I WAS writing a newspaper piece the other day concerning a subject on which I feel very deeply. As a matter of fact, the paper for which I wrote happens, by a fortunate coincidence, to agree with me for once. And yet even a fellow-advocate may be shocked by a columnist's violence of expression, even though they agree in general upon the subject in hand. That is particularly true if the fellow-advocate happens to be an editor who has to take the rap from all those whose toes may be stepped upon by anything which appears in the paper. Columnists are here today and gone tomorrow, while newspapers endure and suffer sometimes because of the recklessness of their employees. Nevertheless, I liked my own way of getting after the assassins of the child-labor amendment a great deal better than the modifications which crept in through a slight process of rewriting. And so I am going to ask permission to reprint the original version.

"In the eighteenth chapter of the Gospel according to St. Matthew it is written of anyone who offends against a child that 'it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the sea.'

"To Albany there should go 110 millstones to the men (I believe they pass as such) who killed the child-labor amendment.

"It goes without saying that these members of the Assembly should be set in the memory books of the voters and blotted out of public life when next they show their heads. But that is too long to wait. Right now they should be belled like buzzards so that all shall know them by their comings and goings.

"And quite properly some distinguishing mark might be set on the door of their abodes so that decent men and women may pass by on the other side and avoid the dwelling places of the unclean.

"Dirty days have been known before in the Assembly in Albany, but now the lower house of the Empire State becomes the lowest in all the land. At times, I understand, men have gone to the legislature who were not above sharing in the profits of organized vice, but even such might recoil at the thought of trafficking in the toil of children.

"This is our legislature—yours and mine. It is craven and corrupt. And we must share some part of the blame. Many of us in election years have been so intent upon some major candidate that we have swept down a line of levers hardly knowing or caring about the fact that we were also expressing a decision as to the Assembly. The name of the man escaped us, if indeed we ever knew it. But we must know and we must care, for these people who sneaked in through the cracks have put the great state of New York in the ranks of the backward states.

"And if we chance to see the regimentation of children in a mill in any part of this broad country we must bow our heads and say, 'That is our concern. This dirty deed was done in Albany.' It is not often that a simple member of the Assembly gets an opportunity to export his stupidity and vileness into every state of the Union. And if anybody says that some few acted out of a high sincerity, it need only be answered that sincerity will hardly serve as a shelter for children who struggle through torturing hours in the sugar-beet fields of the West.

"We know the names of the men who did these things and we know the forces and the agencies which cracked the whip, and these men and things will be remembered.

"In the ranks of the legion of infamy places should be reserved for all who pretend to be wholly against child labor, but—. There are few foes so dangerous as those who proffer aid and then insist that the goal must be obtained in some other way. They are the painted clowns who assist in laying down the circus mat.

"And surely there must be one section of this parade of philanthropists, public men, and prelates devoted to a representative of those publishers who brought the tragedy into being. There ought to be a special award for smugness. I do not see how it will be possible to top the Herald Tribune, which even twisted its news columns and made 'youth control' the mandatory phrase in describing the child-labor amendment. When the knife had been driven home, out popped an editorial entitled 'Now End Child Labor!'

"The friends of exploitation have won a temporary victory. But now we all know our foes and their names. At least they cannot stab us in the back next time. Let the cry go up, 'When do we fight again?'

Out of my original version I lost "buzzards," "infamy," "vileness," "dirty," and quite a lot of phrases. "Dirty" was changed to "shameful." I don't know why. The most peculiar switch of all transformed "organized vice" into "illicit profits." And yet I should not complain too much at being made to seem a marshallow toaster because I started out by pulling punches myself. "Prelates" is a pretty feeble word for "bishops of the Catholic church."

If I have space next week I may discuss the sudden shift of many Catholic dignitaries to the extreme right. On a single Sunday (March 7) Matty Woll told a Catholic group that the C. I. O. was communistic; at another communion breakfast Senator A. Harry Moore attacked free speech, and L. O. Head said that good Catholics never went on strike. And to top it off Father Walsh, before the Columbus Club in Brooklyn, described the church as the sole resource for truth on all public questions. These are interesting developments.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

ST. THOMAS AND THE MOVIES

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

IN A volume* which runs to nearly seven hundred pages Mortimer J. Adler has studied the moving picture as a moral problem. The conclusion which he finally reaches will not surprise most moderate liberals but his method will, for Professor Adler is a leader in the neo-scholastic movement at the University of Chicago, and his "Art and Prudence" is scholasticism in full dress. Beginning with an analysis of the views of Plato and Aristotle on the relation of art to morals, it ends with some remarks upon the sin of pride. In between come not only a full history of the problem and a criticism of the so-called scientific studies of recent years but also a very exhaustive dialectic treatment of the whole question in Thomistic terms.

It is, I think, not too much to say that his chapters on the pseudo-scientific sociological treatises demolish them once and for all by exposing their almost unbelievable shoddiness, but I am afraid that the very persons who could most profit by what he has to say on that subject will get hopelessly bogged down in chapters which turn upon such distinctions as the following, contained in a sentence quoted from Jacques Maritain: "The Man of Learning is an Intellectual demonstrating, the Artist is an Intellectual operating, the Prudent Man is an Intelligent Man of Will acting well." It may be, as Professor Adler would doubtless maintain, that the dialectic method of scholasticism affords the only satisfactory approach to intellectual problems, but even so the fact still remains that the intellectual public will require a great deal of education before it can feel itself at home in arguments conducted in scholastic terms.

Professor Adler's analysis is so extremely formal and elaborate, as well as, frequently, so interesting, that it is impossible to give any reasonably adequate summary, but reduced to its barest bones it is something like this. Plato was very harsh toward poets because he assumed that they had no relation to morals except through simple didacticism. He is thus typically puritan, and most puritans have followed him ever since. St. Thomas, on the other hand, recognized the fundamental importance of Aristotle's theory of purgation, upon which rests any true understanding of the function of art. The question of the wisdom of any prohibition or regulation of art in society turns, then, upon two other questions: first, the question whether or not any particular work affords adequate purgation to the persons contemplating it; and, second, whether or not a particular prohibition or regulation would, by its general effect, do more harm than good. These are questions of fact to which so-called scientific investigations of the influence of the movies upon children and adults have given no adequate answers. We do not know whether or not people actually are influenced, and we do not know the extent to which, even if they are improperly influenced, it would still be preferable to educate for virtue rather than to prohibit a particular evil influence. The artist qua artist is concerned not with morals but with work good by other than moral standards, but he may, in the pursuit of his good, run counter to good of another kind. Society must find a way of mediation but may not violate the necessary freedom of the artist by attempting to dictate the content of art or by "violating the workshop itself by entering it without the credentials of technique." To do so "engages the prudent man in matters exceeding his competence." Society may, nevertheless, find it necessary, acting upon such imperfect knowledge as it can obtain, "to supervise the ways in which works of art reach their audience, to say, not what shall be made, but what shall be received and by whom and under what condition." The whole tendency of the argument is thus to minimize the extent to which censorships are necessary and to come as close to the conclusions of the classic liberal as is possible for anyone who is committed in advance to the assumption that the fundamentals of morality are absolute, not relative, and that the authority to prohibit works of the intellect or imagination can be legitimate.

Certain of Professor Adler's premises, like those just mentioned, can be accepted or rejected but hardly discussed. I think, therefore, that the reader whose philosophy is not scholastic will find that his attempt to criticize "Art and Prudence" is most fruitful when he asks himself whether or not modern liberal thought has any perceptions concerning the nature or function of art to add to those which go back to Plato or Aristotle; and it seems to me that there is at least one fact of some importance which Professor Adler overlooks—the fact, namely, that the poet is actually the original source of many moral ideas, not merely the transmitter of them.

No one will deny, I suppose, that we do get our ideas of what is right or wrong quite as often from works of the imagination as from ethical treatises, and we might argue, I think, that we are perfectly justified in doing so. Professor Adler assumes not only that moral principles are fixed but also that we arrive at them only through formal logic. Yet the poet has as much as the philosopher to do with the establishment of the mores, and if absolutes do exist, then there seems to me no reason to assume that the imagination of the poet does not reach them as often as the logic of the dialectician.

* "Art and Prudence. A Study in Practical Philosophy." Longmans, Green and Company. $5.

Professor Adler does, to be sure, speak of "communication or social education" as one of the functions of art in a democratic society necessarily unnoticed by Plato, who was concerned with an aristocratic state; and it is possible that this term may be intended to include something of what I have in mind. He does, however, continue to assume that logic is the only source of moral truth and that it is obviously proper that the moral influence of art should be supervised by philosophers. But if it is true, as I believe it is, that the health of society owes as much to what artists have discovered as to what philosophers have proved, then there is no more justification for the censorship of art by the philosopher than there is for the censorship of works of philosophy by poets.

Animal Mystery on Display

BY DAVID GREENHOOD

Our giants the shadows
Strike forth upon vineless walls
Frighting us to the pause
In the March moonrise
But when jocular we recognize
"Only us"
They yaw across the dormant acres
Twice as tall
And crawl flat aground
Slowly shamed looking away
From the bare moon
With her fallow light
And lessening smile

BOOKS

Minneapolis Picket Wars

AMERICAN CITY. A RANK AND FILE HISTORY.

By Charles Rumford Walker. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN A number of respects this book, a New Frontiers selection of the League for Industrial Democracy, sets a new high mark in contemporary American journalism. Modeled superficially on the ground-plan laid down by the Lynds in "Middletown," it is fundamentally different—more searching in both method and effect. It names its city, Minneapolis, the fading capital of Jim Hill's prematurely senile empire of lumber, wheat, iron, and transportation. It uses bald, accurate terms—class war, civil war. It chronicles the most extraordinary and in some ways the most significant labor struggle of the post-war era, the strikes of May and July, 1934, in which the gentlemen and clerks of the Citizens' Alliance and the truck drivers of Local 574 fought each other with clubs and stones until the class line was drawn in blood on the streets of the city.

There were casualties in that war. Arthur C. Lyman, attorney for the Citizens' Alliance and vice-president of the American Ball Company, was slugged to death in the Battle of Deputies

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 53-year-old MONEY BACK GUARANTEE.

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. DON QUIXOTE, by Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with over 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. ($12.50) $1.98

2. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL'S WORKS Centenary Edition. In 7 handsome maroon line volumes, stamped in gold. ($21.00) $5.95

3. His Entire Works, Formerly Only Available in 12 Vols. at $35.00

Now—COMPLETE IN 2 VOLUMES AT ONLY $3.98 THE SET
THE COMPLETE WRITINGS OF BRANN, THE ICONOCLAST

With a boldness that outraged convention, this wizard of words MADE THE WORLD BLUSH FOR SHAME. No one who has ever read a single paragraph of Brann's will ever forget his wizardry of words. ELBERT HUBBARD SAID: "Brann took the English language by the tail and snapped its head off."

Artcraft Leather binding, with headbands, gold tops. COMPLETE WORKS IN 2 VOLS. $3.98

4. PECULIARITIES OF BEHAVIOR. By Dr. Wilhelm Stekel. Fascinating analysis of impulsive acts, disorders of instincts and emotions, etc. The textbook of psychoanalysis. ($10.00) The 2 volume set $2.98

5. THE THEATRE: 3,000 Years of the Theatre. By Sheldon Cheney. Profusely illustrated with 204 interesting illustrations. 558 pages. "A thoroughly readable, well-documented and beautifully illustrated history of man's whole adventure in the theatre."—Outlook, Chautauqua Edition. ($10.00) 98c

6. A HISTORY OF CHINESE ART—From Ancient Times to the Present Day. 153 illustrations including 80 in full-page color. ($10.00) $3.98

7. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. $1.00

8. DANTE'S DIVINE COMEDY. The famous Henry F. Cary translation. 130 full page Gustave Doré illustrations. 652 pages. Large clear type. Handsomely, durably bound in tan buckram, size 6 3/4 x 10". ($10.00) $2.98

9. FUNDAMENTALS OF MUSICAL ART. By Edward Dickinson, Litt. D., Editor-in-Chief. Introduces reader to the immense range and wealth of musical knowledge. Complete in 20 vols. ($40.00) $6.95
The 20 volume set

12. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOS. Twelve prints in full color. Size, 9 by 12 inches, Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued they were sold at FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) $98c
The 12 Prints,

10. THE EPIC OF AMERICA. By James Truslow Adams. "The best single volume on American history in existence." Illustrated with wood cuts. 98c

11. MARK TWAIN'S "1601". This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) $1.58

13. THE SEXUAL LIFE OF SAVAGES. With over 90 photographic illustrations from Dr. Malinowski's unrivaled collection. An account of courtship, marriage and family life among the natives of Trobriand Islands, British New Guinea—with a preface by HAVELOCK ELLIS. Complete in 1 volume. ($10.00) $1.49

14. THE WELL OF LONELINESS. By Radclyffe Hall. Complete and unexpurgated. 506 page. ($5.00) 98c

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

N-16

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 280-N, just off press!

Name

Address

City..... State.....

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

A Personal Letter From Spain

By George and Helen Seldes

Bilbao, March 1st. "Madrid is clearly democratic. The peoples of the world are fighting a common enemy of civilization and intelligence. This is our war; if you help, you share Madrid's immortality."

"History is moving fast here and arm chairs will soon become antiques. The situation is more tragic than THE NATION, the NEW REPUBLIC, the New York TIMES, Hearst tabloids, or the NEW MASSES can ever suggest. Men are willing to die . . . millions of them, but they lack. . . ."

The letter is too long to quote here in full . . . last week we gave you a list of goods that Spain lacks. Checks and money orders are coming in a steady stream. NATION readers and friends are doing even more. Many of them are organizing dinners, luncheons, parties, lectures, to raise money for Spain.

The need for food becomes more desperate every day. We must act quickly. While you still have an arm chair over here, send your check and get your friends to send checks so the non-combatants of Spain can eat.

I enclose $.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

Run. He was commemorated by his comrades in a framed parchment reading: "In Memoriam to Arthur C. Lyman, who fought for his country abroad and who knew how to fight and die for the same principles at home." Henry Ness, strike picket, also a World War veteran, was shot during the unprovoked assault of the police on Bloody Friday; and was followed to his grave by a cortege of twenty thousand workers. To these might be added Floyd Bjornsterne Olson, whose death from cancer was hastened, no doubt, by the tragic role he was fated to play in the events described. Also, perhaps, A. W. Strong, director of the Citizens' Alliance, who died while this book was in the making. With him died, one feels, the confident, self-righteous intransigence of the older industrial oligarchy. From now on reaction is likely to wear different colors and move in different ways.

The war had consequences: a stricter definition and alignment of the class forces in the whole Northwest; the setting of new precedents and patterns for the labor struggle, in terms of quasi-military organization and tactics and the realistic use of political and diplomatic stratagems. With important qualifications Minneapolis in the summer of 1934 was a dress rehearsal for what happened in Detroit and Flint a few weeks ago, and for what may happen in textiles tomorrow.

The leadership was different of course. In Minneapolis strangely enough, or perhaps not so strangely, it came chiefly from the followers of Leon Trotsky—"counter-revolutionary fascists," to quote the then current and recently even more exacerbated Stalinist terminology. These Trotskyites, including the Dunne brothers, Skoglund, and Farrell Dobbs, were islanded in the Northwest labor movement after the 1927 split in the Communist Party. They proved they knew how to win strikes; the workers followed them despite the official Communist Party's cries of "sell-out," and still follow them.

In the end this war turned into a battle of wits and character between two proletarian intellectuals: Olson, the gifted, brilliant, ex-Wobbly lawyer-politician, whose life line, if it had been longer, might have led him to the Presidency, and Vincent R. Dunne, the lean, self-schooled, ascetic truck driver, who might easily have become a boss-man but chose instead to mobilize and lead to victory the labor armies of the Northwest. Study the photographs of the two men and you'll see why Ray Dunne won. I interviewed them both in the autumn of 1934 and can vouch for the fairness and accuracy of Mr. Walker's delineations.

The story is indeed heart-breaking. You wince when you see Olson, in the ominous lull that followed Bloody Friday, crack suddenly, call out the National Guard, occupy the strike headquarters, jail the leaders, and proceed, by the logic of the forces which he had thereby released, to break the strike on the winning of which his heart was set, on the winning of which his political fortunes depended. You see him straddling in anguish that implacable "picket fence," and you applaud the desperate, ineluctable counter-thrust of the strike leaders in defying and pillorying their Farmer-Labor Governor. Until the final crack came: a new federal mediator succeeding the exhausted Father Haas; pressure from Washington—Olson must have had a hand in that. Then the settlement which enabled Local 574 to pyramid its meager victory, checkmate the sabotage of the A. F. of L. bureaucracy, organize a dozen other industries, and in two years almost double the wages of its members.

You wince again—or at least I did—when you read that Ray Dunne, jailed and beaten up repeatedly during the July strike, had three ribs broken while leading, two years later, the picket line of the Strutwear strikers. Not a nice story for nice people. In fact, that war gave the nice people of Minneapolis the apocalyptic jitters, as testified to by an officer of the Citizens' Alliance: "There were thousands and thousands of bums and hoodlums and Communists there [at the Battle of Deputies Run]. Agitators worked the crowd up to the highest pitch of mob fury. They shouted, sang, and yelled. It was really horrible. I felt like slipping away, getting out of Minneapolis on to a farm somewhere, and never coming back."

Horrible. A striker testifies: "I seen one cop under a car and a picket poking underneath to get him to come out." Another: "We brought a bushel basket of deputies' and cops' badges back to headquarters, and two polo helmets. One feller had a captain's badge he was pretty proud of." Are these people hoodlums, Communists, Trotskyists? No. Just truck drivers. Family men. Pinochle players. Bowling-club devotees and movie fans like Ray Dunne.

Mr. Walker lets us see the domesticities, the social and psychological patterns, on both sides of the picket fence. He also prepares his drama by a reasonably adequate historical sketch of Minneapolis's seventy-five-year epic of rise and decline, and attempts, somewhat less successfully, to project the action into the future. Almost inevitably there are many gaps in both the factual narrative and the analysis, and some of these one regrets. But the book, besides being meticulously honest, is on the whole closely thought out and well written—a new mark for Mr. Walker and others to shoot at and surpass if they can.

JAMES RORTY

Mr. Wells Picks a Bone

THE CROQUET PLAYER. By H. G. Wells. The Viking Press. $1.25.

HAVING consigned to celluloid his intimations of things to come a century hence, Mr. Wells now directs a popular augury nearer home. For all its prophetic intentions, "The Croquet Player" is distinctly a product of the conjurer's hat and combines horror and homily in a tale which will recommend itself primarily to those who no longer respond to death rays and interplanetary excursions. The volume is not likely to disturb the slumber of readers familiar with the repertory of the horror-makers, but it is expertly paced and adroitly communicated. In general it concerns the haunted parish of Cainsmarsh, to which a Dr. Finchatton, a physician with "the jaded look of a man who does not sleep well" and a tale to unfold, has fled after numerous disappointments in London, in the hope of finding "tranquilizing surroundings" and rheumatism in sufficient abundance to assure him of a practice amid butterflies, wild flowers, and summer visitors. He takes his leave of Cainsmarsh at the close of the story, possessed of many curious demons and no bank account, having duly discovered the village to be a boneyard of Stone Age fossils which have had the effect of immersing the countryside in time past, and brutalizing both himself and the community to the level of potential savages.

The notion offers excellent grist for symbolic extension, but Wells is too dapper a hand to carry it forward successfully in the highly sensitized medium which he has chosen. He makes the "scientific" error of employing poetic symbols as though they were propositions to be proved instead of projecting them with tangents and clarifying them with refractions. A final chapter bearing the title The Intolerable Psychiatrist and implying another of The Tables Turned has

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by
C. B. S. Evans,
M.D., F.A.M.A.,
Member White
House Conference,
Committee on
Maternal Care,
Washington—Introduction by R.
W. Holmes, M.D.,
F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory
and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch. M., M.B.,
Specializing Obstetri-
cian, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London,
England.

including charts of sex organs with detailed explanations

By ROBERT L. DICKINSON, M. D., F.A.C.S., Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital

3-WAY
GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via the Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex
Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."
—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."
—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."
—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."
—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 887-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 plus few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

"From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men know how to perform the sexual act correctly."

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY PUBLICATION . . .

Louis Fischer and Benjamin Stolberg on Trotsky

In order to give both sides an opportunity to discuss the controversial matters presented by Leon Trotsky in "The Revolution Betrayed," which examines the past twenty years of Russian history, we shall publish two full-length reviews of the book—by Louis Fischer and Benjamin Stolberg. No one interested in Russia will care to miss this extraordinary feature.

Samuel Duber on the Oxford Group Movement

The Oxford Group movement headed by Dr. Buchman is different from previous revivalist sects, for it has penetrated the upper middle classes and professional groups almost exclusively. Hence, its theories, its specific treatment of social problems, its strength, its political potentialities, and its present activities are known to few. In a factual article Samuel Duber answers most of the questions Nation readers might ask about this unique movement, which gives religious significance to a comfortable credo of possession in an uncomfortable world.

A Series on the Philippines by James S. Allen

Though presumably the president of a democratic republic, in the Philippines Manuel Quezon functions as a semi-fascist dictator. In this issue of The Nation James S. Allen analyzes Quezon's regime, showing particularly how it is influenced by American military men and methods. In later articles Mr. Allen will discuss the Islands' trade problems with relation to independence and American industrial interests and the attempt of the people of the Islands to oppose the policies of Quezon and his henchmen by means of a popular front.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

3-20-37

been appended, wherein the heart of the mystery is plucked out and packed in expository cold storage. The "croquet player"—whose titular honors are at best spurious—is seen to typify the reader, and the bogs of Cainsmarsh, to the last ghost, give up their identity with the powers of darkness and barbarity. All that is unclear through omissions either of flippancy or perversity remains no less unclear, and nothing is revealed that was not already sufficiently plain. The symbol itself is ready for a place on the boneheap beside the other fossils.

Doubtless, there will be many to devour the story with the best will in the world simply as a horror tale of good-old-fashioned variety—in which case its symbolic pretensions will speedily assume their proper status among the parlor divertissements as an agreeable substitute for automatic writing or the ouija board. The misfortune lies in the fact that "The Croquet Player" is conceived in the same genre that produced so profound and apposite an allegory for the times as Thomas Mann's "Mario and the Magician." Mr. Wells's eye, as always, belongs to the remoter lenses of the telescope and is most "prophetic" when it is fixed on astral spaces and imaginary islands, where riddles may be resolved in vacuo—even though they turn into parables in the end.

BEN BELITT

Whitman Reconsidered

WHITMAN. By Edgar Lee Masters. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.50.

HART CRANE'S words, written during a period when most poets showed little interest in Whitman, are proving prophetic: "The most typical and valid expression of the American psychosis seems to me still to be found in Whitman. . . . He, better than any other, was able to co-ordinate those forces in America which seem most intractable, fusing them into a universal vision which takes on additional significance as time goes on. He was a revolutionist . . . but his bequest is still to be realized in all of its implications."

Today Whitman is indubitably one of the chief influences upon younger poets. His pronouncements on liberty are repeated, even though his general conceptions are altered to fit a different epoch. For it must be remembered that Whitman's myth of America was one possible only to an agrarian and expanding country. He made part of his thinking the conception of solidarity which entered American proletarian thought in the fifties through the labors of Engels and Marx. But living in a period in which the frontier still offered at least an illusion of equality, Whitman saw no contradiction between the principles of complete democracy and those of complete individualism.

Edgar Lee Masters is not, however, so much interested in Whitman's political theories as in the poet Whitman and the Whitman who defied puritan repressions. Masters has in abundance the zeal necessary for writing one biography after another. He delights in surveying all the materials and attempting to reproduce the poet as a living, natural human being. Whitman has already achieved greatness; he needs no defense—as Lindsay needed it, with whom for many reasons Masters almost too closely identified himself. This life of Whitman is therefore more objective and more impersonal than was the Lindsay biography. It is, moreover, the most comprehensive life that has yet appeared.

About half of the book is devoted to documentation. But one reads through the mass of already published material with renewed interest, for Masters is using this material to prove Whitman's general humanity. He is not afraid to acknowledge the great poet's faults—his laziness, his inferior abilities as a young newspaperman, his childishness, his egotism, his many idiosyncratic blind spots and incorrect judgments concerning other literary figures both of the past and of his own day. Then, too, Masters is particularly interested in making a case for Whitman as that type of man who is subnormal sexually and whose passions flow, therefore, into tender and imaginative channels only. Producing all the papers about the autopsy performed on the poet and all the medical reports, Masters proves conclusively that Whitman was long crippled by general miliary tuberculosis and died of it, not of any venereal disease. He indicates that Whitman's boastings about natural children were those of a man who wished to be thought completely natural. Certainly none of these children have claimed their famous father. Whitman's letters to Peter Doyle, the young workman whom he loved dearly and helped financially, are given as examples of the aging poet's tenderness and desire to be loved. In depicting this side of Whitman's character Masters is very convincing.

In general, the biography is rambling, repetitive, crammed with quotations, but it is nevertheless very serviceable. Many books have been published about Whitman, but this is the most human and complete study of him. Particularly moving and detailed are the chapters on his last years and his final illness and death.

EDA LOU WALTON

Improving the Gospels

LIFE OF JESUS. By Francois Mauriac. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

M MAURIAC is a writer with a wide reputation in France. His "Life of Jesus" has run through several editions there. Now that the book is available in translation, one suspects that the popularity of the French edition is due more to the name and fame of the author than to its own intrinsic merits. The author is a devout Catholic. As such he is less inclined to reduce the teachings of Jesus to the proportions of liberal moralism than some of the numerous literary men who in recent years have tried their hand at a life of Jesus. On the other hand, he is more closely bound to the delivered tradition than some of the other interpreters. Furthermore, he shares with all amateur interpreters, whether skeptics or believers, ignorance of any new knowledge which modern historical scholarship may have discovered about Jesus. This happens in the present moment to be of considerable importance because of the researches into the relation of the thought of Jesus to that of the apocalyptic writers of Hebrew faith. It is just as difficult for a literary man to write an adequate life of Jesus without a full knowledge of the historical background as for him to write of a Napoleon or a Cromwell without complete mastery of the relevant historical material. No one dares to attempt the latter, but various men of literary gifts have been drawn to the former task by either their piety or the artistic challenge in the subject. In the case of Mauriac's effort the final result is a Life which manages to be little more than a free rendering of the Gospel narratives. The primary virtue of the attempt lies in the author's sometimes very penetrating explications of the words of Jesus. Its defect is that the narrative is spoiled rather than improved by efforts to heighten its drama and sharpen its contrasts.

R. N.

AN UNUSUALLY DISTINGUISHED NOVEL
FOR A DISCRIMINATING AUDIENCE

Nightwood

BY DJUNA BARNES

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY T. S. ELIOT

"I have wit enough to realize that this extraordinary novel, like 'Ulysses,' requires for complete understanding half a dozen readings. I have read it only twice and am persuaded, at least, that it is an original, not an eccentric, book. . . My hunch is that 'Nightwood,' if not a work of genius throughout, has genius in it. That is rare enough."—Clifton Fadiman, New Yorker

"Here is a novel which I specially recommend to all who know that, though most novels are entertainment and little more, now and then a novel is a work of art like a poem, to be read with attention to each word and consideration of its ideas and its structure."—Carl Van Doren, Boston Herald

$2.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & CO., 383 Madison Ave., N. Y.

THOMAS MANN

cables to Harper & Brothers:

"I congratulate you upon the publication of Silone's novel Bread and Wine in which a loving knowledge of the Italian people and a passionate love of freedom are most happily united."

BREAD AND WINE by Ignazio Silone is to be published April 2nd. Reserve a first edition copy at your bookstore now. $2.50. HARPER'S. A Story Press Book.

THIS vision of a woman's rebirth, says The Nation, "seems directly derived from Lawrence . . . and the fine beauty of the prose, its simplicity, at once tender and precise, are reminiscent of the early Stein."

Anna Becker

BY MAX WHITE

STACKPOLE SONS NEW YORK CITY $2.50

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40. Eves. 8:40. 300 seats $1.10

STORM OVER PATSY

by Bruno Frank, adapted by James Bridie
with SARA ALLGOOD ROGER LIVESEY
CLAUDIA MORGAN IAN McLEAN
LEO G. CARROLL

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday & Saturday, 2:40. Eve., 8:40.

A frank and open discussion which concerns every honest supporter of PEACE and FREEDOM!

"SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY"

presents

MAURITZ A. HALLGREN

Author and Editor

"WHERE DO THE LIBERALS STAND?"

LOUIS FISCHER
Moscow Correspondent

MAURICE HINDUS
Noted Author

JAMES WATERMAN WISE
Editor of "Peoples Press"

MALCOLM COWLEY, Chairman
Literary Editor "New Republic"

MECCA TEMPLE, 133 WEST 55TH STREET

FRIDAY, MARCH 19TH, 8 p. m.

Tickets 25c-40c-75c—At All Workers Bookshops
Advance Tickets "Soviet Russia Today," 824 B'way, AL. 4-2378

Were you a student rebel at Podunk in '06?
Have you made Mrs. Dilling's list?

Come and meet your classmates at an

"ALUMNI HOMECOMING"

Dinner sponsored by the American Student Union in honor of those rebels and heretics who, since 1900, have created a liberal tradition on the American campus.

SUNDAY, MARCH 21st, AT 7 P. M.

THE AMERICAN WOMAN'S ASSOCIATION

361 West 57th Street

New York City

The program—"A Panorama of the Twentieth Century on the Campus"—will mark the growth of the student movement since 1900. Among the former student leaders who will speak are Robert Morss Lovett, Harry Laidler, Ernest L. Meyer, Addison T. Cutler, Gerude Folks, Roger Baldwin, John Rothschild, Robert Dunn, Bella Dodd, John Herling, Osmond Fraenkel, Alfred Bingham, and many others.

SONGS, MOVIES, SKITS

Dinner: $2.00 per plate. Phone reservations to AL. 4-4072

A. S. U., 112 East 19th Street, N. Y. C.

New Novels

NONE SHALL LOOK BACK. By Caroline Gordon. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

AT THE moment novels dealing with the Civil War seem destined to be measured by "Gone with the Wind." Miss Gordon's novel is shorter, less verbose, less reckless, less spectacular; the narrative flows less freely; the details are not so lavish; and there is more intelligence. Intelligence, indeed, of a distinguished and excellent sort is, in Miss Gordon's three novels, an outstanding characteristic. If it is not the only necessary attribute for a novelist, it is, for a novel that will endure, of prime importance. "None Shall Look Back" opens with the bland and charming life of Kentucky at the outbreak of the war; the afternoon sunlight on the rose garden gives the tone. And it breaks naturally into the siege of Fort Donelson and comes to a heady climax in the swift and desperate scenes of the Battle of Chickamauga. The battle scenes, indeed, have a power and passion lacking and perhaps necessary in other sections of the book. The romance between Rives Allard and his cousin Lucy is muted at the beginning when it should be most clear and free—Miss Gordon's head got in the way of her heart here—so that there is not sufficient contrast at the end when the war is lost and the old life is ended and Rives is dead. It is possible that Miss Gordon was less interested in Rives and Lucy than in General Nathan Bedford Forrest, on whom she lets herself go. He is a dashing buccaneer, a stern, dark-haired man on a great war horse, at the last a heroic figure of defeat. In our time, when heroism has rather gone out of literary fashion, General Forrest is a satisfying figure. He will cause an admirable novel to be remembered, one whose faults, where it has faults, are those of understatement and restraint but never of sentimentality or cheap melodrama.

THE ANTIGUA STAMP. By Robert Graves. Random House. $2.50.

Mr. Graves is also intelligent and an accomplished writer, but he is not above monkeyshines of the most agreeable sort. This story of a postage stamp and of the brother and sister who claimed it and fought for it, in and out of the law courts, for half a lifetime, is mostly monkeyshines, in spite of a number of hard things which Mr. Graves has to say about English public schools, the clergy, the law, and modern life in general. The stamp is unique; the brother is a bounder; the sister is clever, unscrupulous, and approaches, in her conduct, a kind of barbarian justice. The net result is highly diverting.

THEATRE. By W. Somerset Maugham. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

When Mr. Maugham dispenses shoddy he does it like a gentleman. The outer wrappings are always bright, smart, and not without elegance. This story of the greatest actress in England, her handsome, middle-aged husband, and her young lover (who, alas, is a boor), is put together expertly, in the best theatrical tradition. The lighting is costly, the sets are modern, the direction is of the best, the acting could hardly be improved upon. But the play is third-rate. Maybe it is fourth-rate. There is no use getting impatient with Mr. Maugham, who showed us long ago that he could do so much better than this. In a way he is just having his little joke, and keeping his typewriter from rusting. For all his recent novels are excellent publicity for a great book which he wrote twenty-two years ago.

CAROLINE SMITH

DRAMA

Sweet and Light

LAST week an editorial paragraph in this very journal called attention to the fact that sweetness and light seem to be coming back into our theater. Further confirmation for the statement is now furnished by the latest offering at the Guild Theater, where "Storm over Patsy" turns out to be quite unashamedly pleasant. Unless my fancy is running away with me, the audience required some little time to get accustomed to the shock of not being shocked before it settled down to the enjoyment of one of the funniest last acts seen here in some time; and I myself kept wondering what it was that seemed vaguely old-fashioned about the piece. Was it, I asked myself, the somewhat anecdotal character of the plot or, digging deeper, something about the dramaturgic method? Thinking it over, I came, however, to the conclusion that the explanation was less esoteric. "Storm over Patsy" reminded me of the past because it was cheerful.

The plot has, to be sure, its social implications. The rising young politician in a small Scotch town obviously has a bit of the provincial Mussolini in his make-up, and it is that which leads him on to the egregious mistake of treating too lightly the case of an apple-woman whose dog Patsy has been impounded for want of a license. One thing leads to another, and when his career goes crashing about his ears, the moral is plain; but I am afraid that the primary intention is not so much to instruct as to extract all the very considerable fun to be got out of the humors of a provincial town. Just what the play was like before James Bridie translated it out of the German of Bruno Frank and then transported it to Scotland I do not know, but in the present incarnation it is innocently amusing. Everything turns out for the best because the people, seeing the promise of big tyrannies in the presence of little ones, will have none of the masterful statesman with lofty ideals—which is exactly as it should be but not, unfortunately, as it frequently is. By the time the hilarious farce of the trial in the last act is reached, even the mild moral is largely forgotten and one has come to be less concerned over the fate of the exponent of strong rule than over the question of whether or not the testy judge—played with rich humor by Leo Carroll—will or will not ever succeed in finding out who is supposed to have stolen the dog from whom, or just why anyone should care.

Except in one respect the play has been staged and acted with fine judgment. The one exception is traceable, I think, to a certain failure to realize just how anxious a modern audience is not to be unsophisticated, and it consists in the admission of certain traditional bits of dialogue or business which suggest too powerfully the age of innocence. Comic servants are, not without reason, somewhat suspect, and so are Sunday-go-to-meeting shoes too tight for their wearer's feet. Not, of course, that there is anything really wrong with either. Generations yet unborn will doubtless laugh at both, and audiences are going to like "Storm over Patsy" in any event. But they are also going to wonder whether they can afford to do so, and it would have been wiser to remove everything too obviously part of a tradition we sophisticates are committed to despising. Innocence should be disguised or someone may recognize it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

OPEN ROAD TRIPS

RUSSIAN TOURS

STUDENT TOURS

Trips which show you more than tourist sights at least cost of time and money. Open to students, teachers, members of professions.

May Day and the Russian Theatre.

Leader: Norris Houghton, author of "Moscow Rehearsals."

Sailing April 14. Six weeks. $387

General Survey Tour. Leader:

Walt Carmon, editor "International Literature," Moscow 1932-

'36. Sailing June 26. Nine weeks. $394

A Travel "Collective." Leader: Dr.

Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3.

Eight weeks. $543

Julien Bryan's Sixth Annual Trip

through the highways and byways of the Soviet Union. Sailing June 19. Nine Weeks. $694

Public Health Survey. Leader:

John A. Kingsbury, co-author of

"Red Medicine." Sailing July

10. Nine weeks. $797

Open Road Travel Seminar (Fourth

Season). Leader: Anna Louise

Strong, Editor "Moscow Daily

News." Sailing July 4. Nine

weeks. $895

Student hosts abroad. Itineraries which cover the summer or leave time to vagabond. Membership restricted to students.

Guests in Europe. A series of trips combining a choice of countries.

Sailing June 30. $349 to $659

Tour of France. An intimate and comprehensive view of French life. Travel by motor. Sailing

July 3. Six weeks. $297

Tour of Germany. The Rhine, the Bavarian Alps, and the most interesting German cities. Sailing

June 27. Six weeks. $326

Tour of Italy. Italian art, pic-turesqueness, and contemporary life combined with a Mediteranean cruise. Sailing June 26.

Eight weeks. $325

Tour of England. The great cities and the merry countryside—the past and present. Sailing July 3.

Five and one-half weeks. $325

American Student Union Tour (Europe and Russia). Contacts with social movements and leaders.

Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. $499

A dozen other unusual trips for students and their elders.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street, New York

NEW MASSES PRING

BALL

SAT. EVE. MAR. 27

$1 in advance

$1.50 at the door

CLEF CLUB ORCHESTRA

HOTEL EDISON

228 West 47th Street, New York City

Dancing until two a. m.

Tickets on Sale: NEW MASSES, 31 East 27th Street (order by mail or telephone CAledonia 5-3076); Columbia Bookstore, 2960 Broadway; Rand Bookstore, 7 East 15th Street; Putnam Bookstore, 2 West 45th Street; Chelsea Bookshop, 58 West 8th Street; Workers and Peoples Bookshops.

MOVING? If you subscribe to The Nation, please give us three weeks' notice, the old address as well as the new. Notify The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

THE STORY OF JOHN L. LEWIS

BRUCE MINTON and JOHN STUART have made an exhaustive study of this aggressive figure against the background of his entire labor career. They have recorded little known bits of history, left to remain hidden away in the files of dusty old newspapers. They have traced the amazing development of a conservative old-line union leader into one of the most progressive and powerful leaders of a rank and file movement, the C.I.O., whose activities are still in their early stages. What is more, the authors have seen this career as a unity, as a logical development, as a process in which the parallel growth of labor's strength profoundly influenced Lewis's entire approach to organizational problems and tactics. This is the "inside story" of a man whose name is identified with the most purposeful and militant labor organization in America today. To see John L. Lewis clearly is to gain an important insight into the profound industrial struggles of our time.

BEGINS IN THIS WEEK'S NEW MASSES

SPECIAL INTRODUCTORY OFFER

Three Months for One Dollar!

NEW MASSES, 31 East 27th St., New York City

Enclosed find one dollar for which please enter my subscription for three months in accordance with your special introductory offer.

Name

Street

City and State

Occupation

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

RECORDS

IF YOU like "La Bohème" you will enjoy Columbia's new set of Act IV (four records, $6). For not often is there an opportunity to hear this music sung as it is by Lisa Perli, Heddle Nash, John Brownlee, and others, to hear it played as it is by the London Philharmonic Orchestra, and to hear it phrased as it is by Beecham. For myself, I like the gay portions of "La Bohème," which include the beginning of Act IV; but the tear-jerking in the rest of this act I cannot endure. Again I must wonder what mental processes resulted in the decision to have Beecham record an act of Puccini rather than an act of Verdi—not to speak of the second or third act of "Meistersinger." You may understand my wonder if you listen to the excerpts from Verdi's "Masked Ball" on Columbia's February list (one record, $1.50). You may, as I did, laugh for sheer pleasure at the characteristic expressive force of the opening melody of "Ma dall' arido stelo," and again at this force in the figures that appear in the orchestral accompaniment when this melody is repeated. The excerpts are sung in none too distinguished fashion by Gina Cigna.

Most of Bach's sonatas and partitas for unaccompanied violin, which fill many people with proper awe, fill me with boredom. Bach's craftsmanship could grind out music even without the prompting or participation of feeling; and these works are some of the results. An exception is the Partita in D minor, or rather one movement of it—the Chaconne, which is one of the greatest things in all Bach. Milstein's performance is straightforward and well recorded (three records, $4.50); but there is more in the work than he finds to bring out.

The best works of Loeffler—the "Poem," the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem"—are the works of a minor master, almost excessively fastidious in emotion and workmanship. None of these is recorded; and what Columbia offers now is a product of Loeffler's last years and declining powers—a Partita for violin and piano in which he too reverts to the eighteenth century, with results which have as little significance as the results of some other attempts of that sort, but which are more agreeable in sound. The performance by Jacques Gordon and Lee Pattison and the recording are good (four records, $6).

Most performances of Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" Symphony are hysterical; the performance by the Paris Conservatory Orchestra under Gaubert (five records, $7.50) sounds as perfunctory and listless as though they had considered the work beneath them, which it is not. There are pages in the first and last movements which I find magnificent not only in their emotional and imaginative power but in their extraordinary feeling for the entire complex of musical line, color, and mass.

Beecham is also represented on Columbia's February list by a recording of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" (one record, $1.50). The performance with the London Philharmonic is superb; the recording improves as the grooves are cleaned out but remains unsatisfactory. On another single record ($1.50) is a charming Corelli Suite for a string orchestra (Sarabande, Gigue, Badinerie), well played by the Madrid Symphony under Arbos, and well recorded a few years ago.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

The Supreme Court "Grab"

Dear Sirs: I have your issue of February 13 containing your editorial on the Supreme Court grab now being attempted by our ruthless Roosevelt. . . .

For ■ supposed present advantage to your clientele, you are willing to sacrifice the traditions of justice in this country. Having no program to effect the remedy for the injustices which you feel exist in this country, you propose to overthrow institutions which prevent personal government, that is, fascism. I have the strongest feelings of revulsion against so-called liberalism of this kind, which prefers a policy making for revolution and internal discord to one of gradual growth and change.

PERRY J. STEARNS

Milwaukee, Wis., March 2

[In our issue of January 9, 1937, we published a general program entitled "Fourteen Points for Congress," and have since followed with specific programs for relief, the judicial power, labor, neutrality and peace, and farm tenancy. If Mr. Stearns will continue reading The Nation he will find during the next few months our programs for the remaining nine points.—EDITORS, THE NATION.]

Court of Big Business

Dear Sirs: Your readers may be interested in the appended reply to a communication addressed to me by ■ number of leading American writers, namely, James Truslow Adams, Marc Connelly, Edna Ferber, Sinclair Lewis, Robert Littell, Dorothy Thompson, Bernard De Voto, and William Allen White:

I thank you for including me in your company. I note that you do not seek to influence my convictions regarding the President's message on the Supreme Court. This is wise of you, because it will save you a lot of wasted time. What you do is to ask me to telegraph my Senators and Congressmen "demanding the fullest possible discussion" of the President's proposal. You tell me that you are "not aware of the existence of any emergency which justifies the risk of hasty action upon an issue of such importance."

In reply permit me to say that I should have supposed that liberal and intelligent Americans would already have given "most thorough consideration" to the need of changing the Supreme Court. They should have given it when the Supreme Court destroyed our child-labor enactments, and thus made plain that it paid no attention whatsoever to the clause in the Constitution which gives Congress the right to provide for the general welfare. I should have thought that American writers would have come to the same decision which I came to—that that Supreme Court of big business should be modified and "unpacked," or rendered impotent to injure the general welfare, by the quickest and most effective method which any President could devise.

You who call yourselves "leading American writers" tell me that you are not aware of the existence of any emergency, etc."

Presumably you have failed to note that we still have eight or ten million persons unemployed, and that upon a splurge of borrowed money we are starting upon another Wall Street boom which will prepare another quick collapse with the risk of civil war such as we are seeing in Spain. We are piling up steam in the boiler, and we have six or seven old men sitting on the safety valve, and you "leading American writers" tell me that you "are not aware of the existence of any emergency."

Well, I may or may not be a "leading American writer," but I certainly am not leading in the same direction that you are. Count me out!

UPTON SINCLAIR

Pasadena, Cal., March 1

Paine on the Judiciary

Dear Sirs: . . . Government by judicial negative was especially obnoxious to Paine, Jefferson, and others of the Founders. "The great object of my fear is the federal judiciary," declared Jefferson. "The whole judiciary needs reform," said Paine. . . .

Paine believed that the Constitution was defective in that it did not provide proper means for determining the "good behavior" of judges and for their removal. He therefore proposed to amend the article establishing the judiciary by inserting after the words, "The judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior," the following words: "but for reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment, the President may remove any of them on the address of a majority of both houses of Congress."

. . . Under his plan the Congress was to first propose the removal of judges, and the President, in his discretion, could then remove them. This method would have brought the matter as close to the people as possible. And this was Paine's aim, for he declared that under the Constitution as it stood "the people of the United States have no share in the appointment of judges, nor any control over them afterwards, and if the representatives of Congress have no cognizance over the conduct of judges as to good behavior or ill behavior, the judiciary may become domineering or even dangerous." And then Paine added: "It is fair to suppose that those who formed the Constitution never thought of this when they made the judges independent of our own Executive."

R. C. ROPER

Elmhurst, N. Y., March 4

The N. A. M. and the Special Conference Committee

Dear Sirs: Our attention has been called to the following statement in Mr. Ward's Washington Weekly comment in The Nation of February 27: "Representatives of a dozen of the nation's giant corporations have been meeting once a month in New York. . . . It is called the 'special conference committee' of the National Association of Manufacturers."

We fully realize that The Nation misses no opportunity directly or indirectly to criticize this association; nevertheless we believe even in The Nation misrepresentation should not be deliberate, and that there should be at least a reasonable standard of accuracy. Certainly if Mr. Ward had called our Washington office or if your own office had called the office here, the facts could have been ascertained. The "special conference committee" does not have and never did have any connection with the National Association of Manufacturers. As a matter of fact, some of the companies included in its membership are not eligible for membership in this association, and not all of those which are eligible actually hold such membership.

We are not criticizing the "special conference committee"; we would in fact welcome the membership of those eligible companies which are not now members of this association. I nevertheless direct your attention to the fact that the name of the National Association of Manufacturers was included in your columns inaccurately, unfairly, and without the slightest justification.

NOEL SARGENT, Secretary
New York, March 3

Dear Sirs: Mr. Sargent's letter is delightful. When even the National Association of Manufacturers begins showing compunction about being associated with such enterprises as the "special conference committee," we must conclude that progress indeed is being made.

I hope that Mr. Sargent will be patient with The Nation and me for a few more weeks until the La Follette committee gets around to holding hearings on the "special conference committee." Then, I believe, Mr. Sargent will find that the relationship between the N. A. M. and the conference committee is not so remote a thing as he apparently believes.

Meanwhile, he is technically correct in his complaint, and if he will examine the record of the hearing to which I referred—and examine it in the light of his own long experience with Congressional investigations—he will see how the record on the point in question is a little confused. It was in attempting to condense and refine that testimony that I made the mistake to which he calls attention. My error in construction probably was influenced by my recollection of Glen Alwyn Bowers's testimony before the NLRB last April. Mr. Sargent ought to read that testimony, too. In it Mr. Bowers, testifying as an expert on labor relations from the employers' side, traced the origin and history of the N. A. M. from 1898 to date and described as its primary concern forming a united front of employers against labor unions.

PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 8

On Sound Reproduction

Dear Sirs: As one who is greatly interested in Ben Haggin's department in The Nation, I must deplore certain basic inaccuracies that lessen its worth. These inaccuracies flow from Mr. Haggin's complete ignorance of the technical aspects of phonograph reproduction, however valid may be his judgments in the aesthetic field, where I concede his qualifications to be superior to mine.

In your issue of January 23 he uses half-digested technical information so badly that an engineer must be highly amused and lay readers completely led astray by his befuddled conception of what actually occurs in the process of sound reproduction. Thus he says that without the use of certain auxiliary speakers, the overtones of high frequency were blocked. The use of the word "blocked" is amusingly wrong, and stemming from the same false premise, but much more serious in its confusion, is the statement about disconnecting the auxiliary speakers because of their disadvantageous effect on tone. The disconnected speakers, had they remained in the circuit, could not possibly have had a bad effect on the tone result. It's like saying that an eighty horse-power motor called upon to deliver forty horse-power will deliver it badly. On the contrary, the unused potential capacity serves to deliver the forty horse-power more smoothly. The unused speakers, if allowed to remain in the circuit, would at worst have been dormant; they could not have introduced distortion.

One popular manufacturer of quality markets an instrument that is claimed to go to 7,500 cycles on the high-frequency side both for radio and phonograph, and probably does. He also produces an instrument at a high price for which is claimed 12,000 cycles, but he is scrupulous enough to explain, when asked, that neither broadcast stations nor available phonograph records reproduce anything as high as that. SAMUEL E. LESSER

New York, March 9

CONTRIBUTORS

ANDRE MALRAUX, the distinguished French novelist, author of "Man's Fate," "The Royal Way," and "Days of Wrath," has been fighting in Spain at the head of the international air squadron. At present he is in this country speaking and writing for the cause of the Spanish loyalists.

RALPH THURSTON is the pseudonym of an American correspondent in Germany.

CHARLES R. WALKER'S new book "American City," is reviewed by James Rorty in this issue.

JAMES S. ALLEN recently spent three months in the Philippines collecting the material for his Nation articles and a forthcoming book.

DAVID GREENHOOD, a Californian, is author of "Poems, etc."

JAMES RORTY is the author of "Where Life Is Better: An Unsentimental American Journey."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new one required for subscriber's change of address.

COMPASS SPECIALS to the SOVIET UNION

● 3rd SOVIET TRAVEL SEMINAR

Leader—Prof. Bernhard J. Stern - Co-Editor Science and Society

● 2nd SOCIAL CHANGES TOUR

Leader—Dr. Clinton J. Taft - Director C. L. U. of S. Calif.

● 2nd OLD AND NEW WORLD TOUR

Leader—Prof. Bernhard Ostrolenk, C. C. N. Y.

● 2nd UNITED FRONT GROUP

Leader—Alvin E. Coons, Univ. of Iowa

● SOCIAL SECURITY SEMINAR

Leader—Charlotte Todes - - - Labor leader and editor

Also a Selection of Other Outstanding Individual and Conducted Tours

For descriptive pamphlets NR apply

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU

55 WEST 42ND STREET, NEW YORK Longacre 5-3070

HOUSE WANTED

Looking for fairly large furnished house in quiet country near N. Y. and beach, not far from some small town, preferably lower Conn., equipped for simple, quick housekeeping, from early May to end of October. Write fully to Louis Adamic, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT TO SUBLET

Charming apartment overlooking Hudson. Living room, three large bedrooms, full-size kitchen. Sublet unfurnished April or May to October—$60. Can renew lease expiring Oct. 1. 640 West 153rd St., Apt. D5. Tel. Audubon 3-3992.

APARTMENT WANTED

Cultured young lady desires to share semi-furnished or furnished apartment; kitchen privileges. Up to 23 St. Manhattan. Box 881, c/o The Nation.

ROOMS FOR RENT

Large, beautifully furnished room. Also attractive small room. Reasonable. 93rd, near Drive. Call Riverside 9-5612, afternoons.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MARCH 27, 1937

NUMBER 13

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

MAKING SITDOWNS LEGAL

"SPAIN IN FLAMES"

THE CLICHY RIOTS

INFLATION IS HERE

WASHINGTON LETTER by Paul W. Ward

HOW NOT TO PLAN PUBLIC HOUSING

by Langdon W. Post

KEEPING AMERICA OUT OF WAR

by Louis Fischer

MEDICAL CENSORSHIP IN CALIFORNIA

by Lillian Symes

TROTSKY vs. MALRAUX

WHAT IS THE NATION COMING TO?

by Oswald Garrison Villard

EXPERT TESTIMONY by Heywood Broun

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

REVOLUTION BY POETIC JUSTICE by William Troy

ADAM SMITH IS PLEASED by Wesley C. Mitchell

SMALL TRADE WIND by Harry Levin

THE MEANINGS OF VALUE by Lincoln Reis

A SOUTHERN RECORD by Philip Blair Rice

NATURALIST IN COLONIAL AMERICA

by Clara Gruening Stillman

DRAMA: WHAT EVERY WOMAN KNOWS

by Joseph Wood Krutch

FILMS: PLIGHT OF AN INTELLECTUAL

by Mark Van Doren

DRAWING by Jolan Gross Bettelheim

337

340

340

341

342

343

344

347

349

351

352

353

354

356

358

359

360

361

361

362

The Shape of Things

★

THE WHOLE NATION MOURNS THE VICTIMS of the school disaster at New London, Texas. Thus far the evidence indicates that a residue gas line from an oil field was tapped for its gas, and that the use of this gas in a faulty conducting system resulted in the explosion. There is a tragic irony in the fact that in the Texas oil fields, spouting forth their natural wealth from the earth, such a disaster should have been occasioned by the desire to economize on heating costs. It is one of the paradoxes of an economic system that seeks to maximize profit and minimize costs, and is wasteful only of human life.

★

THE SLAUGHTER BY INSULAR POLICE OF TEN marching Nationalists in Ponce, the second largest city in Puerto Rico, is the natural and deplorable outcome of a long series of bitter clashes between the authorities and the more intransigent groups on the island. It is significant that the strength of popular feeling against the United States should have increased rather than diminished under the supposed beneficence of the New Deal administration. The details of the incident are still lacking, but enough facts have been published to make it evident that a peaceful demonstration was ruthlessly dispersed by machine-gun fire. We shall print next week an article by Oswald Garrison Villard, who has just returned from the island.

★

PROSPECTS FOR THE CONFERENCE REPORT which seeks to reconcile the Pittman and McReynolds neutrality bills are none too promising. The only favorable development is the likelihood that the McReynolds "cash-and-carry" provision will be accepted instead of the Pittman proposal. The McReynolds bill puts the "cash-and-carry" policy into effect only at the discretion of the President during the next two years. This takes away certain of the dangers of the inflexible Pittman provision, which would operate to the advantage of a great sea power under any circumstances. On the other hand, there is a strong chance that the deplorable clause in the McReynolds bill prohibiting the solicitation or acceptance of funds by belligerents or factions will be retained. While Mr. McReynolds has insisted that the clause was not meant to stop humanitarian contributions, it leaves far too large an area of discretion to the State Department, whose record in the matter of humanitarian aid to Spain has been none too good.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

WHILE MUSSOLINI HAS BEEN ACTING CAESAR in Libya, his troops have suffered a crushing defeat in Spain. This is the first time the Loyalists have taken the offensive, and the rout of the demoralized Italians may prove to be the decisive turn of the war. The crucial role has been played by the new airplanes which the Spanish government has recently acquired, and which have given it the whip hand in aviation. In their hurry to get away, moreover, the Italians left behind large supplies of munitions which will prove useful to the munitions-starved loyalists. The incident is very like what happened during the Russian civil war, when the government troops captured the munitions of Kolchak and Denikin and defeated the Whites with their own batteries. Meanwhile, a dispatch by Pertinax to the New York Times reveals that even the English lion-worm is beginning to turn, and is showing a disposition to support Spain before the League of Nations in its protest against the presence of 90,000 Italian troops on Franco's side. England should also act upon the protest from Valencia that while the rebel borders are being patrolled by the English and French (neutrals), the loyalist borders are patrolled by Germans and Italians (belligerents).

★

IT SEEMS TO US THAT THE PRESS, IN PLAYING up the threat of taxation in Marriner Eccles's statement on inflation, missed its chief point. The Governor of the Reserve Board was not merely issuing a timely warning. He was establishing an alibi. He has just begun to realize that there are certain vital aspects of the price structure which cannot be controlled through changes in the rediscount rate or reserve requirements; aspects which respond rather to the controls exercised by ownership—by monopolies, patent pools, cartels. Mr. Eccles's statement was designed to establish this fact clearly in the public mind before it should become apparent, as our editorial in this issue on inflation indicates, that the machinery he operates is unable to check runaway prices. Unfortunately his purpose was thwarted by the newspapermen, who knew their public better than Mr. Eccles's purposes.

★

THE POPE'S ENCYCLICAL LETTER READ TO German Catholic congregations on the morning of Palm Sunday immediately provoked an angry reply from the Nazis. It may lead to the renunciation of the Concordat between Hitler and the Vatican. The vigor of the Pope's attack upon Nazi ideology and the bluntness of his charge that the German state has violated the Concordat contrast with the recent conciliatory pastoral letter of the German bishops, in which they were still pleading to be accepted as equal partners with the Nazis in their common fight against "communism." The change in tone was undoubtedly occasioned by the increasing prestige of the pagan religious movement within the Hitler government, for which the rising star of Himmler, the head of the secret police, is partly responsible. One possible reason for the increased power of the pagan forces within the government seems to be that the conservatives—Göring, Schacht, the Army, et al.—who have beaten the more radical forces in the field of economics, have sought to appease the resentment of the radicals by giving them freer rein in the cultural field. The immediate effect of this development has been the increased pressure of the police upon Catholic parochial schools in contravention of the Concordat. The Pope's letter now places the Catholics in the same desperate opposition to the government in which the Protestant church already stands.

★

AN INCONSPICUOUS LITTLE BILL CALLING FOR the repeal of the Indian Reorganization Act has been slipped into the hopper by Senator Wheeler. As the original sponsor of that act Mr. Wheeler received due credit for the land reforms and communal development that have been effected since its adoption. Now, perhaps under pressure from Montana stockmen, he wants to kill the whole development. Until recently Indian lands were passing into white hands at the rate of about seven million acres a year. Particularly in the northern plains the areas owned by the Indians were so scattered that it was impossible to make use of them as grazing land. As a result the Indians were forced to lease these sections very disadvantageously to the white stockmen. Under the Reorganization Act most of this has been stopped. Many leases are being terminated and the tribes are using the range themselves. This change is beneficial to the country as well as to the Indians, since under federal guardianship it is possible to apply soil-conservation principles to areas which were being rapidly destroyed by over-grazing. The interests behind Senator Wheeler's bill are suspect and its purposes are questionable. It should not be allowed to reach the floor of the Senate.

★

THE TIDE OF LIBERALISM HAS RUN LOWER and lower in the Scripps-Howard press. At the moment the negotiations between the Newspaper Guild and the New York World-Telegram, which Roy Howard manages personally, have broken down on the issue of the Guild preferential—not the closed—shop. (The Guild shop would allow the World-Telegram to hire anyone it pleased so long as that person joined the Guild within a given period.) To be sure, there has been an advance. Formerly the World-Telegram had declared that it would negotiate only with its own employees; but the education of Roy Howard is apparently not yet complete. As we go to press the threat of a strike hangs over his head. The Guild has the backing of both John Lewis and William Green; and the typographers of New York City, as well as the members of other unions involved in getting out Mr. Howard's newspaper, are not men to pass a picket line. In trying to preserve the "freedom of the press," lest a Guild shop here set a bad example to provincial Scripps-Howard units, Mr. Howard is setting his face against a union town in which the large majority of his readers believe in collective bargaining. Is it possible that he will take the almost certain risk of having the World-Telegram's lighthouse put out of commission?

JOHN H. CLARKE, FORMER LIBERAL MEMBER of the Supreme Court, proved last week over the radio that the President's proposal was perfectly legal. Charles E. Hughes, present Chief Justice, proved with equal force that without it the court could keep up with its schedule. We are ready to believe both. But both are side skirmishes in a larger battle. Legality is reassuring, but it only clears the ground for the question of social effectiveness, which is not synonymous with calendar efficiency. The country is not passing through the present throes of discussion in order to lighten the labor burden of the justices. In so far as Mr. Roosevelt has stressed that, he has given the whole matter an unfortunate emphasis. The real question is one of getting for the time being a workable democracy by tempering the unyielding rigor of the present court majority and by introducing a more vivid sense of social realities. For the long run only an amendment will avail.

★

LEON TROTSKY WAS NO DOUBT STIRRED INTO making his press statement against André Malraux, which we print on another page, by Malraux's failure to comment on Trotsky's assertion that Malraux had visited him in southern France at the time he was accused of meeting Romm in Paris. While we may understand Trotsky's resentment, his gratuitous attack can only arouse indignation. The assertion that Malraux "carries the responsibility for the strangulation of the Chinese revolution" seems, if the statement is at all correctly quoted, fantastic. And everyone who has had any contact with Malraux in America knows not only that he is devoted to the Spanish United Front government but also that he has restricted himself severely to furthering its cause here. It is one of the tragic results of the controversy over the Moscow trials that it has produced dissension in causes where there should have been complete unity.

★

THE RAILROADS DID NOT COME OUT BADLY in the compromise pension plan which has now been submitted for Congressional action. As a price for withdrawing their objections to a federal pension scheme they propose to unload upon the government the obligation which they have incurred under their private pension systems. It is estimated that this will save them approximately $36,000,000 in a single year, and assure an average saving of $14,000,000 to $15,000,000 a year over a long period. A slight reduction in the tax rate from the present railroad retirement law will save the roads about $8,000,000 additional each year. The sliding-scale tax rate proposed by the railroads and unions averages approximately 6.6 per cent as compared with the flat 7 per cent levy of the existing law—a rate which the Treasury insists ought to be maintained if the plan is to be self-sustaining. But perhaps the most interesting aspect of the agreement is the sudden discovery by the railroad management that federal pensions, which they had insisted were unconstitutional, become constitutional when they work to the financial benefit of the railroads. There seems to be a dollars-and-cents equivalent for constitutionality.

CAPTAIN WILHELM WEISS, ONE OF JOSEPH Goebbels's chief deputies, announced last week that art and theater critics, who in December were forbidden to function, could now resume their criticism—providing they did it in the form of political observations! He went on to outline the rights and duties of a critic in the Third Reich in a series of verbal contortions that reminded us of nothing so much as Robert Benchley's film version of the man with insomnia who changed his position fifty-seven times in one night. "What is Nazi is good; what is not Nazi is bad," began the Captain, settling down for a good night's rest. "We desire a respected and interesting German press," he continued, making a mild shift and arranging the covers, "and intend it to be a sure and powerful instrument in the Führer's hands." At this point he pulled the quilt over his head, thus uncovering his feet. "Art criticism," he declared, curling up defiantly, "is not primarily an aesthetic question but a political one." But "the art of observation does not differ from the former art of criticism, in heaven's name," shouted the acrobatic captain, getting up and turning the mattress. He ended in a final tailspin. "The old idea," he said, "that there is good art and bad art must be removed." We understand that this old idea, suspected of having a Jewish grandmother, has since been executed by a firing squad.

★

Correction: Mr. Louis B. Wehle

[In its issue of January 23, 1937, The Nation published an article by Paul W. Ward on the Tennessee power situation containing several references to Mr. Louis B. Wehle which subsequent disclosures have shown to be somewhat inaccurate and unfair in their implications. In justice to Mr. Wehle, the following statement of facts is made.

As to Mr. Wehle's credentials for acting in the situation: At the President's request Mr. Wehle was present at the White House power-pooling conference in September, 1936, and subsequently acted as mediator between the TVA and the Commonwealth and Southern Corporation in arriving at the terms of a status quo agreement. When this agreement was concluded, the parties recited their appreciation of the efforts of Mr. Wehle, as the President's designee, in cooperating with the parties.

As to Mr. Wehle's connection with railroad reorganization: Mr. Wehle, after having published an article in the December, 1934, Yale Law Journal on Railroad Reorganizations under the Bankruptcy Act, was retained by the Prudential Insurance Company for the purpose of drafting and urging legislation on that subject. The retainer was terminable at any time by either party, and Mr. Wehle was left free to express his own views as to public policy and to disclose to officials in Washington the existence of the retainer. In the course of his subsequent activities under the retainer, Mr. Wehle, on his own initiative, fully disclosed its terms to the RFC and others with whom he dealt.

The Nation regrets that its correspondent did not have the foregoing information at the time of the writing of his article.]

Making Sitdowns Legal

NEVER in our memory has anything happened in America that so completely illumines the uses of law in our society as the controversy over the sitdown strike. The speed with which the sitdown has spread in the highly industrial states shows of course that it is deeply related to a felt need among our workers. It is this need, arising not only out of specific grievances but out of the whole position of the workers in our economy, that prompted the Chrysler strikers to address their magnificent open letter to Governor Murphy. It is this need which prompts their continued defiance of Judge Campbell's injunction. And the response of the law itself to this need is a stiff-necked assertion of illegality.

Let us not be misunderstood. Given the law as it stands, interpreted narrowly, there can be little doubt that the sitdown is illegal. There have been those who have urged the opposite, and we have ourselves pointed to the property rights that a worker has in his job. But it is terribly important to make a distinction here. Are we talking about the law that exists or the law that is emerging? If we take Justice Holmes's excellent behavioristic definition of law—"law is what the courts are likely to decide"—and if we couple that with what we know about most American judges today, the answer is clear. We could, of course, write an editorial on what the judges should decide. Or we could ruminate on what we should decide if we were judges. But the hard reality is that we are not.

Unless we make this distinction, we obscure the uses of law in social struggles and the manner in which law grows. Law at any given period is a crystallization of past growths and past struggles. It is a response to the felt impulses of the past. In America today our law reflects the desperate need for protecting property in a rapidly growing, mushrooming frontier society that turned in an amazingly brief span of time into the most highly developed capitalist state in the world. It reflects also the fears that our industrialists felt when faced by the growth of trade unionism and democratic feeling. This need and these fears have been written—have written themselves—into the law. The use of the injunction in the past, even more than today, as a strike-breaking weapon is a prime example of how law can be used to favor one side in the capital-labor relationship. Today such a use of the injunction is illegal in sixteen states and in the federal courts. And not only the injunction. The strike itself was once illegal. It is now, in theory at least, legal. The labor boycott was illegal. It is now, under certain circumstances, legal. Picketing was once illegal. It is now legal. Mass picketing was once illegal. It is now generally legal. What we call "the law" has on these subjects changed as social realities have somehow got themselves into peoples' heads and become recognized as realities.

The "law" on the sitdown will also change—is, in fact, changing under our very hands. Judges are human, and even judges are not entirely impervious to realities outside the courtroom. Judge Campbell spoke more softly than Judge Gadola before him: the next judge will speak more softly than Judge Campbell. For they will come to understand that there is more in the heaven and earth of the sitdown than is dreamt of in the doctrine of simple trespass. You do not dispose of the controversy between the Chrysler corporation and its workers by recourse to an eighteenth-century idea of private property. Such a controversy is infinitely involved. On its settlement depend not only the livelihoods of thousands, even of millions, but the social health of the state. Whoever you are—judge, corporation head, newspaper publisher—you must recognize that the stake these workers have in their livelihoods and the stake the nation has in healthy and decent industrial conditions are far greater than your narrow and static legalism. You cannot chase these men out as you would chase out a trespasser from your back yard.

Even on the score of strict legality, the total case is far from clear. Every day, throughout the nation, the corporate employers are breaking laws in their struggle against collective bargaining. Every day the Labor Relations Board is defied, labor spies are used, men are discharged for union activities. Every day police brutality is used to smash strikes and break up picket lines. Two wrongs, of course, do not make a right. But we cite these facts because we are convinced that the objection of the corporations to the sitdown is not that it is illegal but that it levels out the immense advantage they have thus far had in the bargaining struggle. That is what they cannot endure—not the trespass, but the fact that they are now compelled to put their houses in order and accept the workers' demands for collective bargaining.

In legal terms the sitdown must therefore be seen as part of the no man's land where the law is, except in the narrowest and most mechanical sense, still undetermined. In such an area the considerations that should be decisive are those leading to a decent living standard for all.

"Spain in Flames"

WE THOUGHT the name of A. Mitchell Palmer had gone down—as far down as it deserves—in history. But it has turned up again in an ominous connection. Mrs. A. Mitchell Palmer is chairman of the Board of Censors of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, which ruled on February 16 that the people of that great industrial state would not be allowed to look at "Spain in Flames," a film dealing with the Spanish civil war, unless changes were made which would effectively stop distribution of the picture. "Spain in Flames" was edited in the United States. The dialogue was written by John Dos Passos and Archibald MacLeish. Since it is a newsreel type of film, it does not fall within the jurisdiction of censorship boards, but when it was scheduled for exhibition in Philadelphia, the Board of Censors asked to see it, and it was submitted as a matter of courtesy. The board held it for a week. Finally telegrams from Dos Passos and MacLeish brought forth this extraordinary—and extra-legal—ruling: "You may show this film in Pennsylvania only if you change the sound track so that every mention of the word fascist or fascism is eliminated." Needless to say, the cost of making a complete new sound track would be prohibitive.

It is not surprising that "Spain in Flames," which has been seen by thousands in some sixty American cities, is too red for a lady bearing the name of A. Mitchell Palmer. The news is, however, that Governor Earle, liberal, aspirant for the White House, and as they say in Pittsburgh "a rich man who rose to be a friend of labor," out-Palmered Mrs. Palmer. Without haggling over sound tracks or the word fascism he summarily ordered the film barred from Pennsylvania. "This picture," said Governor Earle, "is pure communistic propaganda. . . . We Pennsylvanians are not interested in the propaganda of a government largely made up of Communists, Syndicalists, and Anarchists who butcher priests . . . it definitely encourages recruiting."

It is difficult to understand how a politician as shrewd as Governor Earle could have permitted himself the luxury of expressing his real feelings so openly. It is not difficult to get at the real reasons why "Spain in Flames" has been barred from Pennsylvania. Catholic influence is strong and is throwing its whole weight against the Spanish government. Moreover, Pennsylvania is inhabited by thousands of working people, many of them of European ancestry. In the thoughtful darkness of a moving-picture theater they might well recognize, as they looked at "Spain in Flames," that the Spanish workers and peasants are defending their very lives against the same forces that are aligned against poor men in Pennsylvania. In Spain it has come to open war. In Pennsylvania the thousands of industrial workers are only beginning to realize that their labor has created the wealth with which their bosses have been able to keep them under, and that the Catholic church has been one of the most dependable and well-rewarded allies of industry.

"Spain in Flames" has met a similar fate in Ohio, probably for similar reasons. But unlike Governor Earle, Governor Davey has carefully avoided the issue. The Cleveland Press and other papers have been waging a lively fight on the stupidity of censorship—so far to no avail. Legal action is now being taken by the sponsors of the film, the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy; and the American Civil Liberties Union is planning to introduce legislation at the next session of the Ohio legislature to change the sound track of the Board of Censorship.

Legal action is also under way in Pennsylvania to force the Board of Censors and Governor Earle to rescind orders which have no basis in law. An even more effective protest could be made by the most progressive force now operating in the states of Pennsylvania and Ohio. We refer to the Committee for Industrial Organization. It is the workers of Pennsylvania and Ohio whom the board of censors have in mind when they oppose the showing of "Spain in Flames." It is the workers of America, above all others, who should understand events now happening in Spain. The C. I. O. is directly concerned, and John Lewis, who gave notice at Madison Square Garden last week that he realizes the meaning of fascism, should make the first protest.

The Clichy Riot

IF WARNING were needed to show what might happen to France if the Popular Front government fell, such a warning was delivered in the fatal rioting at Clichy last week. Early press reports received in this country placed the blame of course on the Communists. It was alleged that the Communists, led by their representatives in the Chamber of Deputies, had deliberately attacked and broken up a peaceful theater showing staged by De la Rocque's newly established Social Party, which was under the protection of government police. This version of the affair does not, however, coincide with the reports of post-riot activities. It does not explain why all 5 of the persons killed in the riot and most of the 300 wounded were Communists or Communist sympathizers, or why the chief outcry against the riot has come from organized workers and the left political parties rather than from the supposedly aggrieved fascists. Moreover, if the government had really sent large detachments of police to protect the fascists, it is difficult to see why it should now threaten to prosecute De la Rocque for illegal political activity in holding the meeting.

Despite these press distortions, there can be little doubt that De la Rocque and his followers were largely, if not primarily, responsible for the whole affair. They called the meeting in the heart of Paris's "red belt" with the deliberate intention of provoking the Communists. They apparently went to the meeting well equipped with pistols and other weapons for "self-defense." Only an omniscient investigating committee can determine who started the fighting or who fired the first shot. But the blame must obviously rest chiefly on those who laid the plans for the demonstration with full knowledge of its probable fatal outcome.

If De la Rocque hoped that by instigating this riot he would plunge France into a period of disorder from which he would profit, he has been bitterly disappointed. Instead of weakening the Popular Front government, the riot appears to have frightened all the left groups into a new solidarity. Although the Communists were irritated with Blum for allowing a fascist demonstration in a working-class district, they have not wavered in their support of the Popular Front. After weathering a financial crisis at the beginning of the month and overcoming the political repercussion of the Clichy riots, the Blum government should enter its second year with greater vitality than it possessed at the beginning of the first year. The defense loan has been oversubscribed, and labor difficulties are on the wane. When the passivity of the right following the Clichy affair is contrasted with the clamor aroused by the February riots in 1934, the danger of an immediate fascist coup seems unusually remote.

The fact still remains, however, that events in France are bound to be influenced substantially by developments in Spain. A victory for Franco, Hitler, and Mussolini at Madrid would undoubtedly encourage the French right to new audacity in an effort to create the sort of disturbances on which fascism feeds. A continuation of the recent setbacks to the international fascists, on the other hand, will almost certainly spare France the necessity of passing through the horrors in which Spain is now engulfed. Fascism thrives on glamor and success. Once the myth of its irresistible power is shattered, it will have lost its primary appeal to the masses. A fascism dependent solely on the class interests of a minority of wealthy reactionaries is dead as a political movement. Clichy represents a reversal for French fascism, but Madrid will determine the final outcome.

Inflation Is Here

THE general public thinks of inflation as a wild speculative orgy in which the printing presses turn out tons of money in ever-increasing denominations. This, of course, is characteristic of the final stage of an uncontrolled inflationary movement. But to an economist an inflation is merely a period in which there is a steady shrinkage in the purchasing power of money. From this point of view there can be no doubt that we are already well along in an inflationary period. As is usually the case with inflations, the rise in prices was gradual at first. From the low point in 1933 to the early fall of 1936, wholesale commodity prices rose only 25 per cent. The prices of manufactured articles, after a sharp rise in the summer of 1933, remained practically stationary until the last quarter of 1936.

Since the end of October wholesale prices have risen an additional 9.2 per cent, making a total increase of 15 per cent in the past year. The price of finished steel products has advanced 25 per cent in the past twelve months and 39 per cent since the depth of the depression. This advance may be compared with a 44 per cent increase in 1922-23 and a 39 per cent rise in 1919-20, years which are now recognized as inflationary periods. It is doubly significant in view of the fact that iron and steel prices declined only about 25 per cent in the depression.

Here is unmistakable evidence that a period of inflation has begun. Where it will end no one can say. Once prices start skyrocketing, a vicious circle is joined. The increase in the prices of raw materials necessitates a rise in the prices of finished products. This leads to higher living costs and demands for higher wages, which in turn furnish a pretext for a further boost in prices. Meanwhile, stockholders and speculators are the chief beneficiaries.

While Secretary Wallace may have been overstating it when he declared that the government lacked power to control "the wide swings of the business cycle," he would have been on sound ground if he had merely said that the devices with which the inflationary boom might be checked are dangerous and politically inexpedient. If the Reserve banks divested themselves of the two billion dollars' worth of government bonds now in their vaults and raised the rediscount rate, while the government sold its stock of excess silver and curtailed emergency expenditures, the boom could be checked. But in the process we might easily find ourselves in the throes of a new depression. If the present rate of economic activity is to be maintained and expanded, it is essential, as J. M. Keynes recently pointed out, to keep interest rates at or near their present low levels. Emergency expenditures cannot be curtailed without grave injustice to the underprivileged groups in the country. What is needed is not some method of destroying the purchasing power of the ten million still unemployed but a device which will reduce the excess funds of the very wealthy.

The only satisfactory curb on inflation, as Marriner S. Eccles, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, has stated, would be heavier taxes on high- and middle-income groups and an increase in the levy on corporation profits. An unbalanced budget is necessary in a depression in order to maintain mass purchasing power, but during a boom the budget should be balanced and the indebtedness incurred in the slump retired. Very little reduction can be made in government expenditures at this time; so if the budget is to be balanced, it must be through increased taxation.

If taxes are to be raised, legislation should be adopted at this session of Congress. Even if this is done, the taxes on this year's income will not be payable until next March. By that time the boom may be fully upon us. If action is put off until the next year, the new levies cannot come into force until 1939, which would be much too late. It may even be that an increase in taxes on luxury goods will be necessary in order to make certain that they become operative in time to be of value. Once an inflation reaches the runaway stage, it is too late to use ordinary taxation as a check.

In discussions of the threatened inflation in the daily press much has been said about the regulation of prices and wages. This strikes us as a deliberate attempt to arouse public opinion against the Administration. Some commentators have even gone so far as to say that the President is anxious to push through his Supreme Court proposal in order to obtain dictatorial power which will enable him to regulate prices and wages. Apart from the political absurdity of the charge, there is no basis in history for the belief that a government can control prices and wages in an inflationary period. Many such attempts have been made in the past, and none has been successful when the incidence of inflation was really marked. Minimum-wage laws are just and desirable in a period of stable prices, but they are meaningless in an inflation. Even more refined methods, such as attempting to fix wages in terms of the cost of living, are bound to prove unenforceable. Mr. Roosevelt is undoubtedly aware of these facts, and there is nothing in the statements issued by his Cabinet officers to suggest that he intends to use any but the most orthodox methods of checking the threatened runaway rise in prices. Back of the charges against the President lies the undeniable fact that most of the men who control the country's economic power do not want to head off a boom—least of all by an increase in taxation. If "dictatorship" is to be feared in coming months, it is the dictatorship of these men—the same group that prevented effective action in 1928-29.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 21

THERE'S a new deal in store for the American farmer and the power trust now that Morris L. Cooke has got out of the Rural Electrification Administration and John M. Carmody has taken his place at the REA's helm. As a part of that new deal a shake-up in REA personnel impends, a shake-up that involves ridding the agency of several key men who obviously believe God never intended to have rural America electrified unless the latter-day Insulls and Hopsons first gave their consent and were guaranteed a flat share in the resulting tolls. Despite a contrary dogma in the REA act they have sworn to support, they have practiced their own peculiar religion so assiduously that the REA stands today as one of the most complete failures among all the Roosevelt Administration's undertakings. The public-ownership movement which produced it has been sabotaged, millions of dollars have been wasted, valuable time has been lost, and, worst of all, public or cooperative rural electrification projects have been thwarted or otherwise held in check until private power companies killed them by running spite lines into the project areas or by skimming off the cream of the prospective business there.

Carmody, who has been successively chief engineer of the Civil Works Administration, a member of the Railway Mediation Board, and a member of the National Labor Relations Board, intends to change all that and to restore the REA to the course its legislative godfather, Senator Norris, charted for it. He signaled his intention yesterday by driving down to Warsaw, Virginia, and putting on a show in which, for the first time in the agency's history, the farmers instead of the power magnates were treated as the REA's clients. At the request of the farmers down in Virginia's Northern Neck, he held a public hearing in the Warsaw courthouse and gave them a chance to tell him face to face what they thought of the way his predecessor had treated them. For seven years the farmers in that part of Virginia which gave us Washington and Lee have been trying to get electricity. Despairing of getting it through the private power company in the area, they formed a cooperative a few months ago and applied to the REA for a loan so that the cooperative might build and operate its own transmission lines and if necessary generate its own power. Instead of granting that application the REA a few days later allotted $125,000 to the Virginia East Coast Utilities Company for a rural transmission line in the area, and Administrator Cooke, under date of February 2 last, advised the farmers that if the company's line was not going to extend into the same area for which their project had been planned, they had better "take the matter up direct with the company."

This action was taken in plain contradiction of a section of the REA act which stipulates that preference must be given to public, non-profit, and cooperative agencies rather than to private concerns. The fact that the private company to which the allotment was made is only now emerging from its second bankruptcy makes the contradiction even plainer, for it erases any ground for argument that the company was a better credit risk than the cooperative. The cooperative alleges that Cooke approved the allotment to the company on January 29 "on the recommendation of his chief counsel, Vincent D. Nicholson, and his head engineer, Willard E. Herring." Carmody promptly put a stop order against the allotment to the Virginia East Coast Utilities Company, and it is now indicated that the money will go to the cooperative.

The Virginia episode is merely symptomatic of what has been going on inside the REA from the beginning. Cooke, who took charge of the agency when it was first set up in 1935 as part of the $4,880,000,000 emergency relief program, has never been able to bring himself around to the public-ownership point of view. Despite his long experience with the power trust, he has clung to his belief that private-profit enterprise is best and that the boys who run the power industry can be trusted to advance the public interest. He insisted that the private companies be allowed a share in the REA benefits, when Norris wanted to bar them. He insisted that public and cooperative agencies under the program should not be favored to the point of letting them compete with private companies, when Norris wanted to draw the act so that the REA might finance such competition. And he was so anxious for the REA to be "safe and sane" that he staffed it to the rooftree with "safe and sane" lawyers and engineers such as Nicholson and Herring. They have made no secret of their disbelief in public ownership of power developments and of their scorn for cooperatives. Nicholson, in fact, when the permanent REA was pending in Congress, worked with Representative Huddleston of Alabama to get into the bill the little clauses that have been the safeguards of the private companies, and at least one member of the legal division is known to have written an official of the notorious H. C. Hopson's Associated Gas and Electric System advising that official to call him at night at his home because he could talk more freely with him there than at the REA's offices. This is especially strange in view of the fact that Associated officials from the beginning have seemed to feel peculiarly at home in the REA offices. They have been treated with such deference there that under Cooke's regime they got six different REA loans, totaling $876,450; and the loans were slipped through with such extraordinary celerity that, contrary to regulations, the REA'S development division was not given an opportunity to scrutinize the projects involved.

Under the leadership of Nicholson, a Philadelphia Brahman-Quaker formerly with the NRA's legal division, who apparently possessed a strange power to make Cooke alter decisions after the administration had reached them on the basis of a conference with the heads of all the REA divisions, the REA's legal battery has placed every conceivable impediment in the path of rural electrification along any lines save those pleasing to the private companies. Isolated by training and experience from the public point of view, they have approached REA projects from a purely legalistic and banker angle. They have insisted that the farmers' own small-town lawyers were not capable of drawing up the necessary charters and contracts. They have insisted that these jobs be entrusted to big corporation law firms. Quite typically, one of their first choices was the Minnesota law firm of Butler, Mitchell, and Doherty, from which Justice Pierce Butler sprang; that choice was nipped in the bud by a little quick work on the part of Minnesota's Farmer-Labor Governor. The REA's legal division has devoted itself to finding endless, niggling fault with the project plans for cooperatives and to vetoing these almost unprecedented undertakings because the law records with respect to private utilities provide no precedents for them.

For every little trick of obfuscation and delay that the REA's legal division has employed against public projects a parallel can be found in the engineering division under Herring, another Philadelphian, who incidentally was such a power in the REA while Cooke was in command that the words "For the Administrator" appeared under his signature on hundreds of letters. Just as the legal division has insisted on selecting lawyers for the applicants, so the engineering division has insisted on choosing their technical advisers and managers. Cooperatives also have found frequent cause to protest against the engineering division's fanatical insistence on dictating construction specification details, such as requiring the use of aluminum wire where copper would be cheaper and more durable and demanding that the cooperative use poles which must be imported from other states when local materials would be cheaper and equally serviceable.

The worst feature of it all has been that the legal and engineering divisions have expanded their jurisdictions to include the economic feasibility of projects. Under Cooke, Messrs. Herring and Nicholson acquired absolute veto power over projects on this score. Some strange decisions resulted. The Dyess colony in Arkansas, with a million dollars cash in the bank, put in an REA project application. An REA lawyer advised its rejection because he had examined the colony's charter and could find nothing in it to prevent the colony's directors from paying dividends to themselves at some future date. The colony started as an FERA project and all its stock is held by Harry Hopkins as trustee for the government. When this initial legal hurdle was topped, the REA's legal and engineering divisions decided that the project was not economically feasible; in short, it was too great a risk for the government to do business with itself. Since the FERA's successor, the WPA, has a little more influence in Washington than the ordinary farm cooperative, this hurdle too has finally been topped and the colony's application approved.

How Not to Plan Public Housing

BY LANGDON W. POST

THE fact that we finally have a small amount of public housing in the United States, after fifty years of agitation against slums, is not the result of any real general awakening to the need for it. We have it simply because the government decided to spend money for public works to help us out of the depression. It is important to remember this, because it helps to explain why, more than three years after the first funds were allocated, we still have no real program and no firm acceptance of housing as a public responsibility.

The Public Works Administration has constructed or is constructing in forty cities projects which will accommodate not quite 25,000 families. The Resettlement Administration is building a few greenbelt towns which may take a few additional thousands of families from our city slums. These are called demonstration projects, and to a certain extent they are. The PWA and the RA have set admirable standards, and the physical existence of the projects does help to focus attention on the problem and to create a demand for further efforts. The RA should also help us to discover whether or not the garden communities which have been so successful in England and other parts of Europe can be satisfactorily adapted to the United States. But neither has pointed the way to the long-range program which should ultimately eliminate all of our bad housing.

This is not to any great extent the fault of officials in Washington. The RA, handicapped by adverse court decisions, local opposition, complete lack of precedents, and the necessity of devoting most of its efforts to other matters, has done what it could. The PWA Housing Division has had similar difficulties, and in addition has been under the unfortunate compulsion to fit its program into the fixed formula of loans, grants, and interest rates set up by Congress for all types of public works. Proper planning has had to be subordinated to the rigid requirements of the formula. Thus, instead of choosing sites and plans on the basis of greatest advantage to the cities in which projects were to be located, the Housing Division, and cooperating local authorities where they existed, has had to select sites where the land cost did not exceed a certain amount, and to fix the size of projects chiefly on the basis of the total amount of money available and the proportion which could properly be allocated to any given city. This is obviously going at the whole problem backward.

As a matter of fact, the cost approach is the primary trouble with all housing in this country, private as well as public. The individual builder, in order to obtain the maximum return on his investment, almost always puts as many rooms on a given piece of property as he is allowed to. This has resulted not only in the tenements of the slums but also in the fantastic apartments of the well-to-do, sixteen stories or more in height, with a density per acre and a lack of natural light and ventilation which are shocking. It is literally true that the most important part of an architect's work in our cities has been to produce maximum floor space with minimum expense, pressing as closely as possible upon the requirements of local laws. Design for comfort, health, and safety is always secondary. And of course the laws have been generous, to say the least.

This same preoccupation with economy at the expense of standards has been carried over into public housing. During the past three years I have examined hundreds of proposals for solving the slum problem. Almost every one has involved some chiseling below proper standards, just as the prize design in the famous 1879 tenement-house competition actually resulted in greater coverage and congestion. Architects of good reputation have seriously urged us to relax the present inadequate laws regulating construction and coverage. Others assure us that the simple solution is to buy land in outlying districts, completely disregarding the effect which this would have on the rest of the city. Virtually none of the plans I have seen has been centered directly on the problems of good housing and proper city planning.

I do not mean to suggest that we should be careless in the expenditure of public money, or that we should not avail ourselves of every possible economy. But we must examine all aspects of the situation and not merely initial price. It seems strangely difficult to make people realize that site and construction costs of public housing are only two of many factors which enter into the ultimate cost to the community. Particularly the expense of other public services must be taken into consideration. At present, as studies in many cities have shown, we are subsidizing slums. Our cities spend more for police, health, schools, fire protection, streets, sanitation, transportation facilities, and other benefits to the occupants of slum property than that property ever returns in taxes. This might well be true under any circumstances for people in the lower-income groups, but it is dubious economic sense to spend this money so that rents can be maintained, even at low levels, in privately owned buildings. On the other hand, tax assessment of slum property is usually above the actual value of such property figured by return on investment.

To put it in another way, our municipal bookkeeping as related to residential real estate is unrealistic to a high degree. The planlessness, the bad housing, and a host of other evils in slum areas are perhaps properly blamed on years of real-estate speculation. But the present situation is due not nearly so much to speculative values as to the freezing of such values through mortgage and tax structures. We find in New York, for example, contrary to the general opinion, that very few of our bad tenements are owned by large estates or speculators. Those owned by banks have all been acquired involuntarily through foreclosure. Most of them are still nominally owned by comparatively poor individuals who have bought them with their life savings, not as a speculation but as an investment. Most of these owners would be delighted to sell for the amount of the city's assessment, or less. Many of the properties could be bought for the amount of the mortgage. The price would still be too high if the districts were restricted to properly limited residential use, and then evaluated in terms of fair return on prudent investment. The prices must come down. But any effort to force the price of slum property down to a level comparable to outlying vacant land would ruin thousands of poor owners dependent upon their property for a living, would embarrass many of our savings banks, and to a lesser degree would upset the cities' tax structure.

I certainly would not defend the ridiculously high price of land in our cities. It may be that in some cases we shall have to say that so far as the owner is concerned, it is just too bad, and break the prices. But such a solution involves grave consequences, and it is no service to the cause of public housing to jump at it as a panacea, either through drastic zoning laws or by draining slum population into outlying districts.

Even more important from the planning standpoint is the fact that our cities now have substantial investments in schools, fire and police stations, and other public facilities in the slum areas. Heretofore, while cities have been expanding rapidly, we have given comparatively little thought to the desirability of opening up new subdivisions provided with public facilities. We have had to have them, and they have been provided, with an assessment against the improved property to cover part of the cost. Population expansion involves necessary expense which is ultimately returned in greater wealth for the whole community. But now that population is tending to become stabilized, we must examine this question in a new light. It is true that we face a national shortage of decent housing and must expand somewhat further; but it is also true that we are entering a period when replacement is more important than expansion, and we must readjust our city plans on that basis. It was bad enough to allow the cities to grow without plan and without restriction; it would involve even more waste and economic dislocation to shift them about planlessly after they are grown, building up new districts at the expense of those already established.

Some shifts will undoubtedly be desirable to permit people to live closer to the places where they work, and to provide the additional park and playground space which we need. (If we get a universal six-hour day, it may not be quite so bad to have millions of workers spending two hours a day getting to and from the places where they are employed. But it still seems to me a ridiculous waste both of time and transportation cost.) But it would be the height of folly to shift our slum dwellers to outlying areas simply because our housing program was tied down to a formula which made it necessary to build on cheap land.

The possibilities of using slum areas for good housing have also received insufficient attention. It is true that in Harlem and parts of the lower East Side in Manhattan there is a congestion which must be alleviated. But such a condition prevails in far less than half of New York City's seventeen square miles of slums, and is even less prevalent elsewhere. In the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn, for example, the New York City Housing Authority and the PWA have demolished twelve blocks of squalid tenements, which covered from 80 to 90 per cent of the lots on which they were built. There was no play space except in the streets. On this site we are building four-story brick buildings, covering less than thirty per cent of the gross area, in which there will be apartments for about two hundred more families than were moved out of the area. There will be ample community facilities, including a high school occupying one block with its playground occupying another. In addition, there will be open courts larger than any now existing in the city, additional playgrounds for smaller children, and light and air in every room. Such slum areas do not need to be moved or expanded, they need to be redesigned.

On the other side of the picture, we have our new commercial and semi-commercial apartment buildings, such as London Terrace and Knickerbocker Village in

New York. High buildings of this type are apparently necessary to return a profit on high-priced land. But if we were to build up only the lower East Side, a fraction of the area of Manhattan, in this fashion, we could house the whole population of New York City. If we leave our slums to themselves, we shall face either such a ruinous prospect or continuing blight in the hearts of cities.

Looked at in another way, no initial-cost formula for housing really makes sense anyway. New buildings should be planned to last a minimum of fifty or sixty years, and we do not really expect the value of money to remain constant for any such length of time. Wages and prices have exhibited a long-term rise which will probably continue. The family which now pays five dollars per room per month may be able to pay ten dollars twenty years from now. Or if there is a shift the other way, it may be able to pay only two or three dollars. The rental of public housing should obviously be based on ability to pay, not on a fixed interest rate or, as in private housing, on what the traffic will bear.

Fundamentally, the purpose of public housing is to raise the standard of living for the underprivileged and to help to eliminate the evils of crime, disease, juvenile delinquency, and bad citizenship which are the concomitants of bad housing. Our national history has shown a gradual broadening of public responsibility for the welfare of citizens, and we have seen the government take over schools, roads, parks, health service, and many other activities in the public interest, without taking cost as the primary consideration. We are now beginning to realize that government should make itself responsible for seeing that every family has a decent place in which to live.

In undertaking this responsibility we must decide first what standards are necessary to achieve the desired results, and those must be rigidly maintained. A public housing program could not properly be justified simply because it gave people homes which were a little better than the ones they had before. Its purpose is to provide good housing for a long time, not to meet an emergency. After we have set these minimum standards, we can decide how much above them we can afford to go. There, and there only, cost should be taken into consideration. And even then the cost should be figured not on the basis of preconceptions about interest rates or the amount of subsidy but simply on the condition of the public purse and the proportion of income we wish to spend for housing.

Finally, we do not want to standardize homes. Housing is a public duty, not a charity, and it will not be good if we take the attitude that the tenants should accept what they get and like it, or that we can design an ideal, universal home. Some people may prefer suburban homes with gardens; some will prefer city apartments. There should be real opportunity for choice. The horrid word regimentation has been made a silly bugaboo by the Tories. Nevertheless, there are real dangers in regimentation, and we should avoid it in public housing. We must remember that the houses we build are intended for homes.

[Langdon W. Post is Tenement House Commissioner and Chairman of the Housing Authority of New York City.]

Keeping America Out of War

BY LOUIS FISCHER

THE prevention of war ought to be the purpose of American foreign policy. It is not. Our chief goal seems to be to keep out of a war once it has begun. This course is not only selfish; it is dangerous. If a major war breaks out, there is at least a chance, I think a very strong chance, that we shall be drawn in, all our neutrality legislation and pacifist sentiment notwithstanding. But if there were no war anywhere, we should be sure of peace. The only safe peace for the United States is universal peace.

If a European or Far Eastern war were surely coming in the near future and if it were possible to remain aloof I should say: Let us insulate and isolate ourselves. Let us try to be neutral. But I believe that American neutrality increases the likelihood of foreign war. It increases accordingly the likelihood of our becoming involved in a war. A wise American foreign policy could prevent widespread war. It could achieve this without risking a single man or gun. Our much-vaunted neutrality, on the other hand, is a complicated, costly, unpractical effort which is sure to defeat its aim. Neutrality is the best encouragement to aggressors.

It has often been pointed out that if in July, 1914, Sir Edward Grey, the British Foreign Minister, had made it unmistakably clear that England would rush to the aid of France in case of an attack, Germany might not have started the war. The possibility that Britain might remain neutral encouraged the Kaiser. A government launches a war in the hope of winning, and when a war-bent nation sees only a puny combination of forces aligned against it, it is more likely to strike. Were Hitler certain today that England and America would stay out, the second world war would be immeasurably nearer.

The neutrality advocated by American isolationists plays directly into Hitler's hands. He does not want collective security. On the contrary, when hostilities break out between two states, he would have "the other nations withdraw at once from both sides." That is his idea of neutrality, and he advocates it because it would facilitate his military successes. In a given dispute only the aggressor and the attacked nation fight. The others are neutral. Germany marches into Czecho-Slovakia, for instance. Russia, France, and England remain neutral. Germany wins the war. Germany would probably win all bilateral wars in which other powers remained neutral.

The basic idea of American neutrality is a misconception. It is assumed that we shall do nothing. But it is possible to do a great deal by doing nothing. The sitdown strike has proved that. By stopping still in our tracks, by not fighting in the war, we may actually determine its outcome. Just as nature abhors a vacuum, so international affairs make neutrality a physical impossibility.

During the Italian conquest of Abyssinia we were neutral. We could not, therefore, withhold oil shipments from Mussolini. He used our petrol to operate the airplanes which sprayed the Ethiopians with poison gas. He thus won the war. We were neutral, but we helped the aggressor toward victory.

The United States government presumably is also neutral in the Spanish civil war. We take no sides. That is the official formula. The reality is that while Franco has been receiving from Germany and Italy all the arms he can use as well as tens of thousands of trained troops in compact infantry units, the legitimate government of Spain, which has every right under international law to buy munitions everywhere, cannot receive them in sufficient quantities. What Franco cannot get from Germany and Italy he finds in the United States. The British freighter Linaria recently arrived in this country to take on a load of nitrate for Franco's munitions industries; and the Baltimore Sun of March 1 reported the docking in Baltimore of the British freighter Statira with 8,500 tons of copper ore from Huelva in rebel Spain. We paid for that ore and thus strengthened Franco's finances. Moreover, Germany and Italy, which officially are not belligerents, can buy arms here in endless quantities and ship them to Franco, their ally. No neutrality legislation proposes to deal with such a situation. We are guided by technicalities and legalities instead of by realities. All American neutrality programs open the road wide to discrimination.

In the case of the war in Spain, it is the legitimate government which suffers. One of the reasons for the arms shortage in loyalist Spain is our own arms embargo, clamped down hastily and in mysterious circumstances. We are thus to blame, along with other democratic countries, for the almost daily bombing and wounding and killing of thousands of women and children in Madrid and elsewhere in loyalist Spain. The embargo could make us partially responsible for the defeat of the legitimate government and the triumph of the rebels. That would be a victory not alone for Franco, who represents few Spaniards and depends entirely on what he gets from sources outside Spain. It would be a victory for Hitler and Mussolini to which we had contributed. Spain must not be regarded as an isolated phenomenon. It is part of a chain of major events which began in Manchuria in 1931 when the Japanese occupied that rich territory and includes the rape of Ethiopia and Hitler's coup of March 7, 1936, remilitarizing the Rhineland. Spain is a sequel to all these fascist successes. If it too becomes a fascist success there is every reason to expect that the fascist powers will seek other fields to conquer. Why should they not grab as long as the grabbing is good? Spain has become the key to Europe's future. If democracy is crushed in Spain, the fascists will be encouraged in France and elsewhere, and Rome and Berlin will be convinced that they can with impunity continue their campaigns against small states. The turn of the larger states will come later.

Peace will not be obtained by talking, or by yearning for peace, or by describing the horrors of past and future wars. The only way to guarantee peace is to stop the fascist aggressors who alone want war. It can still be done in Spain. If Hitler and Mussolini are checked there, they will be weakened and sobered. Europe will have a breathing space of a year or more. In that period certain social processes eating at the vitals of Germany and Italy will have further undermined their strength, whereas France, England, and Russia will be more powerful. The truce in Europe which would follow upon Franco's failure in Spain might postpone for a decade or more the second world war which we all dread so much and whose cost in lives and property would make the war of 1914-18 look like a child's game. If the United States helped the Spanish government to win, we might have peace during this generation. But we are neutral. We therefore have no foreign policy in peace time. We merely have a neutrality policy for war time. It is a policy which makes it pretty sure that there will be a war time.

The cash-and-carry principle introduced into legislation now pending in both houses of Congress is the very negation of neutrality. It means that the nation which has cash and the ships to carry can buy here in war time to its heart's content. That nation might be a potential enemy of the United States. It might be engaged in a flagrant and unwarranted attack on another country. Yet we should be helping it. That is not neutrality. Nor is there neutrality in complete abstention from trade with belligerents. Such complete abstention, be it noted, is not proposed in the neutrality bills. It would hurt American business too much. But suppose we did refuse to buy from or sell to any participant in a war. Some of the participants might have prepared fully for the war in advance. The victims of aggression might not be prepared. The former would not need our supplies. The latter would. By withholding munitions we should be confirming the advantage of the aggressors. We should by doing nothing help one side to win.

No matter how we look at the problem of our relationship to peace and the next war, neutrality is not the solution. We were never neutral in the war between the Allies and the German quadruple alliance. After April, 1917, we simply gave more arms and more money and also men. It is one of the greatest fallacies of American political thinking to suppose that we went into the war in 1917 chiefly because J. P. Morgan had invested in the Allies and wanted to save his investments. Morgan invested in the Allies because the interests of this country were pro-Ally. We could never have allowed Germany to win the war. When there was a danger that it would, we dropped the fiction of non-participation and became an active belligerent. Nor are wars made solely or even in large part by the munition manufacturers' desires for profit.

By all means, let us take the profit out of war. In war time conscript wealth. But that will not prevent wars. Mussolini has practically nationalized the Italian armament industry. Yet he launched one war in Ethiopia in 1935 and another in Spain in 1936-37. Japan would have seized Manchuria even if its business men had been denied an immediate profit. For war is regarded as a period of national investment. If the capitalists can gather no profits during the war they will simply plan to get more profits after the war. Wars are a gamble on future profits and a consequence of the accumulation of past profits. Taking the profit out of war would not stop wars. Taking the profit out the economic system would. The propaganda for neutrality often befogs these fundamental issues.

When an international armed conflict is of no concern to us we cannot be drawn in no matter how much we buy or sell. But if our interests are involved, we shall not be neutral no matter what laws Congress passes. William C. Bullitt, the American Ambassador to France, who knows more about foreign affairs than many United States officials, said in a recent speech in Paris which, according to reliable reports, he had previously read over the transatlantic telephone to President Roosevelt: "It is impossible to affirm that, if war broke out in Europe, America would not be forced in as in 1917." This is indisputable. Every student of international affairs must agree to this proposition. The only sensible procedure, if we are true lovers of peace, is to go beyond neutrality and create a foreign policy conducive to world peace.

To do so requires first an understanding of the international situation and then a relationship to it. There are in the world today three nations which insist that they must expand territorially. They are Germany, Italy, and Japan. In each case the pressure behind the expansionist foreign policy is propaganda about economic insufficiency. These powers have failed to solve the problem of adequately feeding and clothing their own people. Even autarchy, so integral a part of the fascist program, must be looked upon as a measure of preparedness, an industrial weapon forged in advance of a war of aggression.

If the expansionist designs of fascist states are their only salvation, then the non-fascist states, by thwarting those ambitions, are condemning fascism to death. Do England, France, and America wish to pass this death sentence? They are not sure. They fear lest fascism in falling bring down the capitalist structure with it. They hesitate and waver. They do not know their own minds and therefore they take refuge in neutrality, which is just what the fascist aggressors want.

Foreign policy is not a combination of schemes devised in private by government officials. It is always the exact reflection of domestic policy and domestic social conditions. If the great democracies of the world were firmly anti-fascist, it would be easy for them to have a firm anti-fascist foreign policy. That is why the Soviet Union experiences no difficulty in formulating an anti-fascist foreign policy. The Russian social system is by its very nature anti-fascist. The U. S. S. R. has therefore been the strongest pillar of European peace, and the policies of Litvinov as he has eloquently expounded them at Geneva and elsewhere have won ringing applause throughout the world. Russia is not neutral, for Russia is anti-fascist; we are playing around with neutrality because we do not know what we are. It is fairly safe to assume that President Roosevelt and Secretary Hull are anti-fascist in their convictions—but not in their deeds. At this moment a brazen invasion of Spain is going on. The fascist powers, in undisguised violation of their own signatures, of every canon of international law, of every principle of decency and humanity, are trying to crush the Spanish people and their democratically elected, legally constituted government. Apparently that does not matter to us.

We sit by idly and contentedly, denying Spanish democracy the means to defend itself. Neutrality followed to its logical conclusion has made America effectively pro-fascist.

The alternative is not war. There are other weapons at our disposal. The President of the United States could, with a few strong, well-chosen words spoken in private and if need be in public, stop the invasion of Spain. He could by so doing become the winner of the Nobel peace prize for 1937. This country has a duty to mankind and to itself. An ounce of war prevention is worth a pound of neutrality.

Medical Censorship in California

BY LILLIAN SYMES

San Francisco, March 12

SOME TIME in 1934 friends and advocates of some form of "socialized medicine" hailed with delight, and also with surprise, a report that the California Medical Association had gone on record in favor of compulsory health insurance. At about the same time the California Medical Association, together with the State Emergency Relief Administration (now the WPA), initiated an exhaustive study of medical needs in California. This news, on top of the fact that a state legislative inquiry into the cost of medical care had been undertaken in 1933, indicated that the cause of social medicine was looking up in the Far West. In the long and discouraging battle to rationalize medical progress in terms of social need this seemed to be the first breach in the fortifications of that most formidable defender of the individualistic status quo, the American Medical Association.

Later and fuller reports proved that the moral victory in California was by no means a decisive one. The indorsement of a medically controlled "health-insurance system"—not by the C. M. A.'s membership but by its feebly insurgent House of Delegates—was a mere depression baby, born of the desperation of medical practitioners unable to collect their bills. As the first faint rays of recovery lightened the economic horizon, the bill which embodied this plan, though it was a "doctor's plan," conceived primarily in the interest of the profession itself, was permitted after many delays and amendments to die in a legislative committee. The California Medical Association's other depression baby, the Dodd Report on Medical Needs in California, is however very much alive, and the C. M. A. is in the embarrassing position of questioning its legitimacy while demanding full parental control. This exhaustive two-year study of health needs, financed largely by state and federal funds to serve as a basis for intelligent legislative action, has been withheld from publication by the very group which initiated it—the California Medical Association itself.

It may be well to give a brief history of the Dodd report and its relation to the health-insurance movement in California. In 1933 the serious effects of the depression upon the economic status of the medical rank and file prompted the California Medical Association to ask the state Emergency Relief Administration for funds with which to finance a survey of medical needs in the state. The request was granted to the extent of $60,000. Of the total of $95,000 needed to complete the project, approximately $35,000 was appropriated by the C. M. A. itself. The official "sponsor" required for projects to be financed by federal funds was found in the state Department of Public Health. Dr. Paul Dodd, associate professor of economics in the University of California at Los Angeles, was placed in charge of this "Medical-Economic Survey."

At about the same time the state Senate created a Commission on the Cost of Medical Care. In 1935, after extended public hearings, this commission produced a voluminous report recommending a compulsory form of health insurance. (The Dodd report was not yet in.) The commission's bill approached the problem from the medical rather than the economic angle and provided that complete control of the insurance set-up should finally rest with the C. M. A. It was this bill which the C. M. A.'s House of Delegates indorsed. The association did not push it however, and after numerous hearings and amendments and a bitter fight against it by the drug interests, the big industrialists, the Christian Scientists, the fraternal medical groups, and others, the bill was killed.

In May, 1935, a group of assemblymen headed by Dr. Dewey Anderson, a leader of the progressive bloc in the legislature, introduced a bill creating an Assembly Interim Committee on Health and Health Insurance. The bill was carried, but in appointing the five members of the committee the Speaker of the House "stacked" it with a majority who were opposed to any kind of social control of medicine. In spite of this initial handicap the committee, whose report has recently been submitted, had certain advantages. By the time it met, a short preliminary report of the Dodd study had been prepared in mimeographed form and Dr. Dodd himself was called as a witness at a committee hearing. Thus certain findings of the Dodd study were incorporated in the Interim Committee's report to the state legislature. These quotations are the source of the C. M. A.'s present embarrassment and the reason why the report in full may never reach the public.

Work on the California Medical-Economic Survey, under Dr. Dodd's supervision, occupied two years, 1934 and 1935, during which 20,000 representative homes (65,000 persons), 3,500 physicians, 2,200 dentists, 600 osteopaths, and the staffs of numerous hospitals, clinics, and public-health agencies were interviewed. The report calls attention to the fact that while the United States has a larger proportion of licensed physicians than any other nation—one for approximately every 865 persons—the state of California occupies an even more favorable position than the nation as a whole. It has one physician for every 568 persons. Its per capita income is the fourth highest in the United States, and its people spend more than $150,000,000 annually on medical and dental care. Yet more than half its population live in families with a net income of less than $1,200, three-fourths in families with less than $2,000; only four out of a hundred families have incomes of more than $5,000.

In spite of the state's better-than-average proportion of doctors, hospitals, and public-health agencies—which in California as elsewhere are not distributed according to need—and in spite of its favorable per capita income, the failure of the present professional set-up to meet the need for medical and dental care among low-income groups is indicated by the following figures:

Of an estimated 658,000 persons who have reported the receipt of a medical diagnosis showing the need of treatment, only 440,000 have received such treatment. This leaves an estimated 218,000 persons at any given time who have been diagnosed as needing medical attention but who are not receiving it.

Of an estimated 340,000 persons who have received a dental diagnosis calling for treatment, only 160,000 have received it; more than half of those diagnosed are not getting the treatment prescribed.

Not even the most rugged of medical individualists can explain away such figures on the basis of individual carelessness or shiftlessness. "Can we talk of 'too many doctors and dentists,'" asks Dr. Dodd, "can we boast of our high health standards, or can we stand by with complacency satisfied with our present system of private practice in view of these conditions? Without searching further into the problem, here alone can be found twenty or more prospective new patients for every licensed physician and surgeon in the state."

The report indicates further that the fault lies not so much in excessive average charges and payments as in the uncertainty and wide variation in charges and payments. In 1934, 65 per cent of the people of the state had only 10 per cent of the medical charges thrust upon them; 80 per cent carried 25 per cent of the charges; 90 per cent carried 43 per cent; while 10 per cent of the people carried 57 per cent. In the same year the average net income of physicians had dropped to a little more than half of the 1929 level.

The conclusions to be drawn from these and other revelations of unmet medical needs are obviously conclusions which the Medical Association is reluctant to have publicized. The excuses given have a familiar ring to any professional fact-finder: the "emergency" of 1932-35 is now over; medical needs no longer constitute a "problem"; the public clinics can take care of the situation quite adequately; the Dodd report is a social-economic, not a medical study; Professor Dodd is an economist, not a doctor (he was just as much an economist in 1934); there is no need to publish such a document. And one gathers that even if there were, the C. M. A. wouldn't like it. For the Dodd report proves quite conclusively that public medical needs constitute a permanent "emergency"; that the clinics do not and never have answered these needs; that public health is a social-economic problem; that the only answer is some form of socialized medicine.

Dr. Dodd has already relinquished his 600-page manuscript to the C. M. A., and certain members of that organization who have seen it have declared it to be the best and most comprehensive state study of the problem that has yet been made. But although the study itself was financed largely by public funds and officially sponsored by a state agency, the C. M. A., which appropriated only a minor portion of its cost, now claims exclusive copyright. It is said that the association has offered to publish the report providing it is "condensed" and its findings "generalized"—in short, if it is emasculated. A more recent rumor is that the C. M. A. will publish a few copies in full next July, after the possibility of legislative action has been postponed for another two years. As this is written, no definite announcement on the subject has been made.

Within a few weeks the resolution of the Assembly Interim Committee on Health Needs calling for a commission to crystallize public thought and coordinate all available material on social medicine will probably be approved by the state legislature. The resolution calls for a commission composed of three members of the legislature, a representative from each healing profession, and one from each interested group—labor, business, women's clubs, and the like. Powerful leaders in the C. M. A. object to the lay character of this proposed commission. Certainly the Dodd report should be utilized by such a commission and should serve as a departure for public discussion of the subject. It was for just such a purpose that the study was made. But unless the C. M. A. decides that it cannot afford to play John Sumner to an important public document, or the new commission can force its release, or Professor Dodd is induced to meet the C. M. A.'s terms and permit partial publication, the California Medical-Economic Survey may furnish another chapter in the great American fact-finding farce.

Trotsky vs. Malraux

[The following dispatch, quoting Leon Trotsky, was issued through the United Press from Mexico City on March 8.]

LEON TROTSKY today accused the French writer André Malraux, who is at present in New York, of being a Stalin agent. He also charged Malraux with being one of those responsible for the failure of the Chinese revolution. "When Malraux pays tribute to the courageous and perspicacious policy of the Cárdenas government toward the Spanish revolution, I obviously have no objection," said Trotsky. "I only express my regret that Mexico's initiative found no support." Trotsky says, moreover, that Malraux's trip is for the purpose of halting the movement to unmask Moscow. "New York is the center of the movement in favor of a review of the Moscow trials, which is the only way of preventing new judicial assassinations," Trotsky said. It is unnecessary to explain how much this movement alarms the organizers of the Moscow amalgams.

"In 1926 Malraux was serving the Comintern and the Kuomintang in China and is the one who carries the responsibility for the strangulation of the Chinese revolution. Malraux is organically incapable of moral independence; he is official by birth. In New York he issues an appeal to forget everything except the Spanish revolution. However, Malraux, like other diplomats, speaks least of that which concerns him most. His solicitude for Spain did not prevent Stalin from exterminating dozens of old revolutionaries. Malraux himself left Spain for the purpose of conducting a campaign in the United States in defense of the judicial work of Stalin and Vyshinsky. It is necessary to add that the policies of the Comintern in Spain reflect completely its fatal policies in China. . . ."

[M. Malraux's reply, which appears below, has not been printed in full in any other publication.]

New York, March 13

When I arrived in the United States, I had not read the newspapers for seven days—the period of the crossing. On my arrival I found a statement of Mr. Trotsky in which he called on me as a witness. [This refers to Trotsky's assertion, published on February 16, that Malraux among others had visited him in the south of France at the time he was accused of meeting Vladimir Romm in Paris.] I have just received a second statement in which Mr. Trotsky accuses me of being responsible for the strangulation of the Chinese revolution, accuses me of being incapable of moral independence, and finally of being an agent of Stalin.

I can maintain that Hemingway is Mr. Roosevelt's literary pseudonym or I can accuse Mr. Trotsky of being the author of the Charlie Chaplin films. It is easy to prove what one has done; it is another story to prove what one has not done. Up to the present time Mr. Trotsky has devoted to the Chinese revolution a considerable number of studies (one of them appeared on the occasion of the publication of one of my books). But Mr. Trotsky, who has attacked personally all those whom he held responsible for the Chinese defeat, has never ascribed to me an important political role in this revolution. For a period of ten years I have been of no account in the history of the Chinese revolution. Now I suddenly become its most important figure. Is it because in the interim I have declared that the immediate collectivization of land in Spain is thoroughly impracticable and impossible, thus accepting the position of the Spanish Popular Front government and opposing the program of the P. O. U. M. and the Spanish Trotskyites? If I were in agreement with Mr. Trotsky on the Spanish question, then apparently I should never have been responsible for the defeat in China.

When Mr. Trotsky calls me an agent of Stalin, he brings to mind those French generals who during the World War described as German agents all those journalists who did not like the twist of their mustaches. Not to agree with Mr. Trotsky on his Spanish policy does not necessarily mean that one is an agent of Stalin. I was the only French writer who publicly came to the defense of Mr. Trotsky when he was expelled from France by M. Laval, but after that time I became the president of the Committee for the Liberation of Dimitrov when he was unjustly accused of having burned the Reichstag and then kept in prison after his acquittal. Apparently to Mr. Trotsky moral independence consists not only in defending Mr. Trotsky but also in not defending Dimitrov.

If Mr. Trotsky, instead of declaring that I am in the United States to uphold the indictments in the Moscow trials, had read the newspapers, it would have been easy for him to see that in not a single interview of those which I have given have I touched this subject. But Mr. Trotsky is so obsessed with whatever concerns his personal fate that if a man who has just come from seven months of active fighting in Spain makes the statement that help for Republican Spain comes before all else in importance, such statement seems to Mr. Trotsky to hide something.

Mr. Trotsky says that no country has followed Mexico's initiative in aiding the Spanish Loyalists. Here he knows he lies.

I reserve the right to discuss later at greater length the fundamentals of this debate, which go far beyond the personality of Mr. Trotsky or myself, but I deplore now the incredible levity with which Mr. Trotsky is ready to hurl any accusation in order to dramatize his personal conflicts. I regret the total difference with which he offers the French fascists weapons to use against a man whom they are trying desperately to attack. This levity is calculated to make one look with the greatest distrust upon the present Spanish policy of Mr. Trotsky.

Mr. Trotsky realized that if anyone had credited his charge that I was an agent of the Comintern my work in this country in behalf of Spain would have suffered. Was that the purpose he wished to achieve?

ANDRE MALRAUX

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

What Is The Nation Coming to?

RETURNING from the West Indies, I find that the difference in temperature between the two regions is not what it was when I left. Thanks to the President's Supreme Court proposal, the sitdown strikes, Marriner Eccles with his threat of imminent inflation, and Fiorello LaGuardia's outspokenness, there is certainly heat enough in God's country to make a trip to any torrid zone unnecessary even for invalids. Why go to view Mont Pelée or the lovely Souffrière on Guadeloupe when one can buy a daily newspaper or one's favorite weekly and find molten lava erupting on every page? As for our columnists, heaven help us! Never since the Battle of the Boyne was there anything to compare with it. If you have shillalahs prepare to use them now.

The hottest and most terrifying of all the Scribes and Pharisees is my own editorial associate and next-page neighbor in The Nation, Heywood Broun. What a battle ax he swings! Let Senator Wheeler or President Conant dare to breathe opposition to Fifteen Men on a White House Bench and Broun, with or without a bottle of rum, has his teeth in the unfortunate's neck, shaking him until all the disgraceful facts about his grandfather, his father, and his predecessor in his present job, together with his previous sins, tumble out of his gyrating pockets. I am so scared that I would conceal, if I could, my opposition to the Roosevelt method of achieving the Supreme Court reform I have urged so long. Unfortunately, while I was among those calm and patient isles I wrote a piece for some newspapers telling where I stood, in utter unawareness that I was thereby reading myself out of life-long liberal associations. So now I am a recreant liberal gone tory, a miserable person who would fiddle with a constitutional amendment while America burns—with shame for Nine Old Men. Well, ugly facts will out, and I suppose it will now be spread abroad that for years I employed non-union labor and actually own an honorable discharge ("character excellent") from one of those strike-breaking militias. What has covered me with humiliation most of all are these words of Broun's: "On which side are you going to fight? Are you going to fight standing beside Bishop Manning, A. Lawrence Lowell, the Herald Tribune, the Liberty League, and William Randolph Hearst? Make up your mind."

Nothing else has revealed so clearly my present baseness, the falsity of my standards and values. How much time have I not wasted during these long years trying to assay rights and wrongs, seeking to get facts, endeavoring to weigh ethical values and to balance the merits and demerits of every proposal! How much, much easier it would have been always to have asked: "Where stand Manning and Hearst, James H. Rand, A. Lawrence Lowell, Henry Cabot Lodge, President Harding, the war-makers, the patrioteers, and all the others I have hated or despised?" And then to have stood against them. But, after all, it is not quite so easy, for there are times when even a tory blunders on to the right side. Lowell, the unforgivable condemner of Sacco and Vanzetti, fought gloriously for professorial freedom of conscience and speech in the war days, when almost every other college head became a witch-burner. And Hearst was right, whatever his motives, when he tried to keep the United States out of the World War. It was hard in the fight against the Treaty of Versailles to find oneself a political bed-fellow with Senator Lodge, with the Herald Tribune, and, what is worse, the Chicago Tribune, and with all the diehards and reactionaries. But there never was a better job done than that. No one who fought that fight can do aught but rejoice in it when he sees today that treaty trampled underfoot with not one human being to do it reverence; when he sees the failure of the League, damned from the start by being intertwined with the folly and wickedness and injustices of the treaty. Yet there were liberals in plenty then to say: "Look at The Nation! See the company it keeps! Think of its editors striking hands with Moses and Harding!"

For years one wing of the Abolitionists occupied precisely the same position as the swashbuckling cavalier secessionists in the South whom they so bitterly attacked. They publicly burned the Constitution. They wanted "no union with slaveholders." They wanted the Southern states to get out of the Union and to stay out until purged of their sin of sins, human slavery. And how they were pilloried in the North, denounced, vilified, and ridiculed for their secessionist pro-slavery bedfellows! I might go on and even point out that Heywood Broun stands shoulder to shoulder with William Green in opposition to Hitler and all his vile works. Does that make Hitler deserving of Broun's support? I hardly think so.

That I live in another day and age was clear to me when I read recently in The Nation—the same journal which fought so hard against Grant's proposal to pack the court—an appeal by Professor Karl N. Llewellyn of Columbia Law School, calling on us to join "the anti-tory front," although he admits that the President's proposal "is unfortunate from every angle but one." So, as Dorothy Thompson says, let us joyously go forward with such advanced and radical thinkers and curbers of the court as Jim Farley, Joe Robinson, Homer Cummings, and Pat Harrison—bedfellows whom Heywood Broun has loved so dearly in the past.

BROUN'S PAGE

Expert Testimony

WHEN it was first announced that the Senate Judiciary Committee would hold a hearing on the President's proposals, I assumed that naturally the justices of the Supreme Court would be invited to testify. And I assumed and still assume that the members of the High Bench ought to accept this opportunity with alacrity. Strangely enough the opposition to such a procedure comes from those who are against any kind of change. It seems to me curious that the defenders of the status quo should want to bar the very men whose opinions readily fall under the head of expert testimony.

Recently rumors have been flying about of very sharp division among Supreme Court members. I am not referring to certain five-to-four decisions or to the acid quality in some of the dissenting opinions. Of course Washington is a whispering gallery, and some of the wildest tales which circulate are probably untrue. And yet there seems to be a basis for the belief that within the court itself there is difference of opinion as to its field and function. If this is so the people of America have every right to hear the arguments of nine men who are vitally concerned with the most important issue now before the country.

We take great pride in saying that our judicial system rigidly excludes all star-chamber procedure. That is less than accurate. It is true that cases are publicly argued before the Supreme Court and that when a decision is rendered, both sides—in some cases three sides—make open statements as to the reasons for their interpretations. But this still leaves too much off the record. There should be a stenographic report of the arguments which occur in chambers. Possibly some lapse of time might be arranged. In order to spare the blushes of good men and true, a year might pass by before any publication of what occurred when the nine let their hair down in discussion which at times may have been somewhat acrimonious.

As far as legal matters go, the Supreme Court of the United States should have no private life at all. The most intimate conferences should be preserved so that posterity may weigh and evaluate the mental conflicts. As things stand, not even the wisest scholar can write a complete biography of the Constitution, the men who made it, and the men who are still contributing to its meaning. In a sense every highly debatable case is a sort of constitutional convention in which something is added to the scope of the instrument or subtracted from it. It is a legitimate curiosity to demand not only the present publicity of prepared opinions but some account of the manner in which they were arrived at.

In two recent episodes it has seemed to me that the Supreme Court adopted a decidedly horse-and-buggy attitude toward publicity, which after all is just another word for information. Indeed, it might even be argued that this hostility to press and radio breaks the tradition of the Founding Fathers. It is true that the Constitutional Convention met in secret, but at least one first-class reporter was present in the person of Madison, and his diary has furnished invaluable material on the discussion which went on behind closed doors. I believe it is also said that Benjamin Franklin was quite a sieve and that he could be pumped by any journalist of the day who caught him at the right hour and in just the proper mood.

But in the last few months the Washington correspondents have undertaken to establish a somewhat new custom in regard to the court, and when the President's proposals were announced, the reporters boldly invaded the Greek temple on the hill and undertook to get from the nine men some kind of answer to such pertinent questions as "How come?" and "What about it?" No news gatherer got any farther than a brief meeting with an office boy or a secretary, and presently the private police of the building were instructed to throw the interlopers out. The Washington correspondents have not yet developed sufficient labor consciousness to put on a sitdown strike until such time as some one of the justices comes through with a story.

Again a salesman who undertook to sell "The Nine Old Men" in front of the Supreme Court building was given the bum's rush. And within the fortnight the members of the High Bench refused to let radio reports of the proceedings go out from the basement of the building. I think this attitude is unfortunate. I believe the public has a right to get every scrap of useful information.

It seems to me that it would be wholly dignified and proper for one and all of the members of the Supreme Court to appear before the Senate Judiciary Committee and voice their own views at length and with complete candor. Justice McReynolds has not been considered the most liberal member of the bench, and yet he undertook, quite properly I think, to discuss some phases of the court problem at a fraternity banquet. Later, to be sure, Justice McReynolds stated that he probably would have said nothing if he had known that reporters were present. And here again I catch a hint of an attitude which seems to me deplorable. If Justice McReynolds thinks that the members of Phi Delta Theta have a right to know his views on the New Deal, I see no reason why he should wish to withhold this information from the other voters of the country.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

REVOLUTION BY POETIC JUSTICE

BY WILLIAM TROY

IT IS no secret that the group of young English poets which includes W. C. Auden, Day Lewis, Michael Roberts, and Stephen Spender has caused almost as much embarrassment to the orthodox Marxists as to the bourgeois enemy against whom they wage guerrilla warfare in their verse. The response to Mr. Auden's recent volume,¹ for example, demonstrates this ambiguity to a marked degree. Those critics who do not deplore the shock tactics adopted in certain of the poems in the collection discover in certain others a retreat into the private vision which amounts to something like religious backsliding. Obviously Mr. Auden is being completely pleasing to nobody just at present; and the sharp division in his verse can only suggest that he himself is still rather undetermined as to his precise function as a poet. On the one hand, he is a satirist of such vigor, freshness, and ingenuity that at first glance it seems impossible not to recognize him as a militant revolutionist. But his satire is strongest on the purely negative side; it is the satire of "The Vision of Judgment" rather than that of "The Hind and the Panther." It is clearer to what things the poet is opposed than to what things he gives allegiance.

On the positive side the values are but dimly implied through a rhetoric that never finds symbols as definite and compelling as those which are made to stand for the rejected order. Moreover, these values do not operate in the only way in which they could prove their complete reality for a poet—through an aesthetic ordering that is a reflection of an ordering of the whole personality. In Yeats's phrase, Mr. Auden gives the impression of quarreling with his neighbors without having made sure that everything is perfectly all right at home. It is understandable enough why the churchgoing Communist has found something distinctly suspect in the centrifugal quality of the communism emanating from this verse. It is communism not only without benefit of clergy but without any very fixed points of reference in the mind. And like any contemporary attitude that becomes too detached from intellectual support, it is continually dissipating into a wholly negative and morally self-consuming romanticism. (It is irrelevant that Mr. Auden has just reported in Spain: the final test of values in a poet is not in action but in poetry.) As for the other sort of poetry that Mr. Auden writes, the personal love lyrics in the current volume, it possesses a distinction of line and surface that is all too rare in our time. But its connection with the attitudes elsewhere expressed in his work is either too general or too remote to be established without considerable sophistry. Eda Lou Walton has pointed out that the influence of Hopkins has been discarded for that of A. E. Housman; and there is a more than technical interest in the shift. It may signify a temporary abandonment of the effort toward complete self-integration around an idea, of which Hopkins provided the example, for the more limited notations of the unattached sensibility.

The incertitude that is merely implicit in Mr. Auden's poetry is quite explicit in the work of other members of his group, particularly Stephen Spender, who has just written what he calls an act of will, an assertion in behalf of two things that he very much cares for, justice and poetry. The book² is a bewildering farrago of historical information, political theory, personal autobiography, and unamalgamated emotion. The whole first part is an account of liberalism along the lines drawn by Harold J. Laski and John Strachey; and this is of course an account of liberalism that will be thoroughly familiar to readers of liberal journals. Liberalism is again represented as a smoke-screen ideology promoted by the middle class during the last two centuries to conceal its real motives from itself and from others. And the thesis is that since political freedom without economic freedom has proved inadequate to all but a privileged few in the modern world, democracy must immediately be replaced by communism. In the third section, which is a journey in space as the first has been a journey in time, we are taken on a political Cook's tour through England, fascist Italy and Germany, and the Webbs' two-volume version of Soviet Russia. It is true that these final chapters were written before the Spanish civil war and the last Moscow trials. But presumably, since Mr. Spender was prepared for the former event and at least reconciled to the previous set of trials, these events do not alter his fundamental picture. From the first and third sections we are expected to receive an impression of the external facts of social and political reality presented to the disinterested "liberal-idealist" observer.

In the middle section, which is entitled The Inner Journey, Mr. Spender is concerned not so much with facts as with his own attempt to achieve an emotional orientation in regard to them. He submits himself to an inner catechism, asking himself disconcerting questions concerning the authenticity of his conversion, the relationship between his role as poet and his role as propagandist, and the problem of the freedom of the individual. Here we are brought to the core of those problems which are treated elsewhere in the book only through the clichés of current political analysis. And it is here that we can detect more than once evidence of the deep personal confusion that is responsible, among the members of his group, for the increasing breach between their declared allegiance and their poetic practice.

¹ "On This Island." By W. H. Auden. Random House. $1.50.

² "Forward from Liberalism." By Stephen Spender. Random House. $2.

For Mr. Spender justice, freedom, and equality correspond not to moral or intellectual values but to emotions: "To me Beethoven's 'Fidelio' has a greater emotional appeal than any other music, because the music of that opera is dominated by the excitement of one idea, one word, one musical phrase—Freiheit." There would be nothing suspect about this utterance if it were immediately followed by an identification of the sentiment with an objective set of values outside the individual. But Mr. Spender persists in retaining a distinction between the individual capable of having such a feeling and communism as a dogma. This is evident in the conclusion that "the only integrity is personal integrity. Therefore, whilst it is right to demand absolute loyalty from the individual to his group, it is wrong to try and transform his mind into a generalized group mind." Such a separation of individual integrity from the integrity of the group offers another classic example of the irrepressible romantic ambition to have one's cake and eat it too. But the separation is made even more vivid in the distinction between poetry and prose, which are represented as "two separate ways of exercising one's consciousness." Prose of the propagandist sort is concerned with problems of the will; but poetry with "that of crystallizing and contemplating a given situation, a situation which is permanent and yet contains within itself inescapable truth, which is a seed of energy, planted in the mind of the reader." Logically, of course, this amounts to that divorce between morality and aesthetics which left critics so bitterly denounce in the writers of the last century. Problems of will—of which social action is here the most prominent—are segregated in one section of the personality, and creative activity in another. The only thing that could possibly unite them would be some body of dogma common to the poet and his society; but Mr. Spender is opposed to dogma. "Principles are more important than dogma, because principles develop, whilst a dogma is static. . . . The real leaders, the true loyalists, stand above the party code."

It is hardly necessary to point out that what all this amounts to is a religion without a church. (How enthusiastically, it may be asked, would this last statement be welcomed in Moscow?) The "principles" for which Mr. Spender stands are not in their broadest sense different from those of romanticism, which was also a religion without a church. And romanticism, it will be recalled, is intimately bound up with that liberalism which Mr. Spender is so busily exposing throughout his volume. In the final analysis the motivation behind his group is indistinguishable from what we find in Byron, Shelley, and the other English poets of the early nineteenth century. Leaving aside comparisons of a strictly literary nature, there is the same rejection of external authority, the same failure to relate the individual to the social will, and the same belief in progress. It is communism with a distinctly English accent. That is to say, it is the old

SELDEN RODMAN narrates in epic verse the legend of a heroic figure of our times

"Selden Rodman's narrative poem of T. E. Lawrence's career is swiftly moving, colorful, easy to read and well disciplined in its means of telling a romantic story. Seems to sustain evidence of an actual revival in American poetry."

—HORACE GREGORY,
New York Herald Tribune

"I've liked it more than any narrative poetry for a long, long time. . . . This poem brings its own vitality, its own brilliance of scene and image, to the mind . . . it takes the interest with its pace and variety." —MURIEL RUKEYSER

"A poem of distinction . . . always animated by a burning sincerity and a desire to get back of the facts into the mind and soul of the actual man."

—WILLIAM ROSE BENET,
Saturday Review of Literature

"A striking and very interesting dramatic poem . . . where, in spite of the vividness of adventure, war and death, the great drama is in a man's own mind. I find this the most interesting book on Colonel Lawrence that has yet been written."

—HENRY SEIDEL CANBY,
The Book-of-the-Month Club News

"A supple, disciplined and dramatic verse narrative . . . an unusual and impressive piece of work."

—RALPH THOMPSON,
New York Times

The Viking Press

$2.50

LAWRENCE

THE LAST CRUSADE

The Three Lives of T. E. Lawrence

The authoritative history of American diplomacy

With the same authority and lucidity that won him the 1926 Pulitzer Prize in History, Professor Bemis presents the record of our diplomatic history from our earliest days as a nation up to the present. "The most comprehensive and scholarly history of American diplomacy that we have."
—N. Y. Times. Illustrated, $5

A DIPLOMATIC HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES

by Samuel Flagg Bemis

A brilliant record of an eventful era

This lively, and authoritative volume reviews recent American history. Written from the liberal point of view, its emphasis is on social history, with special attention to the adjustment of industrial enterprise and the Federal Government. It throws into proper perspective our present problems. $3.50

ROOSEVELT TO ROOSEVELT

by Dwight Lowell Dumond

A survey of Europe's storm centre

A noted German writer presents a penetrating analysis of the political and economic problems facing Central Europe. He deals with the post-war groupings, the Hapsburg question, the "Anschluss"—, presents the facts, surveys the problems and indicates the solutions of these portentous questions. $2.75

CENTRAL EUROPE AND THE WESTERN WORLD

by Gerhard Schacher

Must the state be tyrannical?

The Chief Editorial Writer of the Cincinnati Enquirer appraises our American state. He analyzes its shortcomings, and suggests steps which can be taken to increase its effectiveness. For every American who is concerned with avoiding both Communism and Fascism. $2.50

OUR INEFFECTIVE STATE

by William H. Hessler

HENRY HOLT & CO., NEW YORK

ideal of Anglo-Saxon protestantism recovering from the effects of its alliance with nineteenth-century liberalism and ready to fall into the arms of a communism from which all external curbs have been carefully removed.

Another way of putting this would be to say that Auden, Spender, and the rest are indulging in the emotional satisfaction to be derived from communism as a revolutionary movement without undertaking the moral and intellectual responsibilities involved in its acceptance as a dogma. Communism is either a new label for a set of unanchored emotional attitudes, which makes it identical with romanticism, or it is a self-contained body of objective ideas, which makes it at least comparable to an orthodox church. Unless they submit their minds to these alternatives, their work is certain to vacillate between either an expansive rhetoric or a negative satire and the "narrow strictness" of the personal lyric, between problems of will and problems of poetry. Such an effort of the intellect, it may be added, is itself a moral struggle of the greatest fertility for poetry, as Hopkins demonstrated in his strenuous attempt to reconcile his sensibility with his theology. And the point is here made because such an effort, in the case of poets with their almost excessive vulnerability to contemporary experience, is a necessary condition to their further development.

BOOKS

Adam Smith Is Pleased

AN INQUIRY INTO THE NATURE AND CAUSES OF THE WEALTH OF NATIONS. By Adam Smith. Edited by Edwin Cannan. With an Introduction by Max Lerner. The Modern Library. $1.10.

WHEN my medium put me into touch with Adam Smith last night, the sage was chortling over the Modern Library edition of "The Wealth of Nations." He professed a livelier satisfaction in it than in any other edition since the very first. I ventured to express surprise. Mankind's interest in his work must be an old story to him. Disciples have been editing his classic since 1805; there have been no one knows how many reprintings in English, and a score of translations into other tongues. Why make so much of one more testimonial to the vitality of his book?

"Because," he answered, "the Modern Library edition exemplifies so well the excellent results produced by 'the obvious and simple system of natural liberty.' When I put my manuscript into the hands of Strahan, an excellent printer, he made it into a two-volume quarto and charged £1 16s per set. That was in 1776. On page 70 of this new edition you will find that common laborers in the province of New York were then earning the equivalent of two shillings sterling a day, substantially more than the London rate. It would have cost a New York laborer eighteen days of work to buy a copy of my first edition, not counting the cost of carriage. Now his great-great-grandson can buy a copy for $1.10, and I am assured that any New York laborer who does not earn three or four times that sum daily by working only eight hours is underpaid. In terms of 'The Wealth of Nations,' real wages have risen more than fifty-fold since 1776. Could I find a more gratifying example of what individual initiative can accomplish under conditions of free competition?"

"And this is not a case," he went on, "of 'cheap and nasty' goods. The new edition, though less stately, is far more convenient to use than my two quartos. The type puts no strain upon the eye, the paper will pass, the binding is neat. I regret only that the publishers chose for their dust cover ■ cut of five men hauling on ■ rope. Why did they not illustrate the modern division of labor, instead of drudgery appropriate to the pyramid builders? But that is a trifle. What counts is the inside of a book, and I must admit that the present text is better than the text even of the last edition I saw through the press myself. I was rather unfortunate in my earlier editors from Playfair to McCulloch; but Edwin Cannan has more than made amends. He has treated me as a literary scholar would treat my favorite poet, Gray. He has noted every variation in the readings of the first five editions, he has checked each of my references and found many new ones, he has made a better index than I had patience for, he has supplied ■ terse marginal summary, and he has written a discreet account of my labors. The only thing wrong with Cannan's edition was that it cost $12, of which I hope he got a liberal share. But now all the admirable features of his work can be had in a single volume for $1.10. May I not congratulate myself that private enterprise has combined the best of scholarship with good mechanical quality and low price?"

"Most of all," Adam Smith concluded with what sounded like a chuckle in his voice, "I am delighted to see how right I was in believing that economic freedom nourishes freedom of thought. The publishers, who hope to make a profit from this edition, a venture in which they have my best wishes, commissioned an introduction from a young scholar who is critical of profit making and who compares my book to Machiavel's 'Prince.' I referred to 'the tyranny of one of Machiavel's heroes'; Max Lerner refers to the tyranny of my heroes, using the weapons I forged for them. He calls me 'something of a revolutionary,' which I strove to be in economic policy, and 'an unconscious mercenary in the service of a rising capitalist class,' which was no part of my intention. Mr. Lerner himself mentions my warnings about the conspiracies of commercial men against the commonweal, and recognizes that I have often been horrified by perverted applications of my doctrine. In return, I have the honor of agreeing with him that free enterprise has produced some ill results along with much that is good. But is not Mr. Lerner's own position as hard to classify as mine was, and ■ the position of any discriminating man who loves the truth is bound to be when he faces a complicated human situation? Does he not agree with me in approving the fruit of private enterprise as exemplified by the volume he has so kindly recommended to the reading public? Certainly he values, as I did in my day, freedom to criticize ideas and institutions. Under what other form of economic organization prevailing in the world would he have such liberty of speech as he enjoys in what he calls an 'individualistic capitalist economy'? In addition to my thanks for his introduction I hope Mr. Lerner will accept my congratulations upon flourishing within an economic system that permits him to dilate upon its shortcomings while he is contributing to one of its many good results."

WESLEY C. MITCHELL

A Manual for Students and for the General Reader

HIS LATEST BOOK ON THE SEXUAL LIFE

Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime

COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse; Physical Factors; Mental Factors
The Sexual Zones
The Sexual Impulse in Youth

Masturbation

Frigidity: Frequency of; Nature of; Factors in; Treatment of Impotence: Frequency of; Nature of; Temporary; Psychic; Neurasthenic; Treatment of

First Intercourse

Secondary Sexual Characters

The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"

Sexual Abnormalities

Sexual Irregularities

Exhibitionism

The Sexual Criminal

Analysis of Courtship

Woman's Change of Life: Adjustments; Advantages; Effect on Sexual Desire

The Dangerous Age in Men

Symptoms; Physical and Psychic Aspects

Carl Van Doren says: "The best one-volume treatment of ■ in the English language."

Sadism and Masochism

Cruelty and Pain in Relation to ■

Homosexuality: Background and Prevalence; Types and States

Homosexuality: Temporary; Pseudo-; in Youth; in Later Life; in Normal Persons

Hermaphroditism

Sexual Abstinence

Sex Intercourse and Health

Divorce
Monogamy; Polygamy
The Nature of Birth Control
The Question of Abortion
Frequency of Coitus

The Nation ■ "There is probably no better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

The Sexual Athlete

Satyriasis; Nymphomania

Jealousy

Married Love

Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex

Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience

Modesty; Nudism

Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after

Sexual Feeling in Women

Sex Practice in Marriage

Methods and Technique of Coitus

Sexual Pleasure and Conception

Positions in Coitus

■ Life and Nervous Disorders

Sexual Difficulties

Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido"

Dreams; Their Significance

■ Life of Unmarried Adults

Sexual Fetishes and Symbols

The Art of Love

Sexual Adjustments

Sex Happiness

Age and the Sexual Impulse

The Sexual Impulse and Love

Love Rights of Women; ■ Men

The Choice of ■ Mate

Ethetics of Coitus

Expression and Repression

Substitutes for Sex

Treatment of ■ Complaints

Medical and Legal Treatment of Abnormal Gratification

Nature and Habits of the Invert: Medical and Legal Treatment of

Bisexual Attraction: Inter-Sexuality

Eonism (Identification with opposite sex)

The Marriage Relationship

The Power of the Sexual Urge

Sexual Maladjustments in Marriage

Wide Range of the Sexual Impulse

Relationship of Sex to Happiness in Marriage

Chastity: the Primitive Attitude; the Attitude Today

The Treatment of Sexual Anesthesia in Women

Bertrand Russell says: "Few books on sex ■ be so confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."

Restriction of ■ Activity

How the Physician May Help

Main Channels of ■ Procedure

Factors in Erotic Personality

Sex as ■ Instinct versus ■ as ■ Appetite

Preparation for Marriage

Fertility and Sterility

Glossary of Sexual Terms

Index

Birth Control Review

says: "Sums up the phenomena of sex psychology in their normal relation to life, ■ that the average person may get sufficient information to serve both in life and in conversation."

Science News Letter

says: "Not alone the psychological, but also the biological and medical aspects of marriage, love, and the ■ ual impulse ■ discussed, and ■ light is given on more or less universal problems."

Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases says: "Some of the finest and, in many respects, the most advanced findings in this field."

AUTHORIZED ■

$3.00

POSTPAID

■ 6TH PRINTING

389
PAGES

MAIL THIS COUPON

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or ■ Emerson Books, Inc., Dept. 903-N, 251 West 19th St., New York City. Send me a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 plus a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to ■ refunded, if returned within 5 days.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if ■ wish ■ enclose only $3 thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

SEND NO MONEY

When writing ■ advertisers please mention The Nation

Hungry Children

Drawing by Kathe Kollwitz

FEED SPAIN'S CHILDREN

When Children Ask
for Bread There Is Only One Answer—
BREAD!

A bowl of bread and milk each day will dull the edge of a child's hunger. It will quiet a mother's anxiety. It will keep small bones firm through terror and civil war.
We must feed Spain's children.

Help Fill The Nation's Food Ship

I enclose $.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

Small Trade Wind

GREAT TRADE ROUTE. By Ford Madox Ford. Oxford University Press. $3.

PORTRAITS FROM LIFE. By Ford Madox Ford. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

"IMPRESSIONS are sensations that impinge and leave scars on the consciousness of the transient." Ford Madox Ford says so, and his consciousness of the transient has taken a good deal of punishment in its time. There are not many whose literary reminiscences begin at the age of six, with poor Mr. Swinburne being carried up the back stairs and put into the bath by the housemaid and the cabman. Fewer, perhaps, at eight, finding Turgenev waiting in the studio, could have entertained him in conversation. Surely anyone who claims to have been the model for the hero of "The Wings of the Dove" is entitled to that distinction, without being required to spell Merton Densher's name as Henry James did.

Mr. Ford, then, has reason to be writing his memoirs. His latest volume of them appears unpretentiously as a series of portraits from life, commissioned by the American Mercury, unified by no principle more rigorous than the vicissitudes of a professional career nor any tone more pervasive than the Anglo-American literary atmosphere which Mr. Ford exhales. Here and there, out of this collection of first-hand material about the curiosities, quarrels, and calamities of eleven authors, a personal detail springs into sudden relevance—Henry James's struggles with the servant problem or D. H. Lawrence's impact upon his first editor. Mr. Ford is frankly an impressionist... observe the pointillage of his style...

One generalization has been suggested to Mr. Ford by his variety of sitters. They can be divided into craftsmen and politicians, into those who wrote under the mutually exclusive influences of art and science. The defects of Wells, Galsworthy, and Dreiser he amiably imputes to the intrusion of politico-scientific reform in their work. The other line, which has its roots in the tradition of French naturalism, includes Turgenev, James, Conrad, W. H. Hudson, Stephen Crane, and presumably Mr. Ford as the last leaf. But the dichotomy cannot be pushed too far. Mr. Ford keenly appreciates the political significance of a work of art like "Sketches of a Sportsman." And how does he classify Hardy and Lawrence, whose artistry was vitiated, in both cases, by non-political obsessions?

Mr. Ford has just published another book which undertakes to save the world, although there seems to be no great hurry about it. His trade route, so far as it can be followed, is the fortieth parallel, separating Nordic from "Sino-Hellenic-Latin" culture, and indicating their movement from east to west. It also serves as a piece of mythological and anthropological machinery, to link Mr. Ford's recent American travels with the march of civilization as a whole. Mr. Ford lives in Provence, but we are his adopted literary public, and the prescription is for us. In New York he has taxied around Columbia Circus, in Washington he has seen the Japanese plum blossoms; he has watched cricket matches on the playing fields of Philadelphia and sipped coca-cola à l'eau through the cities of the South. "... I don't want really to know anything about the state of Delaware. I want to be able to regard everything here as a fairyland."

This qualification disarms any suspicion aroused by the statement that Delaware has a population of 23,000. There may even be some Pickwickian sense in which Friedrich Engels was the son-in-law of Karl Marx. And on the War

March 27, 1937

Between the States, obviously, Mr. Ford is full of mint julep. From childhood amid the Hammersmith socialists to old age among the Nashville agrarians—in all this there is consistency, if not progress. The apocalypse of Mr. Ford is a nation of small producers, suburban Robinson Crusoes as it were. He can cite you practical instances of those who have raised their own vegetables and still found time to get on with their painting or poetry or wood-carving. In economic terms, subsistence farms, such as Monticello, suit him from the ground up. He stands for ■ cassoulet de Castelnaudary in every casserole.

There are things we cannot expect from a surviving impressionist. Mr. Ford has sympathy, generosity, catholicity, and that is much. His approach to literature and life can scarcely be characterized as historical, philosophical, or even critical; he might pardon a gallicism and let us call it degustation. He is the retired British officer sitting at the next table, who turns out, after a few drinks, to possess an amazing store of anecdotes and opinions, to have known the great by their first names, to be utterly frivolous and engaging, and only once in a while to become serious and a little tedious. Ah, le bon vieux temps! We can ignore his advice, but we cannot begrudge him his douceur de vivre.

HARRY LEVIN

The Meanings of Value

A PRIMER FOR CRITICS. By George Boas. The Johns Hopkins Press. $2.

IT IS an agreeable surprise to find ■ book on aesthetics written in simple language. Professor Boas is evidently not one of those philosophers who find it necessary to relate their discourses to their systems rather than to their readers. In "A Primer for Critics" he attempts clarification of the issues raised by the confusion of the different meanings of value. Criticism deals with value judgments; but a work may contain many different values, and Professor Boas does us the favor of showing us what the basis of these are in criticism. Though he modestly calls his book a primer, it is only so in the sense that the issues which it raises are primary.

Professor Boas reminds us that no one judgment of a work of art is or can be exclusive. Thus where political activities tend to take precedence over other forms of action, it is perhaps necessary to judge from the point of view of expediency alone. But social expediency is an instance of what Professor Boas calls the instrumental value of a thing. And he goes on to tell us that instrumental value, or the use value of a thing, is not the only kind of value. Instrumental values are for the sake of what he calls terminal values, those values which are for their own sakes. Here he makes a fresh application of an old truth. The distinction may be obvious, but Professor Boas adds that which is not so obvious—that the same object may have both instrumental and terminal value. He does not pretend to final judgment, but avoids it, and this is one of the book's likable traits.

He reminds us that things satisfy us because they are in relation to us, or, more precisely, to our particular states, which are mutable. We may find reason for approbation in what satisfies a particular want, but we change. And what we approved of once we now condemn, and with equal reason. Dr. Boas goes on to suggest that this is as true of the race as of the individual, and what we call eternal values are no more than the by-products of long-enduring yet transient experience. This has the merit of sharpening an old dispute.

SEE SOVIET RUSSIA

with

JULIEN BRYAN

WALT CARMON

JULIA DORN

WILL GEER

NORRIS HOUGHTON

JOHN A. KINGSBURY

JOSHUA KUNITZ

ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Trips which show you more than tourist sights at least cost of time and money.
Circulars on request.

Independent arrangements for those who prefer to travel on their own.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

$394 round trip New York with a month in Soviet Russia.

Other tours up to $895.

INTRODUCTORY OFFER — 13 issues of the Manchester Guardian Weekly for $1

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretation prepared by the best minds in England.

For more than ■ century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on ■ great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of thirteen weeks for one dollar—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home.

Mail the order form at once!

THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
222 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose ■ dollar for your 13 weeks' trial offer
of THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

3-27-37

"The theme, the crisis in which western civilization now flounders, and the competence of the author conspire to make Mr. Noel-Baker's work on armaments one of the indispensable books of the times."

—Prof. CHARLES A. BEARD

The Private Manufacture of Armaments

by PHILIP NOEL-BAKER

The most comprehensive and fully documented study of the subject ever published. Complete in two volumes. Volume I now ready. $3.75

Oxford University Press, 114 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

WHY DID

John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

WRITE TO JIM FARLEY?

See if you can answer this question after reading the remarkable article, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma", by Louis Wallis in The Christian Century, reprinted free for you.

Here is the dilemma: Business recovery must go much further; else the New Deal fails.—But if recovery DOES go on, it will inevitably drive up land prices, and inflate ground rents, and lead to another period of land speculation, which will produce another economic slump. Most "frozen paper" in banks is based on inflated land values.

Two remarkable articles by Louis Wallis, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma" and "The Economic Problem,"—both reprinted from The Christian Century—will be forwarded to you free by sending your name clearly written on a postal card to

Dept. C

WILLETT, CLARK & CO.,

440 South Dearborn Street

Chicago, Illinois

Those who speak familiarly of eternal values will have to speak with care or be suspected of emotional cant.

It is in the development of these simple points that the freshness of the work may be discovered. Unhappily, Dr. Boas sometimes compels us to cavil. It is true, as he says, that a work of art may mean many things to us, but these meanings have not all the same status. Some are accretions or secondary growths. It is not altogether sound to give these the same weight as those originally possessed. Nor is there so great a spread between the artist's and the observer's point of view as Dr. Boas seems to think. He has apparently forgotten that the artist is often but a communicative observer.

For felicity of thought and for simplicity and clarity of expression "A Primer for Critics" is to be commended. It is openly middle of the road, and so is likely to be ineffective. Its lessons will not and perhaps cannot be learned or followed now. When our present issues, so practically important, become historical ghosts, and innocent enjoyment is again respectable, Professor Boas's shade may have the pleasure of saying, "I told you so."

LINCOLN REIS

A Southern Record

MONTICELLO AND OTHER POEMS. By Lawrence Lee. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

A NUMBER of those reviewers who have been distressed by what is called modern poetry have hailed Lawrence Lee as the harbinger of a return to normalcy. To regard him in this way is to obscure his genuine merits. He writes agreeable, unpretentious lyrics and descriptive pieces, familiar but not imitative. Completely uninfluenced by recent experimentalism, he has affinities with the Georgians, but succeeds better than most of them in achieving economy of means and avoiding the rhetoric of spurious simplicity. A Southerner who draws his images easily from the Virginia small town and countryside, he yet does not rattle the tenor drums of regionalism.

Mr. Lee will disappoint those who expect the poet to see and feel and think things that escape the non-poet; his is the recording rather than the creative vision. His chief power lies in his ability to express the commonplace cleanly, with some embellishment of fancy. The poems are short, and most of them present a single picture with an associated mood or not too recondite idea. He observes "the purple irises break from the mud," and sees the earth move as a "slow red foam" behind the plowman. In the early morning he notes that "Farm women drove by with eggs held on their knees," and concludes therefrom that "Night had not moved the roadway into town." The poems about Jefferson which give the book its title are reverent but something less than argumentative. Night Journey and Slowly Moves the River, the two pieces in which narrative is attempted, are the least successful poems in the volume.

Judged by what he has written so far, Mr. Lee is one of those not too numerous writers who make wise use of a slight talent; he is the perennial minor poet who pleases but does not vivify. It is both unfair and unnecessary to compare him with the pathfinders. A reaction from certain excesses of the experimental and political writers is now in the offing. Those who are qualified to lead such a reaction must be able to see more, not less, than the poets from whom they are reacting; and if they wash up the old bottles they must fill them, not perhaps with a novel beverage, but from a new vintage.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

Naturalist in Colonial America

PETER KALM'S TRAVELS IN NORTH AMERICA. The English Version of 1770 Revised from the Original Swedish and Edited by Adolph B. Benson. With New Material from Kalm's Diary Notes. New York: Wilson-Erickson. Two Volumes. $12.50.

PETER KALM, a pupil of Linnaeus, sent here by the Swedish Academy of Science in 1748, was the first trained naturalist to come to this country on an official mission—to make systematic studies in the colonies and to publish them. His main object was to collect useful seeds and plants that could contribute to the industrial and agricultural development of Sweden, but the wide scope of his interests and his naive observations on the customs of men and beasts gave to his diaries the heterogeneous charm and value that made them a classic of travel in mid-eighteenth-century America. His explorations in Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, and southern Canada led not only to the description and classification of plants but to notes on the differing temperaments and manners of the English, Dutch, French, and Indians, on religious ceremonies of various sects, on construction of buildings, fences, cider presses, and birch canoes, on geography, topography, ores and minerals, recipes, diseases, wages, and windmills. Already, he notes in Pennsylvania, large tracts were being deforested and fish and game recklessly destroyed. In New York and Canada Indians were buying their wampum at exorbitant rates from the whites. In Canada beaver was considered fish and eaten on Fridays. In New York oysters were eaten only in the months containing r. There is occasional evidence that the fondness for tall tales was already an American characteristic. Kalm expresses doubt as to some of them but sometimes records a bit of leg-pulling with solemn credulity. Received by Franklin, Bartram, and other notables in Philadelphia, by the French governor-general in Canada, Kalm made many friends. The special opportunities for observation he thereby enjoyed make these volumes, now published for the first time in this country and long out of print abroad, of unique interest to students of our colonial period.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

DRAMA

What Every Woman Knows

FOR many years Bernard Shaw and James M. Barrie were next-door neighbors. That used to be considered a very piquant fact, but as I watched Katharine Cornell's revival of "Candida" at the Empire Theater I could only wonder that the friendly propinquity had ever seemed odd. "Candida" is precisely "What Every Woman Knows" with fireworks accompaniment, and the two playwrights shared exactly the same "profound understanding of women." Shaw, to be sure, made fun of "manly men and womanly women"; in behalf of the female of the species he proclaimed that no member of it really wanted to be considered a creature apart. But that did not prevent him from creating Candida to reveal that men are only big babies after all or from setting her gently down upon as elevated and ornate a pedestal as one could easily find.

membership invited

in the

A 49-day travel study project, including interviews with leaders of economic thought in England, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Soviet Union, Austria, Switzerland and France. Prof. Mitchell of Johns Hopkins University will lead the discussions and present his interpretations.

Edutavel also offers complete service for individual travel and short cruises. Call, write or phone for full information—and mention THE NATION.

BROADUS MITCHELL Seminar
ON ECONOMIC LIFE IN EUROPE

Sail July 24 — Return Sept. 11

A pamphlet giving full details of itinerary, costs, etc., is just off the press. Ask for it.

Other interesting Edutavelogs for this Summer include: a 57-day trip with the well-known reporter, John L. Spivak, visiting places and people that figure in the news of the day . . . a 60-day study trip of the arts of national minorities in the U. S. S. R., led by Langston Hughes, Negro poet and playwright . . . a 47-day Seminar on Social Work in the Soviet Union . . . a survey of Soviet education centers and methods.

EDUTRAVEL, Inc.

An Institute for Educational Travel

55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Telephones: GRamercy 7-3284-3285

READ: 79 OLD MEN

by Robert S. Allen and Drew Pearson

In a series of articles in Common Sense beginning with the April issue, the authors of THE NINE OLD MEN write the history of the Supreme Court. They show how, as a defender of special privilege from the days of Marshall, the Court has grasped for power and all but destroyed the Constitution itself.

&: Mr. BLUM GOES RIGHT

by R. W. Wiley, C. S. Foreign Correspondent

A sensational article raising and suggesting answers to a series of alarming questions. Is the Socialist Blum saving capitalism in France for a French Hitler? Is Premier Blum destined to be another Ramsay MacDonald? Etc., etc.

&: DOMESTICATE CORPORATIONS

by the Chairman Natl. Conf. on Constitutional Amendment

Henry T. Hunt explains a constructive plan which might not only keep an inside clique (holding proxies of absent stockholders and owning only a minority of stock itself) from manipulating other people's money and pursuing anti-social policies, but might make possible the production of abundance in America.

These are the lead articles in the April issue of COMMON SENSE. In addition there are the regular features: Editorials, News, Political Notes, Book Reviews, Outstanding Magazine Article Reviews, Cartoons, and other important articles.
It's a magazine for common sense people!

COMMON SENSE, 315 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK:

Enclosed find $1. Beginning with the issue containing the first article of the 79 OLD MEN series, please send COMMON SENSE for 7 months to:

Name.....

Address.....

To say this is not to deny that the play remains very entertaining indeed and amazingly fresh. It contains some of the liveliest verbal fencing ever provided by a modern playwright; and there is nothing surprising in the fact that in the days when it was new, audiences were too shocked by the manner to realize how acceptable the matter really was. As usual, Shaw is careful to make it clear that the conventional reasons for everything are completely wrong. Candida, for instance, is not really "virtuous." If there were nothing to be said in favor of sticking to one's husband except what moralists usually say, then Candida would not have stuck, or would, at the very least, have gone off on a week-end with her poet. Yet the choice she finally makes is precisely that of which any Victorian would have approved, and when you divest her reasons of their superficial paradoxes they are not significantly different from those of any moderately rational but conventional woman: romantic passion is less important than understanding, and the best husband is the one who needs you most. Candida is not the sister of Candide. She is more nearly related to the usual Victorian heroine, and Shaw himself never gets as far away from Victorian conclusions as he himself thinks. Indeed, it seems odd that the meaning or the "message" of Candida should ever have been debated as excitedly as it was, for that message is plain enough. In this play at least—and I suspect in most of the others—Shaw's iconoclasm is largely intellectual. His heroes and heroines rarely do anything which would shock anyone. But they often seem to be giving outrageous reasons for their conformity.

The production in which Miss Cornell is appearing serves very well to establish another fact which is becoming increasingly clear as Shaw is put to the test of time. All the better pieces remain too obviouslyactable to be dismissed as mere pamphlets interesting only in so far as the ideas remain fresh. There is something else in them, even if that something is not the flesh-and-blood reality of the supremely great dramatists. Shaw knows the tricks of his trade. If he cannot quite create living human beings, he can provide something better than mere talking machines to reel off his ideas. Each of his characters has not only a point of view but also at least a theatrical concreteness. The puppets not only speak but act; they have gestures, and traits, and peculiarities. And for stage purposes that is the next best thing to living character. His personages may have little life outside the play, but they have great liveliness within it.

"Sun Kissed" (Little Theater) is a somewhat guileless satire on California and the exiles who devote themselves to lotus eating there. The scene is a boarding-house inhabited by assorted eccentrics, and if one is in a not too exacting mood it is frequently funny. I liked best the pet goose cherished by one of the inmates. JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Cross-Town" (Forty-eighth Street Theater) converts into a technique a common axiom among third-rate talents that farce comedy and stupidity are two words for the same idea. Ostensibly a play about a plagiarist who, after being discovered, discovers in turn that he is capable of producing masterpieces on his own, it offers sheer noisomeness in place of gaiety and invention. All of its laughs are snickers and attach themselves to smoking-room properties like the bathroom plunger, the burlesque tease, and the predatory society matron in quest of purchasable primitives "with knotted muscles" for week-end uses. The result is a "comedy" so dishonest and puant that it emerges as an odor instead of an idea. B. B.

Changes in Governmental Provisions for Relief and Social Service will require closer integration of effort between private and public social work agencies.

The knowledge and skills required are made available in graduate curricula for professional social work leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees offered by

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

For information about requirements for admission, scholarships and fellowships, write to

DR. M. J. KARPFF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

FILMS

Plight of an Intellectual

CLOSE on the heels of "The Woman Alone" comes now another film which intrinsically is just as good and which extrinsically is even better. By those polysyllables I mean that "Razumov" (Cameo) enjoys the advantage over Alfred Hitchcock's picture of having a subject which is more immediately "important"; but that in every other respect the two are equal. By placing quotation marks around the word important I do not wish to suggest that the theme developed by Marc Allegret is merely supposed by certain people at the moment to have a special significance. It has it for me too—so clearly indeed that I went to the Cameo a second time, and I think it was not entirely to see a "good" film. The quotation marks are there in both cases in order to insinuate a doubt as to whether we know exactly what we mean by the terms in question. I suspect not; though we might guess that a film which was nothing but good would have only a mechanical fascination for us, and that a film which was nothing but important would be so unconvincing as to have no importance at all. At one extreme we should have nothing but art and at the other we should have nothing but propaganda; and either would be nonsense. The point is that both films strike very close to the great human mean; and that "Razumov" has the additional advantage of being able to address an area of our minds which everything in the world has been conspiring to prepare for it.

The hero of Allegret's film is a young Russian intellectual of 1906 or 1907; a student who is just graduating with honors from the university and who looks forward with innocent eagerness to a long life as scholar and professor. But as he returns to his room with academic praises ringing in his ears he finds concealed there another student, his old friend Haldin, who has just assassinated the Prime Minister and has run for sanctuary to the only man he knows whom he can trust to be disinterested. Razumov's irritation increases to horror as he realizes that he can get rid of Haldin only by going out to arrange with an accomplice for his escape from the city. This single act will involve him in a relationship to the revolutionary movement for which he knows he will have no stomach, since politics "disgust" him. He knows this. But he cannot conceive the series of adventures, the net of ironies, in which every step he takes henceforth will entangle him. Yesterday he had thought of himself as quite outside "the struggle"; today he is one of the most important persons in it in spite of the fact that he is still unable to feel it. By a sequence of peculiarly ghastly ironies he becomes a telltale, a traitor, a hero, a worker for the cause—becomes these things in other minds, that is; in minds which there is never opportunity to disabuse. And the greatest irony of all is that he remains a perfectly decent fellow throughout; his decency, in fact, being the motivation of each error as it is committed. The logical end is death.

Any spectator at all sensitive to the world as it now is will understand Razumov's plight immediately, and will sympathize with him; for even a cast-iron revolutionist will remember that the steps by which he entered into the faith were taken more slowly, and the outsider, the still disinterested intellectual, will find it easy to imagine himself pulled into a similar situation for which he has and may continue to have as little relish. Sympathy is so directly engaged by the film, indeed, that the question arises as to how "good" it would be if it were not so "interesting." For my part I am satisfied that it is as good as the best. The French have outdone every revolutionary film sent out from Russia since the classic days of Eisenstein and Pudovkin. They have provided for one thing four superb actors in Pierre Fresnay as Razumov, Jean-Louis Barrault as Haldin, Jacques Copeau as the chief of police, and Pierre Renoir as his agent. And they have provided in M. Allegret a director of the most refined yet simplest strength. The Russian directors have been handicapped, of course, by the necessity they seem to be under of proving that the revolution has been a grand success. "Razumov" returns to the time when it was still being fought for. And for the purposes of art there could be no richer time.

Max Eastman's assembly at the Filmarte of old moving pictures taken by various hands in Russia from "Czar to Lenin" is a film of an entirely different order. Mr. Eastman has arranged a great many documentary scraps in chronological order and with the help of his own voice has made them yield what is of course an important story, and one told in a contemporary idiom. Some of the pictures were taken by the Czar or by his photographer; some by the various armies of occupation during the civil war; some by Americans; some by persons now nameless. The result is highly interesting and valuable. It does not establish, however, that the documentary film is absolutely better than the imagined one. "Razumov" is different from "Czar to Lenin" in the same way that poetry is different from history; and in my opinion it is better.

MARK VAN DOREN

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thurs. & Sat., 2:40. Eves. 8:40. 300 seats $1.10

STORM OVER PATSY

by Bruno Frank, adapted by James Bridle
with SARA ALLGOOD ROGER LIVESEY
CLAUDIA MORGAN IAN McLEAN
LEO G. CARROLL
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats.: Thursday & Saturday, 2:40. Eve., 8:40.

SCHOOL

WORKERS SCHOOL Spring Term Registration

COURSES IN:	Labor History
Marxism-Leninism	Current Events
Economics	China and the Far East in World Affairs
Dialectical Materialism	Psychology
Science and Dialectics	Labor Journalism
Literature	Russian
American History	And many other

For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

TOURS

8 COUNTRIES . . . $215

France, Switzerland, Italy, Austria, Poland, Germany, Belgium and England. Includes 3rd class round trip steamer and rail expenses.

9 COUNTRIES . . . $264

England, Belgium, Germany, Poland, Czechoslovakia, Austria, Switzerland, France, including a week all-expense tour in the U. S. S. R.

11 COUNTRIES . . . $300

England, Belgium, Germany, Poland, Turkey, Greece, Palestine, Italy, Switzerland, France and a week all-inclusive tour in U. S. S. R.

6 COUNTRIES . . . $234

England, Holland, Belgium, Switzerland, Italy, France, including a motor tour through Holland, a motor and boat tour through the Swiss passes, Rhone Glacier, a motor tour through the French and Italian Riviera as well as a trip through the French Alps.

Also Other Travel Bargains

GUSTAVE EISNER

POPULAR PRICED TOURIST AGENCY

1123 Broadway
Cor. 25th, N. Y. C.
CH. 3-5080

THE Nation ANNOUNCES
FOR EARLY PUBLICATION . . .

Who Owns the Air?

Who says there is a monopoly of broadcasting? The public relations directors of the national networks refute such a charge but the advertising directors confirm it. Ruth Brindze, a frequent contributor to The Nation on consumers' problems, shows our readers who directs the affairs of the huge broadcasting chains which influence the thinking of millions of listeners, what interests they represent, and to what extent the charges of monopoly are justified.

Letters to the Editors

Senator Wheeler's United Front

Dear Sirs: In your issue of February 27 you stated: "It is difficult to see how a progressive like Senator Wheeler not only attacks the measure [the judiciary bill] but uses exactly the arguments of the tory editorials."

A year ago Senator Wheeler permitted the Montana Power Company to regain the Flathead power site (500,000 horsepower). Senator Wheeler has "gone respectable." Two years ago he carried Montana by a five-to-two ratio. At a meeting of 175 persons here on March 4, at the Roosevelt Supper, the President was cheered inordinately, Wheeler's stand against him bitterly scored. A vote would probably have revealed 170 with the President and 5 appointees of Mr. Wheeler present but not voting. The daily paper here, Anaconda owned, did not mention the next morning that we had met at all.

Wheeler is convinced that if he can unite the radicals, progressives, conservatives, and tories in his support he can succeed Mr. Roosevelt.

Butte, Mont., March 6 H. L. MAURY

Who Rules the Pope?

Dear Sirs: Dr. Reinhold Niebuhr commands the respect of all liberals, but when he discusses the papacy (The Nation, January 30) his kindly instincts and inherent Protestantism cause him to fall into what the Catholic brethren call "grievous error."

It is surprising indeed to witness a scholar of his repute analyzing recent elections to the papacy and deriving the thesis that Cardinal Pacelli will not be the next pope. Pacelli may or may not achieve his cherished dream, but certainly nothing in his apostolate has antagonized the thirty or so "Italian" cardinals, the Ultramontane clique, who actually will choose the next pope. Dr. Niebuhr alludes to the veto of the election of Cardinal Rampolla, but he omitted the fact that this was the last exercise of the "Spanish veto," and that the cause of this veto—the sexual aberrations of a Hapsburg—was not a matter of dispute among any of the hierarchs.

I have no patience whatsoever with the speech-bromide "the policy of the Vatican." A pope is much like the King of England in relation to Stanley Baldwin's Tories—he is the semi-mundane holy magnavox for the collective will of the dominating Italian cardinals, who in turn are motivated by nothing more than the inflexible continuity of a single policy—a two-thousand-year struggle for sovereignty over all mankind. The bald statement that "centralization . . . has not been the unvarying policy of the papacy" I could rebut with citations from Rhode Island back to Pelagius and forward to Martin Luther—and back again to the Plenary Councils.

The "policy" of the Vatican, while inelastic as to objective, permits perfect elasticity as to method. Deals such as those with Hitler and Franco are seeming evidences of changing policy, but neither these nor any others that I have ever examined reveal any inconsistency in liturgical lucubrations. In this connection it is a matter of continuing wonder that neither Dr. Niebuhr nor other qualified publicists have called attention to the fascinating possibility that the Vatican, via the dominating Italian cardinals, is become the cat's-paw of Signor Benito Mussolini.

The "honey" of Dr. Niebuhr's conclusions is in his assertion of "the ascendancy of Jesuit influence at the Vatican over the milder and more spiritual [sic] monastic groups." The Jesuits certainly are lovely bêtes noires for Protestant quaking parties—useful therefore to Catholic elements anxious to cover up skulduggery elsewhere. Right now the secular Catholic clergy are unmercifully flaying the battered Company of Jesus for its abysmal failure in Spain. If the Jesuits had any kind of "ascendancy" at the Vatican, you could bet your hammer and sickle that Cardinal Pacelli would never have been allowed to come to the United States a few days before a Presidential election—with a widely advertised scheme of adding Franklin Delano Roosevelt to the Hitler-Mussolini united front against Moscow. Roosevelt saw him, I believe, the day after the election, whereupon the naive Cardinal went away with some very pleasant memories—of a Hyde Park luncheon and a suave squire. Were our American cardinals' faces red?

JEAN LE GAULOIS

New York, February 11

Mr. Haggin Protests

Dear Sirs: When you asked me if I cared to answer Mr. Lesser's letter (The Nation of March 20), I replied that a demonstration of its worthlessness was not worth The Nation's space, its readers' attention, and my own time. By my standards the letter would not then have been printed; if you did print it you should have appended my comment; and since you have printed it I must waste the space, attention, and time.

When one says a speaker's range extends to 6,000 cycles one means that after this point there is a sharp drop in intensity such that anything beyond 6,000 is too attenuated to have appreciable effect in the entire sound that comes through. And if, now, what the pick-up reproduces and the amplifier amplifies beyond 6,000 is appreciable with auxiliary speakers but not appreciable without them, one may say that without them it is blocked.

As for the auxiliary speakers, an informed person would know that their range of operation does not begin exactly at 6,000, but overlaps the range of the chief speaker, extending down possibly to 3,500; and that their effect is therefore not merely to extend the range above 6,000, but—in the case where recording stops at 6,000—to reinforce frequencies between 6,000 and 3,500 (over-emphasizing treble as against bass), and also to add noises (of surface, needle chatter, pick-up resonance) beyond 6,000.

And now, having pointed out how the auxiliary speakers may affect the tone, I will add that it was the way records sounded with these speakers connected that caused me to experiment with disconnecting them, and it was the improvement which followed that caused me to bother with technical explanations. My approach, in other words, was the opposite of Mr. Lesser's—which explains the difference in our results.

B. H. HAGGIN

New York, March 18

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 3, 1937

NUMBER 14

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

365

EDITORIALS:

IS THE SUPREME COURT GOING LIBERAL?

367

THE SITDOWN HYSTERIA

368

MUSSOLINI WEIGHS HIS CHANCES

369

LAWS TO THROTTLE LABOR by Paul W. Ward

370

LIBERTY AND DEATH IN PUERTO RICO

by Oswald Garrison Villard

371

VOLCANO UNDER ENGLAND by Robert Dell

373

NEBRASKA'S FIGHT FOR SURVIVAL

by Maxwell S. Stewart

375

A HUNDRED WHITE HORSES by Agnes Smedley

377

THE LOWEST BRANCH by Heywood Broun

379

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

GEOMETRY'S FOURTH ANGLE

by Joseph Wood Krutch

380

MOUSE MEAT by Mark Van Doren

382

HEALTHY, WEALTHY, AND WISE?

by Maxwell Geismar

383

AMERICAN JEWS IN CHICAGO by Philip Rahv

384

HEALTH INSURANCE by James Rorty

385

MASTER MARINER by Hugo Van Arx

386

IRELAND AND THE "TROUBLE"

by Horace Gregory

387

NEW NOVELS by Caroline Smith

388

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

389

The Shape of Things

★

GOVERNOR EARLE, ACCORDING TO THE PRESS, has written a letter to The Nation, in response to our editorial last week, in which he gives at length his reasons for supporting the state Board of Censors in its refusal to allow the film "Spain in Flames" to be shown in Pennsylvania. We have not yet received the complete text of Governor Earle's letter. As soon as we do we shall comment on it—probably in the next issue. Meanwhile we learn that he has ordered fifty tickets for a private showing of the film. We await developments.

★

WITHIN THE LAST FEW WEEKS, AT LEAST SIX crimes involving rape and murder have been committed and flamboyantly reported in the press. The latest was the killing in New York of an artists' model and her mother and a roomer in their apartment. The older of the two women had been attacked before being strangled. In each case the combination of sex and murder with the other morbid and horrifying details that emerge from such crimes has insured a maximum of lurid headlines, pictures, lavish news spreads. We have had the usual crop of editorial demands for summary action, attacks upon the parole system, and clamor for new forms of punishment. But only one recent writer as far as we know has hit the mark squarely. That writer is Heywood Broun, who questioned in the New York World-Telegram whether the lurid talents displayed by his colleagues, the headline writers and crime reporters, may not have helped to spread the infection. It is a known fact that crimes come in "waves." It would be interesting to know how much these epidemics are stimulated by stories which advertise the horrid thrills accompanying the more violent and abnormal varieties of crime. We recommend—without much hope—a little restraint within the newspaper offices, even at the expense of newsstand sales.

★

WHAT HAS AMBASSADOR CLAUDE BOWERS been doing all this time in his retreat at Hendaye? This question comes to our mind in connection with Secretary Hull's plea last week for an increase in the State Department's budget. No doubt Secretary Hull was entirely right in stressing—we quote the Associated Press—that "it was vital to have able representatives, especi-

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

ally in the disturbed portions of the world," and that "it was important for American foreign representatives to discover what was going on behind the scenes and foresee trouble." Which leads us to ask again: What has Ambassador Bowers been doing all this time? Why is he not in Valencia, the seat of the legal Spanish government, where he would be in a position to send intelligent reports back to his government, and protect American life and property? Why does he leave a young Third Secretary in charge of affairs in the part of the world where the most momentous events are happening today? We are certain the answer does not lie in the views of Mr. Bowers himself. Mr. Bowers cares so much about democracy that even from Spain he sends an interview to Esquire saying that the Founding Fathers feared to admit "real democracy" into the American Constitution. The hopes for real democracy in Spain center today in Valencia. Can it be the State Department which believes that to have an American ambassador at Valencia, where he belongs, might be construed as favoring the Loyalist Spanish government? If so, it is another instance of the timorousness which keeps the State Department from observing even the traditional legalities of international relations.

★

WHEN THE GERMAN GOVERNMENT FINDS IT necessary to adopt as drastic a measure as seizing the property of farmers who do not meet their production quotas, the food situation is serious indeed. The German peasant does not relish compulsion any more than any other farmer. And under normal circumstances peasants anywhere will produce as much as possible in order to obtain the necessities of life. Resort to compulsion by the government would seem to verify the reports that the peasants were deliberately refusing to deliver food at the ruinous prices offered them. It remains to be seen whether the peasants do not have the whip hand. The threat to take over the land and rent it out to peasants who are more loyal to Nazi economics may prove temporarily effective. But there is a difference between meeting the legal requirements and the intelligent use of agricultural resources necessary in a modern state. No government can get a full measure of production out of any sector of its population by coercive measures.

★

LAST WEEK THE DRAMA CRITICS' CIRCLE awarded its second annual prize for the best new American play of the year to "High Tor," by Maxwell Anderson, whose "Winterset" was chosen last year. On the last ballot "High Tor" received the votes of fourteen of the eighteen critics present. It is an imaginative comedy dealing with a young hermit living on a cliff overlooking the Hudson who has held out against the agents of an industrial company wanting to buy his land but who finally concludes, after conversing with the shades of Hendrik Hudson's men, that it is useless to resist the spirit of the age. Many will agree that the play is less powerful than "Winterset," but it is very agreeably worked out in a spirit suggestive of the later Shakespearean comedies. Three votes went to "Johnny Johnson," a satiric tragic-comedy dealing with the adventures of a "fool of God" during the last war and set to music by Kurt Weil. It was generally thought interesting in conception but not completely realized. A lone vote was cast for "Daughters of Atreus," a remarkable retelling in classical terms of the Iphigenia story. The popularity of "High Tor" may be taken as something of a portent in the history of contemporary taste.

★

THE NEW INDIAN CONSTITUTION HAS STRUCK an obstacle in the refusal of Indian National Congress leaders to form governments in the six provinces in which their party holds a majority of seats in the legislatures. The issue is a fundamental one. Speaking for the Congress leaders, Gandhi asked for a definite promise from the provincial governors that the "special powers" granted them by the constitution would not be invoked to weaken the authority of the elected government. The governors have taken the position that the granting of such an assurance would be against the spirit and intent of the constitution. In this they are probably correct, since the constitution seems to have been carefully framed to give the Indian people the illusion of self-government without the substance. At first it was thought the Congress Party would boycott the elections, in which case Britain's task would have been comparatively easy. But after taking part in the elections and getting a majority in six out of the eleven "self-governing" provinces, the party is now in a position to checkmate British plans. The energetic and wise leadership of Jawaharlal Nehru has at last put the Congress Party in a position where it can demand real concessions from the British government.

★

WE LEND OUR SUPPORT TO SENATOR NYE in his pending resolution which calls upon the State Department to give an official opinion on whether Germany and Italy are at war with Spain. When a well-equipped army of 40,000 men crosses the frontier into a neighboring country and attacks its capital, there is at least reason for us to ask whether or not the countries are at war. In theory, the Neutrality Act is supposed to apply to both sides in an international conflict. To apply it to one side only, and to continue sending munitions to the other side, is both unjust and dangerous. The suggestion, which apparently emanated from official circles, that "volunteers" from many countries are fighting in Spain and that it might be difficult to establish their official connections has no basis in fact. Officers of the Italian regular army have been captured by Spanish government troops. Italian and German passport and currency regulations make it impossible for any considerable number of individuals to leave either of the fascist countries without official knowledge and assistance. We do not happen to share Senator Nye's faith in an isolationist neutrality as a means of keeping us out of war. But it is important to prevent a measure designed to maintain peace from becoming a screen behind which the United States is covertly aiding the fascist powers.

★

THE PRESIDENT'S COMMISSION ON EUROPEAN cooperatives, which has just made its report, did not find the European cooperative movement to be a short cut to Utopia. But it did find a well-established, efficient method of distribution which returned a substantial saving to its members. It also found that the cooperatives were carrying on social and educational activities of profound importance. Nowhere was there any evidence that the cooperatives were supplanting private enterprise. On the contrary, competition between the two was found to be mutually beneficial. Members of the commission differed sharply regarding the future of the movement in this country. Some felt that the efficiency of American merchandising methods, the lack of a strong labor movement, and the absence of a desire for thrift made it unlikely that consumers' cooperatives would ever gain a foothold in the United States. Others felt that the cooperative method offered hope of saving "the American idea" against the threat of "powerful forces in a rapidly changing world." Rejecting both of these views as extreme, the majority of the commission agreed that the movement had a real contribution to make in this country although perhaps not as great a one as it already has made in the more favorable atmosphere of Europe. With this view we should be inclined to agree.

★

THE DUPLESSIS GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC has revealed its essentially fascist character by pushing through one of the most repressive measures ever adopted on the North American continent. With a view to stamping out the "Communist menace," a law has been enacted providing for the padlocking of any house or building used for the dissemination of "Communist propaganda" and prohibiting the sale or circulation of all newspapers, periodicals, pamphlets, and other documents "propagating or tending to propagate communism." Under the new law it will be illegal for a resident of Quebec to discuss communism in his own home. While the act contains extended definitions of a "house," a "person," and an "owner," there is no attempt at a definition of "communism" or "bolshevism." Mr. Duplessis did not clarify the terms when in the debate he spoke vaguely of the "movements with anarchistic tendencies" which had found their way into the province after creating much "disorder and misery." The truth is that Quebec has neither a Communist nor an Anarchist movement worthy of a moment's consideration. Even the C. C. F., Canada's semi-socialistic party, has never been able to gain a foothold in the province. What progressive opposition there is has come from isolated labor groups which are without real political strength. Mr. Duplessis is no doubt aiming to smash these groups. Someone should tell him that even milder attempts in America have proved to be boomerangs.

Is the Supreme Court Going Liberal?

TO MANY the decisions which the Supreme Court handed down last Monday will be proof that the court has gone liberal. The court upheld by unanimous opinions two fairly important New Deal measures—the Railway Labor Act and the new Frazier-Lemke Farm Mortgage Moratorium Act. In the field of state powers it upheld by a seven-to-two decision a Washington state tax on materials used in the construction of the Grand Coulee dam; by a five-to-four decision, the Virginia state milk-control law; above all, by a similar vote, the Washington state minimum-wage law.

We do not want to be ungracious and eternally dissatisfied. We rejoice with the railroad workers, farmers, women laundry workers, and scrubwomen who are affected by these decisions. We welcome the change of mind by Justice Roberts which transformed a liberal minority of four in the Tipaldo case (New York minimum-wage law) into a majority of five in the present case of the West Coast Hotel Company vs. Parrish. Nevertheless, no clear mind today will be lulled into optimism because some needed legislation has finally been validated, or because a "bad" judge seems to have become a "good" judge. The real issues are more momentous—the fate of the President's court proposal, the fate of a constitutional amendment, the fate, in short, of judicial supremacy.

Two things stand out as one seeks to view the decisions in some perspective. One is the sense of having read Chief Justice Hughes's opinion in the minimum-wage case somewhere before—until one realizes that its tone is the tone of the liberal decisions in the first stage of the New Deal, the tone of the Appalachian coals case, the Nebbia milk-control case, the Minnesota moratorium case. In all of them there is a judicial tolerance of legislative judgment and a sense of economic realities. The second thing is the bitterness of Justice Sutherland's dissent in the minimum-wage case, and the rancor of his obvious reference to Justice Stone's remarks in his AAA dissent as having "offended the proprieties" and being "ill-considered and mischievous." When the veneer that coats the surface of Supreme Court intercourse wears as thin as that, one may feel assured that it has been subjected to some rough handling. Even more important, however, than Justice Sutherland's personal allusions is the flat and uncompromising quality of the short treatise on constitutional interpretation with which he prefaces his discussion of the Washington minimum-wage law. Here one may find, as explicitly as anywhere in the annals of the court, what we might call the Hussite view of inflexible constitutional construction. "Burn me if you will: I can do no other." There is a grim sort of courage in this dissent of Sutherland's, the courage of the diehard Tory in a bewildering world of economic change.

Thus it would seem that the issue is now drawn in the court between the new liberal majority of five and the tory minority of four. But here we must enter so many caveats and make so many qualifications as to leave this view finally untenable. First, nothing crucial has been decided on the federal power. The two unanimous opinions dealing with federal powers prove nothing but a hope that they may be a prelude to something more important. The railroads come so clearly within the scope of the commerce power that the only fact which is striking about Justice Stone's opinion is that the rest of the court followed him in upholding the provisions even for "backshop" employees. As for the Frazier-Lemke Act, the redrafting sought laboriously to meet the court's objections in its decision of two years ago.

Even in the realm of state power we must keep our fingers crossed. The liberal margin of advantage is the margin of Justice Roberts's very changeable mind. That is not a sturdy enough peg on which to hang the garment of one's hopes. The issue involved, moreover, is one in which the court had previously created a no man's land where neither the federal nor the state governments could act; and since public opinion, like nature, abhors a vacuum, a storm of protest over the Tipaldo decision had swept the country and included even Alfred Landon and Hamilton Fish. What the new decision proves is that Justice Roberts is responsive to such considerations, and that Justice Hughes in the present agony of the judicial power has not stopped short of deliberately overruling the precedent of the Adkins case.

Thus we must conclude that the real lessons of Monday's decisions are two. We find, first of all, that our economic fate and our judicial fortunes are still subject to the caprice of the odd man on the court. We find, secondly, that whatever we may say or think of judicial independence, the Supreme Court does actually in its functioning operate within the ambit of political considerations. Such a day of decisions would not have been possible before the court faced the threat of the President's reorganization proposal. Its new liberalism, like the new-found fidelity of the frightened bridegroom, may without disrespect be called a shotgun liberalism.

The logic of the history of the Hughes court is to be found, however, not in the psychological realm but in the crises of the economic order. Three stages may be traced. In the first, that of the economic crisis of Hoover's closing and Roosevelt's opening years, the court was caught up in the general sense of fear, and its decisions were flexible. As the Roosevelt government undertook more and more stringent industrial controls and as the economic crisis lessened, the second stage became a crisis of Congressional control: and here the court majority set its face rigorously against any untoward controls that might disturb the vested interests. Out of reaction against this stand the movement to liberalize both the court and the Constitution has grown up—a movement whose first fruits have been the President's proposal. Thus the third stage is the crisis of the judicial supremacy. And in this crisis the two balance-of-power justices, Hughes and Roberts, are turning toward liberalism.

Whether it is a true liberalism, the coming Wagner Act decisions will tell.

The Sitdown Hysteria

THE sitdown has reached the point where people no longer reason about it: they can only give spluttering expression to their hopes and terrors. Witness the newspaper campaign against it. Witness the hysteria of the utterances from the pulpit and in the microphone. Witness the flat assertions and denials of the sitdown's legality, made in most cases without fear or research. Witness, as a sort of symbol of the whole tumult, the telegram sent to Vice-President Garner by a group of Boston citizens headed by ex-President Lowell of Harvard, calling the sitdown "armed insurrection . . . anarchy, mob rule, and ruthless dictatorship."

Hitler's aphorism, "We think with our blood," seems on the point of receiving dangerous confirmation. The abdication of reason is nothing new in American life. We have seen it happen in time of war and during very crucial Presidential elections. But when reason abdicates so completely because American labor has gone about its organizing task—that must be seen as an index of the rapidly mounting psychological tensions within the nervous system of the capitalist democratic state.

How shall we confront the sitdown hysteria? Much of it has undoubtedly been drummed up by the newspapers and their industrial allies. But we must not forget that there must have been some fears there in the American mind which could be drummed up. For the most violent and lawless people in the world, Americans cling amazingly to their "law and order" myth. We live in a complicated and fragile civilization, where it is conceivable that a violent wrench might send the whole structure toppling. Many of us have the feeling that what separates us from anarchy is principally the accumulated crust of convention, otherwise known as "law." Like the Britisher in the jungle who clings desperately to the amenities of London life, we are jealous of any infraction of law—especially of property law, which is the fabric of a capitalist order. If we yield an inch we surrender all. It is only in these terms that we can understand the hysteria of Mr. Lowell and his comrades.

This is the psychological core. The rest is technique and self-hypnosis. As such, let us not underestimate its force. It has been strong enough to put even progressive Congressmen on the defensive. It has been strong enough to worry Mr. Roosevelt. It has been strong enough finally to force Mr. Lewis into ordering the withdrawal of the automobile workers from the Chrysler plants.

We believe Mr. Lewis was wise and statesman-like in his action. He has in many instances shown his sensitiveness to the worker's mind. But here is proof of his sensitiveness to the middle-class mind as well, ridden by property fears as it is. It is another instance also of the restraint which the whole C. I. O. movement has thus far shown. But restraint or no restraint, it is not a hard guess that the newspapers and industrialists will continue their crusade of hysteria. Their success thus far should do much to dampen the premature rejoicings of liberals after the Roosevelt reelection, when it was said on all sides that the press was no longer a decisive force in our culture. Where labor and the lower middle class can hold together, as on the Roosevelt campaign issue and, to an extent, on the Supreme Court issue, the advantage of the press can be overcome. But where an issue arises on which labor and the middle class can be split, then trust to the press to seek a way of splitting them.

What makes the press so anxious? We come here to the sitdown not as symbol of fear but as social reality. The sitdown as a strike technique has, of course, enormous advantages that have several times been described in The Nation. But its great strength lies in the fact that it is part of a complex, which can be roughly summarized as the C. I. O., John L. Lewis, and the sitdown—in short, a new movement, a new leader, ■ new technique. It is this combination that is bringing accessions to the ranks of organized labor so fast that the resources of the C. I. O. can scarcely keep pace with them. It is this complex that the newspapers and the industrialists fear and are fighting: they merely single out what seems to them the most vulnerable part of it, the sitdown.

We believe that the American people will come to accept the sitdown, with limitations, as a legitimate technique, just as we expressed our belief last week that American law would eventually sanction it. But whether or not it continues as a technique is not of transcending importance. What is important is the proof that the new American labor movement is alert enough to reach out for new techniques and wise enough to weigh gravely their social utility.

Mussolini Weighs His Chances

WIDE difference of opinion exists as to whether Mussolini has promised not to send more volunteers into Spain. The dispatches contradict one another. Part of the difficulty arises from the fact that if Mussolini told London and Paris he would continue to break the non-intervention agreement, they would like to keep it a secret as long as possible, whereas if he undertook to refrain from further shipments he would like to keep it a secret as long as possible. For the realist, however, the question is not what Mussolini promises, for he has many times broken his promises. The question is what he will do.

It is highly probable that Mussolini sent into Spain 60,000 or more Italian soldiers in advance of the date on which the foreign patrol of Spain was to become effective, in complete certainty that this large force, co-operating with Germans and Moors, would quickly carry Franco to victory. This certainty broke down when the Italians turned and ran on the Guadalajara front. The rout was an embarrassment to Mussolini abroad and will plague him at home. The news of 2,000 or 3,000 dead and as many prisoners must trickle through to Italian towns and hamlets and cause the people to murmur.

Yet there is no doubt that Mussolini's domestic situation would still allow him to dispatch more men to Spain.

But will 50,000 or 100,000 more and even better Italian soldiers secure a Fascist triumph in Spain? Mussolini is hard-boiled and this is the great problem now tormenting him. Every month the Loyalist army improves. Spain might become ■ bottomless maw swallowing division after division of Italian soldiers. Even Mussolini's possibilities and temper have limits. The Guadalajara battle yielded enough Italian equipment for several government brigades, and there is no guaranty that ensuing battles will not again restock Valencia's supply depots. The Spanish government has won supremacy in the air. Its tanks, too, have become a tremendous fighting factor, and now the Loyalist fleet, long bottled up in Cartagena, has sallied forth to harass the enemy.

There is no longer any way by which Mussolini can produce a speedy victory for himself in Spain. Can he, before Abyssinia is completely subdued and before it has yielded him any of the expected profits, take on a war for a year or more in Spain? Here international complications enter the picture. Italy's 60,000 or more soldiers sufficed to bring the French Radical Socialists into line and enabled the Blum Ministry to take ■ firm stand against the Italian invasion. Nobody knows at what point the British will stop wavering. Will it be when Mussolini has 150,000 or 200,000 troops in Spain? The Duce must reckon with the probability that the deeper he sinks into Spain the more foreign resistance he will meet.

Finally, it appears that Mussolini is not quite as sure as he would like to be of Germany. The New York newspapers, the Times even more noticeably than the Herald Tribune, are reporting the involved international situation with woeful inadequacy. But it seems that Hitler sent 20,000 troops and then stopped. The Nazi dailies did not suppress stories of the Guadalajara débâcle, and that, in a totalitarian state, has significance. Germany and Italy are both close enough to Spain to send by air 500 airplanes, which would make ■ vast difference and might turn the tide. Yet Germany has lately been less interested. Is this because of ■ tacit understanding that when England succeeds in pushing Mussolini out, Germany will share some of Franco's concessions? Perhaps. But these speculations become increasingly less impressive. England is caught in this contradiction: without the Italians Franco certainly cannot win, and with the Italians England will not be stage manager.

Has Hitler despaired of a Fascist victory in Spain? Will Mussolini give up the attempt now? The stakes in this Spanish struggle are very large, and the decision is probably one of the weightiest that Mussolini has ever been called upon to make. The Fascists cannot readily admit failure in Spain. On the other hand, Hitler and Mussolini, though they may behave like "mad men" when the occasion requires, are calculating. Hitler especially has his army chiefs to reckon with. In this crisis of uncertainty, just a bit more certainty in London and Paris could quickly decide Mussolini that he had had enough of Spain. What a difference it would make in Europe! And still the democracies muddle

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Laws to Throttle Labor

Washington, March 27

DON'T waste much time worrying over reports and rumors that Congress, in response to the current, intensive campaign of employer associations, is going to enact some labor-throttling legislation such as acts requiring incorporation of unions or outlawing sitdown strikes. Look, instead, to the state legislatures. That's where the dirty work will be done and already is being attempted. A case in point is the Pennsylvania Labor Relations Act, which Donald Richberg recently drafted for the benefit of anti-union employers in that state and now, Max Stern writes in the Scripps-Howard papers, is urging, as one of Roosevelt's close advisers, as a pattern for new federal legislation.

There are several reasons why no legislation directly inimical to organized labor is likely to come out of Congress. In the first place, the Supreme Court, when it rules on the Wagner Act tomorrow or a week or so hence, probably will knock the props out from under any plans that might be in the offing for extension of federal jurisdiction over labor relations; that certainly will be true if it holds the NLRB has no jurisdiction over manufacturing enterprises. Second, and more important, here in Washington organized labor can bring to bear against anti-labor legislation a concentrated and effective opposition made immeasurably stronger by the fact that there are federal officials, members of Congress, and journalists here who have a thorough grasp of the subject and can illuminate all the nefarious purposes lying behind the weasel words that embroider such legislation. In the third place, Roosevelt is at the moment wholly preoccupied with getting his court-reform bill through Congress and cannot afford to alienate labor support.

However, when the Supreme Court path to an extension of federal jurisdiction in the labor field is cleared, we may expect that efforts will be made in Congress to set up for all industries substantially the same machinery for peaceful adjustment of labor disputes as exists for disputes in the railroad industry. There is no good reason why such legislation should be resisted if it is firmly rooted in the Wagner Act and directed primarily at protecting labor's rights rather than at prevention of strikes and other industrial stoppages. But all proposals for extending the railway mediation set-up to labor relations in general will have to be subjected to a rigorous currying-off by experts in search of those tricky phrases which labor's foes will seek to insert.

An example of this sort of thing is the Maritime Mediation bill which one of the Roosevelt field marshals, Senator Guffey of Pennsylvania, has introduced in Congress.

There are only a few important labor bills in Congress that have a chance of enactment, and among them the Guffey bill is unquestionably the worst. Its quality is exemplified in a new concept it introduces in collective bargaining through a provision requiring that employee representatives in the maritime trades must be native-born or fully naturalized citizens. The Senator, or whatever group of ship-line attorneys framed the bill for him, would have saved words and misunderstandings if he had, instead, written into the bill a proviso saying that "under no conditions shall Harry Bridges, guiding spirit of the new maritime labor movement on the West Coast, be permitted to represent the workers." Merely a skeletonized enumeration of all the flaws and pitfalls in the Guffey bill would fill several pages. It rejects all the good features of the Railway Mediation Act, adopts all its worst features, and then intensifies them. Its emphasis is on stopping strikes at any cost. It provides for compulsory mediation and then delivers the whole problem of labor relations into the hands of courts, juries, and district attorneys, instead of turning it over to some such group of experts as the NLRB, which under the bill would be deprived of jurisdiction over the maritime industry. The adjustment board that the Guffey bill would create would be loaded against labor with twenty employer representatives against sixteen labor representatives. Virtually every union-busting dodge that lawyers have been able to contrive has been built into Guffey's bill and hidden there under blankets of language which give the whole measure an air of complete reasonableness and liberality.

Fortunately, there are men in Washington able to lay bare such traps for labor and put the unions on guard. But this is less true in the state capitals. For example, there is pending in the Wisconsin legislature a bill much like the Wagner Act, and employer groups are ganging up to fill it with weasel words. According to reports in labor circles, Governor La Follette has succumbed to their sweet reasonableness to such a point that he is backing some of their amendments, including one which provides the entering wedge for compulsory incorporation of unions under the guise of requiring registration for the purpose of eliminating company unions, which the law already outlaws. There are baby Wagner acts pending in Pennsylvania, New York, and New Jersey—and others in the drafting process in California and Ohio—that will have to be guarded meticulously against such encumbrances and worse ones that corporation lawyers will try to insert in them. It can be done. The Utah legislature a few days ago adopted a state Wagner Act that follows the federal measure almost word for word and in some of its provisions is even more specific; Utah is the first state to enact a law complementing the National Labor Relations Act. There is an atrocious bill pending in Minnesota, introduced by State Senator Galvin apparently for the purpose of heading off a measure such as Utah puts into effect on July 1. Also pending in state legislatures are numerous bills to outlaw sitdown strikes, require unions to incorporate, force them to file annual reports covering their activities, finances, and membership lists. Such measures, however, do not appear to be making much headway. Union-incorporation bills have just been licked in Missouri and Oregon.

Pennsylvania probably will be the first state to follow Utah's example in the enactment of a law paralleling the National Labor Relations Act. The bill which Richberg drafted for that purpose on behalf of employers in the state has been thoroughly emasculated by henchmen of the Earle administration, including Lieutenant Governor

Tom Kennedy, secretary-treasurer of the United Mine Workers, who enlisted the aid of federal experts in disemboweling Richberg's scheme. What is left is only a polite little bill that says the state Mediation Service should do its best to see that labor disputes are settled by peaceful negotiation. The way remains clear for a state Wagner Act. Richberg's bill was intended to take the place of such an act. In essence, it was nothing more than the National Association of Manufacturers' compulsory-mediation proposal incorporating all the mediation devices of the railway act. But this bill, which is now being held up as a model for federal legislation to preserve the industrial peace, contained none of the Railway Labor Act's provisions outlawing company unions, establishing majority rule, and prohibiting employers from having any part or voice in questions concerning the workers' rights to self-organization.

Liberty and Death in Puerto Rico

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

[Mr. Villard's Issues and Men has been omitted this week in order to make room for the first of two articles on conditions in Puerto Rico. The second will appear next week.]

THE needless bloodshed in Ponce, Puerto Rico, due in part to official blundering, which has just cost ten lives, again forces to the front the question of the independence of that island. I was told by officials before I left New York, and again on my arrival in San Juan, that the independence movement was negligible, being confined to a few reckless hotheads, and that the Nationalist Party has an enrolment of only 5,000, made up largely of boys of fifteen and sixteen. Since the riot, newspaper comment in this country echoes the statement that there is no real Nationalist movement. Senator Barcelo, president of the Liberal Party, now in New York City, repeated this in an interview after the riots. Yet after my visit to the island I feel that independence is and will remain the foremost issue in Puerto Rico, and this without any regard whatever for the Nationalist Party, its scanty numbers and the immaturity of its members. The Nationalist agitation is in the air and will continue to be so because independence for Puerto Rico is synonymous with economic freedom and security. Talk of it would largely cease if Puerto Rico could obtain justice at the hands of the United States; if its lands were turned back to the people on fair and just terms; if the stranglehold of foreign capitalists upon the island could be broken; and if there were some assurance of decent living conditions for the mass of the peons, who today, working in the cane fields, earn the starvation wage of $105 a year.

Statements of conditions in the island have been published, republished, broadcast, and trumpeted about for decades without moving the Congress or the Presidents of the United States to do anything radical. It is a bitter fact that although in 1898 we promised the island the "American standard of life," no thorough reorganization plan was ever undertaken until our own sufferings in the depression compelled our government to act for Puerto Rico as for every other part of the Union. Governor Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., told the truth about the horrible conditions when he was there, but it was only the New Deal—which he denounced—that accepted the challenge. Under the direction of the Department of the Interior a comprehensive relief and reconstruction program is under way.

It is not enough. Nor can it move swiftly enough to end the despair which comes to thoughtful minds when they study the problem. Many, many Puerto Ricans are thinking seriously and talking quietly, without public agitation, about independence—continental Americans living on the island, too—because they say that the present situation cannot continue, that it is getting worse, despite the Puerto Rican Relief Administration's work. These people do not hate the United States. They are not actuated by a theoretical belief in what Woodrow Wilson defined as the right of small nations and peoples everywhere to their own way of life. They know the risks of independence, the dangers from unscrupulous, self-seeking politicians of the Latin American variety; they know that if the island leaves the United States and is excluded from the American tariff system it will face economic ruin. Yet their minds turn constantly to independence because they see no hope for Puerto Rico as long as it is a dependency, ruled imperialistically by a Congress which will never be able to understand the Latin American point of view, temperament, or cultural aspirations. They say, "We are not Anglo-Saxons but Latins, and the two will never mix; the Congress will never be able to govern us justly."

They gladly acknowledge that Puerto Rico has profited in many respects from American rule. They have good roads; 48 per cent of the budget goes to education (and that is still not enough); the railroads are much improved; the health of the people, shocking as the statistics reveal it to be, is yet better than it was under the Spaniards. Medical centers are being established all over the island; the university has developed remarkably; San Juan has been beautified, modernized, and given excellent docks; all the cities are much cleaner. But still the fundamental conditions which have reduced the Puerto Ricans to economic slavery are worse than when the Spaniards left the island, for the lands of the small farmers are steadily being lost, and the vast sugar profits leave the island to be spent by absentee shareholders in Spain and the United States. Four American sugar corporations own almost half the sugar lands and produce almost half the sugar crop. In the seventeen years from 1917 to 1935, the net earnings of the three largest absentee-owned sugar companies totaled $79,275,000, and "practically all these net returns," the Puerto Rican Reconstruction Administration reports, were paid to stockholders living off the island. The four chief products—sugar, tobacco, fruits, and textile goods—have shown an enormous increase in total value and per capita output under American rule; and still the plight of the island is desperate. A vital reason for this is that the population has increased since the conquest by 900,000 at least, and the cost of living, except for some foods, is as high as or higher than in New York.

There you have the reasons for the independence movement, the reasons why it will continue and grow, whether the growth shows in the figures of the Nationalist Party and public agitation or not. Of course, the propertied interests are opposed to independence, ■ are also many persons with a liberal point of view. I asked a high official of an important farmers' cooperative association which seeks to aid the small planters as against the banks and the great corporations what independence would do to the sugar industry. "Kill it," he replied. There is a genuine and not unfounded fear that independence would bring forth a dictator, like Trujillo in neighboring Santo Domingo, or mob rule, immediate expropriation of property, and chaos. It is ■ curious anomaly that while economic insecurity is creating ■ real demand for freedom, the assurance of economic security would also increase the desire for independence, and in conservative circles. I asked one of the richest men in the sugar industry whether the assurance that his property and income would be untouched under a republican government would make a difference in his attitude toward independence. To my great surprise he replied, "Indeed it would. I should feel very differently about it." Others whose minds are attuned to the social needs of the island, who cannot ride unmoved by those horrible pigsty slums to be seen in every city, in which human beings live in sickening poverty and degradation, say that under a republic things could not be worse and might be much better. "At any rate," they add, "chaos is coming if we go on this way."

When I asked what made them believe the island could exist during a transition period from colony to republic, I got no specific answers. I inquired whether steps were being taken to plan for independence; whether they were working out a simple system of government—the island has, for one thing, far too many municipalities; whether they were considering a return to the unicameral legislative system abandoned in 1917; how they were proposing to minimize the politician evil; whether they were considering proportional representation, and so on. There is little such spade work being done. Those who favor independence are palsied by uncertainty about the economic policy of the United States after liberation. They try to persuade themselves that Puerto Rico is too valuable a market—$80,000,000 a year—for Congress to throw away. In other words, they do not know the swinish selfishness of our beet-sugar and cane-sugar growers and high-tariff lobbyists who dictate the policy of our government in such matters. Still the reply came to me: "Even so, we can't go on this way."

Statehood? The immediate offer of it would certainly spike the independence movement. But its irrevocability would daunt many. What if after the union the incompatibility of the two temperaments became more manifest? The pending threat to give school instruction in English has aroused a storm. The Puerto Ricans think, mistakenly, that this means a deliberate effort to do away with Spanish, an attempt to wean their children away from their great Spanish heritage; today, after nearly forty years of Americanization, the Puerto Ricans, as the Baltimore Evening Sun puts it, "are avoiding English to the extent possible." Would not the island be Americanized more than ever if it became ■ state, and would two Senators and ■ few Congressmen really be able to win for them the economic safety and liberty they need in order to live with human decency?

Well may they ask this question, for the coastwise shipping laws—from which the Virgin Islands, seventy miles away, are exempted—work against Puerto Rico, and so do monopolistic freight rates. The island is also severely penalized by our tariff laws. Reporting to the P. R. E. R. A., Darwin De Golia declares that the value of mainland products brought to the island in fiscal 1934 was $57,503,000, on which the potential tariffs, or increased price paid by Puerto Rico because of the tariff, was $22,951,000. Of this total, $19,275,000 was in foodstuffs on which the cost added by the tariff was $10,107,560, a heavy burden, indeed, for a starving people. Again, Puerto Rico is ruthlessly exploited by mainland firms, as if to make industrialization of the island impossible. Often when a successful factory is started, it is deliberately undersold by some mainland competitor. It is hardly surprising that the Puerto Ricans point to this and say: "Well, independence would remedy that and let us create home industries."

Four great remedies for these economic ills present themselves: industrialization, birth control, wholesale emigration, and the recapture of their lands for the people. These I shall discuss in detail in my next article. I wish here to stress again how basic are the evils of the economic situation. If the island is not freed from its economic royalists; if the price of living continues to rise—the P. R. E. R. A. said on May 2, 1936, that measured in terms of purchasing power “wages have been reduced almost consistently since the first days of American occupation”—the Puerto Ricans will welcome a king, a dictator, independence—anything but the present regime.

As for the few hotheads, the Nationalists, who call themselves the “army of liberation,” and possibly began the Ponce bloodshed, they are extraordinarily difficult to handle. They illegally possess arms, they insist on carrying them publicly, and they are ready to shoot. They had not received permission to parade at Ponce with arms. Nothing can prevent further violence and additional “martyrs to freedom” except the utmost skill and tact, and these the officials have not shown. The only sound policy is to let the hotheads have full rein so far as possible, but your official mind hurries to forbid parades lest they bring on disorder—and thereby brings on bloodshed. I am much afraid of the military mind in the palace at San Juan, for that type turns inevitably to repression and severity. The Governor, General Winship, who stands very high in the island, is a charming and well-meaning gentleman, most eager to do what is right. Like everyone else he was deeply shocked by the assassination of Colonel Riggs, the chief of police, a year ago. The universal horror and indignation over the Colonel’s murder were unfortunately tempered by the immediate killing of the two assassins by policemen at the station house to which they were taken, on the excuse that they had made a rush to take arms from a rack. The public believes these youths were deliberately murdered, partly out of grief and rage, partly because insular juries are so slow to convict. The policemen were tried before a native jury and acquitted. Their retention on the force without disciplinary proceedings by the police authorities is an outrage. No efficient policeman turns red-handed murderers loose without handcuffs in a room with a rack of allegedly loaded rifles. What competent policeman would not have been able to subdue two boys under such circumstances without shooting them? And if it is true, as charged, that these same policemen are now on duty in the immediate proximity of the governor’s palace, then that is tantamount to commendation and not condemnation. It is again proof that military and police methods do not mix. What is needed now is a General Glassford and his technique in handling the bonus army.

It all makes one feel that there are bad days ahead in Puerto Rico, despite all the honest efforts in Washington to improve conditions. When Patrick Henry called for liberty or death he meant the political brand of liberty. Multitudes in Puerto Rico today believe that death is ahead of them if economic liberty is denied them, and therefore they ask a political independence which in their hearts they do not wholly desire, as a last resort in order to achieve economic well-being. Personally I should look upon the experiment of independence with the greatest anxiety. But believing always in self-government, I feel that if a majority of the Puerto Ricans want it, they should have it.

Volcano Under England

BY ROBERT DELL

Newbury, England, March 16

I HAVE been in England for three weeks, and there seems to me to have been a certain amount of change in the moral atmosphere since my last visit six months ago. To begin with, everybody assures me that there is less pro-German feeling than there was last year. And so far as I can judge from an experience necessarily limited, that would appear to be the case. Whether there is less anti-French feeling is another matter. Anti-French feeling seems to me to be permanent in England, although it is more or less at the surface at different times. What the reason of it is, it is difficult to say. One is inclined to think that it is to some extent a relic of the old nineteenth-century Nonconformist or Puritan tradition, which abhorred the French as being either atheists or Roman Catholics and in any case immoral. No doubt, however, the English have a natural difficulty in understanding the French; and perhaps the French have an equal difficulty in understanding the English, although there is no widespread anti-English feeling in France, or at any rate it is not so fundamental as anti-French feeling in England seems to be. Sometimes the French get very angry with us for some particular reason, but when the reason is removed the anger dies down.

It is unfortunate that two peoples living so near together, who have so many interests in common, should find so much difficulty in understanding each other. The excuse often given in England for anti-French feeling is that French policy since the war is to a great extent responsible for the existence of Nazi Germany. It is not a good excuse. No doubt French policy from the end of the war until 1924 was often foolish and irritating, but the Nazi movement did not become a serious political force in Germany until 1930, when important concessions had been made to Germany and the Treaty of Versailles had undergone considerable revision. The English are too much disposed to forget their own share of responsibility for the diplomacy that led to the war and for the worst provisions of the peace treaties, but I cannot go into that question now. There is in England an atmosphere of uncertainty and disquietude. Few people seem to have any clear idea of what British policy is, still less of what it ought to be. The rearmament program is accepted by the great majority of people as an unwelcome necessity, but nobody seems to know for what exact purpose the increased armaments are to be used. Naturally their purpose is said to be that of defense. Defense against whom? Most people would probably say against Germany, but nobody seems to be quite sure. Some people say—it is said officially—that we are rearming so as to be able to fulfil our obligations. Exactly what obligations? Again nobody seems to have any very definite idea. It is generally understood that we should support France, Belgium, and perhaps Holland in resisting any unprovoked aggression, but nothing else is certain. As to the obligations of the Covenant of the League of Nations, few people seem to take them seriously.

The desire to avoid war at all costs is widespread, but in most cases it is not, so far as I can judge, based on pacifist principles. Probably ninety-nine people out of a hundred would be willing to go to war if England were attacked, but there is, I think, a feeling that although war is probable in Europe, England will somehow or other manage to keep out of it, and that so long as England keeps out of it, it does not matter. Unwillingness to run the risk of war in any circumstances is due less to pacifist sentiment than to the desire to have a good time. So people shut their eyes and ears, put everything unpleasant out of their minds, and think as little as possible. I am told, for instance, by friends intimately connected with the stage that the public mentality in regard to the theater is very much what it was during the Great War. There is no hope of a good run for any play that is at all tragic or ironical or satirical. What the public want is to be made to laugh—and forget—and it takes very little to make them laugh. If this be true, it is surely a disquieting symptom. Many things in England remind one too much of people dancing on the rim of a volcano.

Yet I am convinced that, if only there were leadership, there is a body of opinion in England prepared to face the facts of the European situation and to support the measures necessary to deal with it. The remarkable vote in favor of collective security that was given in the peace ballot represented a feeling that is not dead but only dormant. Unfortunately there is no leadership and no effective political opposition. The Labor Party more than held its own in the recent election of the London County Council, because its local administration has been successful, but the results of parliamentary by-elections show that it is gaining little or no ground in the country as a whole. Readers of Harold Laski's articles in The Nation will understand why. The leaders of the party in Parliament feebly criticize the foreign policy of the government in detail, but they show no sign of understanding it, and they acquiesce in its main lines. If they are sincere, they are as much taken in by it as the public in general. They even believe, or pretend to believe, that the policy of "non-intervention" in Spain was initiated by the French government, whose lead the British government followed. Yet it must be clear to anybody who does not shut his eyes to facts that the aim of the British government in initiating that policy and imposing it on France was to secure the victory of the Spanish rebels. The British naval authorities at Gibraltar do not conceal their sympathy with the rebels and have semi-official relations with Franco.

The way in which the government and the Foreign Office have succeeded in deceiving public opinion about the real nature and aims of British policy is one of the most disquieting factors in the situation. There are actually people who write to the papers to complain that our policy is dictated by France and that we are altruistically sacrificing British interests! A young English girl who was dining in American company in Geneva a few months ago remarked that it was unpleasant to be on the Continent because nobody would believe that British policy was so altruistic and disinterested as all English people knew it to be. She was quite surprised when everybody laughed. She was as sincere as she was typical.

British diplomacy must be judged by its acts and their results, not by Eden's speeches. Its results were described in my article published in The Nation of February 27. I have too high an opinion of the skill and intelligence of British diplomacy not to be convinced that those results were deliberately aimed at. Unless British diplomats are imbeciles, as they are not, the only hypothesis that accounts for their policy is that they hope to buy off Hitler by giving him a free hand in Europe east of the Rhine until England is sufficiently strongly armed to make it hopeless for him to attack the British Empire or France and can force him to come to terms. Indeed, persons in close touch with the ruling spirits of the Foreign Office say this openly in private and mention three years as the period during which it will be necessary to keep Hitler occupied east of the Rhine. France—and also Belgium and Holland—must be defended against any German attack because they are the buffer states between England and Germany, and England can never allow any French, Belgian, or Dutch port to be in the hands of Germany. That is what Baldwin meant when he said, "Our frontier is on the Rhine." It therefore becomes necessary to detach France from any commitments east of the Rhine lest they should lead to a situation in which England would be obliged to intervene. That means reducing France to the position of a third-rate power, subordinated to England and ultimately to England and Germany if those two countries can come to an agreement. England will always intervene if Germany invades France, for the reasons already mentioned. It is therefore unnecessary for France to make any sacrifices to secure English support in that event, and the policy of the French government is a dupe's game.

In the London Observer of March 14, J. L. Garvin, who little more than two years ago described Nazi Germany as Public Enemy Number One but is now an enthusiastic supporter of Hitler and Mussolini, openly declared in favor of the creation of "a united 'Middle Europe' under German leadership." He said at that time:

Such a federated system would contain at least 150,000,000 of people with an equal wealth of industrial and agricultural resources. It would be able to hold its own in all ways and circumstances—thus removing one of Herr Hitler's chief anxieties for the future—against the Soviet power which controls 8,000,000 square miles of territory and within a few years will number 200,000,000 of people. Russia, content with its own enormous scale, would have to relinquish the Soviet pacts against the Reich, and waive opposition to a united Middle Europe under German headship. That is one further practical condition of constructive peace. Another condition is that Britain should favor the project as essential to the renewed safety and progress of European civilization; and as part of any serious conception of an Anglo-German settlement.

This monstrous proposal to give Nazi Germany the hegemony of Europe undoubtedly represents the view of important capitalist and financial interests in England, which regard Nazi Germany as a bulwark against communism and fear France as a "left" country. It probably also represents the view of some members of the British government, and it may even be a kite flown to test public opinion. In any case Garvin's proposal is the logical conclusion of present British policy, and one may be grateful to him for saying openly what many people think but do not say. At least we know what to expect. Will the British Labor Party at last recognize the danger and organize a campaign throughout the country against the betrayal of European democracy and civilization? I wish I could confidently answer the question in the affirmative.

Nebraska Fights for Survival

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

Lincoln, Nebraska, March 20

THE fate of a great state hangs on the decision of two supreme courts—its own and that of the United States. A favorable decision by the two courts means that the state can launch an enterprise to irrigate from 500 to 1,000 square miles of what was once among the richest agricultural land in the country. It will also make possible the production of a vast amount of cheap electric power for industrial and agricultural uses. Defeat in the courts may consign thousands of farmers to a desperate and losing fight against the encroaching desert, and threaten the economic well-being of the entire state.

For central and western Nebraska the drought of 1934 and 1936 spelled not mere temporary misfortune but a crushing defeat in a struggle against diminishing fertility which has been under way for more than two decades. Thirty years ago there was land in the central area which produced up to fifty bushels of wheat an acre in good seasons. Today the farmers on this same land consider themselves lucky to get fifteen bushels an acre. In bad years there is no crop. A part of the difficulty can be attributed to the recent subnormal rainfall. The average precipitation for Nebraska for the past sixty years has been about 23.5 inches, ranging from 34 inches in the southeast to about 16 inches on the western border. For the past six years the average for the state has been only 19 inches.

But more serious than the succession of abnormally dry years is the depletion of the soil itself. Although this section of Nebraska has been intensively farmed only during the present century, approximately 40 per cent of the nitrogen and humus in the soil has been exhausted. The land has also suffered severely from erosion, particularly in the western section. Many other states have faced a similar depletion of agricultural resources without economic retrogression. But Nebraska is one of the three states in the Union which are almost totally without resources apart from the land. It has no coal, oil, or other minerals. What industry exists is dependent on agriculture either for its market or as the source of raw materials.

In the central and western parts of the state the traveler sees unmistakable signs of deterioration. Many farms have been abandoned; the farmers who remain are cultivating larger and larger areas in an effort to make a living. Houses are badly in want of paint; repairs have been neglected. There is a notable absence of dairy cattle, pigs, and poultry. Most of the farms are marred by great gullies which carry off the sadly needed rainfall. The general appearance of the area is strikingly similar to that of the arid regions of North China, where agriculture has been all but abandoned.

It is only natural that the inhabitants of the state should be deeply concerned over the outlook. Yet mixed with apprehension is the hope that irrigation can more than make up for the ravages of drought and erosion. And there is an excellent chance that their hopes will be fulfilled. On September 28, 1935, the PWA made an initial allotment of $10,000,000 toward the construction of a great dam on the North Platte River, some 200 miles west of Hastings—to be known as the Keystone Dam—which would make possible the irrigation of 500,000 acres of rich loess soil in Gosper, Phelps, Kearney, and Adams counties. Supplemental reservoirs on Plum Creek may subsequently permit the extension of the irrigated area by another 100,000 to 200,000 acres. In addition, the project calls for the construction of two power stations which will have an annual output of some 235,000,000 kilowatt hours of electrical energy. It is estimated that this energy could be delivered to the municipal plants in the area for a flat rate of 7 or 7½ mills per kilowatt hour, which is considerably less than the cost of production in the most efficient steam plant in the region. When completed with irrigation canals and transmission lines as far east as Omaha, the project will have cost some $32,000,000.

While the irrigation aspect of the program is unquestionably more important, the production of power is essential if the costs of supplying water are to be kept at a reasonable figure. Soil experts estimate that twelve inches of irrigation water supplied during the growing season would be sufficient to guarantee maximum crops every year, regardless of droughts. Moreover, irrigation would make possible the growth of leguminous crops, such as alfalfa and sweet clover, which would restore the fertility of the soil. Given an adequate supply of water, the area can support an agricultural population from two to four times as large as the present one.

The project of the Central Nebraska Public Power and Irrigation District, known as the Tri-County project, is the largest of three important power developments which the PWA is financing for this area. But the others are by no means unimportant. About fifty miles northwest of Lincoln is the Loop River power project, now completed with its turbines practically ready to generate energy. This development, known as the Columbus project, has cost $11,000,000 to date and will have a total annual output of 165,000,000 kilowatt hours. Although it has a small storage reservoir, there is no provision for irrigation. Two hundred miles farther west, just south of the city of North Platte, is the Platte Valley Public Power and Irrigation District, known as the Sutherland project, which is fully completed and in the process of filling its reservoirs. The Sutherland development cost approximately $10,000,000 and has an estimated annual output of 151,000,000 kilowatt hours. It supplies water to previously installed irrigation ditches serving some 100,000 acres.

Something of the magnitude of the three projects can be seen when we note that in addition to irrigating 600,000 acres they can furnish 490,000,000 kilowatt hours of "firm" power. It is planned to distribute this throughout the central and eastern part of the state as far as Omaha. Since the total power production in the same area at present is only slightly more than 500,000,000 kilowatt hours, the PWA projects will nearly double the electric-power production of the region.

It appears to be a magnificent program, second only to the TVA in its social and economic implications. As an outsider I expected to find that every Nebraskan was conscious of its full meaning for the state. To my astonishment, however, I have found a considerable amount of opposition to the key project, the Tri-County development, among certain groups. Despite the explicit approval given to the project by the Governor and the State Planning Commission, efforts were made to prevent it from obtaining federal funds. After the funds were allotted, an attempt was made to prevent the state engineer from granting permission to build the Keystone Dam, which alone can make possible the vast irrigation project. When the state engineer approved the program, its opponents carried the fight to the Nebraska Supreme Court, where they obtained a ruling on June 29, 1936, voiding his action on the ground that it was illegal to take water outside the watershed of a stream. It happens that 300,000 acres of the 500,000 which are to be irrigated lie across a slight divide in the valley of the Republican River. Yet this land can be irrigated only from the Platte.

Meanwhile five of the local power companies, affiliates of the Insull, Stone and Webster, Electric Bond and Share, and the United Light and Power interests, have asked the Supreme Court of the United States for an injunction which would prevent any of the government-supported projects from selling power in competition with the private companies. While this suit is pending, Tri-County cannot obtain funds for the construction of its power station and transmission lines. The other projects, having already been completed, are permitted to build certain transmission lines but are forbidden to link up with each other.

To cap the climax, opponents of the Tri-County project have returned to the Nebraska Supreme Court to contest the amended water rights which would permit the Tri-County authorities to build the Keystone Dam and irrigate within the Platte River watershed. Until this case is settled, the PWA cannot even advance the major part of the $10,000,000 already allotted. Opponents of the project have also introduced a number of bills in Nebraska's unicameral legislature with a view to killing all undertakings of this type. One of these bills provides that all directors of an irrigation project must live within the watershed that is affected, and forbids irrigation authorities to build or own reservoirs, dams, or power plants outside the irrigation district. These provisions would hamper if not destroy every important irrigation and power project in the state.

Strangely enough, a large part of the opposition to Tri-County has come from the directors of the Sutherland project. It is difficult to get at the roots of this antagonism, but it appears to be based in part on sectionalism, in part on personal and political jealousies, and in part on basic differences in economic and social outlook. The struggle over irrigation is but part of a long-drawn-out conflict between the progressive political forces of the state affiliated with Senator Norris and the powerful political machine which has been built up by Senator Burke and Arthur Mullen, former Democratic national committeeman. It happens that Mr. Mullen, while national committeeman, obtained the grants for the Columbus and Sutherland projects before Tri-County could even obtain a hearing. Some months later the President forced him to resign his position on the National Committee, and he is now engaged in trying to collect upwards of $50,000 from the PWA for "legal services." The Mullen machine has been closely tied up with the utility interests and has naturally opposed public power development.

A further basis for the fundamental difference in outlook between the officials of the Sutherland project and those of Tri-County may be found in the nature of their respective enterprises. Sutherland has no large reservoir, which means that it will presumably not be able to operate at full capacity in dry seasons. Estimates of the amount of "firm" or steady power which can be produced vary widely, but it cannot be more than 90,000,000 kilowatt hours annually, and without the Keystone Dam the project may have no firm power whatsoever. This prevents Sutherland from selling its output to the municipal plants and farmers of the area unless it is linked with another producer. Lacking such a link, it has little choice but to sell its energy to the private power companies at "dump-power" rates. It would, of course, be possible for Sutherland to "firm up" its power by connecting with the Tri-County and Columbus projects, but this is precisely what the private power companies are seeking to prevent. A contract exists between Columbus and Tri-County, but the Sutherland officials have refused to be affiliated in a three-cornered deal. And they have insisted that the construction of the Tri-County power plants would make it more difficult for them to dispose of their power. The Tri-County authorities deny that the new project will create a surplus of electrical energy. They point out that the private companies have fixed their rates so high that they have scarcely touched the rich agricultural market for electricity. Nebraska ranks twenty-ninth among the states in the Union in the percentage of farms which are supplied with electric current.

Considerable opposition to the Tri-County project is also to be found in the region around Grand Island, thirty miles northeast of Hastings. A Platte River Water Protective Association has been formed which has as its battle slogan "Platte River for the Platte Valley." While this organization may have utility backing, it is nourished by a real fear that the Tri-County project may rob the area north of the Platte River of its present water resources. There are two issues involved, both somewhat bewildering to an Easterner. One is the contention by farmers along the Platte that the building of the Keystone Dam would deprive them of their riparian rights—which they interpret to mean the privilege of watching the river flow by filled to the banks. While Nebraska laws furnish some basis for this contention, the United States Supreme Court has definitely rejected this conception of riparian rights. Consequently, Nebraskans may wake up some day and find that the surplus water of the Platte has been granted to Wyoming or Colorado on the ground that Nebraska was not making full use of it.

The second claim appears at first sight to be a little more substantial. Residents of the north bank of the Platte claim that a diversion of the river's waters would rob the region of at least a portion of its precious store of underground water. A careful study of this subterranean water supply has been made by A. L. Lugin of the Nebraska Conservation and Survey Division and L. K. Wenzel of the United States Geological Survey. They concluded that the recent depletion of these resources was not permanent and was due primarily to dry weather.

Very little of this underground water comes from the Platte River; the bulk of it flows down from the sand hills of northern Nebraska, and the remainder is mostly obtained from rainfall.

Despite the opposition of these groups, the Nebraska Supreme Court is expected to hand down shortly a decision granting the Tri-County authorities the necessary water rights. This will permit work to be begun on the Keystone Dam and such irrigation ditches as have not already been constructed. There will still remain the problem of finding some way to irrigate the 300,000 acres that happen to be outside the Platte River watershed. This means that the obstructing law of 1895 will have to be repealed. Once these two battles have been won, the fight should narrow down to a clear-cut struggle between the utilities and the people of Nebraska over the question of public power production. With the issue thus clearly drawn it is doubtful whether even the Supreme Court can prevent Nebraska from obtaining the irrigation and cheap power it so desperately needs.

A Hundred White Horses

BY AGNES SMEDLEY

HORSES are valuable beasts, thought the long, brown old peasant. He was a man as brown as the earth on which he sat, and he was as motionless as a stone. The only clothing he wore was a pair of gray cotton trousers, and they also blended with the color of the earth. Valuable beasts, the old peasant kept thinking. His thoughts were not idle day dreams, either, for his eyes were following a slowly moving herd of horses across the River Sing. What a shame that those horses belonged to the Fifth White Army—what a shame! The Red Army could use a good horse like one of those over there. His son, a Red Army soldier, had once captured two horses almost from under the Whites, and had taken them to the red military headquarters. His son was a hero—no doubt about that.

The old man sat on Soviet territory north of the River Sing and looked across at the herd of horses on the southern bank, where the Whites occupied and ruled the countryside. From over there they kept sending raiding parties into Soviet territory. The river was the boundary line. The people over there all helped the Soviets when they could, but the Whites were cruel if they caught a man. Now, right there before his eyes was a whole herd of horses, no less than a hundred grazing peacefully, and no one in sight. Suppose he crossed over and picked out a horse. He squatted motionless as a stone as he thought and watched. No, not a soul in sight. So he might as well swim over, look about, and if he saw no one, see what the horses would do.

He moved down to the river, waded out, and began to swim. But would a horse obey him and swim the river on the way back? He wondered about many things, and above the water his eyes scanned the bank and the hill before him. He felt earth, stood upright, stood dead still near a small tree for a time as he looked about, then crept up the hillside. The leading horse did not take fright when he went near, but continued grazing peacefully. The old man took a last look around, then went up and patted the horse gently on the nose and rubbed its glossy neck. The horse nosed against him gratefully. They liked each other from the start.

The old man threw his arm over the animal's neck, gently patting and prodding it. It began obediently to move down toward the river. The whole herd of horses stopped grazing, looked up, and then began moving slowly behind them. The old man's heart was in his throat. Silly beasts, he thought. Anyone watching would know something was wrong. He leaped on his chosen animal and, guiding and prodding, rode him to the river, out into the water. And then he felt the animal begin to swim.

From behind he heard splashing that became ever louder, and he looked back anxiously. All the horses were going into the stream. Many hesitated, then began to swim obediently. The old man's heart beat so hard against his ribs that he could hear it. The whole drove of horses was swimming swiftly. The old man clung to his animal desperately, exulting but fearful. One rifle shot from behind and he would be finished.

He felt his horse touch Soviet soil and begin to scramble up the bank. Then the others began to clamber after. The old peasant grasped the mane of his animal tighter, kicked him in the ribs, and tried to force him into a trot or a gallop. Now all the horses were free of the stream, following up the path and over the hill. They were trotting with a thunderous noise. They crossed the hill and made straight for the narrow pass through a stony mountain. The horses whinnied, and Red Guards stood in amazement as the wet old man and a hundred wet horses trotted through the pass. The old man seemed drunk and kept yelling at the guards that he had "confiscated" a drove of White horses.

Inside the pass they turned off to the right toward a village. Crowds of women and children and a few men ran out and watched in amazement. The old man brought his horse to a stop right at the door of the local Soviet. All the women and a few men inside had run out and stood on the threshold, gaping in astonishment. A small unit of red soldiers at drill on a nearby square had halted and run up. The old man guided his horse to the square and looked back to see that all the others followed. He had lived long, but never had such a moment as this come to the life of any man; for there was a herd of horses obeying his will, and there were hundreds of people—with red soldiers among them—standing back and watching. The old man was dizzy, yet clear-headed enough to slide off his animal, pat it, and talk to it.

Turning to the villagers crowding nearer, he said: "They are White horses. I swam over to get me a horse, and then the whole drove followed. I was sitting and thinking—" He could speak no more. His own excitement halted him. And the people began to laugh; so that some of them fell down and sat there shrieking.

Somewhere the red soldiers had found a rope and were stringing it around the square to keep the horses from escaping. The children were pulling up grass and feeding it to the animals. Some of the animals threw up their heads and frisked away, but others ate the grass. The villagers were delighted and they all began pulling up grass, offering it, and calling the horses that took it all kinds of sweet names. "You beautiful darling—oh you nice old thing—lovely horsey." Such extravagance was enough to make a man laugh until he split.

The old peasant at last found his tongue and began telling the whole story. When he finished, the people laughed themselves half to death. The men slapped the old fellow on the back until it was sore. But he was so excited and so proud that they could have slapped him into pulp and he would not have felt it. So he told the story again, and that night he told it again to a still bigger crowd that came from other villages. They made him repeat it many times and they laughed until their jaws ached. Some of them knew the story by heart so that when the old man left out any detail they corrected him and put it in.

"The beasts are Soviet sympathizers—that's why they followed you," some wit remarked to a roar of laughter.

The old man slept hardly a wink that night. But sleep was unimportant at such a time as this. The next morning he and four others would take the beasts over the hills to the north, to Red Army headquarters. He, of course, would ride in front on his beautiful animal. What a horse it was, to be sure! The old man sighed at the thought of parting with it. The whole village was up by daybreak to see the procession start. A rough halter looped over the nose of his animal served as bridle, and a piece of thick wadded cloth served as a saddle for the old man. The other men rode in similar fashion, but they rode in the far rear, driving the horses before them. A crowd of admirers followed them for a li beyond the village.

Other villages had already heard of this great victory and were waiting. They saw the old man come in sight, then behind him the grand procession of horses, brought up by four men. It was as good as a demonstration, and people applauded and waved and yelled. When the procession stopped at noon, the old man told his story anew to strange villagers, who fed the men and the horses.

In this way they finally reached Red Army headquarters. Commanders and fighting men were accustomed to many unusual things, but this was a joy they would not forget. The lean old man told them his story and then they fell in each other's arms or sat down and laughed, and a number of them embraced the old man and insisted that he sit down and have something to eat and drink.

He stayed at headquarters for two days, making himself acquainted with affairs of the world, an honored guest. His son returned from the front on the second day and stood grinning at his father.

"You see, my son, you captured two horses, but I, an old man, captured a hundred."

The son grinned from ear to ear. And everybody laughed.

BROUN'S PAGE

The Lowest Branch

AFTER the Assembly of the State of New York had killed the child-labor amendment, I wrote to the 102 members who had voted against the measure and expressed my opinion that they had participated in the dirtiest day's work ever done in the lower house at Albany. I wrote as president of the American Newspaper Guild, since the organized editorial workers of this country have frequently gone on record as against the exploitation of the immature. The problem touches our own craft, since many publishers employ children as carriers and newsboys. In the jargon of the Publishers' Association they are known as "little merchants."

In writing to the assemblymen I mentioned the unassailable fact that labor groups throughout the state intended to remember the offenders and work against them when they came up for reelection. The intellectual level of New York's lower house is not very high. Its courage is somewhat less. The two forces which the legislators feared quite obviously were the prelates of the Catholic church and the newspaper owners of the state. I trust they will learn to their sorrow that their defiance of the strong position of labor was, among other things, a major political error.

A number of replies have come from the gentlemen of the lower house; their letters are sometimes illiterate and almost invariably on the moronic side. Instead of making a selection I will simply pick three from the top of the pile and let them stand as exhibits A, B, and C. The first which comes to hand is from Mario J. Cariello. Mr. Cariello writes, "No more consideration or weight need be accorded remarks such as yours than are worthy of the speaker thereof."

Just try and scan that sentence on your scanner. But the second, which comes from Chauncy B. Hammond, is a good deal longer and somewhat more incoherent. Mr. Hammond writes:

"Your circular letter of the tenth, addressed to other members of the New York State Legislature, came to me as a part, I assume, of your program to urge upon the members of the legislature who voted against the youth-control amendment to the Constitution, commonly, but erroneously, known as the child-labor amendment.

"Assuming that you are a newspaperman and a man of education, may I suggest that the language used in your letter is not consistent with that usually employed by men who presume to occupy the position suggested by your letterhead. I appreciate the fact that you have but expressed in most distasteful language your private opinion of the members of the legislature. You know as I do that the bill presented to the New York State Legislature was one of the rankest communistic bills ever presented to any legislative body. You know as do I that it was the intention of the proponents of this bill to regulate, limit, and prohibit the labor of youth under eighteen years of age. You know, and so do I, that it was one of the steps that such persons as you and your cohorts sought to impose upon the American public whereby the state could step in and direct the thoughts and acts of the youth of our land as in the communistic and socialistic state that you so desire. I am happy that it was my privilege, together with 101 other red-blooded American citizens, to defeat the aims of yourself and your kind, and I wish to say to you that so long as I live, I will resist by my vote and by my voice on the public platform such legislature [sic] as this. The time has come when you and the group you claim to represent must recognize the fact that this is the United States of America and not communistic Russia or any other country.

"I have no more use for you or those who you claim to represent than has the devil for holy water, if the analogy is at all consistent."

As for the consistency of Mr. Hammond's analogy in which he compares himself to the devil, I can only say that it is perfect. I could not have assigned him a more suitable role after his vote against the child-labor amendment. But I should like him to justify his contention that the Newspaper Guild does not possess the right to state its opinion to elected representatives in the lower branch of the legislature. What has become of those fine old American rights of petition and free speech? Does the gentleman in Albany honestly maintain that labor becomes communistic simply because it chooses to be articulate?

The voters of New York should make a much closer scrutiny of the men and women who are nominated for the state legislature. To a great extent these jobs have gone by default. Perfectly preposterous people reach Albany as unregarded pebbles in some particular political landslide. As in the case of new voters, there ought to be a literacy test for members of the Assembly. No man should be elected unless he is able to read and write. May I point out that Mr. Hammond seems confused as to the nature of some simple words which ought to be down his alley. What he is thinking of in his first sentence I shall never be able to tell you because, after employing a subject and a transitive verb, Mr. Hammond has completely forgotten the necessity of an object.

As exhibit C, I have a letter from Frank G. Miller. I'm at a loss to know whether Assemblyman Miller is filled with remorse or not strong in logic. At any rate he writes: "My comment on your letter of March 10 is as follows: There is no act so dirty but what it is soon followed by one a thousand times dirtier. The statement of your organization of the Assembly's action on the child-labor amendment, to my mind, comprises that act."

I rest my case.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

GEOMETRY'S FOURTH ANGLE

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

EDDINGTON, Jeans, and the rest have put the reader of popular science in a strange position. All too often he has learned to talk about "curved space" and "frames of reference" while preserving an ignorance so complete that he would not recognize a differential equation if he saw one. For that reason a popular introduction to formal mathematics is sorely needed, and at first sight that is what Lancelot Hogben's "Mathematics for the Million"* appears to be. Actually, however, the book is both a good deal more and a good deal less—a frequently brilliant and no less frequently exasperating exposition of some of the main principles of practical calculation plus the author's interpretation of history and his very intransigent personal convictions concerning the only true end of mathematical processes.

Being a Fellow of the Royal Society and a member of the faculty of the London School of Economics, it is not surprising that Professor Hogben should be interested in his subject primarily as a tool, or that social statistics should seem to him even more important than the physical sciences. Obviously his main purpose is to enable the average citizen to make sense out of means, medians, curves of distribution, probable errors, and the rest, but in his more than six hundred pages—most of them fairly stiff reading—he lays a very broad foundation of arithmetic, geometry, algebra, and calculus. At the same time, however, he undertakes something I have never seen undertaken before. Geometry has hitherto recognized three kinds of angles: obtuse, acute, and right. Professor Hogben adds a fourth—the left, or class, angle. There is, said Archimedes, no royal road to geometry. Professor Hogben spends a great deal of his time in the effort to prove that there is, nevertheless, a proletarian one.

Despite its persistently obtruded eccentricities, the work is, as I have said, often solid and brilliant. The approach to the solution of each problem through the history of that problem has an enormous advantage over the method of the textbooks, where demonstrations are always presented as faits accomplis so perfected and so tidied up that one is usually left wondering how they were ever hit upon; and I am frank to confess that the reading of this book furnished me with many insights I never achieved during the undergraduate days when I "majored" in mathematics. Nor is Professor Hogben's "economic interpretation" of the development of mathematics by any means all nonsense. It is, for example, a commonly accepted fact that some of the limitations of Greek geometry are traceable to the aristocratic preference for the study of static form over the study of movement and change. His treatment of the famous paradox of Zeno—the supposed theoretical impossibility that the hare of the fable will ever actually overtake the tortoise—is most ingenious, and the demonstration that the solution could not be reached until, at the Reformation, a mercantile civilization "took time away from the priests by taking saints out of the calendar" is delightful. But there are also times when Professor Hogben allows his hobby to ride him. Nor is it only that his impatience with everything not "practical" leads him to despise what more devoted mathematicians called "elegance" and to treat "rigidity of proof" so cavalierly that the treatise on the science of mathematics seems at times about to degenerate into a mere Ready Reckoner.

Frequently his preference for the practical rises shrilly into moral indignation. In the history of mathematics Good has been engaged against Evil. Anyone tainted with an interest in "pure" mathematics was an oppressor of the people and anyone who holds that mathematics has any meaning except as a tool would really like, if the truth were known, to take bread out of the mouths of workers. Yet it seems to me that something very much like his own method may be turned against him. When he says, in italics, that "solving problems is not a special gift but merely the art of applying fixed rules of grammar," it is plain that he wants to believe this because it sounds hopefully democratic. The fact remains, however, that it is true only in so far as the more routine processes of algebra or calculus are concerned. Try telling it to any competent mathematician who has struggled to get a solution for a difficult differential equation and then seen the feat accomplished by another with a gift more like the gift for chess than the mere ability to follow rules.

Near the beginning of his book Professor Hogben speaks of mathematics as "the language of size" and returns time and time again to this perilously inexact analogy. It would be much nearer the truth to say that mathematics is the logic of size. Essentially, in other words, it is not a method of making statements about what we know but a method of discovering something we do not know. Mere formulas are, to be sure, statements. If I say that $s = \frac{1}{2}gt^2$, that is a statement which may mean that the distance passed over by a body falling in a vacuum is equal to one-half the square of the time it has been falling, multiplied by a certain number which varies with the point on the earth's surface toward which the body is falling. If I add also that $ds/dt = gt$ I may be saying that at any instant the speed of that falling body is equal to the time it has

* W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

The one subject most important to personal happiness—yet many people go through life woefully uninformed about it!

NO engineer would dream of building a bridge without a blueprint. Even a housewife, embarking on the business of furnishing her family with food, uses a recipe book!

Yet how many people face the task of making a success of marriage in its most important aspect, that of sexual relations, without any other guide than their "instincts" or the information (and misinformation) they may have picked up haphazardly!

As Dr. Van de Velde has said, "much marital unhappiness, attributed to the apparent sexual frigidity of the wife, could be avoided and prevented if the medical profession had not allowed themselves to be deterred from explaining many technicalities of a normal married life, owing to a mixture of false modesty and professional reserve."

There are many books on the sexual life. There is one book which has won the unqualified approval of the medical profession and of the lay public. It is Ideal Marriage, Its Physiology and Technique, by T. H. Van de Velde, M.D. It is different from any "sex book" you ever read, or read about. It is:

1. AUTHORITATIVE. Dr. Van de Velde is an internationally famous Dutch gynaecologist (former head of the Gynaecological Clinic of Haarlem).
2. EXPLICIT. It is simple, forthright, detailed, and uses language that everyone can understand. It contains many charts and diagrams, 7 of them in full color.
3. COMPLETE. It covers every aspect of normal marital relationship. It has nothing to do, however, with sex deviations or perversions. This is a book for intelligent, adult people seeking perfect adjustment in their sexual relations.
4. UPLIFTING. It gives to marriage new dignity, new glamor, and new romance—because it explains the physical bases of spiritual and emotional satisfactions.

The price of this book is $7.50. You would, no doubt, gladly pay more than that for equivalent information to a physician—who would quite probably refer you to Dr. Van de Velde's work. And do not forget this—after you have read all other books on the subject, including those made to sell at a lower figure, you would still return to "IDEAL MARRIAGE" — the ultimate, complete authority; the one safe and sane guide.

Partial Contents

CHAPTER I	MARRIAGE, ACTUAL AND IDEAL
	Reasons for Retention of Marriage
	The Husband as Permanent Lover of His Wife
CHAPTERS II AND III	GENERAL HUMAN PHYSIOLOGY OF SEX
	Internal and External Stimuli: Smell, Touch, Sight
	Sexual Odours
CHAPTERS IV, V and VI	SEXUAL PHYSIOLOGY OF THE ADULT WOMAN
CHAPTER VII	ANATOMY AND PHYSIOLOGY OF THE MALE SEXUAL ORGANS
CHAPTER VIII	SEXUAL INTERCOURSE—ITS PHYSIOLOGY AND TECHNIQUE
	Definition of Normality
	Love-Play
	The Borderline of Abnormality
	Bodily Manipulations and Carresses
	Erogenous Zones
CHAPTER IX	SEXUAL UNION
	Mechanism
	Specific Stimulation
	Ideal Sexual Communion
	Analysis of Process of Orgasm in Man
	Analysis of Process of Orgasm in Woman
	Failure of Woman — Achieve Orgasm
	Coitus Interruptus
	Supplementary Satisfaction
CHAPTER X	SEXUAL COMMUNION
	Prolongation
	Male Infantilism
CHAPTER XI	SEXUAL COMMUNION
	Position and Action During Coitus
	Variations in Coitus
CHAPTER XII	EPILOGUE OR AFTER-GLOW
CHAPTER XIII, XIV, XV, XVI	BODILY HYGIENE
	Technique of First Intercourse
	Temporary Frigidity
	Influence of the Sexual Function on Physique and Psyche
	Sexual Vigour or Potency
	Difference of Age
	Medicaments, Drugs, Narcotics, Aphrodisiacs and Anaphrodisiacs
	Periodicity of Sexual Desire Sexual Intercourse During Menstruation Intercourse After Child-birth
	Genital Diseases
	Care and Cleanliness
CHAPTER XVII	PSYCHIC, EMOTIONAL AND MENTAL HYGIENE

IDEAL MARRIAGE

ITS PHYSIOLOGY & TECHNIQUE • By Th. H. Van de Velde, M.D.

"This is the book — the physical problems of marriage — have all been waiting for. It had to be written; and written exactly in this way—soberly, scientifically, completely, without a scintilla of eroticism, and yet with a sustained note of high idealism."
—DR. J. JOHNSTON ABRAHAM, of London.

"The best of the many books on the technique of relief for marital infelicity because it is painstakingly thorough; because it is matter-of-fact, clear, and plain, without any thought of embarrassment or constraint; because it is practicable, and gives advice that can be understood and followed; and it is true; it gives advice that has been found by the reviewer and many others to be of genuine value in these cases."—MILES J. BREUER, in Social Science.

"There is little doubt that its general circulation would do — to lessen divorce and conjugal unhappiness and to promote successful family life than all the religious exhortations from Moses to Manning."—HARRY ELMER BARNES, in the New York World Telegram.

"This is a highly civilized book. . . . Dr. Van de Velde has distinguished himself beyond all his predecessors — accomplishing the task which he outlines."
—American Journal of Psychiatry.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

"ON APPROVAL" COUPON

To any bookseller or
COVICI-FRIEDE, INC., 432 Fourth Avenue, New York City:
Enclosed find $7.50 in full payment of one copy of IDEAL MARRIAGE, Its Physiology and Technique, by Th. H. Van de Velde, M.D., which you will send to me by return mail. It is understood that I may examine this book for 10 days, at the end of which time I will either keep it, or return it to you, in which case you will promptly refund the entire purchase price.

Name.....

Address.....

City and State.....

☐ Check here if you wish book sent C.O.D. Same return privilege.

been falling, multiplied by this same number. But those two statements do not represent a mathematical process. Mathematics consists neither in such statements nor in mere rules for connecting them but in the logic which enables us to say that if one is either assumed or observed to be true, the other (which cannot be observed) must be true; and in this particular instance that logic consists in the determination of the instantaneous rate of change of s with respect to t —which logic, by the way, happens to be the foundation of differential calculus.

Note that I was careful to say that the two mathematical statements may mean what I translated them to mean. The "may" is important because the mathematical statements might mean many other things quite dissimilar—as for instance that the slope of the tangent to a certain curve was so and so. And this is important because it illustrates an important fact, namely, that mathematical statements and mathematical deductions are extremely generalized and reveal mathematical resemblances between things which seem to have no relation to each other; that they are so generalized, indeed, as to give some justification for the attitude toward them which seems to Professor Hogben the root of all evil. Perhaps those very thinkers who conclude that mathematics deals with a realm of logic far more extensive than the realm of phenomena which nature happens to illustrate are engaged in a speculation which is not useful. Certainly they are going at the matter from an angle quite different from that chosen by Professor Hogben. But is it really necessary to regard them as moral lepers? It is true that Pythagorus—whom he regards with a jaundiced eye—did have some very queer convictions about the soul and what men should eat. They did not, however, prevent him from having "ideas that are a lot of use about the square of the hypotenuse"; and personally I think it would be a mistake to insist upon liquidating everyone who happens to disagree with us about the true nature of the square root of minus one.

BOOKS

Mouse Meat

NIGHTWOOD. By Djuna Barnes. With an Introduction by T. S. Eliot. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

MR. ELIOT is right when he says of this novel that it is "really 'written.'" It is too consistently "written" for quotations to mean much, nor does any sentence contain the whole. Yet if Mr. Eliot is also right in the analogy he suggests with poetry, the book can be searched for good "lines." And they are easily found. Some of them are witty:

She defiled the very meaning of personality in her passion to be a person.

She was one of the most unimportantly wicked women of her time—because she could not let her time alone, and yet could never be a part of it. She wanted to be the reason for everything and so was the cause of nothing.

"She speaks of people taking away her 'faith' in them, as if faith were a transportable object—all her life she has been subject to the feeling of 'removal.'"

"She was really like those people who, coming unexpectedly into a room, silence the company because they are looking for someone who is not there."

And some of them are pretty in a tremendous way:

"We are but skin about a wind, with muscles clenched against mortality."

"And what of the sleep of animals? The great sleep of the elephant, and the fine thin sleep of the bird?"

"I began to wait for all the little beasts in their mothers who would have to step down and begin going decent in the one fur that would last them their time."

"Man was born damned and innocent from the start, and wretchedly—as he must—on those two themes—whistles his tune."

"I went toward the Ile because I could see the lights in the show-windows of Our Lady and all the children in the dark with the tapers twinkling, saying their prayers softly with that small breath that comes off little lungs, whispering fatally about nothing, which is the way children say their prayers."

But the poetry of which Mr. Eliot must have been speaking will be found on a third level, as far removed from these as the poetry of our time is from mere wit, mere charm. On Miss Barnes's third level a special state of consciousness is constructed and a very special sort of thing is said. When Mr. Eliot writes of "Nightwood" that "only sensibilities trained on poetry can wholly appreciate it," he means, of course, modern poetry. Sensibilities trained on Horace and Pope, or even on Homer and Shakespeare, would make nothing of it at all. For those poets in their various ways accepted the world and trusted the commonplace; whereas this one stares away from her in a rigor of horror, probing distance with fixed eyes in the hope that it will yield a niche where the contemporary mind, trained on distrust and disgust, can lose itself in stretches of time beyond our time. The vessel of life may have something in it, but first it must be smashed.

Felix thought to himself that undoubtedly the doctor was a great liar, but a valuable liar. His fabrications seemed to be the framework of a forgotten but imposing plan; some condition of life of which he was the sole surviving retainer.

"The modern child has nothing left to hold to, or, to put it better, he has nothing to hold with. We are adhering to life now with our last muscle—the heart."

"The reason the doctor knows everything is because he's been everywhere at the wrong time and has now become anonymous."

"The French are disheveled and wise; the American tries to approximate it with drink. It is his only clue to himself. He takes it when his soap has washed him too clean for identification. The Anglo-Saxon has made the literal error; using water, he has washed away his page. Misery melts him down by day, and sleep at night."

"To be utterly innocent would be to be utterly unknown, particularly to oneself."

"In time everything is possible and in space everything forgivable; life is but the intermediary vice. There is eternity to blush in."

"One has, I am now certain, to be a little mad to see into the past or the future, to be a little abridged of life to know life, the obscure life."

"In the acceptance of depravity the sense of the past is most fully captured."

"It is only by such extreme measures that the average man can remember something long ago; truly, not that he remembers, but that crime itself is the door to ■ accumulation, ■ way to lay hands on the shudder of a past that is still vibrating."

"After all, calamity is what we are all seeking."

The book is like that everywhere, which is to say that for brilliance and formal beauty few novels of any age can compare with it. But one must also say how desperate it is. Mr. Eliot condemns in advance any reader who feels superior to the three chief persons of the narrative, all of whom belong to the third sex. That, however, is not the point. The point is that Miss Barnes has strained rather than enriched our sensibilities. "Nightwood" is more fascinating than interesting. The marvelous doctor who speaks so many of the lines just quoted has another aria about the women of the world who scurry out from doors at night with lamps in their hands. "Like a thousand mice they go this way and that, now fast, now slow, some halting behind doors, some trying to find the stairs, all approaching or leaving their misplaced mouse meat that lies in some cranny, on some couch, down on some floor, behind some cupboard." "Nightwood" is mouse meat at which we nibble page after page with a special kind of joy. But great fiction is more ordinary than this, and ultimately more nourishing. Beefsteak and apple pie.

MARK VAN DOREN

Healthy, Wealthy, and Wise?

THE EARNEST ATHEIST. A STUDY OF SAMUEL BUTLER. By Malcolm Muggeridge. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.75.

SINCE the publication in 1919 of Festing Jones's copious memoir of Samuel Butler the disparity between Butler's life and his writings has caused much speculation—a disparity now made sharper by the recent instalments of the Notebooks. Shuttling through the varied domains of the human spirit, seizing, examining, discarding one established value after another, Butler reverts to health, practical wisdom, and wealth as the basis of the good, or at least the only, life. But tormented in mind and carbuncled in body, Butler himself was a little less than wise, and especially so in the pursuit of wealth. Despite Butler's scorn for him, it was his father who gave him a generous start and who supported him after he had gathered and dissipated his small fortune. It was his father's death and money that Butler sought, and from this fact, it appears, stemmed much of Butler's rebellion. Hating the parental image for the power it early and late held over him, Butler transferred this hatred to all authority: family, education, church, even to his evanescent salvation by Darwinian science, even the tyrannical reign of the intellect itself. This endless voyage to escape the bounds of authority—with its strange ultima Thule, the bank account—dominates and warps Butler's life. Infantile, he fled from the possibility of love; as the highest manifestation of his affection he supported well-groomed but perhaps questionable young men; toward the one valuable and sincere feminine friendship that was offered him he displayed only embarrassment, annoyance, a belated and not altogether convincing remorse. His life formed of conflict and compromise, of a series of apparent failures in art, science, literature, he took refuge in the ordered precision of an old maid's existence, in a feeling of persecution, in a fervent belief in his posthumous fame—a fame for which he recorded, sometimes with a singular lack

Just published

THE LETTERS OF LENIN

Translated and edited by

ELIZABETH HILL AND DORIS MUDIE

These letters are incorporated into a single volume in the English language for the first time. The greater part of the correspondence has never before appeared in English, and the whole has been taken direct from the collected Russian Edition.

Lenin's letters are fully as valuable and interesting as any of his formal writings. The importance, therefore, of this very thorough selection cannot be over-emphasized.

Both personal and political correspondence is included. There are letters to his mother, wife, sisters, brother and others; from prison, from Siberia, and from exile abroad. They reveal Lenin in a peculiarly intimate way, his simplicity and modesty, his love of nature, his wide sympathy. The political letters cover the whole period from 1895 to his death and cast valuable light on the politics and history of those significant days.

HAROLD J. LASKI in THE NEW STATESMAN AND NATION (London):

"This excellent translated volume contains 340 letters. Taken together they are not only an invaluable picture of the man himself; they are also an indispensable guide to the study of his method . . . the incredible depth of devotion to an idea revealed by these pages is almost literally beyond words. . . . Even the most passionate of his opponents could not arise from these letters without ■ new respect for the man. If there exists anywhere ■ better example of personal nobility in the history of modern politics, I do not know it."

499 pages, $4.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY
383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

White Heat Means a Cooler Kitchen

WORKING with searing heat at 5400 degrees Fahrenheit, G-E scientists have evolved more durable, more efficient heating units. These CALROD units, used in General Electric and in Hotpoint electric ranges, provide quick, clean, even heat—localized just where it is needed. This means a cooler kitchen. In thousands of plants, CALROD units are being used for industrial heating because they provide heat at a remarkable saving in cost.

But the CALROD unit is only one achievement of the ceramics experts in the G-E Research Laboratory. New and unusual kinds of glass serve as vital parts in sodium lamps that light miles of American highways—light them for greater safety for drivers and pedestrians. Large insulators support the wires that bring electric power from the generators to your home; tiny insulating blocks help to maintain the high quality of reception in your radio tubes. To these, too, General Electric scientists, in Schenectady, have brought important improvements.

These examples are but a few of the contributions of research which has stimulated industry, increased employment, made available more things for more people at less cost.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

of perspective, almost every detail of a life that was often singularly lacking in grace.

Toward this man—who was, however, a great precursor, whose intuitions and asides have been confirmed in so many ways, whose scientific findings have steadily grown in significance, whose Nowhere has almost become Everywhere, who was the author of one of the wisest and wittiest books of our time, who was in some respects the most important figure of Victorian England, whose belief, in short, in his own posthumous fame was quite warranted—Mr. Muggeridge's new study adopts a certain eccentricity of approach. All that is wrong in the modern world, Mr. Muggeridge has decided, with the exception of unspeakable Moscow, is derived from Butler. This author knows the values according to which Butler lived, and they have come to fill him "with unutterable horror." From a biographer burdened with such a thesis and displaying such ostentatious feeling one does not expect, and one does not get, an accurate portrait. For a Butlerian study one still prefers Clara Gruening Stillman's detailed and excellent biography, or even, for example, Hugh Kingsmill's essay.

To this statement, however, a note should be added. In respect to Butler's accomplishments Mr. Muggeridge exaggerates, stresses, and omits according to his emotion. Yet in respect to Butler himself the author's hate is rather more preached, I think, than practiced. On the fundamental problems of Butler's personality Mr. Muggeridge's understanding tends to get the better of him. His analyses of Butler's motivation and his descriptions of Butler's background show a penetration, an artistic power, and an ironic sense that are worthy of a better book. For all Mr. Muggeridge's studied air of antipathy no previous biographer has brought out more forcefully the pathos of Butler's disoriented life. If Mr. Muggeridge would just stop trying to be so different, he would be.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

American Jews in Chicago

THE OLD BUNCH. By Meyer Levin. The Viking Press. $3.

MEYER LEVIN'S new novel must be placed among the most ambitious efforts of contemporary fiction. Close to a thousand pages in length, intimately told and with the interest spread out almost evenly over all the characters, it attempts a vast summation and judgment of recent American history. The lives of this group of Jewish boys and girls of Chicago's West Side who grow up and assume adult responsibilities in the years between 1921 and 1934 touch on every event and experience of importance during that period. Their story and the story of their native city are well documented: business, politics, the arts, law, medicine, real estate, gang wars, strikes, Zionism, communism—these are the data and forms of their various ambitions, struggles, and failures. The immigrant parents of the "bunch" live and toil with the sole object of insuring a better deal for their American children, but none the less the ax falls. No amount of care and education can prevent these young people from being victimized by a civilization that permits little happiness or satisfaction save at the cost of a betrayal of human values. The girls fight to corral husbands and shoehorn them into a gross, vulgar life; and the problem of a livelihood faces the men like a hail of bullets. Cunning and conformity are not really a guaranty of success, for in the clash of blind forces even the most ruthless are often lost. One or two make their way to the top of the heap; the rest are beaten and bewildered; only a few revolt. The whole world of Chicago, of America, "seems sick and done for."

Intrinsically this is the classic American story of defeat and frustration so often presented in American literature by novelists like Dreiser, Farrell, and Dos Passos. Mr. Levin's particular distinction lies in having discerned and recreated this story within the Jewish American milieu, of which scarcely a detail of background or development escapes him. And, ironically enough, it is through showing the failure that they share with their American hosts that Mr. Levin naturalizes his Jews within their new homeland.

Though written with complete sincerity and in a language whose color and associations keep pace with the movement of events, the novel's comprehensiveness and fidelity of social observation do not wholly make up for its lack of tension. The narrative proceeds along a somewhat monotonous level, with no particular figures singled out for emphasis. Perhaps the fault here is that the author's conception of his characters is so much identical with his conception of the situations in which he places them that the contradiction between the two seldom emerges as a dramatic moment. For it is this very contradiction that makes for dramatic conflict.

PHILIP RAHV

Health Insurance

SICKNESS AND INSURANCE. A STUDY OF THE SICKNESS PROBLEM AND HEALTH INSURANCE.

By Henry Alvin Millis. University of Chicago Press. $2.

IN CONCLUDING his consistently lucid, frequently penetrating, and admirably concise summary of the problem of organizing and paying for medical care, Mr. Millis has a suggestion of his own to make: that compulsory health insurance be limited to the major disabling illnesses requiring hospitalization, but that it be supplemented by extensions of the public health services, plus cash disability benefits administered through the Social Security Act. This, as Mr. Millis points out, is "the British plan turned upside down"—the emphasis of the British panel system being on general-practitioner care.

Mr. Millis's idea would also appear to be more or less Surgeon General Parran's idea. His proposal is worth thinking about, especially the tactical arguments by which he justifies it. Like most of the progressives working in this field, Mr. Millis would like desperately to get something done, and in effect he raises the question: just how good a program will the medical politicians, the quacks, the insurance companies, and the drug interests let us get away with? Not too good, probably. Let's be "practical" then. The "standard" bill flopped in 1920 partly because the industrial-insurance companies didn't like its provision for burial benefits—so that's out. But the American Medical Association has let us get our feet in the door by grudgingly approving voluntary, group hospitalization insurance. So let's expand that gain, being careful not to stir up Dr. Fishbein, who is respectfully quoted to the effect that "without the cooperation of the medical profession no system of practice can succeed."

Personally I don't see it. Both in print and from the platform I have treated Dr. Fishbein and his followers with an entirely appropriate disrespect, and I am convinced that this attitude is shared by the vast majority of informed and progressive American physicians. I am even convinced that this is the more practical method for progressives to adopt. We

THE OPEN ROAD in SOVIET RUSSIA

Trips which show you more than tourist sights at least cost of time and money. Open to students, teachers, members of professions.

MAY DAY AND THE RUSSIAN THEATRE

Leader: Norris Houghton, author of "Moscow Rehearsals." Sailing April 14. Six weeks. $387.

GENERAL SURVEY TOUR

Leader: Walt Carmon, editor "International Literature," Moscow, 1932-1936. Sailing June 26. Nine weeks. $394.

A TRAVEL "COLLECTIVE"

Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. $543.

JULIEN BRYAN'S SIXTH ANNUAL TRIP

Through the highways and byways of the Soviet Union. Sailing June 19. Nine weeks. $694.

A PUBLIC HEALTH SURVEY

Leader: John A. Kingsbury, co-author of "Red Medicine." Sailing July 10. Nine weeks. $797.

OPEN ROAD TRAVEL SEMINAR

(Fourth Season.) Leader: Anna Louise Strong, editor "Moscow Daily News." Sailing July 4. Nine weeks. $895.

AMERICAN STUDENT UNION TOUR TO EUROPE AND RUSSIA

(Second Season.) Leader: Joseph Lash. Membership restricted to students. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. $499.

A dozen other unusual trips

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

132 OUTSPOKEN STATEMENTS pro and con ON THE SUPREME COURT ISSUE

With a Complete Digest of the Whole Question

No sides are taken by the editors of this timely, encyclopedic digest of all important phases of the seething Supreme Court issue. Balanced as closely as possible between the ayes, nays and alternatives—this book presents 132 frank, decisive statements by national authorities—a refreshing, informing cross-section of to-day's leading opinion. Contains many supplementary digests, tables and charts, to provide the solid facts on which to base a reasoned conclusion.

PARTIAL LIST of noted contributors

• Harry Elmer Barnes •
Sen. W. E. Borah • Gov.
G. H. Earle • Hamilton
Fish • William Green •
Sen. R. M. LaFollette •
Rep. William Lemke •
Walter Lippmann • Sen.
W. G. McAdoo • Raymond
Moley • Scott
Nearing • Daniel C.
Roper • Sen. A. H. Vandenberg • Sen. B. K.
Wheeler •

A Glimpse at the Contents

Origin and development of the Constitution •
"The Constitutional Crisis," by Walter Lippmann • Biographical Sketches of the Supreme Court Justices • A Review of "The Nine Old Men," by Thomas Reed Powell • Leading Editorials and Cartoons • Complete Text of the Judiciary Reorganization Bill • President Roosevelt's Message to Congress • Digest of Federal Legislation Invalidated by the Supreme Court • Attorney General Cummings' Letter to the President • and various other digests, summaries, charts and tables.

THE SUPREME COURT ISSUE AND THE CONSTITUTION

Edited by William R. Barnes and A. W. Littlefield
Handsomely bound in cloth and gold-stamped. Printed on fine stock. $1
At bookstores—or order direct:—

BARNES & NOBLE, Inc., (Since 1874)
105 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.

I enclose $..... for which send copies of THE SUPREME COURT ISSUE AND THE CONSTITUTION, postage free.

Name

Address

"Of vital importance to every person who turns the dial"

—MORRIS L. ERNST

Author of "The Ultimate Power"

NOT TO BE BROADCAST

THE TRUTH ABOUT THE RADIO

BY RUTH BRINDZE

Author of "How to Spend Money"

Some of the Questions Asked—and Answered—in This Book:

- Who controls the radio—the government, the broadcasting companies, or the advertisers?
- Is there government interference in broadcasting?
- Why are most radio programs so stupid?
- How big is the bill for radio advertising?
- Is the radio being employed for fascist propaganda?
- What bankers direct the networks?
- Are the big "chains" a menace?
- Does the independent radio station get equal treatment from the government?
- Should the radio be a government monopoly (as in Great Britain)?
- What is the future of radio?

This book contains important facts that every well-informed man and woman should know. $2.50—All bookstores

VANGUARD PRESS • 424 Madison Ave. • New York

FEED SPAIN'S CHILDREN

When Children Ask
for Bread There Is Only One Answer—

BREAD!

A bowl of bread and milk each day will dull the edge of a child's hunger. It will quiet a mother's anxiety. It will keep small bones firm through terror and civil war.
We must feed Spain's children.

Help Fill The Nation's Food Ship

I enclose $.....

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

can be sure that any program, no matter how mild, will be sniped at and whittled by the vested interests affected. Hence why not start with a sound, comprehensive program and make the medical politicians, the insurance companies, the drug interests take the onus for any whittling.

British medical politicians didn't want health insurance either, but British labor made them take it, and now British doctors like it. They'd probably have liked it better in the end if the British legislators from the beginning had paid less attention to the largely disingenuous shibboleths of the British medical politicians about "freedom of medical choice" and the like and more to the logical necessity of group practice.

Michael M. Davis writes a preface to Mr. Millis's book emphasizing a point which is not emphasized in the text: that medical benefits are today more important than cash disability benefits. The point is at least debatable. Certainly every wage worker knows that whether he gets sick or is fired, his pay stops. Hence organized labor will quite properly demand as a condition of its support that adequate cash disability benefits, however administered, be an integral part of the program.

Is it not better, tactically, to accent the very real distinctions, the widening cleavage, between the medical politicians and the increasingly progressive rank and file of the profession than to endanger the labor support without which nothing of any value can possibly be accomplished? More concretely, should not Mr. Millis pay at least as much attention to the C. I. O. as to the A. M. A.? Does not the extraordinary messiness of the French system, as described by Mr. Millis, illustrate the folly of throwing sops to medical bureaucrats?

In pointing out the dangers of Mr. Millis's tactical position, I do not mean to discount the value of his book; it is one of the most intelligent brief statements of the problem that have appeared and should be purchased by all lay and professional students of the subject.

JAMES RORTY

Master Mariner

LIVING AGAIN. By Captain Felix Riesenber. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $3.

FELIX RIESENBERG, C. E., master mariner in sail and steam, lieutenant commander, U.S.N.R. (retired), author of many land and sea novels, of marine textbooks known the world over, has just written a book about his life called "Living Again." The outstanding part—the high adventure he never has told before in detail in any of his other works—is the account of his two years on Dane's Island in Spitzbergen as navigator for Walter Wellman, who attempted in 1907 to fly over the North Pole in a dirigible balloon.

All through the summer of 1906 the preparatory work went on—the construction of the hangar, the erection of gas apparatus, the testing of equipment—and suddenly "summer had gone and the balloon was not even out of the case. The gloom of an impending interminable night was soon to settle over Spitzbergen." The flight must be postponed until the following year, but someone must stay and look after the work done. Riesenber volunteered. Two Norwegian sailors were chosen to stay with him; and the little bark Frithjof sailed away leaving them to the long silence, the cold, the polar twilight which was soon to fade into the blackness of the Arctic night.

It was a period of hardship, of narrow escapes from death, of fighting the vast cold solitude which "may warp, freeze, and solidify the spirit, or may set it free." But there were compensations—"the full-moon floods, falling on a white world," the glory of the Aurora Borealis, and the peace—most of all the perfect peace.

Finally the light returned, and one morning, late in the spring, the Frithjof was sighted around the headland. Another summer of work, and in September of that year Wellman at last was ready. Riesenbergs went along as navigator and Melvin Vaniman as engineer. Their six-cylinder engine could make only fifteen miles an hour, and as they began to buck the forty-five-mile head wind from the Pole, the little craft gave up the ghost. They came down on Foul Glacier, not more than a hundred yards from a giant crevasse which could have swallowed a hundred balloons the size of theirs. They had been in the air four and a half hours. Captain Riesenbergs's habit of not dramatizing his adventures gives them an air of authenticity, just as his lack of emphasis on humorous episodes makes them doubly effective.

"Living Again" covers fifty-seven years crowded with experience. It ranges from Minneapolis to Hongkong, from Marconi to Joan Lowell. There is a terseness in its style which suggests a ship's log, and a philosophy which comes only to one who has thought long thoughts in many night watches, to one who is essentially a man of the sea.

HUGO VAN ARX

Ireland and the "Trouble"

ARMY WITHOUT BANNERS. By Ernie O'Malley. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

ON EASTER Monday, 1916, Ernie O'Malley, a medical student at Trinity College, Dublin, saw a tricolored flag floating over the General Post Office in O'Connell Street. A few weeks later he shared the use of a German Mauser with a friend, both boys taking turns at firing the heavy rifle at the military police. He had become an Irish volunteer through the same impulse that had aroused hundreds of other Dubliners to action: "to secure and maintain the rights and liberties common to the people of Ireland." The execution of the leaders of the Irish Republic—Connolly, Pearse, MacDonagh, Plunkett—had dramatized the British threat of armed intervention, and almost overnight the citizens of Dublin found themselves at war with the British Empire. The events that Ernie O'Malley describes are not unfamiliar to readers of Shaw Desmond's "Drama of Sinn Fein," and the fog, rain, and machine-gun fire through which O'Malley rode his bicycle are easily visualized by those who have seen "The Plough and the Stars" or the movie version of "The Informer." Yet the history of what is now politely called the "trouble" in Ireland remains unclear. British censorship has done its work too well, and Irish love of melodrama shares the honor of obscuring the facts of those five years in which O'Malley grew to young manhood and earned a captaincy in the Irish Republican Army.

Meanwhile O'Malley's book should not be confused with the kind of entertainment offered by middle-aged army officers who enjoy the memory of an active youth each incident of which reflects the glory of its hero. Nor should this book be substituted for a history of the Sinn Fein movement, which was to translate its hopes and theories into memorable action. O'Malley is careful to say that he is not responsible for exact dates and generalized conclusions; in this book at least he has

SEX

TECHNIQUE

in MARRIAGE

By
ISABEL EMSLIE HUTTON, M.B., Ch.B., M.D.
Physician to the British Hospital for Functional Mental and Nervous Diseases, London
Foreword by IRA S. WILE, M.D.
Former Commissioner of Education,
N. Y. C.

ILLUSTRATED

EXPLANATORY
DIAGRAMS

SUBJECTS INCLUDED

PRE-MARITAL PREPARATION

Necessary Knowledge—Sex Freedom Before Marriage for Man; For the Woman—Sex Instinct in Men and Women Contrasted—Implications of Courtship—Hereditary Factors—The Age Factor—Indications of Sexual Incompatibility—The Neurotic Temperament in Marriage.

FIRST SEX ACT

Analysis of Sexual Intercourse—Preliminary Love-Play—Overcoming Mental Obstacles—Pain—Early Intercourse—The Fatigue Factor—The Husband's Part—The Wife's Part—Methods of Sexual Stimulation—The Active and the Passive Wife—Nervous Shock of First Intercourse—Temporary Impotence—Simultaneous Climax—How Produced.

THE SEX ORGANS

Knowledge of Male and Female Organs Essential to Both Husband and Wife—"Fitting"—Anatomy of Organs—Hygiene of Sex Organs—How Fertilization Takes Place—Woman's Hygiene.

SEX LIFE

IN MARRIAGE

The Arts of Love—Timing—Impotence During Marriage—Sexual Cooperation—Influence of Age, Sexual Instinct and Health—Sexual Adjustment—Sex Errors—Sexual Rhythm—Frequency of Intercourse—Positions in Intercourse; when Variations Indicated—Sexual Starvation—The Unsatisfied Wife—Prelude to Sex; Love Play—Sex Life During Pregnancy; after Childbirth.

MENSTRUATION AND THE CHANGE OF LIFE

The Hygiene of Menstruation—Activity during and after the Change of Life—The Menstrual Cycle and Conception—Normal and Abnormal Symptoms.

CURABLE CHILDLESSNESS

Simple Causes and Their Treatment—Conditions where Medical Treatment is Required—Conditions where Surgical Treatment is Indicated.

BIRTH CONTROL

IT comes as a startling fact to many couples who THINK they are well-informed, that they ARE in REALITY, AMAZINGLY IGNORANT OF THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE. "When no trouble is taken to learn how to make sexual intercourse harmonious and happy, a variety of complications arise. Very often wives remain sexually unawakened, and therefore inclined to dislike sexual intercourse. When that happens, husbands do not experience what they long for, and are apt to be sexually starved. Neither husbands nor wives on these terms attain harmony, and the result is nervous ill-health. . . . The cause of all this is not want of love. It is want of knowledge."—A. H. Gray, M.A., D. D.

FROM a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly. Many men feel bitter, in a resigned sort of way, about their "frigid wives." As a matter of fact this problem, which too often is one of "the bungling husband," frequently vanishes completely when both husband and wife know exactly what to do for each other. In THE SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE, Dr. Hutton describes the sexual act in such detail that no need any longer remain in ignorance of exactly how it should be performed. In the foreword to this work Dr. Ira S. Wile declares: "A knowledge of the science of mating offers greater assurance of successful marriage."

WHILE completely frank, Dr. Hutton handles the subject with excellent taste, and, the American Medical Association says, "with good judgment as to what constitutes general medical opinion."

The Sex Technique in Marriage is a book for husbands and wives to read together, if they wish to remain together!

FIVE DIAGRAMS

The Male Sex Organs (Two Views)
The Female Sex Organs (Two Views)
Male and Female Reproductive Cells

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 914-N
251 West 19th St., New York, N. Y.
Send me in plain wrapper SEX TECHNIQUE IN MARRIAGE for FREE EXAMINATION. I will deposit $2.00 plus few cents postage on delivery. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned, within 5 days.

Name
Address
☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $2.00, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

SEND NO MONEY

HOW TO STOP WAR-TIME PROFITEERING

By THOMAS HALL SHASTID, M.D., LL.B., etc.

★

Second edition, enlarged by a cross-examination and three full appendices. Compact, up-to-date. Considers commonsensibly various proposed plans for peace.

Hand-bound in Interlaken cloth and well printed with 12-point Garamont type on dull-finished S. J. Grave Wove paper. 134 pages. Suitable for gift purposes. Price, postpaid, $2.00. Copies on Alexandra Japan paper, postpaid, $3.00.

GEORGE WAHR

Bookseller, Publisher and Importer, Ann Arbor, Michigan
All books of all publishers at favorable prices. Libraries bought and sold.

I Stake My Life

BY LEON TROTSKY

6500 people waited in the Hippodrome for this answer to his accusers at the Moscow Trials.

5c per copy. Add 2c for postage.

Three other vital books by Trotsky:

The Third International After Lenin—$3

Lessons of October—75c

Whither France—$1

PIONEER PUBLISHERS, 100 5th Ave., N. Y. C.

MAY DAY TOUR to the U.S.S.R. Conducted by D. RESNICK

The May Day demonstrations in Soviet Russia represent one of the most significant experiences of a lifetime.

5 Weeks of travel for $357

Visiting Leningrad, Moscow, Kharkov, Dnieproges, Sevastopol, Yalta, Odessa, Kiev, Warsaw.

Sailing April 14th on S. S. Berengaria
Returning May 19th on S. S. Queen Mary

Other instructive and comprehensive tours of Europe and the U. S. S. R. conducted by known leaders. Write for booklets: "Soviet Russia Today," "May Day," "Western Europe," "History in the Making."

WORLD TOURISTS INC.

175 Fifth Ave.,
New York, N. Y.
AL 4-6856, 7, 8

MOVING? If you are a Nation subscriber and expect to move soon, please give us three weeks' notice and your old as well as new address. Write to The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, N. Y. C.

no intention of competing with the historians. The merits of O'Malley's "Army Without Banners" are peculiar to the kind of personal history that disowns individual heroism in favor of a common cause and common experience. He writes in his introduction: "We who fought effected a small part of the energy induced, and our individual efforts as personalities were subordinated to the impersonality of the movement and not impaired by it." And like the good writer that O'Malley reveals himself to be, he proves his case by making his story far more intelligent and graphic than any recent effort to record unique adventure through a period of civil warfare. The reader sees him as one of many drilling with broomsticks at night in a drafty hall and later as a young man in an ill-fitting trench coat organizing scattered units of the I. R. A. throughout Tipperary, Clare, Cork, Limerick, and Kilkenny. Even his memories of riding a lampless bicycle down lonely roads at evening are made to seem the experience of all who shared his duties and responsibilities.

When at last he was captured and imprisoned in Kilmainham gaol, he convinced those who questioned him that his name was Stewart and that as far as he knew there were no officers in the Irish Republican Army. His identification with the cause for which he fought was so complete that he welcomed anonymity and furthered it to protect himself against betrayal. In writing "Army Without Banners" it is significant that he has used the anonymous songs of the period to illustrate his memoirs as though he were again supplying evidence that his identity was wholly one with the will of his people.

This kind of self-effacement often implies self-discipline and is of the same order that sustains the morale of any group against superior numbers and overwhelming military advantage. It was evident in our own Revolutionary War as it was during the "trouble" that defeated the Black-and-Tans, and even today the Loyalist forces in Spain exhibit the same strength against fascist invasion. But what happened in Ireland after 1921 is another matter, and it is perhaps a consciousness of this difference that prompted Ernie O'Malley to close his narrative with the signing of a treaty announcing the birth of the Irish Free State.

HORACE GREGORY

New Novels

YOUNG ROBERT. By George Albee. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

YOUNG Robert is the grandson of an Irish immigrant who pioneered his way through the West, ending up in California, and living the bountiful, reckless pioneer life. Robert's father and his uncles and aunts were still pioneers, strong, eloquent, gigantic in stature and aptitude, named for Irish heroes and queens and wearing these names fitly: Conor, Dana, Sheen, Dermott, Angus, Fand, Flann, Gilveen. But the pioneer generation wears itself out in time; and the mind comes in to confuse and weaken heroes. Robert, who was growing up in San Francisco about the time of the earthquake and fire, was not a simple strong man like his Uncle Dermott or a simple orator like his Uncle Dana, or even a simple revolutionary like his labor-leader father. Robert got himself mixed up with education and the mechanical complications of the twentieth century. And the result was fatal. Very likely Mr. Albee knew he was symbolizing all the weakness of our own time and all the strength of the time of our fathers in his story of the Limewright family. But whether he knew it or not, he has written an admirable novel, lively, thoughtful, lavish with epithet and metaphor, rich with incident, and implicit with wisdom.

THE GODS ARRIVE. By Grant Lewi. J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.50.

History makes itself and time makes subjects for fiction. We are now at the stage in time when the wild, gin-drinking twenties are sufficiently a part of the past to be isolated and put into novels. Mr. Lewi deftly details the brassy young girls in short skirts, the irresponsible young men who wanted to be artists, the easy money, the forgotten traditions, the calm acceptance of dirt, and the impatience with order. But when his hero, one of the would-be artists, has returned to his wife and begins to pull himself up by his bootstraps, Mr. Lewi turns moralist and didactically lays down a solution for a mad world—of all things, back to the land! In other words, he has written what promised to be a clever novel of manners and turned into a tract, not very clearly thought out.

ALL GOOD AMERICANS. By Jerome Bahr. With an Introduction by Ernest Hemingway. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

Fourteen short stories about a Middle Western small town, peopled with Polish or German Americans. Mr. Hemingway aptly says that the country and the people are reminiscent of Pieter Breughel. Mr. Bahr describes them in a one-syllable style that is occasionally reminiscent of Mr. Hemingway. But the stories have vitality, color, and humor; they are freshly and directly told; and a note of irony now and then makes them more than merely readable.

SMIRE. By Branch Cabell. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

It is difficult for one who is not among Mr. Cabell's warmer admirers to be properly appreciative of "Smire," which is the third in the trilogy which began with "Smith" and "Smirt." Perhaps it will be sufficient to say that Mr. Cabell's manner has not changed an iota and neither, really, has his matter. If you like it, you like it.

CAROLINE SMITH

RECORDS

SOME of the Decca records now offered at 50 and 75 cents are decidedly worth getting. They are repressings from European masters, and as such they fall into two groups. On the one hand there are English Decca recordings, which were made recently and have the clarity and fidelity that this fact implies. Outstanding among these is the set of Purcell's "Dido and Aeneas" (seven records, 75 cents each), which was originally issued by subscription. The music is beautiful; it is well performed by people most of whose names will be unfamiliar to you: Nancy Evans, Mary Hamlin, Roy Henderson, among other singers, Charles Kennedy Scott's A Cappella Singers, the Boyd Neel String Orchestra, Bernhard Ord at the harpsichord, all under the direction of Clarence Raybould; and it is well recorded, except that one cannot distinguish the words. This makes it important to have the text, which did not accompany my records.

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play
THE MASQUE OF KINGS
with
HENRY HULL MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK
SHUBERT THEATRE, 44th Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thurs. Sat., 2:40. Evens. 8:40. 300 seats $1.10

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
STORM OVER PATSY
by Bruno Frank, adapted by James Bridle
with SARA ALLGOOD ROGER LIVESEY
CLAUDIA MORGAN IAN McLEAN
LEO G. CARROLL
GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway
Mats. Thursday & Saturday, 2:40. Evens. 8:40.

ANTI-WAR DINNER
commemorating the 20th anniversary of America's entry into the World War
Auspices
AMERICAN LEAGUE AGAINST WAR AND FASCISM
Speakers
SENATOR GERALD P. NYE
DR. HARRY F. WARD
TUESDAY—APRIL 6TH—7 P. M.
HOTEL RIVERSIDE PLAZA
253 West 73rd Street, N. Y. C.
Subscription $1.50 Informal
Reservations: American League Against War and Fascism
45 E. 17th St., ALgonquin 4-9290; 268 Fourth Ave., ALgonquin 4-9784

MUSICRAFT presents
hitherto unrecorded works of the masters
BUXTEHUDE
Easter Cantata "O Fröhliche Stunden"
Ethel Luening, soprano; J. Reilich and R. Hersch, violins;
S. Hunkins, cello; E. V. Wolff, harpsichord.
HÄNDEL
Secular Cantata "Nell Dolce Dell' Oblio"
Ethel Luening, soprano; Otto Luening, flute; Sterling Hunkins, cello; E. V. Wolff, harpsichord.
W. F. BACH
Piano Sonata in C major . . . Ernst Victor Wolff
C. P. E. BACH
Piano Sonata in G major . . . Ernst Victor Wolff
J. C. F. BACH
String Quartet in E flat major . . . Perole Quartet
Twelve-inch records—$1.50 each
MUSICRAFT RECORDS, Inc.
10 West 47th Street New York City

WORKERS SCHOOL
Spring Term Registration
COURSES IN:
Marxism-Leninism Labor History
Economics Current Events
Dialectical Materialism China and the Far East in World
Science and Dialectics Psychology
Literature Labor Journalism
American History Russian
And many other courses
For Descriptive Catalogue D write to the School Office, 35 E. 12th St., N. Y. C.

VACATION TOURS TO EUROPE and Soviet RUSSIA
Conducted or Independent
Including COPENHAGEN, STOCKHOLM, HELSINGFORS or PALESTINE, EGYPT and on return trip visit WARSAW, VIENNA, DALMATIA, VENICE,
BERN and PARIS.
Special Arrangements for Teachers
Consult us about your travel plans
—Our service is FREE—
Ask for literature.
AMALGAMATED BANK
11 Union Sq., N.Y. ALgonquin 4-1500

R MEDICAL TOUR
For Physicians and Dentists
July 3, 1937
Conducted by
DR. EDWARD COHEN
and DR. D. M. ROLLET

I cannot conceive a forward-looking mind in our country being far away from The Nation at any time," says Senator Gerald P. Nye —nor can thousands of other thoughtful Americans who form the largest readership The Nation has ever had!

They find—as you do—that The Nation accepts the challenge of the intelligent minority to disclose the facts behind the news and to interpret them authoritatively from the progressive point of view.

Our correspondents, feature writers, and editors help you understand the headlines of today and prepare you for those of tomorrow. Through the cold, hard eye of the militant progressive, we scrutinize every public issue to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. Readers who sometimes disagree with our views admit, nevertheless, that we perform a service of extraordinary value in clarifying issues, attacking shams, upholding progressive principles, and in assisting them to form sound opinions of their own.

Take as one example the coming articles by McAllister Coleman which sketch the political career of New Jersey's reactionary Governor Hoffman. In these articles Mr. Coleman shows very clearly the governor's contempt for small consumers, the unemployed, and the organized labor movement and calls attention to the forces which are now combining against him and his corporate supporters.

Critical months loom ahead. Understand them. If your subscription expires soon or if you are not yet a subscriber, mail the order form below at once!

ORDER FORM

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1.00; Canadian, 50c

4-3-37

On the other hand there are the Odéon and Parlophone recordings, which are old, but some of which are worth having nevertheless. I would say this of a number of records of excerpts from Mozart's operas that I have listened to. It is the orchestra that suffers in the recording of eight or nine years ago (but it suffers initially from the ubiquitous Dr. Weissman's conducting); the voice is reproduced excellently; and these Mozart records offer some superb voices. Thus, in Leporello's Catalogue Aria from "Don Giovanni," Papageno's two arias from "The Magic Flute," and "Se vuol ballare" and "Non più andrai" from "The Marriage of Figaro," the singing of Gerhard Hüsch is heard in all its beauty of timbre, its perfection of phrasing, its spirit and dramatic point. Nor does Hüsch provide the only examples. I recommend from "Don Giovanni" the recitative "Don Ottavio, son morta" and the aria "Or, sai chi l'onore," sung by Margarete Bäumer; and "Dalla sua pace" and "Il mio tesoro," sung by Max Hirzel. And from "The Marriage of Figaro" Cherubino's arias "Non so più cosa son" and "Voi che sapete," sung by Luise Helletsgruber with a fresher voice than she reveals in the recent Mozart Society set; and "Porgi amor," in which Elisabeth Rethberg's voice, too, is lovelier than it is today. All these, I must add, are sung in German; and I must also add that they are, like Columbia records, afflicted with the residue that must be removed from the grooves by repeated playing.

There is a record of the Quintet from "Die Meistersinger" which is worth having for the beautiful voice of Emmy Bettendorf (on the reverse side she is heard in the conclusion of the bridal-chamber scene of "Lohengrin," in which you may hear the bloom that Melchior's voice has lost with the years). And she sings the exquisite passage "Geliebter, spare den Zorn," which is on the first of four sides that give most of the scene of Sachs's cobbling song and Beckmesser's Serenade in Act II of "Die Meistersinger." The other singers include Michael Bohnen and Leo (not Gustav) Schützendorf. Unfortunately the recording gets quite bad in Beckmesser's Serenade; but there are no other records of this wonderful scene.

In an emergency I listened to the following single Victor records on a machine of a few years back (Victor E-135), using a cactus needle. This machine failed to reproduce the bass that I am sure is present in what sounds like a superb recording of the usual three excerpts from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust." The music was written for just the marvelously colored and sensitized playing which the Boston Symphony does under Koussevitzky (two records, $4). On another single ($2) is exquisite singing by Elisabeth Schumann of Strauss's "Traum durch die Dämmerung" and "Ich schweibe" and Schumann's "Mondnacht." On still another ($2) is a beautiful performance by Wilhelm Bachaus, excellently recorded, of Brahms's Variations on an Original Theme. And on another ($1.50) are two songs of Sibelius sung by Eva Leoni: "The Dragon Fly," Opus 17, No. 5, and "Aus banger Brust," Opus 50, No. 4. I care neither for the songs nor for the singing. Nor do I find anything of interest in two compositions, "Andalucia" and "Arabia," by the guitarist Oyangueren, which he plays on another single ($1). There are fine performances by Yehudi Menuhin of Paganini's Caprice in E, Opus 1, No. 9, and the one in G minor, Opus 1, No. 6, to which Enesco has fitted a piano accompaniment ($2). And finally, a record ($2) which you may neglect: the "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orfeo" and the "Ombra mai fù" from Händel's "Xerxes," sung by Enid Szantho.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editors

European Trials

Dear Sirs: The editorial Behind the Soviet Trials in The Nation of February 6 states that Soviet judicial procedure is patterned more on that of the Continental European countries than on the Anglo-American, and that in Continental Europe the evidence taken down during the preliminary inquiry is secret.

If by Continental European countries the writer means Fascist Italy or Nazi Germany, he may maintain that their judicial procedure is to a certain extent analogous to that of Soviet Russia. In Italy political opponents of the government are tried by a special tribunal consisting of officers of the Fascist militia, and the whole procedure depends on the discretion of the president of the tribunal. Sometimes the newspapers are commanded to publish documents and other evidence collected during the preliminary inquiry. Until the middle of 1935 they were as a rule allowed to give no more than the names of the defendants and the sentences inflicted upon them. Now even this information has been suppressed. In Germany Hitler can even "purge out" his political opponents without any trial at all—which is perhaps a fairer and more humane method of getting rid of them than the Soviet method, according to which they are brought on the stage to vilify themselves by abject "confessions." But if by Continental European countries are meant those which are still endowed with free government, and Italy and Germany before they were blessed with Mussolini and Hitler, then the statement in question is wholly out of place.

In France the evidence collected during the preliminary inquiry is so far from being secret that the counsel for the defense attends the whole procedure, and the papers can give information about it from day to day. In Italy before 1927 the records of the preliminary inquiry were put at the disposal not only of the counsel for the defense but also of the press. No document or other evidence collected during the preliminary inquiry was of any use during the public trial unless it was read out. The material gathered during the preliminary inquiry served to help the judges and barristers in cross-examining the defendant and witnesses, not to make the public inquiry unnecessary. "Confessions" were not regarded as sufficient evidence but had to be supported with independent proofs.

If judicial procedure in the free countries of Continental Europe as well as in the dictatorial countries were similar to that of Soviet Russia, this still would not mean that Soviet procedure is good. It would mean that not only the dictatorial but also the free countries of Europe should take lessons from Anglo-American procedure. As a matter of fact, in this field the free European countries have little to learn from the Anglo-Saxons, and Stalin must be content with the companionship of Hitler and Mussolini.

GAETANO SALVEMINI

Cambridge, Mass., March 16

Spirit of Spain

[The appended letter from Madrid has been sent to us by a subscriber.]

Dear —: Across the highway leading from France to La Junquera there is a poster: "Spain and Catalonia greet all friends of freedom and justice." You pass under it, and then you find yourself in a new world. Not a land of skyscrapers and chlorotic wage slaves of Manhattan beyond the Statue of Liberty, but a land in the throes of revolution and human joy, that goes to your head like wine. You fall in love with Spaniards at once. They are friendly, thoughtful, and infinitely kind, and yet retain their dignity. They are physically attractive. The militia, dressed in a motley array of rags, move silently and gracefully, like cats. If Barcelona and Catalonia are exciting, Madrid confronts you with a note of passionate intensity. Even in Valencia there is a certain amount of gaiety left. The cafes and cabarets are crowded; you see quite a number of well dressed men and women. Madrid is entirely different. There are crowds of people, but they are gray. Appearances are neglected. Few men bother to shave. They say that shaving is a disgrace, because it shows that you have time for yourself. The cafes are open, and the trams seem to run on schedule. But every thing closes at seven in the evening, and after that Madrid is dead, except for the boom of cannon and the occasional rattle of machine-guns. There is a determined atmosphere about Madrid, and practically everybody is confident that it cannot be taken by the enemy. On the other hand the majority of the population expect things to get worse in the future, particularly the food question. I am convinced that whatever hardships may face us here, the surrender of Madrid is unthinkable.

It is impossible of course to explain all that Spain is at the moment, and all it stands for, and it is difficult to pick out really relevant facts. I would like, however, to tell you about two things I have seen, because they impressed me most. All over Spain along the roadside one sees wrecked and abandoned cars, smashed in the first few weeks of the revolution by their enthusiastic but incompetent drivers. The revolution destroys. In Madrid I saw a place where they collect these wrecked cars, build bodies for them, lengthen the driving shafts, and make ambulances out of them. They started two months ago, workers themselves, and out of nothing they have created a unique and wonderful plant. They are turning out fifty ambulances each month now, and this is only the beginning. The workers who took us round the place were the proudest men on earth, and they made us proud too. Proud of taking part in their war, which is our war also, and of having them as our comrades. The factory is near the front, but through shelling and bombardment the work goes on.

And then there was the blood-transfusion service, organized by Dr. Bethune of the Canadian unit. They are getting blood from donors in Barcelona, typing and testing it, and then sending it to all Spanish fronts. It is a marvel of scientific and technical organization. Ten minutes after they are rung up, the patient at the front is getting a blood transfusion. I wouldn't have believed it possible had I not seen it with my own eyes.

It is true that the revolution destroys, but it creates in the same step. In the same way it makes and destroys its enemies, but what wonderful friends it makes! The feeling of equality and human dignity is all permeating and shines through the dirty and unshaven faces of its soldiers, through the mud of the unhappy countryside, through the shellholes in the houses. We who are marching in its wake say: Long live the revolution!

R. A.

Madrid, February 6

Sean O'Faolain

Dear Sirs: Some weeks ago you printed a letter from John O'Hara Harte in which he stated that at the time of his leaving Ireland Sean O'Faolain was under arrest there, and that possibly he was still in prison on January 6, the date of the letter. Having already heard a rumor to the same effect I wrote Mr. O'Faolain, who now replies in part as follows:

I was not arrested, however. A young Trinity College man chose, for some odd reason, to give my name, and you would be surprised at the number of people who have met me in the street and, unlike yourself, said with bitter disappointment, "I thought you were in jail!" I think those days are over for me. The only thing I am likely to be jailed for now is for writing an unpopular book or for protesting against the banning of some good one.

B. W. HUEBSCH

New York, March 11

Bright Idea

Dear Sirs: Writers have been our despair for years. Constituting a group which should be the first to accept modern ideas, they have in fact lagged far behind teamsters and longshoremen. At last, however, there are signs of the times among them. Pressed on, perhaps, by the sharp necessity of paying mounting grocery bills—according to the figures of the Authors' Guild the average income of a writer is $2,500 in good times, with zero the limit in bad—some sixteen hundred authors of all literary crafts and calibers have formed a standard trade union, the American Writers' Union, which already has locals in twenty-three cities.

The first tear bomb in their attack, designed to cause considerable weeping in the magazine offices, is an arrangement, known as the free-presentation plan, to submit manuscripts-in-multiple to publishers. For thirty years editors have enforced an unmentioned but none the less merciless boycott against the author who dared to submit his work to more than one of them at a time. Their reason for so doing is excellent: if a writer receives competitive bids for his product he is liable to get a fair price for it. It is quite illegal, since it flouts the federal statute dealing with restraint in trade, to set up such a boycott; hence it is done sub rosa. But writers throughout the country will be polled by the union by the thousand, and if their vote for the projected free-presentation plan is as overwhelming as it in all probability will be, editors will soon be receiving manuscripts labeled, "Submitted under the free-presentation plan of the American Writers' Union." And editors discriminating against the craftsman who sends in such a manuscript will find themselves in hot literary waters.

GEORGE ALBEE

New York, March 23

CONTRIBUTORS

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, who as editor of The Nation made one of his most persistent and courageous journalistic campaigns in behalf of the rights of the people of the West Indies, recently returned from a trip to the islands.

MAXWELL S. STEWART has just spent several days on the Nebraska front of the country-wide campaign for cheap power and the conservation of natural resources. There as elsewhere the Supreme Court and the vested interests are the villains in the piece.

ROBERT DELL, whose dispatches from Paris and Geneva have appeared for many years in the Manchester Guardian and The Nation, is one of the most distinguished of foreign correspondents. His long experience and wide knowledge of European affairs make his comment at this critical period doubly valuable.

AGNES SMEDLEY has been active in the radical movement in China for ten years; with Mme Sun Yat-sen she founded the Chinese League for Civil Rights. She is the author of "China's Red Army Marches" and of several other books on China.

MAXWELL GEISMAR, who has frequently contributed reviews to The Nation, is on a year's leave of absence from the English department of Sarah Lawrence College.

PHILIP RAHV is one of the editors of the Partisan Review and Anvil, a radical literary journal.

HORACE GREGORY, poet and literary critic, will shortly publish a study of the traditions behind modern literature entitled "Makers and Ancestors."

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

COMPASS TOURS

A. THIRD SOVIET SEMINAR

England, Denmark, Sweden, 32 days in RUSSIA and Armenia, Poland, France. Sail July 3.

60 days all inclusive $515

Leader: PROF. BERNHARD J. STERN, Sociologist, Columbia University, Editor Science and Society.

C. UNITED FRONT GROUP

Denmark, Sweden, Finland, 30 days in RUSSIA, Poland, France. Sail July 4.

60 days all inclusive $398

Leader: ALVIN E. COONS, University of Iowa.

E. SOCIAL SECURITY SEMINAR

England, Sweden, Russia, Czechoslovakia, Italy, Switzerland, France. Sail July 3.

63 days all inclusive $545

Leader: CHARLOTTE TODES, Labor Organizer and Journalist.

B. SOCIAL CHANGES IN EUROPE

England, Denmark, Sweden, 20 days in RUSSIA, Hungary, Austria, France. Sail July 3.

58 days all inclusive $495

Leader: DR. CLINTON J. TAFT, Director C. L. U. of S. Cal.

D. NEW WORLD AND THE OLD

England, Scandinavia, Russia, Turkey, Greece, Palestine, Italy, France. Sail July 3.

60 days all inclusive $595

Leader: PROFESSOR BERNHARD OSTROLENK, Economist, Author, Editor.

F. MEDICAL TOUR TO S. RUSSIA

Scandinavia, SOVIET RUSSIA, Poland, Austria, Switzerland, France. Sail July 17.

48 days Tourist Class all inclusive $695

Leader: DR. SAMPSON J. WILSON

MEXICO

Scenery — History — Art — Recreation — All blended in an alluring vacation land.
Conducted and Independent Trips

Using Modern Third-Class on the Atlantic

For descriptive pamphlets apply

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU

55 West 42nd St., New York

Longacre 5-3070

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 10, 1937

NUMBER 15

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS 393

EDITORIALS:

GOVERNOR EARLE IN FLAMES 396

GOVERNMENT BOND SLUMP 396

THE TABLES TURNED 397

SHOULD UNIONS BE INCORPORATED?
by Paul W. Ward 398

"THE NATION" AND THE COURT
by Maurice Wertheim 399

TROTSKY ON THE U. S. S. R.:

OCTOBER INTO THERMIDOR by Benjamin Stolberg 401

LEON TROTSKY'S FAILURE by Louis Fischer 404

THE PRICE BOOM by Eliot Janeway 406

RECONSTRUCTION IN PUERTO RICO
by Oswald Garrison Villard 408

TAXI STRIKE by Gerold Frank 410

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE REVOLUTIONARY CONSCIENCE by Philip Rahv 412

"EITHER-OR" by John Dewey 412

LETTERS IN VINDICATION by Eda Lou Walton 413

TWO GENERATIONS by Horace Gregory 414

SHORTER NOTICES 416

FILMS: JAPANESE TRIANGLE by Mark Van Doren 419

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROWN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE NATION WAITED IN VAIN FOR THE Supreme Court to decide on the Wagner Labor Relations Act last Monday, but the justices are either playing a waiting game or—what is more likely—are still very busy exchanging majority, concurring, and dissenting opinions on what is bound to prove a historic set of cases. Meanwhile Justice McReynolds once more made an impromptu speech in court, as he once did on the occasion of the Gold Clause cases. In it he struck out again at Justice Stone with a degree of bitterness which shows that all is far from serene among the members of the court.

★

NEVER HAS A PROGRESSIVE BLOC IN CONGRESS been needed more than today when the reactionaries are trying to force through repressive trade-union measures. Congress means well. What it needs is a group with courage and realism to take the lead in pointing out the dangers of such legislation.

★

THE PROSPECT OF JEFFERSON CAFFERY BEING named as Ambassador to Brazil is an alarming one. Caffery has a far from enviable record. As Minister to Colombia he was involved in the Barco oil concession. As chief of the Division of Latin American Affairs in the State Department he played an important role in the overturn of Machado and the establishment of the Batista dictatorship in Cuba. As Ambassador to Cuba he has thrown his full support to Batista as against the democratic government. His appointment to Brazil would be particularly unfortunate in view of the fact that the long-delayed trials of Luiz Carlos Prestes and Arthur Ewart have now been begun. Judging by the summary treatment meted out to David Levinson when he visited Brazil for the purpose of acting as counsel for Prestes and Ewart there is no possibility that these men will obtain justice unless the American and other foreign ambassadors impress upon the Brazilian government that along with Prestes and the others it is itself on trial before the bar of world opinion. Levinson, an able American lawyer, was not allowed even to see the prisoners. He was subjected to an almost incredible campaign of slander and misrepresentation by the Brazilian press, hounded by the police, and finally ordered to leave the country. In such a situation America needs as its representative someone more liberal than Caffery.

WE HOPE THE HOUSE WILL MOVE SWIFTLY IN its investigation of Nazi activities in America. The Dickstein resolution calling for an inquiry has passed the Rules Committee, and there can be little doubt that it will pass the House itself. As we pointed out several weeks ago in our editorial No Brownshirt Armies, the existence of a uniformed force of several hundred thousand men, all under drill and all owing allegiance to Hitler, cannot be tolerated by a democracy. Such a state within a state has in every instance in European history been followed by the whittling away of state power and the disintegration of democracy. Our only hope is that the committee of inquiry will have at its disposal investigators with the clarity, courage, and resourcefulness that the La Follette committee and its staff have shown.

★

NEWS OF CONTINUED LOYALIST VICTORIES in Spain has heartened American progressives throughout the nation. The military strategy of the Loyalist command seems at once brilliant and daring. Basic to it has been the air force, which has cut a wide swathe along the entire battle-front and given the government forces an almost unchallenged command of the air. But one must be wary in rejoicing. The war will be bitter and protracted. At present writing the Loyalists are moving on Cordoba but the rebels are closing in on Bilbao. Both are likely to hold out for some time. The business of capturing a Spanish town is a difficult one. The most serious factor in Bilbao is that the city is crowded with refugees that have poured in from surrounding territory, and there is a real food shortage. The deciding factors in any event are not the number of cities captured. They are the air force, the munitions supply, the morale, and the degree of foreign intervention. As for morale, it is now clear from the mutinies among Franco's men and the widespread disaffection of the workers and peasants in the territory he occupies, that his strength is on the point of crumbling. As for intervention Mussolini does not yet seem to have moved from his crisis of indecision. And the evidence piles up that Germany is none too anxious to throw its strength into a Spanish war.

★

IN THIS ISSUE WILL BE FOUND AN OPEN letter to the editors from Maurice Wertheim. We are glad to publish it as we were glad, a few weeks ago, to print Mr. Villard's article on the same subject. In both cases it seems to us that our readers are best served by the airing of such differences among the close associates of The Nation. Mr. Wertheim's article is a forceful statement of the position of the liberals who do not regard the institution of judicial review as an unmixed blessing, but who feel that the dangers embodied in the President's proposal represent too high a price to pay for the reforms intended. We respect this attitude and the sincerity with which it is urged. We shall continue, as in the past, to give serious consideration to such objections in the more precise formulation of our editorial position on the President's proposal.

APRIL 6 IS THE TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY of America's entrance into the World War. Twenty years afterward we are still suffering from the dislocations and the hysterias that the war brought on. The striking thing about the anniversary, however, is that it has been made the occasion for persistent rumors that the President would make some dramatic gesture toward world peace on that day. The rumors have at the present writing not materialized. And yet there can be no doubt that Mr. Roosevelt does feel that an international conference, to discuss not only disarmament but more basic problems as well, would contribute to world peace. If he waits, it is because the example of Wilson has shown that this is a very delicate matter and may result in the impairment of American prestige. The French are obviously panting for such a conference, and there can be no doubt that the smaller democracies of Europe would welcome it. Our own feeling is still what it was last summer, when the idea was first broached. World peace is advanced relatively little by conferences. What we need to do is not to strive for new peace machinery but to throw the full energy of America behind the existing machinery. The immediate alternatives to a conference seem however even worse. If the reports are to be credited that the President may seek to frighten Europe by launching a huge naval building program, and thus obtain disarmament concessions, it would be a grotesque way of approaching his objective.

★

IT HAS BEEN CLEAR FOR SOME TIME THAT General William P. Carney has been conducting an offensive of his own in the New York Times sector of the Spanish civil war. General Carney was stationed in Madrid until the stubbornness of his beloved Madrilenos in resisting Franco began to prey on his mind. He is now in rebel territory, but still waging his private war. More important—because more subtle—distortions of the Spanish news may be found in the recent reports of mutinies. On March 29 Frederick T. Birchall sent a long and authenticated dispatch from London to the New York Times, reporting mutiny among the rebel troops. The next day, as if in response to a query, "What? No discontent in Loyalist territory?" he sent another dispatch adding reports of unrest among government forces, especially the Asturian miners. This was a slight item and unsupported, yet the headline, magnificently "impartial," read "Mutinies Affect Both Sides." On April 1, P. J. Philip from Paris joined the fray by allowing (without revealing his evidence) that "there is just as little contentment [in the insurgent ranks] as among the Republicans." Actually the Asturian miners have since been reported as giving Franco considerable trouble, but the impression of the Times headline remains with its readers. Add to this the fact that when the Catholic Basque government protested to the Vatican against the assassination of priests by the insurgents, the news was carried both by the Associated Press and United Press services, but it never appeared in the Times. Could the reasons be the same as those which operate to exclude the reporting of the speeches of Malraux in this country, while those of Hilaire Belloc and other Franco supporters are given ample space? Could they be the same reasons as those which have kept American papers in general from reporting the exciting story of socialist economic transformation in Catalonia and Spain? The Times is not only a private enterprise; it is a social institution. It owes an explanation to the American public.

★

ON MARCH 31 A DISPATCH FROM BOSTON TO the New York Times briefly announced that "the Legislature completed action today on the bill repealing the Teachers' Oath Law, and it is indicated that the Governor will sign it tomorrow." But the next day was April Fool's Day. A dispatch dated April 1 read, "A veto by Governor Charles F. Hurley today killed two years' efforts to wipe from the statute book a law requiring teachers to swear that they will support federal and state constitutions. The House sustained the veto . . ." Governor Hurley is a member of the American Legion and a Catholic. In a ponderous decision explaining his veto he announced that repeal would "encourage" certain "vicious minorities." These minorities include, we must assume, President Conant of Harvard, President Neilson of Smith, President Compton of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, and other academic dignitaries who publicly opposed the oath as an invasion of freedom. We hope that these subversive elements will not accept permanent discouragement. They and all Massachusetts liberals should adopt the slogan devised by one of our more irresponsible editors—"Let the Hurley worm get the bird!"

★

THE DISSOLUTION OF THE JAPANESE DIET has thrown the entire Far Eastern situation once more into confusion. In recent weeks there had been unmistakable signs of moderation in Japanese policy toward China. Nothing more was said about the desire for a five-province independent state in North China; the troops that attacked Suiyuan last November were withdrawn into Chahar and Manchuria; military pressure was apparently being abandoned for the slower and somewhat less objectionable methods of cultural and economic penetration. The calling of a new election represents an unexpected and important victory for the more extreme military elements. Reports from Japan indicate that the fascist group may actively enter the campaign for the first time with a party of its own, but the chances are that it will do so only if assured of victory. Otherwise, the government will probably wait until after the election and rely on the inducements of office to enable it to form a pro-military political party from among the elected deputies. In either event, the election is expected to discredit the civilian opposition—which is alleged to lack "seriousness" in the face of the national crisis. This will place the military more firmly in power than ever and reduce the chances for a peaceful settlement of either domestic or international issues.

THE MOST IMPORTANT PUBLIC ACTIONS OF the Socialist Party at its special convention in Chicago were its indorsement of the Committee for Industrial Organization, its statement of the party attitude toward war, and its indorsement of a Farmer-Labor Party. The first represented a decision that was difficult even as it was inevitable and desirable. Just as certain sections of the American Federation of Labor found it hard to transfer their allegiance to the more progressive C. I. O. at the cost of breaking with the A. F. of L., so the Socialist Party could not sever its allegiance to the A. F. of L. without a struggle in certain quarters. On the war issue, the stand of the party reflected the difficulties which the existence of a socialist state has strewn in the ideological path of socialist groups in capitalist countries, but maintained its traditional position. "The Socialist Party calls upon the working class to come to the support of the Soviet Union. This can be done only by refusing support to any war of any capitalist country . . . by uninterrupted class struggle to overthrow the rule of capitalists."

★

MR. ROOSEVELT CAUSED A FLURRY IN WALL Street by his press statement that commodity prices were too high. We print in this issue an article by Eliot Janeway which documents the President's statement. Although rising prices normally act as a stimulant of production and employment, they carry with them fundamental maladjustments. Profits skyrocket more rapidly than prices, and prices rise more rapidly than wages. Salaried employees and others living on a fixed income find their buying power drastically reduced by the advance in the cost of living. The result is that production, spurred by the exceptional profits, tends sooner or later to expand more rapidly than the market, which is dependent on consumer buying power. In theory the decline in the buying power of wage-earners and salaried employees is more than offset by the increased prosperity of shareholders and business men. But it happens that these groups, being on a somewhat higher income level, tend to save a large proportion of their new-found income, thus adding to the congestion of the capital market at a time when the demand for new investment is beginning to be checked by low consumer buying power. While it is doubtful whether the upward surge has reached its peak, the rapid increase in prices—particularly in the large monopoly industries—must be viewed with great concern.

★

OUR READERS MAY BE AMUSED BY A GLIMPSE into the problems of an editor's life as they are revealed by a letter just received from a certain Professor A who had been asked if he would review a book by a Mr. B. He writes: "I shall be happy to review Mr. B's book, if you do not wish it done before July. Meanwhile I should like to inquire why my book, 'The This Versus the That,' has not been reviewed in your columns." The cream of the jest is that Mr. B. agreed to review the book in question some four months ago and has, we suppose, been sleeping with it under his pillow.

WE HOPE

its investigation
stein resolution

Committee

Governor Earle in Flames
I have read with interest your editorial "Spain in the Ho." I concurred in the finding of the Pennsylvania our ership Board because "Spain in Flames" was too strong unifinder to me of the propaganda of the European causes unceding our entry into the World War. How many thousands of our best American lives were lost as a result of this propaganda?

One of the subtitles of this picture was "Spain Needs Men of Military Experience to Officer its Armies." Is that not a direct invitation to our World War veterans, our men who have served in the navy, army, and National Guard, and our graduates of military schools to enlist in the Spanish Loyalist army?

The Nation has undoubtedly done a magnificent job in its philippics against the danger of fascism in this country. But so far as human liberty is concerned, just what is the difference between fascism and communism? Both are reigns of terror. The hand of the secret police may fall upon the shoulder of any man, woman, or child in a Fascist or Communist country, and they will disappear never to be heard of again. Both fascism and communism have absolute suppression of freedom of the press and freedom of speech. Both Fascist Germany and Communist Russia have religious persecution.

That the army of General Franco is an army of Fascist mercenaries, there is no question. What about the Spanish Loyalists, made up in large part of Syndicalists, Communists, and Anarchists? Is The Nation so naive as to believe that the Spanish government would be receiving the 100 per cent backing of the Soviet government unless the Soviets were convinced Spain would be Communist in the event of victory for the government forces?

Take a trip to Pennsylvania and learn how the liberal Democratic administration there is giving fair play, for the first time, to the worker in Pennsylvania. Then compare this condition with what is happening to the worker in Fascist Germany and Communist Russia.

Once before The Nation criticized me because I said it was a fortunate thing for Austria that Dollfuss put down the Socialists' rebellion. Had the Socialists won, the entire country outside Vienna would have gone over to Hitler, and within six weeks Austria, including Vienna, would have been under the blighting curse of Nazism.

If the barring of recruiting propaganda of any alien cause from Pennsylvania, with the resultant prevention of the sacrifice of adventurous and courageous American youth on European battlefields, incurs the ire of The Nation, frankly I welcome it, provided The Nation will state fairly just what the issue is between us.

GEORGE H. EARLE

Harrisburg, March 26

GOVERNOR EARLE'S letter deserves a careful answer, "Spain in Flames," he says, "is too strong a reminder of pre-war propaganda." "How many thousands of our best American lives," he asks, "were lost as a result of this propaganda?" That is a platform question which might rouse a multitude; in the relative quiet of an editorial column it provokes a counter-question. Does Governor Earle really believe that it was motion pictures of the horrors of war, and similar material, that led us into the World War? If he does he has not read the reports of the Senate munitions investigation, conducted by another Pennsylvanian, Stephen Raushenbush. Those reports proved what many suspected—that the most effective propaganda leading us toward war was "not a motion picture" but Wall Street loans to the Allies and large orders for Pennsylvania steel—items not commonly under state boards of censors.

"Spain in Flames" is not an official production of the Spanish government. One subtitle does not make a recruiting station, and this one, in its content, was not a call to arms. But granting that it might be so construed, the possibility that American legionnaires and national guardsmen might rush to enlist in the Loyalist army seems to us less threatening to American democracy than a summary act of censorship in Pennsylvania.

We retreat to our corner long enough to thank Governor Earle for his kind words about The Nation and to compliment him on his fine work in opening up the steel towns of Pennsylvania to their inhabitants.

We believe that Soviet Russia's primary purpose in supporting the Spanish government is to prevent fascism, not to establish a communist regime. We further believe that there is a vast difference between fascism and communism—a difference, say, as vast as that between night and day. But if there were no difference between fascism and communism, Governor Earle's act of censorship would be all the more inexcusable and dangerous.

Granting all of the Governor's premises, his logic runs as follows: The Spanish government is communistic; communism and fascism are the same since both impose—to quote Governor Earle—"absolute suppression of freedom of the press and freedom of speech"; the way not to support communism in Pennsylvania is to introduce suppression there! If it were not so serious, we should propose this sequence as a scenario for a moving picture to be entitled, "Governor Earle in Flames."

Government Bond Slump

BEFORE the recent announcement that the Federal Reserve banks would resume buying of government securities, long- and medium-term government bonds had declined from four to eight points in the past four months, one of the severest drops in recent years. Ordinarily a sharp recession in federal securities is an occasion for anxiety. If on this occasion the decline has caused only mild apprehension, the reason is that bond prices have not been really low. Four per cent issues have not sold below 109, and 3 per cent bonds still command a premium. But so great a decline cannot fail to cause repercussions in our national economy.

Most observers attribute the drop chiefly to the new reserve requirements imposed by the Federal Reserve Board. A few banks have been forced to sell securities in order to obtain funds to meet the reserve requirements. The appearance of this selling has led speculators to sell in the hope of buying back later at a lower price and thus realizing substantial profits. It is evident, however, that the bank selling would have been slight if there had not been favorable prospects for the investment of the money withdrawn from governments: it was generally believed that we had reached the end of the period of "easy money," and with the demand for investments in private enterprise increasing, interest rates were tending to rise slightly.

The dangers inherent in a rise of interest rates have been pointed out recently by a number of economists, including J. M. Keynes. Basically, such a rise means that capital exacts a heavier toll from the process of production, leaving a smaller share for labor. High interest rates serve to increase the gap between consumer buying power and the total output of industry, thus hastening the next depression. They also serve as a brake on the normal expansion of industry at a period when brakes should be used, if at all, with careful discrimination. It is doubtful, however, whether the Federal Reserve Board is justified in open-market purchases at this time. The primary danger remains that of inflation, and the recovery period is the best time for the Reserve banks to dispose of their heavy holdings of government obligations.

A further decline in bonds, however, would undoubtedly have a serious effect on the federal budget. A rise of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent in the interest rate on federal securities will ultimately cost the federal government \$170,000,000 annually. While this may not seem a large sum in relation to the budget as a whole, it makes increased taxation at this session of Congress all the more necessary if the budget is to be balanced in time to head off an inflationary boom. Failure on the part of Congress to take such action may create apprehension which will result in a further decline in securities.

Assuming that new taxes are levied and that inflation can be checked—the increase in member-bank required reserves is a step in that direction—the chances are that bond prices would have recovered without special governmental action. No large government loans are likely to be floated within the next year. Under the Social Security Act several hundred million dollars are to be accumulated annually as reserves for the old-age and unemployment-insurance funds. This money must be invested in government securities.

The chief dangers in the present situation are political rather than economic. Already there are indications that the decline in bonds will be taken as a pretext for a new drive to balance the budget, not by increased taxation, but by drastic economies at the expense of the country's underprivileged groups. Chairman Doughton of the House Ways and Means Committee was yielding, consciously or unconsciously, to this pressure when he declared against new taxes and in favor of "economies." As the Brookings Institution recently pointed out, the only economies within the realm of practical politics are reductions in the outlay for relief and emergency purposes. The question of who pays the cost of a balanced budget is a straight political issue. It may be borne by the unemployed, the drought-stricken farmers, and government employees or by the high-income groups. Economic as well as humanitarian considerations support the demand that the latter group assume the burden.

The Tables Turned

THE recent discussions about the legality of the sitdown strike and the Wagner Act have served to make clear the curious paradox of the use of the federal power in a democracy such as ours. The industrialists have recently contended that the federal power does not extend to any business activity that is not in the clearest physical sense part of interstate commerce. They went so far as to have their Liberty League lawyers' committee draw up advisory opinions informing employers that the Wagner Labor Act was unconstitutional, along with a good deal of the rest of the New Deal program. The progressives, on the other hand, have contended that the federal power must be extended to industry to save the country from chaos.

That was yesterday. Today the growth of the C. I. O. organizing campaign has changed all that. It is now the employers who come storming into Congress, begging for the extension of the federal power to manufacturing enterprise so as to make the sitdown illegal and bring government intervention into labor disputes. And it is now the progressives and the labor forces who look askance at the use of the federal power, and fear what the government may do. Thus stands the paradox: the industrialists and conservatives, whose general position is against the federal power, now want government intervention in labor disputes; and the progressive and labor forces, whose general position is in favor of the federal power, now oppose its extension to labor.

The moral is clear. In approaching public affairs we must be wary of the dogmas that any groups set up. Any dogma, when pushed to its absolute limits, involves its holder in logical difficulties. That is what has happened now to capital and labor. Each has turned the tables on the other. And each has borrowed the other's dogma.

The real thing to be kept in mind is not the dogma, whether of federal power or of states' rights, but the social interests that it serves and the limits that must be imposed on it in serving those interests. Paul Ward's article in this issue on the incorporation of trade unions seems to us to express the sound view on that subject—a subject which is likely soon to become as heated a topic of discussion as the sitdown has been. It is not that we doubt the legality of the extension of federal power to industrial disputes. But, given the legality, we do doubt the desirability of the use of the federal power for this particular purpose.

Our reasons are simple. Given the balance of social forces today, government must use its power only to establish the conditions within which collective bargaining can be carried on. The rest must be left to the deliberations of workers and employers, tempered by public opinion. For government now to go beyond establishing collective bargaining would be to move in the direction of outlawing or crippling strikes. And to do this would be to paralyze at the outset the process by which labor can build its strength to the point where it stands a chance of balancing the strength of the corporations.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Should Unions Be Incorporated?

Washington, April 4

ORGANIZED labor's enemies have just begun to fight. Legislative shackles for the new labor movement are being forged in dozens of law shops and legislatures throughout the land. The drive is toward wholesale enactment of state laws paralleling the Trade Disputes and Trade Unions Act that Great Britain put on its statute books the year after the general strike of 1926. Equipped and directed by the National Association of Manufacturers, the United States Chamber of Commerce, and related state and local councils of industrialists, the drive is being furthered either through outright knavery or a fantastic sort of punditical ignorance by an army of writers and lecturers including George Sokolsky, Dorothy Thompson, Leo Wolman, Walter Lippmann, David Lawrence, and Mark Sullivan. These and other witting or unwitting publicists of reaction are rallying the battalions of the bourgeois with day-by-day tracts and speeches pampering the anti-union prejudices of the middle class. Not content with suggesting that labor leaders draw enormous salaries, squander union funds, charge their followers exorbitant dues, and indulge in various forms of racketeering, they seek to impress upon an easily gulled public an idea that existing labor legislation grants unions vast rights, privileges, and power without imposing reciprocal safeguards, responsibilities, and duties. All of which is merely the groundwork for an attempt to block the wage-earner's rise by (1) limiting picketing, strikes, and boycotts, (2) imposing compulsory arbitration and the outright prohibition of strikes, and (3) requiring unions to incorporate on the same basis as profit-making corporations—which would lay them open to innumerable forms of debilitating court attacks.

Nearly all these types of attack on labor unions are embodied in measures now pending in Congress or the state legislatures. Representative Dies's bill is a case in point. Another is the anti-sitdown amendment to the Guffey coal bill which Senator Byrnes of South Carolina introduced a few days ago. Byrnes, who posed as the workingman's friend when he had to stand for reelection last year and gave the pose verisimilitude by sponsoring a bill to prohibit shipping of strike-breakers across state lines, was motivated in the present instance by the terror of the mill men among his constituents lest the sitdown technique give unionism a real hold in the South at last.

The most dangerous form of legislative attack is that which aims at forcing unions to incorporate or otherwise submit to regulation. It is the most dangerous because it can be made to seem so sweetly reasonable. Its proponents can even point out that the great Justice Brandeis when he was in active practice as a friend of labor spoke out in behalf of union-incorporation laws. They will not go on to say that unions then were seeking legal standing and that their fight for the right to incorporate was successfully opposed by the employers. They will prefer simply to elaborate Brandeis's argument that incorporation would make labor unions less "reckless and lawless." All the pat arguments now being trotted out in favor of union incorporation or regulation are based on a premise that unions are irresponsible agencies. It is certainly not a premise to which employers would subscribe who have had long contractual relationships with unions. The records are full of contrary testimonials from management in the railroad, printing, and garment industries, to mention only a few. It is pertinent to point out in this connection that the National Railroad Adjustment Board has trouble not with the unions but with the roads.

Another apparently persuasive point in the argument for union incorporation is that under existing circumstances employers have no redress against unions in that they cannot sue them for damages as they easily could do if unions were obliged to incorporate. This argument is disingenuous. The United States Supreme Court in a unanimous decision handed down in 1922 in the Colorado coal cases involving the United Mine Workers (which the C. I. O.'s chieftain, John L. Lewis, even then headed) ruled that unions are suable in the federal courts both for injunctions and money damages, and in the Colorado cases damages of $27,500 actually were paid. What is true in federal law also is true in state law. In many states unions are suable for damages under codes relating to voluntary unincorporated associations. But the records of the federal and state courts show very few instances in which employers have felt they had any grounds for suing unions for damages. They have preferred to sue out injunctions, taking advantage of the notorious liberality of the judiciary where anti-union injunctions are sought, and their preference is easily understood. In the case of a damage suit, the employer must be able to prove his case or foot the bill. But in injunction cases he is not obliged to prove anything.

Now that labor is meeting with increasing success in limiting the use of injunctions in labor disputes—through the Norris-LaGuardia Act applying to federal courts and a growing number of complementary state laws—employers are eager to find new excuses for tangling the labor movement up in what is merrily called the judicial process. Laws requiring unions to incorporate would serve that purpose.

Of course, "responsibility" and "suability" are not the only reasons adduced in support of the union-incorporation campaign. There are oilier ones. It is suggested that public regulation will prevent despotic leadership, keep dues low, eliminate racketeering, and abolish misuse of union funds, and the suggestion is made in such a way as to imply that conditions with respect to all these matters are notoriously evil in the labor movement. This overlooks the fact that practically all unions have a democratic form of government and constitutions that are easily amended. Then, too, most unions have relatively low dues, especially those in the mass-production industries and the industrial unions. Furthermore, most unions require a strict periodic accounting of union funds, and a substantial number impose a uniform bookkeeping system on their locals. Cases of misuse of union funds exist, of course, but they are so rare that American industrialists should blush to mention them, considering their own record as trustees of other people's money.

The most "reasonable" aspect of the argument for union incorporation is the suggestion that since business organizations incorporate it is no more than fair to require that unions follow suit, and that this would subject both to the same legislative treatment. Its reasonableness breaks down on close analysis. It is a concept which places business corporations, organized for profit, on the same footing as unions founded by propertyless workers to protect and promote the social and economic welfare of their families. There are many other points of difference that might be enumerated. It will suffice to point out that governments traditionally recognize a distinction between profit-making and non-profit associations and make special provision for them in the incorporation and tax laws. But much more to the point of all this is the fact that, whereas employers want to make incorporation of unions compulsory, there is no compulsion upon employers to incorporate. They are free to operate either as individuals, as copartnerships, or as voluntary associations. Thus, to force unions to incorporate would not place them on a parity with employers but would deprive them of the freedom of selection open to employers.

"The Nation" and the Court

—AN OPEN LETTER FROM MAURICE WERTHEIM

TO THE EDITORS OF The Nation:

Those who control the Foundation which owns The Nation believe in the principle of editorial freedom. To insure it further they have, as you know, turned over to you, for a period, complete control of the paper in legal form. Because of my association with the Foundation and the fact that those who control it have no part in shaping The Nation's policies I feel that I must record my own personal dissent from your editorial policy on the President's Supreme Court program.

I do this in a spirit similar to that evidenced by my esteemed associate, Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard, in his recent article What Is The Nation Coming to? in the issue of March 27, wherein he discussed the same subject. I agree with him that the policy of the paper on this issue has been a mistaken one. Since The Nation was one of the first advocates, even before the President raised the issue, of a constitutional amendment to curb usurpation of power by the Supreme Court, it has, I believe, lost a great opportunity in not realizing that advocacy of the President's proposal betrays its own cause.

The issue seems perfectly clear. Many times The Nation had eloquently stressed the dangers inherent in a continuation of the practice by which the Supreme Court was in effect becoming a legislative body. This took courage and penetrating analysis. The Nation was one of the lone voices crying in the wilderness long before the President's plan had so consolidated opposition opinion as to make it appear that the whole country would now welcome a definite curb on the powers of the court. But for that very reason it is difficult for me to understand how The Nation can, editorially and otherwise, now support the President's plan, since it is obvious that the plan in no way corrects the fundamental evil. Adding new members to the court actually sets the stamp of government approval upon a continuation of the legislative function by interpretation—only in the opposite direction. That is as plain as a pikestaff. It is equally apparent that the plan does not even pretend to touch the evil of close decisions. And to favor the President's proposal as well as a constitutional amendment completely begs the question, for I do not believe it can be convincingly urged that if the President gets his way he would do the necessary crusading and campaigning for a constitutional amendment. Since he has declared himself against it as a corrective of the situation, it is now clear that the present issue lies between one and the other.

Why does The Nation favor the President's proposal? Apparently it believes that through this expedient there can be quickly enacted progressive statutes which will be free from the danger of Supreme Court veto. In the few days intervening between the President's proposal and its next issue, The Nation apparently decided that the possibility of attaining such legislation was of greater value than the reform that it itself had advocated; of greater value even than the price which a democracy was called upon to pay.

I am forced to the conclusion that this represented an unreflective stand. That the Constitution should be amended in order to narrow the interpretative power of the court on laws passed by the people's representatives is now being generally accepted. That we need more progressive legislation is likewise generally conceded. But why should The Nation—which has so resolutely opposed everything which even smacked of the authoritarian idea—allow itself to be caught by the bait of a few immediate laws which, as its own Washington correspondent, Mr. Paul Ward, pointed out in a recent issue, may not prove to be so progressive after all? Should not The Nation explore more deliberately the dangers inherent in this situation and call to the attention of its readers all its implications?

It amounts to this—that for the promise of immediate progressive legislation we are asked to sacrifice the great democratic principle that fundamental changes in our system of government shall result only from the decision of the people. Is it not clear beyond question, and does The Nation not know that it is clear beyond question, that the people have not passed on this subject and have not given the present Administration, as has been claimed, a mandate to do what the President now proposes? Obviously, before the last election he had either not developed his plan or had carefully concealed it from the electorate. Even The Nation must agree that the President was very ill advised when he tried in his recent "fireside chat" to reconcile his court proposal with that plank of his Presidential platform which reads, "If these problems cannot effectively be solved within the Constitution we shall seek such clarifying amendments as will assure the power to enact those laws adequate to regulate commerce, protect public health and safety, and safeguard economic security." Either this plank is so phrased as to be utterly misleading and deceptive, which I am loath to believe, or the present plan is not one of those solutions which it was anticipated to work out "within the Constitution." Patently it is not. It is a clear, bald attempt to grasp power—a thing not in the least to be condoned because it may be, and I believe it was, well intentioned—that is, with the purpose of securing progressive legislation sooner than would be possible via the democratic route.

Has The Nation called attention to and weighed the fact that since 1800 the average time taken to secure ratification of constitutional amendments by three-quarters of the states has been sixteen months, and that in the case of the last four amendments the average time required has been less than one year? It seems to me infinitely more important to ponder these facts than to refer, as some defenders of the President's plan have done, to the length of time which the proposed child-labor amendment has been before the country, since it is common knowledge that there is bitter opposition to it on the part of a very large section of the public, progressive and reactionary alike. It may have been true that the same difference of opinion existed in regard to a constitutional amendment on the question of the court before the launching of the President's plan, but it is so no longer. The one merit of this move has been to make the necessity of some action crystal clear to almost all, and it seems a fair statement to say that if the President were now to use the weight of his great office to unite all factions on this question, we could secure a satisfactory constitutional amendment in a period of even less than the average time it took to ratify the last four. Of course, anything is debatable, but the weight of evidence surely inclines to this view and indicates that we might, therefore, within a relatively short time secure the desired legislation without a sacrifice of democratic principles. Does it not appear that the entire background of The Nation during the seventy-two years that it has fought valiantly for the principles of democracy should lead it to favor such a course and to abandon its partisan stand on a question which should never have been partisan? Should not The Nation decisively and promptly call a halt to the shameless horse-trading into which this great question has degenerated?

A halt must be called. The people of this country want their courts to be respected. It is unthinkable that a progressive and liberal journal should actually advocate any plan by which new judges are placed on our supreme tribunal who will decide cases on instructions, or who will be believed to have decided them on this basis. To favor this plan because it is legal is but a poor excuse; in fact, it is no excuse at all, because if the plan is once put into effect, I am bound to think that in the future there will be very little difference between what is "legal" and what is "illegal," since Presidents hereafter will have the precedent of 1937 to enable them to make what is illegal, legal. A liberal editor recently told me that if the President ran for a third term, he would shoulder a musket and fight. I cannot understand why liberal editors do not see in the President's proposal a far more dangerous precedent, unless in all their discussion of the Constitution they have temporarily forgotten one of the underlying reasons behind the Declaration of Independence. "The history of the present King of Great Britain," says that document, "is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations . . . he has made Judges dependent upon his will alone for the tenure of their offices and the amount and payment of their salaries." The analogy is not perfect, but I think that the advocates of the President's plan should consider it too close for comfort. The War of Independence was fought in order that the American people should have the right to govern themselves and, therefore, the right to pass upon all fundamental changes in their form of government. It is idle to contend that this is not one of those fundamental changes, and if The Nation were true to its traditions, it should, I think, indignantly demand that the people be given that right.

Finally, does The Nation approve of the camouflage arguments concerning aging judges and congested dockets under cover of which it was attempted to slip this proposal through? Does it approve of all the mass of innuendo attributing dust storms, floods, and various other acts of God to the Supreme Court? I cannot believe it possible. The Nation has lost itself in unjudicial partisanship at a moment when I, for one, should like to see it come out, like Senator Wheeler, Oswald Garrison Villard, and many other liberals, and say to the President: "Enough of this camouflage; enough of these attempts to discredit your adversaries as 'defeatist lawyers'; we like your objectives, but we don't like your methods. You can now attain your objectives with no sacrifice of American principles if you will not be stubborn. And if that be treason, make the most of it."

Trotsky on the U. S. S. R.

October into Thermidor

BY BENJAMIN STOLBERG

THE REVOLUTION BETRAYED"* is one of the ablest polemics in the history of literature. It is at once passionate and disciplined. It is profound in its insight into the nature and sickness of class relations. It combines great sophistication with luminous simplicity. And the felicity of phrase is startling. Even more startling is Trotsky's tenderness toward the Soviet Union in view of the slanderous savagery of the onslaughts against him and the deadly accuracy of his counter-thrusts. His attitude toward the Thermidor is one of Olympian indignation, but also of such deep and anxious concern as you and I could never feel. After all, Lenin and he made the revolution.

But above all, as John Chamberlain writes, this polemic is a work of great moral purity: it moves on a high level of intellectual taste, controversial integrity, historical criticism, and revolutionary conscience. Even the sharpness of its wit and irony seem sterilized against malice, trickery, or innuendo. It is marred by no self-pity, no personal hatred, no recrimination, no vulgar pride. What people take for egotism in Trotsky is not egotism. It is a keen sense of the drama of history, and of his own rightful place in that drama. As sheer story and indictment of the Thermidorean evolution in the Soviet Union this pamphlet will live and be studied as long as men live in civilization and study its history.

But for all that, this polemic is far more illuminating as review and critique of what actually happened than as an explanation of the deepest causes of the Thermidor. Fundamentally Trotsky fails to tell us why, really why, the October revolution, through all its vicissitudes and zigzags, moved toward the Thermidorean reaction with all the fatality of a Greek tragedy. And in failing to do so, he leaves the reader unsatisfied, with a touch of revolutionary hypochondria: Could it have been—can it ever be—otherwise? It may be irrelevant, and hence unfair, to seek in a polemic for the key to the revolutionary riddle. Yet the fact remains that here the greatest of living Marxists fails, as Engels and Lenin failed before him, to solve the Marxian dilemma, which is: How can revolution avoid a Thermidorean end? How can a revolutionary dictatorship keep from evolving into a privileged bureaucracy? Why do the Robespierres and the Saint Justs, the Lenins and Trotskys lose to a directory or an apparatus; and finally to bourgeois or proletarian Caesarism? Why did even our American Revolution, though its base was partially laid in seventeenth-century England and though it enjoyed the whole nineteenth century as an expanding frontier of democracy, gradually grow into a Thermi-dorean reaction? Why did the Jeffersons and Jacksons and Thaddeus Stevens and their successors cumulatively lose to the Supreme Court oligarchy, which for 137 years has been at bottom nothing but a Fabian Thermidor?

Of course, the conventional answer is that a Thermidor introduces and develops political and cultural reaction for the sake of economic and social exploitation. But that is not the point. The riddle is: Why is revolution unable to prevent it? Why is Trotsky, who is undoubtedly the inheritor of Lenin's ends, now in Mexico? And why is Stalin, the logical epigone of Lenin's means, in the Kremlin? Why does the left always make the revolution and the right always write the constitution?

For all his revolutionary sophistication, Trotsky's answer is the orthodox Marxian answer. Czarist Russia, he says, was a backward and barbarous country, at a low, semi-colonial productive stage. Russia's labor was primitive, her peasantry archaic, her technology simple, her heritage cruel. Repeatedly Trotsky quotes the young Marx: "A development of the productive forces is the absolutely necessary practical premise [of communism], because without it want is generalized, and with want the struggle for necessities begins again, and that means that all the old junk must revive." Moreover, socialism in one country cannot win permanently. As Rosa Luxemburg wrote, "In Russia the problem could be posed; it could not be solved," unless the social revolution quickly developed internationally, especially in the advanced countries. All these reasons, Trotsky repeats over and over again, explain why the Soviet dictatorship is not "withering," why soviet democracy is not unfolding, why the Thermidor. And he might have added that revolution is war; that it must use terror against counter-revolution; and that the use of revolutionary terror hides within it its Thermidorean reflex. "The guillotine of a Robespierre is always followed in history by the sword of a Napoleon," said Prince Bülow.

All the reasons which Trotsky gives are, or may be, true. But they are visibly pregnant with their own contradictions. And the Marxian revolutionary politics—as against its economics—offers no solution. It may be true that the prerevolutionary backwardness of a country determines the degree of its Thermidorean savagery; that is only saying that the past of a culture patterns its future. But that does not mean that if a series of Octobers had rapidly occurred in Berlin and Paris and London, Thermidorean reactions could not have followed. On the contrary, the far more powerful counter-revolutionary forces in the West—so powerful that after all they were able to abort all social revolutions—could have been defeated, if at all, only by a revolutionary terror so strenuous and complex that it might have ended in an international Thermidor, less cruelly Byzantine but far more hopeless than Stalinism. Moreover, though Trotsky is eternally right that socialism cannot be built in one country, it is equally true that the unevenness of international development precluded the quick succession of socialist revolutions in the West. Surely, Trotsky is too good a Marxist to blame the personnel of the Second International entirely for the miscarriage of European socialism. And from this it follows that though the Comintern in China and Germany and everywhere else has partly served as a foil for fascist reaction, it is also true that its reactionary confusion, at least to a considerable degree, is the result of capitalist stabilization-toward-decay and the sharpening of imperialist gangsterism the world over. Lenin believed that the best way to attack Western imperialism was in such a semi-colonial country as Russia. He was going to shake the City of London in China and India. Lenin and Trotsky acted on this belief and won a revolution. But the historic reality since October certainly proves that you cannot shake Wall Street except in America. Financial capitalism recuperated from the shock of October, reorganized itself into a reactionary offensive—from Hitler to Baldwin; and has driven the Soviet Union into its Thermidorean diplomacy, of which the Stalinism is a part, and into a revolutionary retreat, of which the bureaucracy is the vanguard. That the tradition of Russia endows this Thermidor with its own peculiar ferocity, that Stalin acts far more like Nechayev than he thinks like a Marxist, is almost irrelevant.

* "The Revolution Betrayed." By Leon Trotsky. Translated by Max Eastman. Doubleday, Doran and Company. $2.50.

That orthodox Marxism did not fully realize all the terrible implications of international economic and cultural disparity does not invalidate its theory of permanent revolution. It merely means, as history since the World War has proved, that the international conquest of socialist power requires an infinitely more sophisticated revolutionary understanding and strategy; and possibly a couple of centuries, not years. That is not a dilemma. It is just a lot of trouble. The real Marxian dilemma lies in its revolutionary politics, based on its theories of the revolutionary conquest of power and the nature of the state after the proletarian victory. Nowhere in his writings does Trotsky analyze this dilemma. And between the lines of this book it cries out for solution.

This essential weakness of Marxism lies in its purely metaphysical conception of the Dictatorship of the Proletariat, based on the revolutionary instincts of labor, which is quite as much a fiction as Rousseau's General Will based on the Social Contract. Such inventions can make revolutions but they cannot fulfil their promise. For there can be only a dictatorship over the proletariat by a minority. And this minority is necessarily an intellectual minority with all the vices of its virtues, a minority whose final interests are by no means those of the workers. Dictatorships are personal-oligarchic, not impersonal-democratic. A dictatorship is not the best possible means for its own dissolution in the service of a socialist or any other society. Alas, it is not the dictatorial state that "withers," in spite of Engels's careless remark which Lenin scholastically elaborated in "The State and Revolution." What "withers" is the original revolutionary leadership and the revolutionary enthusiasm of the masses. The dictatorship of the proletariat is far less apt to "habituate" itself to its own atrophy than it is to perpetuate itself. To blame Stalin for not remodeling the Kremlin into his own mausoleum and the Soviet apparatus for not dismantling itself is to ask history for miracles.

All this does not mean that socialism can be brought about by the "gradual" methods of the Fabian sell-out. Nor does it mean that Trotsky, as a man of action, can do otherwise than attack the Thermidor as he finds it, which is his simple duty on the heroic scale of his role. But it does mean that Marxism has not yet formulated means sufficiently realistic and prophylactic for its own socialist and moral ends. As yet Marxism is incomparably superior as the critique of capitalist decay than as a guide to socialist conquest and construction.

II

And now what is a Thermidor? It is not a counter-revolution, for a counter-revolution aims to reestablish the basic economy of the overthrown regime. A Thermidor is the new stratification of the victorious revolutionary class into masters and men—on the higher productive level which the revolution has conquered and within the logic of this new order. This new grouping of society gradually crystallizes itself into a new hierarchy, ranging from Thermidorean parvenu down to revolutionary pariah. New forms of exploitation arise, old cultural barbarisms revive under Jacobin disguises, new privileges and disabilities take shape until the new liberation becomes a new slavery; all, to be sure, on the advanced stage of a higher form of economic production. Such is the nature of Thermidor.

The Russian Thermidor differs from the French in time and space and culture. But the genesis of the Thermidorean reaction is almost the same. Just as the French Thermidor did not to any significant degree revert to the feudal economy of the ancient regime, but founded and fostered bourgeois exploitation, just so Stalinism has not to any significant degree reintroduced capitalist exploitation but is creating new forms of proletarian exploitation. And the only way it can do it is by reclassifying society. The French Thermidor formed and established the power of the big bourgeoisie over the petty bourgeoisie, which had fought and bled in the revolution. And so Stalinism has created a big proletariat over the petty proletariat, the rank and file of October. Trotsky, the Marxian purist, refuses to call the big proletariat—the new bureaucracy of executives, technicians, intellectuals of all kinds, the upper strata of labor and the peasantry, and, above all, the party apparatus—a new "class." For in the strict Marxian sense "classes" not merely differ in their functional relation to the productive process but must derive their income in different forms from the class contradictions of this process: profit versus wages. And since in the U. S. S. R. all income is paid by the state, not in different forms but in different amounts and services, there is according to Trotsky no "class struggle" in Russia but mere "social antagonisms." Hence, he argues with Marxian scholasticism, the Soviet Thermidor requires no social revolution but merely a political change to release the democratic process. Maybe. But it would seem more realistic to admit that the Marxian theory of the growth toward classlessness under a proletarian dictatorship has so far proved to be false. The sociology of class formation is visibly at work under the Thermidor. The Soviet citizen owns his national means of production very much as the American citizen owns his national government. But universal ownership in Russia and universal suffrage in America are so largely legendary in power precisely because in both instances the state reflects far more sensitively class influences than democratic welfare. To be sure, presocialist Russia has solved the peculiarly capitalist contradictions. But far from having solved class contradictions, it is creating new ones. And just as bourgeois society developed within itself the economic proletariat, so Soviet society is growing within itself a political plebs.

III

And now let us epitomize briefly Trotsky's indictment. The economic conquests of October are still in the main secure, though Trotsky indicates how the new "social antagonisms" lead to new inner contradictions and hence to economic differentiation. But the cultural conquests of October have become a burlesque of revolutionary egalitarianism. The social distance which separates the higher bureaucracy from the masses is widening. And it is measurable in a scale of privileges. The bureaucracy enjoys—hierarchically—preferential housing, automobiles, luxuries, services of all kinds, including menial, paid of course not from personal profit but by the state. This new process of social classification can be enforced only by an indisputable "party line," interpreted by an infallible dictator and enforced by an inviolate oligarchy. Philosophers, mathematicians, novelists, musicians, and even the ballet must bow before this theocratic Marxism. The new theology can be criticized only ritually not ideologically. The works of Lenin are erratically edited, the Marxian classics are bastardized, revolutionary history is shamelessly rewritten, appointing Stalin a posteriori to the revolutionary accomplishments of Trotsky. Childhood and youth are regimented. Divorce is made more difficult. Abortion has been prohibited—to the ambassador's wife, of course, no less than to the peasant woman. A rigorous caste system has been reintroduced in the army. Of course, socialist construction is releasing tremendous spiritual forces: illiteracy is being rapidly defeated, new public services are being introduced, social work of every kind, especially public health, is being advanced. Everything but socialist freedom is expanding. The pall of the terror lies over opinion. And the theory that in 1937 the Soviet Union cannot afford real socialist freedom of thought, that astrophysicists must first guess right Stalin's opinion, is beneath consideration.

Economically, the Soviet Union has made tremendous advances, proving to the whole world that even presocialist planning in a backward country can do wonders compared to the tantrums of capitalist decline, even in the most advanced nations. Trotsky describes with great detail and enthusiasm these amazing achievements, every one of which flows from October. Once Russia had freed herself from the maze of her primitive-capitalist contradictions, she could develop her empire much as we did in Reconstruction days when freed from the destructive interference of the slave power. Quite correctly Trotsky points out that her industrialization program was taken from the left opposition, just as indeed Stalin took over its program of rural collectivization. And with equal correctness he points out that since each of these programs was taken over when faced with economic catastrophe, they were brutally costly in human suffering.

The Five-Year Plan, when finally adopted, forced quantitative production at the expense of quality. Terrific suffering resulted from the need to build capital at the expense of consumers' goods. Collectivization, too long delayed and too quickly forced, drove the peasantry to kill more than half their livestock and created the famine of 1932. A bureaucracy rushing through such an ambitious plan of socialist construction under such primitive conditions could do so only through terrorism, which feeds on scapegoats. Hence the belated adoption of "Trotskyism" led to ever more terroristic attacks on Trotskyism, which came to include all criticism; and in turn this erratic terror frightened the bureaucracy out of its creative wits into technological and executive conformity.

That labor in Russia is exploited, Soviet statistics, weighted as they are to hide the fact, clearly indicate. In 1935 the average wage per person, if one democratically includes both the director of a trust and the cleaning woman, was about 2,300 rubles. But the real average wages of the Soviet masses ranged from 1,200 to 1,500 rubles, which meant destitution under the prevailing prices. And rising above the masses are the Stakhanovites, earning more than 1,000 rubles a month through a system of speed-up based on piece work. At the top, of course, is the privileged bureaucracy, whose income can be measured not only in money but in the perquisites of status. The Thermidor has formulated a grotesque paraphrase of the famous Marxist dictum: From the workers according to their ability, to the bureaucrats according to their needs.

So much for "socialism in one country," which has been stabilized by the new constitution. This constitution permits voting by secret plebiscite, for alternative men and measures within the party line. It permits freedom of speech, conscience, and assembly within the dictates of the politbureau. It allows the inheritance of personal goods, of the hut of the mujik no less than the country estate of the high commissar. And it abolishes economic representation in favor of geographical parliamentarianism. The international diplomacy of "socialism in one country" we have seen.

The struggle between Trotsky and Stalin, who are but two symbols, will go on as long as the world is in a revolutionary ferment. It is the struggle between October and the Thermidor in the Soviet Union, their refraction upon the world stage, their respective significance to the working class. Stalinism is in power. Trotskyism accepts too rigorously the Marxian metaphysics of power to gain the "permanent revolution" in a dislocated world. But Trotsky himself is, I believe, winning over the Thermidor in his influence on the world intelligentsia, and is likely to grow as the revolutionary conscience of the European proletarian vanguard. And the reasons for this amazing career lie in his personality, in his many-sided genius as historian, indomitable revolutionary, and man of action.

Leon Trotsky's Failure

BY LOUIS FISCHER

FORMERLY Trotsky claimed the policies of agricultural collectivization and super-industrialization as his own. "Stalin," the Trotskyists said, "threw Trotsky out and then stole his ideas." In this book Trotsky has no difficulty in disproving these contentions.

"To the growth of individual farming in the country," the Trotskyist program declared in 1926, "we must oppose a swifter growth of the collective farms. It is necessary systematically year by year to set aside a considerable sum to aid the poor peasants organized in collectives." There had been collectives in Soviet Russia since 1921. Trotsky wanted to give them more financial aid so that they could continue to compete with individual farming, which was growing and which he did not propose to suppress. It was assumed that by this method (p. 73) "the socialist transformation of agriculture . . . would be accomplished in the course of decades." Trotsky would never have been Trotsky had he urged the destruction of private capitalism in the villages and the quick, nationwide socialization of farming; he did not believe in that. His theory of permanent revolution led him to think that the Bolsheviks could merely hold on to the socialist "commanding heights" in the cities until the world revolution enabled them to introduce socialist farming. It was largely because Trotsky did not foresee the possibility of collectivizing Soviet agriculture that he rejected the Stalin thesis of socialism in one country.

Nor did the Trotskyist program demand the immediate crushing of the kulak. Trotsky wished to use the kulak. "To accelerate industrialization," reads one of the planks of the opposition platform in 1926, "in particular by way of increased taxation on the kulak." Now the kulaks were a threat, but there were not many millions of them and they were not very rich. Trotsky's policies of increased taxation and a forced loan would soon have produced passive resistance and the refusal to feed the city. Actually this happened in 1927. A Five-Year Plan financed by the few golden eggs of the kulak goose would have failed. Stalin financed the plan by means of inflation. That was at heavy cost, but no other way was open. Trotsky, however, opposed inflation. In 1927 his platform demanded "a guaranty of the unconditional stability of the money unit," and in 1932: "Stop the process of inflation with an iron hand." This would have stopped industrialization, and Trotsky indeed admits that "the defenders of 'tortoise tempo' and the super-industrializers had, it seemed, temporarily changed places." Permanently, not temporarily. The Trotskyists had no sooner advocated super-industrialization in 1926 than they retreated from it in 1927.

Herein lies the explanation of Trotsky's fall. With exemplary courage Trotsky in this book faces the question of "why Stalin triumphed." Why is it that the scintillating Trotsky with all his grand ideas was defeated by the "mediocre" Stalin? Trotsky's answer is an unsatisfactory amalgam. There was a reaction after the revolution, the masses were tired, the demobilized Red Army commanders carried military discipline back into civilian life, "the outstanding representatives of the working class either died in the civil war or rose a few steps higher and broke away from the masses," and the Soviet population was despondent after the defeat of revolutionary attempts abroad. This complete lack of faith in the reproductive powers of the revolution helps to explain why Trotsky today lives in Mexico City. Revolution devours its children and produces more and better children. The history of the U. S. S. R. proves this every day, but Trotsky has no faith in the second generation of revolutionists. He says: "As for the young bureaucrats, they have been chosen and educated by the elders, frequently from among their own offspring. [This, incidentally, is one of Trotsky's many unproved and unprovable calumnies.] These people could not have achieved the October revolution, but they were perfectly suited to exploit it." The unfairness of such a statement is patent. Kaganovich, Zhdanov, Postishev, Beria, Mezhlauk, and numerous other Soviet leaders of today, most of them now in their forties, were too young to play prominent roles in 1917.

Trotsky mentions all the factors which in his opinion led to the repression of his faction in 1928. He has forgotten one. On November 7, 1927, he personally attempted to stage an anti-Stalin demonstration in the streets of Moscow while the garrison and the civil population were parading through the Red Square. Had the attempt succeeded, the result would have been a Trotskyist coup d'état. This was a desperate last card which drew retaliatory arrests, and it failed, as Trotskyism had to fail in the Soviet Union, because its leader had nothing to offer. His policy was to trust in the world revolution, which, however, was receding into the background as a result of the stabilization of capitalism after 1924, and in the meantime not to build socialism in Russia by means of super-industrialization and collectivization. Such a negative program would have paralyzed the country's spirit and produced the worst kind of reaction. In spite of the stagnation of the world revolutionary movement, Stalin knew how to stimulate a new revolutionary élan for domestic upbuilding. This is his greatest service. It made possible vast achievements in village and city.

Trotsky pays perfunctory tribute to this progress in a brief first chapter, and devotes the rest of his book to criticism filled with bitterness and hatred of the Soviet regime. Years of persecution must inevitably result in such bitterness and hatred, but these are not qualities which produce a trustworthy book on Soviet conditions. The volume is full of warped perspectives and myriads of affirmations whose fine literary style and emphasis are no substitute for the proof which is absent. With greater justice, if one trusts in the material and spiritual reserves of the revolution, a writer could devote one chapter to the numerous and serious shortcoming of the Soviet Union and the remainder of his space to its great victories. If, because the Webbs and Pritt, the great British lawyer and member of Parliament, reacted favorably to Soviet events, Trotsky can say that the former wrote their big work on the U. S. S. R. under the "dictation" of the "Soviet bureaucracy" and that the latter is in the pay of Moscow, he does not seem to possess the judicious attitude necessary for an assessment of Soviet changes. This is a book by Trotsky on Stalin's life work, and one can no more expect objectivity in it than one could expect objectivity in a book by Stalin on Trotsky's role in the revolution. It is a highly polemical, fighting book full of debaters' tricks.

In general, the book does not assume much knowledge of the U. S. S. R. or of socialist theory on the part of its readers. The result is that many of its theoretical sections lay Trotsky open to the charge of perverting Marxist teaching. He quotes (p. 60) from a Pravda article: "During the second five-year period the last relics of capitalist elements in our economy will be liquidated." Thereon Trotsky comments: "From the point of view of this perspective the state ought conclusively to die away during the same period, for where the 'last relics' of capitalism are liquidated the state has nothing to do."

This Trotskyist stand is contrary to communist doctrine and common sense. Lenin said, in describing the characteristics of socialism, which he, like Marx, called the first or lowest phase of communism: "The state is withering away in so far as there are no longer any capitalists, any classes, and consequently no class can be suppressed. But the state has not yet altogether withered away since there still remains the protection of 'bourgeois law,' which sanctifies real inequality. For the complete extinction of the state complete communism is necessary."

Trotsky believes that when capitalism is finished, the state disappears. But Lenin believed, with Marx, that the state would still exist. This is pivotal to Trotsky's philosophy, for he suggests that since the state has not withered away, as he thinks it should under socialism, there is no socialism in the Soviet Union. Moreover, he is surprised that inequalities linger in the U. S. S. R. Marx, Engels, and Lenin, on the other hand, always foresaw inequality as a characteristic of the first stage of communism. The petit-bourgeois intellectuals, to whom in recent years Trotsky has made his greatest appeal, apparently supposed that the demise of capitalism would immediately snuff out all injustice and inequality. But Marx pointed out that socialism would, in its early years, be "in every respect tainted economically, morally, and intellectually with the hereditary diseases of the old society from whose womb it is emerging." Only a dreamer or a blind critic would expect the Soviet Union to be a perfect society already. Trotsky's term "socialist equality" is a contradiction within itself.

Nobody knows the laws governing the emergence of a socialist system. There has never been one before. Marx and Lenin refused to predict how and in what period the state would wither away. It is logical that to be able to wither away with safety, a socialist regime must first be strong enough to crush all its internal enemies and be reasonably secure against foreign attack. Withering away, therefore, is not a process which begins the moment the revolution breaks out. There is first a crescendo of state power and then a gradual diminuendo. In the U. S. S. R. this latter phase set in, naturally enough, with the destruction of village capitalists. It expresses itself in the severe limitations on the G. P. U. and in the promulgation of the new Soviet constitution by which the Soviet state apparatus and the Communist Party abdicate parts of their prerogative. Trotsky attaches too little importance to these epochal reforms. It is difficult for him to believe that the bureaucracy will undermine itself. Yet that is the very reason for the newly introduced secret ballot. Trotsky quotes Stalin to this effect (p. 65). He does not even try to refute Stalin's assertion. In fact, he partly accepts it. But to accept it altogether would mean to scrap his entire thesis of the omnipotence and self-perpetuation of the bureaucracy.

The evolution of inequality is as uncharted as the disappearance of the state. Trotsky himself says (p. 67) that "a successful socialist construction is unthinkable without including in the planned system a direct personal interest of the producer and the consumer, their egoism." That is right and that is the basis of Soviet inequality. Whether there will be more or less inequality this year than in the year before depends on circumstances. Trotsky contends that "so long as it is impossible to guarantee genuine equality," in other words, as long as socialism lasts, there is an "iron necessity to give birth to and support a privileged minority." The only question is whether with advancing prosperity this minority must not grow into a majority. By becoming a Stakhanovist (efficient worker) or by taking courses which are open to all, anyone can immediately join the "privileged." An aristocracy, however, limits its membership.

Even Trotsky, to the embarrassment, if that were possible, of Max Eastman, his "friend and confidant," admits that "the distribution of this earth's goods in the Soviet Union, we do not doubt, is incomparably more democratic than it was in Czarist Russia, and even than it is in the most democratic countries of the West." With the improvement of Soviet productivity and technique the disparity between the real incomes of engineers, high officials, and workingmen is reduced. Stakhanovism leads in that direction. Trotsky maintains in a whole chapter that until Soviet productivity of labor is higher than capitalist productivity of labor there can be no full socialism. All agree. Socialism would be an anomaly unless it advanced beyond capitalism. But Soviet Russia began as a very backward nation and, leaving Czarist standards far behind, has made gigantic strides toward modern technical proficiency. Over a period of years, with a planned economy eliminating the waste of under-capacity production, of economic depressions, of competition, and of commercial advertising, labor is perhaps already more productive in the U. S. S. R. as in the average capitalist land. Moreover, recent events in the air of Spain have demonstrated that Soviet technique may be superior not only to German and Italian technique but even to French and American. This is one instance. There are more, and there will be many more. The U. S. S. R.'s prospects are limitless.

Judgments about events to come depend on one's attitude to the present. Trotsky is pessimistic about Soviet trends unless the present leadership is overthrown. The friends of the U. S. S. R., whom he belabors with such ineffective scorn, are optimistic. Moreover, the devotion of the Soviet masses to loyalist Spain and the performance of Soviet citizens in Spain fortify a deep-seated faith in the health, strength, and self-curative qualities of the Bolshevik revolution. The illnesses which Trotsky diagnoses and exaggerates with such glee will pass as others have.

The Price Boom

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

LABOR is in the saddle, the newspapers say. As wage increase follows wage increase, the impression spreads that labor is at last about to enter the promised land. The public is being told that big business is not only willing to meet labor halfway but is actually sharing the profits of prosperity with labor in truly New Deal fashion.

The only justification for this legend is to be found in the belated and modest 5 and 10 per cent wage increases which industry is generally bestowing upon labor. The wage increases in the headlines, moreover, tell only half the story. Behind the headlines, in the financial pages at the back of the paper, market reports reveal booming prices out of all proportion to the easily absorbed rise in labor costs. Wages have risen. But the rise has already been completely and shamefully outstripped by the price boom.

Some notion of what is in store for wage-earning and middle-class families may be gathered from the cost-of-living index compiled by the National Industrial Conference Board. In the short space of a month, from January to February, the index jumped 3 per cent—a spectacular rise. It now stands 4.4 per cent above the level for February, 1936, and 21.6 per cent above its April, 1933, low. The price of clothing rose 9 per cent from January to February; rents rose 7 per cent in that period. The purchasing power of the 1923 dollar, which was 119.8 cents in February, 1936, had fallen to 115.1 cents in January, 1937, and by February, 1937, it stood at only 114.7 cents. Nevertheless, the price boom has not yet seriously affected the industries selling goods in the retail mass market. It is still confined to the industries which supply the fabricating and consumers'-goods industries. Its full impact upon the cost of living will not be felt until, for example, higher copper prices show in radio prices and higher cotton prices in the cost of shirts.

At bottom, the boom is speculative. It is based upon the anticipation of an indefinitely prolonged recovery, extended by armament orders the world over. For this reason the first commodities to be pushed up to 1918 levels were the metals, the raw materials of heavy industry. Leading the metal boom was copper. Last September, when the British rearmament program was beginning to stimulate copper demand, "the quotations of Northern Rhodesian copper producers continued to advance" on the London Stock Exchange. Forewarned, these companies might have been expected to increase production. They did the opposite. The report of the British South Africa Company, which derives a good part of its income from its holdings in the three leading African copper mines, is revealing. The company's royalties rose by $2,000,000 over its 1935 income. But the copper produced by these three mines in 1936 actually fell 20,000 tons below the 1935 figure as a result of the copper producers' restriction agreement, which was permitted to remain in force long after the boom began.

The consequence of this deliberately provoked copper shortage is reflected in the American metal market. For the better part of a year foreign demand has been forcing up the American price from 7 to 9 cents to its present peak of 17 cents. Seventeen-cent copper has brought undreamed of prosperity to Western mining companies. The case of the Calumet and Hecla mine is typical. During 1936 the company did quite well, producing nearly 60,000,000 pounds of copper at a cost of 6.2 cents a pound, and nearly 20,000,000 pounds at a cost of 4.51 cents, and averaging 9.80 cents a pound on sales. Certainly the company enjoyed a fair profit margin. With copper at 17 cents, the margin is doubled; no lobby would have dared demand as much. This unhealthy profit inflation is shared by the rest of the industry. Anaconda Wire and Cable announces a 62 per cent jump over 1935 in manufacturing profit and a 122 per cent advance in net income. Phelps Dodge reports that 1936 net income rose 85 per cent over 1935. The Phelps Dodge statement, moreover, reveals that "as a result of last year's large sales of copper the company has only nominal stocks" left. Anaconda and Kennecott, the industry's leading units, are opening their marginal, hitherto unprofitable mines. Both companies report a disparity between production increase and profit rise in 1936.

The copper shortage is duplicated by the lead shortage. At its recent meeting the St. Joseph Lead Company, the world's largest producer, deplored the price advance as "unhealthy," and admitted that the buying wave provoked by it had left the St. Joe Company alone in the industry with substantial stocks on hand. The tale of zinc is still more alarming. The supply, according to the American Zinc Institute, has sunk to its lowest level "in years." And the ravages of the depression have left many refineries in such condition that "an increase in output can be achieved only gradually." The production of tin was also drastically curtailed in the effort to bolster prices, which are now following the same spectacular course as those of the other metals. By March 10 tin had passed 66 cents a pound and was selling above the average for every year since 1918.

The astonishing course of the metal boom is accurately summarized by the American Metal Market, a trade paper whose index weighs the several metals by tonnage and market importance. Its composite average of metal prices had fallen to 6.824 cents for the years 1930-34. By 1936 it had rallied to 8.245 cents. On March 10 it stood at 13.065 cents—a bare .03 of a cent below the 1929 high and only some 3 cents below the war-time top. Thus metal prices have anticipated the upward movement of the business cycle. And their action may very well prove disastrous to the recovery curve. For the cost of industrial production—and as a consequence ultimate retail prices—has been jacked up to boom heights while mass income has only begun to climb. The strain which the metal boom has put upon recovery is indicated by the news that the rise in the price of tin is stimulating frantic research into the efficacy of aluminum, glass, and cardboard as substitutes, and that copper prices are provoking similar interest in the uses of aluminum and stainless steel. The touch of Ersatz rounds out the character of this war boom.

The metal boom has already had an ominous effect on the steel market. In spite of the successive Detroit strikes Automotive Industries reports that the automobile industry is going into spring production with inadequate steel stocks in hand. Steel orders have risen 40 per cent above the February level. The steel companies are opening their books for the second quarter of the year, but they have no steel to sell. And steel's customers, taking their cue from copper's customers, are panic-stricken by the combination of price boom and shortage. Far from giving them pause, the drastic increases in steel prices are whipping them up to buy everything in sight. The magazine Steel reports "buying undisturbed by price advances." Because of European arms demand, "thousands of tons of pig iron have been shipped out of the country . . . and imports are dwindling" to zero. United States Steel is now paying dearly for the reactionary technological policy to which it has long adhered. The rush for steel has grown overnight, and while it finds the steel industry producing at over 90 per cent of capacity, the figure for United States Steel is nearer 85 per cent. The corporation is blowing in admittedly obsolete and inefficient furnaces. But in a sellers' market anything goes.

In this whirl the trumps are in labor's hands. Steel must be produced. Costs are no longer a consideration. Each new upward surge on the copper market adds to the steel momentum. When the price of ferromanganese rose $15 a ton and chromium $11.50 a ton, industry barely noticed the effect upon steel prices. And so with labor costs. The steel industry must pay any wage demanded of it. Instead, however, of being made to compensate labor for years of niggardliness, the corporations have been able to turn the recent wage increase to their own advantage. For after the $2.80 to $3 a ton wage increase has been added to the increased cost of raw materials, the increase of $5.50 a ton to the selling price leaves the manufacturers with an increased profit margin of some 50 to 70 cents a ton. In short, prices have risen ahead of wages or even raw materials. As the inflation spreads from industry to industry, prices rise more and more steeply. And already the boom is felt beyond the steel industry. The Journal of Commerce bears witness that "manufacturers of industrial machinery . . . are seeking protection for profit margins by inserting clauses in new contracts giving them the right to raise prices in the event labor costs are revised upwards"; this before what was the copper ripple and what has become the steel wave have inundated the consumers'-goods market.

Rising prices are not confined to metals. Rubber, which costs about 7 cents a pound to produce, is selling at 27 cents, with 30 cents and more foreseen as its goal. Production quotas are being lifted, but the market remains insatiable. Under the influence of the rubber boom tire prices have been raised 6 per cent, the fourth advance within a year, and a fifth advance has already been announced. Hides also have risen, from 11 cents to 15¾ cents in a year. Shoe prices are following suit. Last month shoe prices rose 5 to 10 per cent. This month one national chain has advanced women's shoes from $1.98 to $2.19, and a Chicago chain plans a 12½ per cent increase. Lumber is showing the same tendency, prices having been advanced after the settlement of the Pacific Coast marine workers' strike. Now the sawmill workers are demanding an increase, and the owners have announced that prices will rise with wages. The textile raw materials are paralleling the metals. Cotton, for which Mr. Roosevelt once foresaw a relapse to the "horse-and-buggy" price of 6 cents, has gone to 15 cents. Silk, only a month ago wobbling with the yen and the Tokyo Cabinet, leaped ahead 3½ to 6 cents in a day. Rayon companies, unable to cope with the volume of advance buying, are expanding their capacity by 20 to 50 per cent.

In one pre-consumption-goods industry after another manufacturers are buying desperately, their eyes fixed on the calendar. They want to be covered on raw materials when autumn comes. And what if the spending public, remembering the last depression, balks at paying war-time prices? Industry will have only itself to blame for the panic into which the boom can collapse. Meanwhile the moral of the price boom is not lost upon the more responsible sections of the business community. Commenting upon the military roots of the metal boom, the great London metal house of Brandeis, Goldschmidt says, "What normal trade and common sense could not do, distrust and fear have accomplished."

Labor cannot ride high on a prosperity wave that rises with war preparations. The price boom, in its onslaught upon living standards, is the first forerunner of the crisis which a new 1914 will inevitably prepare for the labor movement.

Reconstruction in Puerto Rico

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

RECONSTRUCTION is the one hope of Puerto Rico, whether it remains a possession of the United States or achieves independence. Reconstruction is the effort—started years too late—to conquer overpopulation, economic misery, political unrest, and to establish sanitation and economic well-being in the island. This contest is all-important today. How does it stand? What is its program? Is it planning for the long pull ahead, and does it really mean to grapple with the fundamental economic evils? These are vital questions.

The Puerto Rican reconstruction policy of the Department of the Interior is based largely upon the Chardon Report, drawn up in 1934 by the Puerto Rico Policy Commission, composed of three Puerto Ricans—Carlos E. Chardon, at that time chancellor of the University of Puerto Rico, R. Menendez Ramos, Commissioner of Agriculture and Commerce, and Professor R. Fernandez Garcia, head of the university's department of chemistry. The report was a careful study of economic conditions with recommendations for progress and reform. Among its fundamental proposals was the recapture of the land for the people from the sugar companies. Emigration and industrialization were mentioned; birth-control, so obviously essential to deal with the dreadful overpopulation, was casually alluded to. For the work of reconstruction a total amount of $42,000,000 was set aside in Washington; and this first attempt to reorganize Puerto Rico on a large scale was enthusiastically welcomed.

Today the ardor of some of the liberal and radical groups for reconstruction has cooled. They charge that its original underlying purposes have been altered for the worse and that a different emphasis is being put upon the program by the administrator, Dr. Ernest H. Gruening, to whom the President two years ago assigned this task in addition to his duties as Director of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions of the Department of the Interior. It is declared that progress is too slow, that the land problem is not being advanced aggressively, that considerable money has been wasted; and the critics resent several dismissals from the P. R. R. A. These criticisms of Dr. Gruening come largely from those who were formerly his personal friends among the liberals and who were at first ardent supporters of the program. As I see the situation, after a brief survey, it is this: There have been mistakes, lost motion, and some waste, such as are inevitable in every pioneering undertaking—certainly they have been found in every relief and reconstruction project on the mainland. But it is a plan to reconstruct Puerto Rico by Puerto Ricans according to a Puerto Rican program—a gigantic and complex program which in the main has been tackled boldly and effectively. For the mistakes made by himself personally and by those whom he picked as subordinates Dr. Gruening will have to shoulder the responsibility; but on the whole, from what I could see in driving through the island, the P. R. R. A. is doing a big job of the greatest worth and significance, under an able director, Miles H. Fairbank. I do not believe it is now possible to maintain that there has been treason to the fundamental policy of Puerto Rico for the Puerto Ricans, but time will show.

Let us return to the four vital proposals for saving Puerto Rico. It is true that the Administration has failed to carry on with two of them—birth control and immigration. Birth-control clinics were started in fifteen places and then closed after protests from Catholic sources. The answer is that Franklin Roosevelt was a candidate for reelection, and his campaign manager, James A. Farley, is a very good Catholic. At any rate, without direct proof, I venture my reputation on the assertion that the order to shut down the clinics did not originate with Dr. Gruening. As to moving large masses of people from the island to the American mainland, or to foreign countries, that is something to be handled in Washington only by Dr. Gruening's superiors. It is the State Department which would have to negotiate with Santo Domingo or Venezuela, and so far as I am aware neither Secretary Hull nor President Roosevelt has moved. It seems to me that Secretary Ickes might have sought before this to move some thousands to certain of our states—with the aid and consent of Congress. The excuse is, I suppose, that a government dealing with resettlement projects at home, especially for those ousted by the purchase of submarginal farm lands, and with the victims of dust storms and floods, has had its hands rather full. But these excuses do not offset the fact that the government must act in this situation; criticism of the delay is justified.

With respect to industrialization, some efforts are under way, but until the obstacles which have prevented private capital from establishing factories and industrial undertakings of various kinds are removed, and some way of preventing "dumping" by mainland firms is worked out, nothing far-reaching will be achieved. The government is building a cement factory to produce cement for the P. R. R. A. at a saving of at least 50 cents a barrel. Various rural electric projects are well on the road to completion—electrification is essential if there is to be large-scale industrialization. The rehabilitation program of various areas calls for warehouses, canning plants, refrigerating facilities and abattoirs, distributing centers and community workshops for woodworking and the making of clay products and clothing. But profoundly to affect conditions many millions more will be needed.

The fourth and most important large-scale proposal for reconstruction is the recapture of the land. Here is where Dr. Gruening's administration is most severely criticized. The first step, about which the controversy centers, was the purchase for $3,500,000 of the Centrale Lafayette (centrale is the Puerto Rican name for a great sugar mill), with its 10,000 acres of land, for the purpose of a radical experiment—the ousting of the foreign, absentee owners and the making over of the enterprise into a workers' and small planters' cooperative undertaking. The high price paid may be responsible for the failure to take over other mills as well; perhaps the administration also thought it wise to make sure that the Lafayette plan could be carried out successfully before risking more money, but the disappointment that other and smaller concerns were not taken over simultaneously remains. Not unnaturally, changes have been made as the experiment has developed. The idea, in broad outlines, is that an industrial cooperative shall run the mill and a central service cooperative shall purchase and control agricultural machinery and furnish management and buying and selling facilities to the members of the planters' and the workers' cooperatives. Planters' cooperatives are to be organized in each of the tracts of less than 500 acres into which the sugar lands are to be divided. Plainly this means a cumbersome and involved organization, calling for a good deal of knowledge on the part of the workers. Many critics feel that it is too complicated to succeed. In addition, submarginal sugar lands are to be exchanged for good sugar lands, on which the cane-field laborers are to be settled, to enable them to do subsistence crop-raising when unemployed, and gradually to purchase their homes and small acreages.

The mere outline of this program shows how extraordinarily difficult and far-reaching it is, involving as it does social, financial, economic, and labor questions in addition to the ordinary business problems of operating a big sugar enterprise. It is further complicated by the colonos, or small, independent cane-growers, whose numbers are steadily decreasing (from 58,371 in 1910 to 52,965 in 1930; 65 per cent of the entire crop of 7,710,000 tons produced in 1935 was harvested on the lands of sugar companies). These colonos are often victimized by unscrupulous mill-owners who falsify weights or chemical analyses upon which payments are based. Hence the Lafayette experiment, which will grind cane for neighboring colonos, is of the utmost importance to the small cane-grower. Now it is obvious that in such a huge undertaking there are bound to be differences of opinion; that mistakes will be made. To form a judgment as to whether the critics of the undertaking are right, time will be necessary. Meanwhile the experiment of operating the mill, which began only with this cutting season, was going well when I visited it. The whole undertaking is dependent for its success upon the world price of sugar and the retention of the present allotment of sugar which Puerto Rico is allowed to send to the mainland for consumption. So far as I could perceive, there is no effort to ignore the fundamental purpose of this great human and economic experiment, which is a revolutionary dividing up of the land of the large owners.

Undoubtedly, Dr. Gruening's chief mistake was that on coming to Puerto Rico he chose for his coworkers the men whom he knew best, in whom he had the most confidence, who sponsored the general program. He failed to take into consideration that they were nearly all of one party. Unfortunately, the Puerto Rican is exceptionally politically minded, and so the public came to believe that Dr. Gruening was creating in the P. R. R. A. a political machine intended to build up the Liberal, that is, the minority, Party, when he had no such intention. Subsequently the disagreements which arose in the P. R. R. A., Dr. Gruening's bitter dismissal of Professor Garcia as head of the Rural Rehabilitation Division, the resignation of Professor Chardon, and the allegations—flatly denied by the P. R. R. A. heads—that radical changes were made without Professor Garcia's knowledge to the injury of the sugar program alienated friends and supporters. It is also felt that Dr. Gruening has changed his attitude toward independence and is now openly hostile to it, after having said it was for the Puerto Ricans to decide. The conservatives cannot forget that Dr. Gruening came to the island with the reputation of being closely allied with the liberal movement, in addition to having been that most terrible of creatures, an editor of The Nation. While not denying his mistakes, I maintain that no one could have tackled this particularly difficult problem of Puerto Rican reconstruction without antagonizing some people. Into the details of all the controversies it is perfectly impossible to enter. Meanwhile, Dr. Gruening can greatly relieve the grave tension by making it plain that the desire for independence will not be considered by anyone in authority as synonymous with enmity to the United States and that no one will be punished for espousing it. It is a situation so difficult as to call for superhuman patience.

Finally, I wish that I had space to record the many other accomplishments of the P. R. R. A. and also those of the Puerto Rico Emergency Relief Administration, the predecessor and coadjutor of the P. R. R. A. I can only add that of the seventy-five workers' reconstruction camps being developed those I visited are full of promise. Selected men are being trained there in sanitation, diet, and other requisites of successful homesteading. The P. R. R. A. hires laborers to work on the reconstruction of plantations and gets from the planters in return three acres of average land at half its appraised value, to be purchased by the laborer on long-time payments. Many cement homes have already been built, completely sanitary, vermin- and rat-proof, and safe against hurricanes—also utterly unattractive, suggesting only mausoleums. Then there is a superb reforestation program, and many other plans. It is all only a beginning; it calls for experimentation, for trial and error, and a readiness to rise above party lines and personal antagonisms so that the general welfare shall benefit. But economic safety may yet be achieved if there is adequate unselfish cooperation on the island, if justice rules in Washington, and not the selfishness of privilege and conscienceless business.

[The first of Mr. Villard's two articles on Puerto Rico appeared last week. Next week he will resume his regular page, Issues and Men.]

Taxi Strike

BY GEROLD FRANK

Toledo, March

I WAS standing outside a hamburger joint on Adams Street where some of the striking cab drivers hung out, talking to a lanky, red-eyed driver. He was sore. "Seven bucks I got from the company yesterday," he said, waving a check in front of me. "I made it two weeks ago when they laid me off three days for going home to lunch."

"Three days?" I asked. "Three days just for going home to lunch?"

"I took the cab," he said. "Y'aint supposed to. Uses up gas, and one of the company men caught me. Well, like I said, I made this seven bucks two weeks ago—they keep a couple of weeks behind so if you run out they don't lose a penny on you—and they took off seven cents for the government and six bucks ninety-three—get it?—for accident insurance. Now, what's that leave me?"

I looked at the check. It was made out to Joe Wilson and after the dollar sign the word "none" had been typed in. "What I wanna know," Joe Wilson went on, "is, d'you think they'd write a story about the check if I took it down to the paper?"

"Don't you get any union benefit?" I asked.

"No," he said. "I ain't got my C. I. O. button yet. We're just joining up."

"Well," I asked, "how much would you make if you worked all week and they didn't lay you off?"

"Figure it out for yourself," he said. "Twelve bucks guaranteed if you take in thirty-six bucks a week. At a quarter a drag, that means twenty-four drags a day, and brother, take it from me, you hustle your head off plenty—if you're lucky." Another driver in a blue sweater, tall and broad-shouldered, came up. "You a driver?" he demanded. "Go on in. Get inside." We both went in.

It was a small, dark, cramped restaurant with a slot machine near the door and the Greek proprietor and his daughter behind the counter. They both had the same cast of face, the same noses, long, drawn to a point, flanges well marked, the same dark eyes. The place was crowded with drivers.

The tall, broad-shouldered driver in the blue sweater vaulted the counter and pulled a chair after him. He jumped up on it. "Now you guys lis'n to me!" he shouted. "I wanna talk. When I get through I'll answer questions, and if anyone else wants to talk, he can go ahead, see?" He paused. "Now, whatawe want?" He answered himself. "We want twen-ty-one bucks a week, see, and nothin' under!"

"You said it, pal!" someone shouted.

Broad-shoulders put up a hand for silence. He was big and rawboned and powerful, and he bore down on you with his gray eyes.

"You guys, each 'n every individually one," he said, "lis'n to me. Yuh can't live on twelve bucks a week. It's no go! Every individually one, no one goes ona streets until we get that contract! Yuh know who's behind yuh? Yuh got the C. I. O.! The C. I. O.!" He shouted it, with a pause after each word. "Them sonovabitches, they gotta—" He stopped short and turned quickly to the girl. She was behind the cash register, leaning languidly on one elbow on the white tile counter. "Excuse me, lady," he said politely, but she did not change a muscle in her face. "Them guys gotta pay yuh a livin' wage! And d'yuh know what'll happen if they don't?"

"Yah, what'll happen?" a man challenged. "Tell us."

Broad-shoulders opened his mouth, stopped, took a long breath. He leaned forward and began gesturing before the words came. "Are there ten thousan' teamsters an' cooks an' bus drivers in Toledo? I'm askin'!"

"No!" someone retorted, and laughed. Broad-shoulders went on as though he had not heard.

"That's what'll happen," he said. "Ten thousan' teamsters an' cooks an' drivers are with yuh. They're C. I. O.! They'll stick with yuh! They're right behind yuh!" He paused and breathed deeply again. "And d'yuh know what yuh gotta do? It's t'come across with that deuce spot, them two dollars dues. Yuh gotta be organized!"

"Where yuh gonna get that deuce spot?" someone demanded.

Broad-shoulders picked him out with a long, pointing forefinger. "O.K.," he said, and pulled at his belt and looked around. "I've been asked a question. O.K. I'll answer it. Now lis'n. Yuh know the C. I. O. said yuh got thirty days—thirty days yuh got from the time we win this goddam strike and go back ona street—to raise that deuce spot. Now, if any guy here can't make two measly bucks in thirty days workin' steady on twenty-one bucks a week"—he paused and drove home his point by swinging his arm violently downward—"then that guy shouldn' be ona street!" He leaned forward suddenly. "You," he said. "Did I answer your question?"

"Yessir," said the questioner promptly. "You answered it. I got my answer."

"O.K.," said Broad-shoulders. "Now I'm askin' yuh, are we all stickin' together? Are we all bringin' in that deuce spot for the C. I. O.?"

They all shouted then, and the girl behind the counter relaxed and smiled, and the Greek grinned too and jokingly thrust out the first and fourth fingers of his right hand in a mock evil-eye sign at one of the drivers, and then they opened the door and surged out. "What I wanna know," said a voice in my ear, and I saw it was the lanky, red-eyed driver, "is, d'you think they'd write a story about it if I took it down?"

Now ready!

THE CONSUMERS UNION 1937

BUYING GUIDE

A 240 page handbook

containing ratings of hundreds of products by brand name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable"—including—

AUTOMOBILES—New AUTOMOBILES—Used
(years and models likely to be good buys)
BLANKETS, wool
BREAD
CANNED FRUITS AND VEGETABLES
CEREALS
COLD AND HEADACHE REMEDIES
COSMETICS DRUGS
ELECTRIC SHAVERS
FLOUR
FOUNTAIN PENS
GASOLINES
HAIR DYES
HOSIERY

CHILDREN'S CLOTHING
MEN'S SUITS, SHIRTS AND SOCKS
LIQUORS AND WINES
MOTOR OIL
MECHANICAL REFRIGERATORS
MEN'S, WOMEN'S AND CHILDREN'S SHOES
SOAPS
SHAVING SOAPS AND CREAMS
ELECTRIC TOASTERS
TOOTH PASTES AND POWDERS
TIRES
TOMATO JUICE
VACUUM CLEANERS
VEGETABLE SEEDS

—and many other products.

Get this Buying Guide by mailing coupon now!

Consumers Union Reports for April on:

COLD CREAMS

"... particularly blatant example of cosmetic quackery," says the American Medical Association's Bureau of Investigation of a certain grossly over-priced cold cream. Find out which brand this is in the April issue of Consumers Union Reports. Fifty-four brands, ranging in price from $1.53 per ounce (dry weight) to 2.6 cents per ounce, are rated.

MEN'S SHIRTS

Twelve brands of men's shirts, ranging from inexpensive mail order brands to popular $2.50 and $3 brands, were subjected to laboratory tests for shrinkage, wearing qualities, etc. The results of this test and of tests on other products are given in this issue.

GARDENING

Special knowledge and skill are required to raise vegetables which compare favorably with market produce. A special article on GARDENING in this issue helps you to acquire this knowledge; gives valuable hints on soil conditions, and rates several brands of fertilizers.

RADIO SETS

Supplementing a report in the November issue on lower-priced radios, this report rates more than ten popular models ranging in price from $60 to $200. Coming issues will contain reports on automobile radios.

AUTOMOBILES

Concluding the report on 1937 automobiles begun in the March issue (which covered the lower-priced cars), this report gives you automotive engineers' opinions on cars delivering in the $1000-$1500 price range. Ratings are given by Labor conditions under which made also reported.

INDEXED for ready reference and conveniently sized to fit the pocket or handbag, this new 1937 BUYING GUIDE issued by Consumers Union of U. S., Inc., will save you time and money while shopping. It will enable you to choose intelligently among the products offered you, by giving you in compact form and in terms of brand names, the results of laboratory tests of the specific products you are considering purchasing.

Every American family should have this handbook. If you want to know which vacuum cleaner tested by expert appliance engineers removed the most dirt from carpets; which bedsheets or shirts are likely to stand laundering best; which cold creams are free from impurities and least expensive; which cold and headache remedies are safe and which are harmful; which liquors are the "Best Buys"; which automobile tires gave the greatest mileage in actual road tests—this GUIDE will tell you, quickly and definitely. You cannot buy the 1937 BUYING GUIDE. But you can get it by becoming a member of Consumers Union.

The material in it is compiled from tests conducted throughout the year by the technical staff and consultants of Consumers Union. Each month these technicians report on standard products; their recommendations are listed by brand name as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," or "Not Acceptable." These reports come to you in a monthly publication, Consumers Union Reports. Your membership in Consumers Union brings you, for the very nominal fee of $3 a year (or $1 a year for an abridged edition covering only the less expensive products): (1) these Reports for a full year; (2) the Annual Buying Guide as described above; (3) a vote in the control of the organization.

Consumers Union has no connection with any manufacturer, advertiser, or other commercial interest. Supported and controlled by its members, there are now close to 35,000 of these throughout the country—a number increasing at the rate of nearly a thousand a week. Consumers Union is organized under the laws of the State of New York as a strictly non-profit, membership organization, and its sole function is to provide consumers with accurate, unbiased information about the things they buy. Its President is Professor Colston E. Warne, of Amherst; its Director, Arthur Kallet, co-author of 100,000,000 Guinea Pigs; and its Technical Supervisor, D. H. Palmer, physicist and author of many papers on consumer problems. On its roster of directors and sponsors are many names well known in scientific, professional and educational fields.

Your membership (see coupon below) will bring you the 1937 BUYING GUIDE and twelve issues of Consumers Union Reports as issued monthly throughout the year. Some of the products reported on in the current (April) issue are described at the left. Your membership, however, can begin with any of the previous issues, as listed in the coupon.

MAIL THIS APPLICATION TODAY!

You Can Begin With Any of These Issues:

(Please check the issue wanted)

- ☐ JULY, 1936 — Refrigerators, Used Cars, Motor Oils.
- ☐ AUG.—Oil Burners and Stokers, Hosiery, Black List of Drugs and Cosmetics, Meat.
- ☐ SEPT.—Shoes, Tires, Whiskies, Women's Coats.
- ☐ OCT.—Men's Shirts, Gins, Electric Razors, Dentifrices, Anti-freeze Solutions.
- ☐ NOV.—Radios, Toasters, Wines, Children's Shoes, Winter Oils.
- ☐ DEC.—Vacuum Cleaners, Fountain Pens, Electric Irons, Blankets, Nose Drops.
- ☐ JAN.-FEB. — Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Shaving Creams, Children's Undergarments.
- ☐ MAR. 1937—Autos, Face Powders, Sheets, Flour, Canned Foods.
- ☐ APRIL—Radio Sets, Gardening, Autos, Shirts, Cold Creams.

To: CONSUMERS UNION of U. S., Inc.,
55 Vandam Street, New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

- ☐ $3 for one year's membership, $2.50 of which is for a year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports.
- ☐ $1 for one year's membership, 50c of which is for a year's subscription to the abridged edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note—Reports on higher-priced products are not in this edition.)

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is designated.

Signature

Address

City and State

Occupation N-4

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Revolutionary Conscience

BREAD AND WINE. By Ignazio Silone. Translated from the Italian by Gwenda David and Eric Mosbacher. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

ALTHOUGH "Fontamara," a story of peasant life in Fascist Italy, was unusual in its integration of a profound humanity with a materialist reading of reality, its scope was hardly wide enough to serve as a complete test of its author's talent. This second novel reveals Silone's full stature; he must now be recognized as one of the most truly contemporary and significant writers of our time. "Bread and Wine" strikes out into newer areas, coming to grips with problems so modern that fiction has scarcely touched them. The fate of the peasant is here intersected by the fate of the intellectual, and besides being an imaginative report of conditions under fascism, the book is also an audit of the revolutionary conscience.

If the intellectual's impetus toward Marxism has its primary source in his moral condemnation of existing society, does he not, then, really cheat himself when in trying to implement his ideals he comes to regard moral values as "petty-bourgeois prejudices" and to subordinate his spiritual and moral needs to the logic of professional politics? Moreover, does not this subordination lead, in the last instance, to utter loss of integrity and the impoverishment of life? Silone places this problem, considered so imprudent and irreverent that so far it has been largely ignored by proletarian writing, in the center of his questionings and perception; and in this sense he has indeed deepened the literature of which he is a part, for one of its tasks is to make the revolution as conscious of itself as it is of the social order it seeks to overthrow. To wrestle with this particular dilemma, however, means to lay oneself open to the perils of mysticism—and, in truth, Silone does not wholly evade these perils; yet the boldness of his effort more than compensates for any errors he may have committed.

In endowing his chief protagonist, Pietro Spina, with a consciousness and sensibility of the highest order, he makes him into a perfect instrument for the dissection of the revolutionary intellectual type. Repelled by the customs and insincerities of party politics (the identity of his party is, by the way, never established), Spina returns from exile to renew himself in underground revolutionary work in a country famished and intimidated, where everything, even hunger, has been bureaucratized. The peasants live in a state of "almost geological resignation," the workers are cowed, and the intellectuals are given a choice between becoming pariahs or state employees. Spina's task is twofold, practical as well as spiritual: while engaging in conspiratorial work he must simultaneously seek to discover the true morality of revolutionary action. Hence the story proceeds on two levels; it is both an ethical dialogue and a plot of active politics. But the two levels are symbolically unified at the very start when Spina, the better to elude the police, puts on the dark robes of a priest and is thus enabled to consecrate the new revolutionary mysteries in the very vestments of the old. He immerses himself in the life of the masses, living among peasants and small-town people and in Rome. In his encounters with the devout girl, Cristina, and with the rebellious priest, Don Benedetto, who sees the fascist dictatorship as Anti-Christ, he is compelled to redefine for himself the meaning of Christianity. Cristina represents the quietism of the church—she is under the spell of its opiate; but in Don Benedetto Spina perceives spiritual forces in which action and morality are reconciled. Personified in the episodes of his illness and the agony and death of his comrades in arms, this theme is developed to the conclusion that the revolutionary life, in our epoch the only genuine spirituality, must vindicate the destiny of man by repudiating "alike the destiny of the sheep and the destiny of the lion." Thus for him ethical passion becomes the motor-force of social change.

It seems to me that in his search for a lyric and heroic humanism Silone has not escaped idealist abstractions. His solution remains on the individual plane, since he indicates no method through which it could be effected within a mass movement or a political party. And from a Marxist standpoint, his sway toward the transcendental might perhaps be explained by the continued defeat of the revolutionary forces in Italy, just as the defeat of the 1905 revolution in Russia explains the "god-building" of Gorky and Lunacharsky in that period.

But even the weaknesses of this novel are organic to its material and to the reality which it encompasses. In posing the problems that it does it fertilizes literature with a new awareness, and the coming victory over fascism is foreshadowed in the strength of its cultural affirmation.

PHILIP RAHV

"Either—or"

EDUCATION AND THE CLASS STRUGGLE: A CRITICAL EXAMINATION OF THE LIBERAL EDUCATOR'S PROGRAM FOR SOCIAL RECONSTRUCTION. By Zalmen Slesinger. Covici-Friede. $3.

MR. SLESINGER'S book is an examination from a strict, somewhat ultra-orthodox, Marxian point of view of the ideas of a group of educators regarding the relation of education to social change. In many points, this group and Mr. Slesinger are in agreement as to the changes which need to be made in society, especially in its political and economic institutions. Both would move in the direction of greater organized social control and economic collectivism. The difference between them has to do with the methods by which radical social changes are to be effected. The group of educators that is criticized emphasizes the desirability of democratic processes, within which it includes public education as an important factor. Mr. Slesinger emphasizes at every point the class structure of society, the class struggle, and the transfer of power by a revolution brought about by force.

Mr. Slesinger's account is objective and refreshingly free from personalities. In his earlier chapters he gives a fair summary of the "liberal educators'" criticism of existing social institutions and their proposals for a new social order. He then places in contrast with their position that of contemporary Marxian Communists, with its emphasis upon class conflict as the sole dependable dynamic for effecting any social change that is significant. In three chapters on the class structure of American society he assembles many facts that are worthy of attention whether or not one gives them the exclusive economic and class interpretation the author adopts. As a minor point, I would remark that I think Mr. Slesinger fails to give sufficient weight to the fact that the men in question, writing as educators, are addressing themselves to educators, endeavoring to awaken teachers to the seriousness of the present social situation and the responsibilities of the school that result from that situation. Accordingly, he tends to take their program for educators as if it covered their whole conception of methods of bringing about radical social change. It does not follow that liberal educators are unaware of the importance of organization in bringing about change because, in addressing themselves to teachers, they stress the factors most directly connected with the work of teachers.

The important point, however, is the contrast set up between democratic processes and those of class conflict. Mr. Slesinger's book is noteworthy for the rigidity and completeness with which he presents an absolute "either-or" position. He leaves no option save that between individuals as individuals and economic classes set over against one another in total opposition. There is no place left for social interplay and modification of one group by another. Some curious inconsistencies result. After holding that the educational group greatly exaggerates the potential power of education, he remarks, "The intellectuals play a most strategic role in modern social life. They hold the keys for the functioning of our complicated world." I imagine most of the group he criticizes would regard this as a rather romantic view of the power of educators. Again, after holding that our whole society is class-structured economically, that its culture is class-structured, and that government is exclusively a tool of the dominant capitalistic class, he says, "The tragedy of the working class is internal strife and division. Lack of solidarity and unity is its present greatest weakness." He then goes on to give facts indicating that in the strict Marxian sense, in which class consciousness is an integral part of the class concept, American society is not in fact "class-structured" though it ought to be.

The book, aside from the assemblage of facts that should be considered seriously by every liberal, is chiefly noteworthy, it seems to me, for its presentation of the "nothing but, either-or" philosophy of society. Read in that light it may lead those who are not already committed to some form of social absolutism to reconsider the possibility of dependence upon democratic processes in bringing about fundamental social changes.

JOHN DEWEY

Letters in Vindication

THE LETTERS OF FANNY BRAWNE TO FANNY KEATS, 1820-1824. Oxford University Press. $3.

THE day Keats sailed for Italy, where he died, Fanny Brawne, eager to comply with his request, began her correspondence with his younger sister—the sister so like Tom. But because Keats had requested Fanny to keep their love secret, a century passed before justice was done and these letters published. They had traveled meantime among Fanny Keats's dearest possessions. They rest now at last in the Keats Memorial House, Hampstead.

These are the touching and brave letters of a twenty-year-

VIRGINIA WOOLF

Author of FLUSH: A BIOGRAPHY; of many famous novels, among them MRS. DALLOWAY, ORLANDO, THE WAVES; of books of criticism such as THE COMMON READER, THE SECOND COMMON READER; acknowledged throughout the English-speaking world as one of the most versatile and distinguished of modern writers.

Her new novel is

THE YEARS

Written in her earlier manner of direct narrative, this new novel shows Mrs. Woolf at the height of her powers. "The Years" begins with a group of characters living in London in the 1880's. Their stories, brought down to the present day, are interwoven in a flowing, realistic presentation that has the essence of Time itself. In "The Years" is the fullest expression of a great literary artist's philosophy of life, and it will mark the high point of the season in the field of the novel.

Second large printing before publication. $2.50

Just published

THE LETTERS OF LENIN

Translated and edited by Elizabeth Hill and Doris Mudie. $4.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY
383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

WHY DID

John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

WRITE TO JIM FARLEY?

See if you can answer this question after reading the remarkable article, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma", by Louis Wallis in The Christian Century, reprinted free for you.

Here is the dilemma: Business recovery must go much further; else the New Deal fails.—But if recovery DOES go on, it will inevitably drive up land prices, and inflate ground rents, and lead to another period of land speculation, which will produce another economic slump. Most "frozen paper" in banks is based on inflated land values.

Two remarkable articles by Louis Wallis, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma" and "The Economic Problem,"—both reprinted from The Christian Century—will be forwarded to you free by sending your name clearly written on a postal card to

Dept. C

WILLETT, CLARK & CO.,

440 South Dearborn Street

Chicago, Illinois

"This book gives one's failing faith in human nature a healthy jolt in the right direction. It's fascinating."

—Herschel Brickell, N. Y. Post

Denmark

THE CO-OPERATIVE WAY

by FREDERIC C. HOWE

"A companion volume to Marquis Childs' Sweden, The Middle Way."—Christian Science Monitor.
2nd printing. $2.50

And don't miss LEON BLUM: From Poet to Premier by Richard L. Stokes. "Indispensable for the political student . . . the general reader will find it fascinating," says John Gunther in the N. Y. Herald-Tribune. $3.00 old girl, made wise through grief, attempting to comfort and to train the girl of seventeen who might have been her sister-in-law. Fanny Keats was still the ward of the Abbess. It was very difficult, therefore, for Fanny Brawne to keep in contact with her, yet she managed to do so until Keats's sister came of age and married Valentine Llanos, whom Fanny Brawne had known.

COWARD-McCANN, 2 W. 45th St., N. Y. C.

Fanny Brawne's letters prove that she was engaged to Keats, that she regretted not having married him before he left, that Keats knew and she guessed that he would not return. They place the date of Keats's engagement to Fanny. They prove that information concerning his serious state of health was kept from Fanny, and that she guessed the worst. She knew, moreover, that he did not read her last letters to him. These, in other words, are the letters to which Amy Lowell had reference in writing her biography of Keats; they are the documents which caused her to champion Fanny Brawne.

Aside from their informational value, they are homely, delightfully human letters. They may seem unliterary and conventional beside Keats's own passionate love letters, but they portray a woman real and understandable. Fanny Brawne seems, indeed, to be rather more intelligent than the average middle-class girl of her generation. She echoes Keats's opinions on poets and poetry. She reads and advises reading for Keats's sister. She was, in general, of course, a creature of her own environment, but she kept her silence even under attacks upon her character and she did not marry until twelve years after Keats's death. She was in love, and loyal.

EDA LOU WALTON

Two Generations

A LONG WAY FROM HOME. By Claude McKay. Lee Furman. $3.

LET ME LIVE. By Angelo Herndon. Random House. $2.50.

THE most significant page in Claude McKay's autobiography is the one on which he recalls the evening in 1922 when he and William Gropper saw the Theater Guild production of Andreyev's "He Who Gets Slapped." McKay was then an editor of the Liberator and for this occasion had taken Charles Wood's place as its dramatic critic. He had many years of celebrity behind him, which had begun when he won a government trade scholarship in Jamaica, where he was born and where he published his first book of poems in 1911. The Seven Arts had published two of his poems in 1917, and a year later Frank Harris had "discovered" him for Pearson's, that ill-fated American venture that marked the spectacular decline of Harris's career. Success in Pearson's made the transition from waiter in a Pullman dining-car to the life of a professional writer barely possible. With Harris's encouragement he found new friends and in 1919 went to London, where he interviewed Bernard Shaw, read Marx, and joined Sylvia Pankhurst's staff on the Workers' Dreadnaught. On his return to New York he accepted Max Eastman's invitation to help him edit the Liberator. His visit to "He Who Gets Slapped" was the source of the finest document of its kind in English, and nothing that Claude McKay has written before or since equals the quality of its emotion, its force, and its brilliance.

Claude McKay had walked into the orchestra of the theater to see the play, but he never reached his seat; he and Gropper were instructed to sit in the balcony, and from that vantage point, he was to write: "I had come . . . as a dramatic critic. . . . The important fact with which I was suddenly slapped in the face was my color. I am a Negro—he, the One Who Gets Slapped." The review was the actual poem Claude McKay had hoped to write; he was no longer impeded by the smooth falsetto of the lesser romantics whom Harris and Max Eastman admired and whom Gerard Manley Hopkins so happily defined in a letter to Canon Dixon. For the moment Oscar Wilde and James Thomson of "The City of Dreadful Night" relaxed their influence upon his imagery and verbal imagination, and in that moment he became the very spirit of the highly sensitized and civilized man he was, a man who happened to be a Negro and a member of an exploited class and people.

Interesting as the remainder of Claude McKay's autobiography proves itself to be, its mere charm and pathos overwhelm the narrative. He is obviously "tender-minded," intelligent, sincere; and as he describes his escape to the Soviet Union—away from a wife who suddenly appeared in New York—his adventures in France, Germany, Spain, northern Africa, and back to America, one knows only too well that his disillusion and bewilderment today are neither unconscious nor wilful evasions of responsibility. Problems of sex, race, history, art, and the "group soul" are interwoven in his mind. The last pages of his book are filled with unanswerable questions; his clearest hope is for a Negro leader, and in that hope he seems to occupy the same nether world that Hart Crane describes in "Black Tambourine." "I have nothing to give but my singing," he says at last. "I have been a troubadour wanderer"—and though the words are quite as false as the color which ran from Frank Harris's hair and stained his forehead, the nostalgia behind the words remains sincere.

There is a kind of father-and-son relationship between Claude McKay's book and Angelo Herndon's "Let Me Live." Claude McKay's symbols for revolt—like those of many another writer of his generation—included bohemianism and the search for Beauty with a capital B; the soft, vague, shadowy word and phrase were sought and with them the desire for freedom from the laws of society. He had witnessed the events which transformed Fabian socialism into communism, but he saw them with the same attitude toward radical politics that marked Isadora Duncan's revolutionary enthusiasms. Angelo Herndon, born in a small Ohio steel and coal mining town in 1913, represents clearly enough another time, a different childhood, and a new interpretation of radical activity.

Herndon is neither poet nor skilful publicist; the opening chapters of his book are awkwardly written and the characterizations of himself, his friends, enemies, and casual associates are wooden and unreal. The reality of the book lies in the logic of Herndon's relation to society, in which he, a Negro proletarian and Communist organizer, defied the employer classes of the South. There can be no doubt that he has a better brain and a keener sense of a dramatic situation than the men who repeatedly threaten him with torture and death, and it is also clear that he is fighting not for himself alone but for the right of unorganized labor in the South to form its unions. His speech to the grand jurors of Fulton County, Georgia, is a masterpiece of close reasoning and forceful polemics. It is characteristic of him to speak of himself in the third person, to say, "no matter what you do with Angelo Herndon, no matter what you do with the Angelo Herndons in the future, this question of unemployment, the question of unity between Negro and white workers cannot be solved with hands that are stained with the blood of an innocent individual." The publication of "Let Me Live" is

THE OPEN ROAD in SOVIET RUSSIA

Trips which show you ——— than tourist sights ——— least cost of time and money. Open to students, teachers, members of professions.

GENERAL SURVEY TOUR

Leader: Walt Carmon, editor "International Literature," Moscow, 1932-1936. Sailing June 26. Nine weeks. $394.

A TRAVEL "COLLECTIVE"

Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. $543.

JULIEN BRYAN'S SIXTH ANNUAL TRIP

Through the highways and byways of ——— Soviet Union. Sailing June 19. Nine weeks. $494.

A PUBLIC HEALTH SURVEY

Leader: John A. Kingsbury, co-author of "Red Medicine." Sailing July 10. Nine weeks. $717.

OPEN ROAD TRAVEL SEMINAR

(Fourth Season.) Leader: Anna Louise Strong, editor "Moscow Daily News." Sailing July 4. Nine weeks. $776.

AMERICAN STUDENT UNION TOUR TO EUROPE AND RUSSIA

(Second Season.) Leader: Joseph Lash. Membership restricted to students. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. $499.

A dozen other unusual trips

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

SCIENCE & SOCIETY

A MARXIAN QUARTERLY

Spring 1937

The Supreme Court and Civil Rights	Louis B. Boudin
Economic Factors in Primitive Religion	Paul Radin
Agricultural Enterprise Under Italian Fascism	Carl T. Schmidt
The Struggle for Land During The Reconstruction Period	James S. Allen

Articles, Communications, Reviews

By Edgar Johnson, Oliver Larkin, A. O. Lovejoy, Ernest Nagel, Charles E. Trinkaus, Jr., J. F. Brown, P. P. Wiener, D. J. Struik, Henry David, Addison T. Cutler, V. J. McGill, Louis Harap

Out April: Order Subscriptions Now

Yearly subscription $1 Single copies 35c

Editorial Office:

61½ Holyoke Street, Cambridge, Mass.

Business Office:

30 East 20th Street, New York City

MEETING

THE COMMONWEALTH CONGRESS
for
PROGRESSIVE SOCIAL LEGISLATION
Meeting-House of the Society for Ethical Culture
2 West 64th Street

Saturday and Sunday — April 17th and 18th

"AFTER THE SUPREME COURT—WHAT?"

Help formulate a program for America's progress. Be your own Congressman. Open hearings on bills, with distinguished experts and political leaders testifying on the most important issues before the country.

For Information call—Stuyvesant 9-4685

PAMPHLETS

PAMPHLETS FOR THE NATION READER

"Sit-Down" by Joel Seidman 10c
Industrial Unionism by Theresa Wolfson . . . 15c
League for Industrial Democracy
112 East 19th Street, New York

THE NATION'S FIRST SHIPMENT

of flour, milk, sardines and other food has been sent to Spain for distribution to starving women, children and old people.

The second shipment will go within two weeks.

Help make it a big one by sending your check NOW.

I enclose $.....

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Nation's Food Ship Fund,
HELEN WOODWARD, Chairman, 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C.

merely one incident in his career as he awaits the decision of the Supreme Court on the validity of the Georgia Civil War statute to prevent slave insurrection, a statute that was revived so as to condemn Herndon to twenty years on the chain gang and certain death. It may be said that Herndon has converted the spirit of Claude McKay's review of "He Who Gets Slapped" into action; and he has concluded the present phase of his activity with a courageous statement: "Death itself is not the greatest tragedy that can possibly happen to a man; rather, the greatest tragedy is to live placidly and safely and to keep silent in the face of injustice and oppression."

HORACE GREGORY

Shorter Notices

THE BOYS IN THE BACK ROOM (LES COPAINS). By Jules Romains. Translated by Jacques Le Clercq. Robert M. McBride and Company. $2.

Everything that Romains has done, from his earliest verse to his current attempt to break all fiction-length records in "Men of Good Will," is more or less connected with his mystical doctrine of unanimism; and the present work, originally published in 1913, is no exception. A mixture of anti-bourgeois satire and pure fantasy, it is suffused with a rhetorical celebration of the "absolute" character of perfect comradeship. It is an odd condensation into hilarious Latin farce of the diffuse Whitmanism that dominated the unanimist group before the war. The cronies of the title carry on an organized campaign of unmotivated subversiveness against the established order. Disguised as important dignitaries from Paris, they cause havoc in the provinces by decorating each other with the Legion of Honor, posing naked on top of public statues, and mounting pulpits to deliver Rabelaisian sermons on the neglected bounties of the flesh. Much of this manages to be amusing despite the obvious intellectual strain; and the long sermon at the end is a tour de force that confirms the suspicion that Romains is the kind of writer who can do almost anything after a fashion. But the book comes out of a mood—a pre-war and perhaps distinctively Gallic mood—that for very many readers will be difficult to comprehend today. It is essentially the mood out of which came Gide's "Caves du Vatican" and other efforts to exploit the fictive possibilities of complete moral and social irresponsibility. This fantasy has a too cerebral creak, this humor a too sadistic ring, for a generation that is unconsoled by any striking evidences of a fundamental unanimity among mankind. Except for the inept title and other jarring Americanisms, Mr. Le Clercq has done well with the translation.

WILLIAM TROY

LAWYER LINCOLN. By Albert A. Woldman. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.50.

Lincoln was confronted with constitutional problems of the gravest nature, yet historians are commonly agreed that he met those problems in worthy fashion. Even the late Mr. Taft declared that no man ever lived who would have made an abler Chief Justice. Since the bar was Lincoln's Alma Mater, where he learned to deal with human nature, to cope with Douglas, to criticize the Dred Scott decision, and to construe the Constitution, it seems strange that no complete account of Lincoln as a lawyer has yet been written. For despite the publishers' claim, Mr. Woldman's book is not "complete." Just how far was Lincoln's reasoning on the Dred Scott case original? What that was new, if anything, did he add to the legal argument against secession? And when he found, or claimed to find, those constitutional powers that made him almost a dictator, did he really see them first? Mr. Woldman does not tell us. Yet his book discusses practically every phase of Lincoln's life as a lawyer, places it against the background of his environment, throws some new light on his practice, and is for the most part well done. Honest Abe, as Mr. Woldman shows, was no Don Quixote of the bar but a shrewd and practical lawyer. Weak in technical knowledge, he was especially gifted in original reasoning and also in persuading a jury. While a poor lawyer in a bad case, he was not squeamish about taking cases. He enjoyed a wide practice and liked his fees fairly well. As Mr. Woldman shows, it was Lincoln's twenty-three years at the bar that molded and qualified him to save the Union. "To Lincoln, the self-trained lawyer," says he, "history must assign a place on a level with Washington, Hamilton, Marshall, and Webster as an outstanding figure in the creation, interpreting, and expounding of the Constitution."

CHARLES LEE SNYDER

THE UNEXPECTED YEARS. By Laurence Housman. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

Mr. Housman gives no clue as to what nebulous or clear-cut forms he expected his life to take; and his matter-of-fact account of what did happen to him needs badly the contrapuntal tally of what did not. "The Unexpected Years" is a record of small literary successes, of picayune quarrels with the censor, of encounters with his more famous brother, of battles fought for woman suffrage and for peace, of telepathic experiences and semi-supernatural visitations. Presented in extension, the autobiography yet has a tendency to telescope, to collapse back on to itself; and the reader is left with the embarrassing realization that this life of seventy-odd years has been no life at all. Thus the book achieves an unintentional pathos, the pathos of a gently assertive, mediocre mind which finds the clutter of its experience more fascinating than seems war-rantable to others.

MARY MCCARTHY

LAWRENCE: THE LAST CRUSADE. By Selden Rodman. The Viking Press. $2.50.

Mr. Rodman's narrative verse is strong, dramatic, and technically sound, but it is scarcely the proper setting for so complex and poetic a figure as the leader of the Arabian revolt and the author of "The Seven Pillars of Wisdom." Mr. Rodman is a conscientious craftsman, and he has skillfully avoided the vagueness and pomposity of average blank verse. But while there are many passages in his book which sound like poetry, there are none which succeed in producing a genuine poetic effect. Mr. Rodman's approach to the character of Lawrence is also unpoetic: Lawrence emerges as a collection of data gathered here and there from his own writings and those of various biographers—and where Mr. Rodman has used his imagination, the result is not as illuminating as it might be. It is Lawrence reduced to his simplest terms: the man of action plus the extraordinary egoist, guided in all matters by a highly personal and all but incommunicable scale of values. Mr. Rodman manages to present these twin aspects of his hero's personality with clarity and force. But nowhere does he succeed in bringing Lawrence back to life or in arriving at a profound understanding of the complexities in his nature. His book seems an attempt to define Lawrence rather than to recreate him.

HELEN NEVILLE

THE well-known Negro author and playwright will lead a group through the districts of the colorful minority races in the U.S.S.R. to study their art, literature and folk-ways. England, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, Poland and France will also be visited.

Edutavel also offers complete service for individual travel and short cruises. Call, write or phone for full information—and mention The Nation.

LANGSTON HUGHES

60-DAY SURVEY OF NATIONAL MINORITIES IN THE SOVIET UNION

Sail July 3—Return August 31

A pamphlet giving full details of itinerary, costs, is just off the press. Ask for it.

OTHER INTERESTING EDUTRAVELOGS

for this Summer include: a 57-day trip with the well-known reporter, John I. Spivak, visiting places and people that figure in the news of the day . . . a 49-day Seminar on Economic Life in Europe, led by Prof. Broadus Mitchell of Johns Hopkins University . . . a 47-day Seminar on Social Work in the Soviet Union directed by Walter West.

EDUTRAVEL, Inc.

An Institute for Educational Travel

55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Telephones: GRamercy 7-3284-3285

TROTSKYISM ON TRIAL!

WHY I RESIGNED FROM THE TROTSKY DEFENSE COMMITTEE

by Mauritz A. Hallgren Price 1c

TROTSKY THE TRAITOR by Alex Bittelman Price 3c

AT THE MOSCOW TRIAL by D. N. Pritt, K.C., M.P.
A famous British jurist tells what he saw. Price 5c

TRAITORS ACCUSED:
Indictment of the Platakov-Radek group. Price 5c

MURDER AT THE KEMEROVO MINES:
Trotskyite Plotters at Work. Price 5c

TROTSKYISM AND FASCISM by P. Lang Price 10c

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS ON THE PIATAKOV-RADEK TRIAL by Wm. Z. Foster Price 10c

TROTSKYISM; COUNTER REVOLUTION IN DISGUISE by M. J. Olgin.
A historical analysis of Trotsky and Trotskyism. Price 15c

COURT PROCEEDINGS, Trotskyite-Zinovievite Terrorist Centre.
Zinoviev-Kamenev, et al., defendants. 180 pages. Price 25c

TROTSKYISM AGAINST WORLD PEACE by Earl Browder Price 1c

VERBATIM REPORT—

ANTI-SOVIET TROTSKYITE CENTRE TRIAL

Platakov-Radek, etc. Full Proceedings. Includes complete indictment, testimony, cross examination, defendants' final pleas and verdicts.

580 Pages. Bound. Price $1.00 postpaid.

on sale at

WORKERS BOOKSHOP

50 East 13th St., New York City

mail orders to

WORKERS LIBRARY PUBLISHERS

P. O. Box 148, Sta. D

New York City

Send for free pamphlet and catalogue.

Magazine BARGAINS for NATION Subscribers

The Nation and
Reader's Digest } $6.⁰⁰

The Nation and
Harpers Magazine } $6.⁵⁰

The Nation and
The Guardian } $7.⁷⁵
(Manchester England Weekly)

The Nation in combination with

Atlantic Monthly	$7.50
Common Sense	7.25
Current History	6.50
New Yorker	9.75
Saturday Review of Literature	7.75
New Republic	8.75
Scribner's Magazine	6.00

ALL subscriptions are for one year. They may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. To make certain there is no further increase in price to you, we suggest you order immediately on the form below.

CONVENIENT ORDER FORM

The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City

Please enter one year subscriptions for the following magazines. ☐ I enclose $ payment in full OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Magazines

Send to

_____	Name _____
_____	Address _____
_____	_____
_____	_____

4-10-37

Karl Llewellyn

One of America's most distinguished legal scholars who is Betts Professor of Law at Columbia University and a member of the new Industrial Relations Board of New York City contributes the first of two authoritative articles on "Law and Sitdown" in next week's issue of The Nation.

Law and Sitdown

CHARLES A. BEARD'S EXPOSÉ

that went 'round the world

FRANKLIN FORGERY EXPOSED BY BEARD

Anti-Semitic 'Prophecy' Cited in Germany Was Discredited by Historian 2 Years Ago

FIRST PRINTED IN THE U. S.

Appeared in Organ of the Silver Shirts, Fascist Group, and Was Republished Here

via Jewish FRONTIER

now in the APRIL issue on all newstands

8 MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR

Jewish Frontier, 1225 Broadway, N. Y. C. Beginning with the enlarged Beard Exposé reprint (April, 1937) send me 8 numbers of Jewish Frontier at the special price of $1.00, enclosed herewith.

Name _____

Address _____ N.A.

FILMS

Japanese Triangle

THE first five minutes of "Kimiko" (Filmarte) are startling. The streets of Tokyo look like the streets of Detroit, and the people going up and down them look exactly like the people we see every day except that they are a trifle shorter. Even the first interior is familiar—a very "modern" sort of office which a girl in a gray suit is preparing to leave at the end of her day's work so that she may meet a young man, also in a gray suit, downstairs at the corner. The two of them step briskly along, quarreling and making up as if they were natives of Hollywood, then quarreling again and refusing to walk together. It is only after Kimiko, the girl, arrives at the apartment where she lives with her mother, Etsuko, that the picture begins to be Japanese in the way we had expected it to be when we heard it announced as the first talkie ever to be imported into this country from the land of the kimono. Etsuko writes poems, and Japanese poems. She spends all her time at it, seated gently beside a table whence the melancholy phrases drift from her while Kimiko puts on an apron and gets dinner.

The poems are the first sign to us, outside of the language and the faces, that we are on foreign soil. But the conviction a little later on that the film contains a new experience for us comes from something more important than any such accident of detail. It comes from the whole management of the story. Not from the story itself, which is about a man, his wife, and his mistress. It is the management, the emphasis, that makes the difference; and I can suggest this difference best by saying that each element of the narrative is presented with a simplicity and a seriousness, and a certainty of effect, which reminds us of something too frequently forgotten in the movies, namely, that economy is power. Mikio Naruse, the director, needs no crowds of people, no cascades of scenery, no whirlpools of significant objects in order to convince us that his story is important. He evidently believes it is; and is content, whether in Tokyo or in the remote province where Kimiko goes to find her father, to tell it with the fewest possible strokes. The result is one of the most moving films I know, and one for which there can be no better words than that it should be seen.

"History Is Made at Night" (United Artists) cannot be accused of economy. It is one of those film romances which call for a great deal of last-minute sailing between Europe and New York and for much loud comedy as an offset to the lavish tenderness of the lovers; and in this particular case there must be a collision at the end between a liner and an iceberg. But granting all that, there must be economy somewhere among the riches; for the film is easily the best of its kind in recent years, and indeed by any standard it is a good film. Jean Arthur and Charles Boyer as the lovers whom nothing can ever quite succeed in keeping apart, and who when they are together speak a preposterous little language of their own, are charming not so much because they act with restraint as because they know how to act as if nothing restrained them, though of course something does—the art, shall we say, of acting. "History Is Made at Night," in other words, is a romantic comedy that can be believed.

MARK VAN DOREN

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

THEATRES

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

HENRY HULL with MARGO
DUDLEY DIGGES PAULINE FREDERICK

SHUBERT

THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Mats.
Thurs. & Sat., 2.40 Evgs. 8:40. 300 seats $1.10
Moves to the Majestic Theatre, Monday, April 12th

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

STORM over PATSY

by Brun Frank, adapted by James Bridie
with SARA ALLGOOD ROGER LIVESEY
CLAUDIA MORGAN IAN McLEAN
LEO G. CARROLL

GUILD

THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway.
Mats. Thursday and Saturday, 2:40. Eve., 8:40.

LECTURES

JOURNALISM SYMPOSIUM LECTURE BY

HEYWOOD BROUN

ON

THE COLUMN

MONDAY, APRIL 19TH, AT 8:30 P. M.

ADMISSION $1

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 WEST 12th STREET

NEW YORK

ETHICAL CULTURE SOCIETY

64th Street and Central Park West

SPECIAL APRIL SUNDAYS—11 A. M.

April 11th—Prof. JAMES T. SHOTWELL, of the Carnegie Foundation, "The Security of Nations";

April 18th—Secretary of Agriculture HENRY A. WALLACE, "Farm and Factory: the Dawn of Group Morality";

April 25th—Dr. JOHN L. ELLIOTT and Prof. HORACE L. FRIESS, "Religion and the Schools".

THE PUBLIC IS INVITED

HAROLD J. LASKI

TUESDAY EVENINGS AT 8:30 P. M.

APRIL 13 THE BRITISH JUDICIARY

APRIL 20 THE BRITISH MONARCHY

SINGLE ADMISSION $1

NEW SCHOOL FOR SOCIAL RESEARCH

66 WEST 12th STREET

NEW YORK

VACATIONERS

Watch our classified columns
For vacation suggestions.

Letters to the Editors

Can War "Save" Democracy?

Dear Sirs: Vera M. Dean's Challenge to Pacifists, in The Nation of February 6, is obscure in thought and language, but it is apparently based on the assumption that war can "save" democracy.

Beating the drum for another splendid crusade for peace and freedom, she hurls at patriots an incredible "challenge." What sort of fool from Keokuk or Painted Post would risk his neck to keep Nazi Germany from "absorbing Austria" or "detaching the Sudeten region from Czecho-Slovakia"?

Her logic is singularly defective. Criticizing pacifists who would rely on generous treatment to "wean dictators from the use of force," she asserts: "They apparently assume that peoples living under dictatorial rule not only share their desire for peace but are free to advocate a pacific policy." But dictators are free to adopt pacific policies, and the argument concerns the "weaning" of dictators, not peoples.

The argument on the character of the dictatorship is hopelessly confused. Are the dictators bent on war or merely bluffing? Mrs. Dean glides gracefully and unconsciously from the affirmation of the first alternative to an equally emphatic affirmation of the second. Her position on armaments is thoroughly inconsistent. "The danger of war is always present," we hear, "in a world armed to the teeth." How does she propose to lessen this danger? By adding guns!

Mrs. Dean considers herself a "realistic" pacifist. If she believes that the League jargon of "aggressors" and "sanctions" indicates a "realistic" road to peace for this country, she knows a great deal less of America than of Europe.

NORBORNE HARRIS CROWELL
Potsdam, N. Y., March 10

By-Products of Isolation

Dear Sirs: Louis Fischer's excellent article on Keeping America Out of War in The Nation of March 27 is a complete answer to the isolationist doctrine that has infected liberals in Canada and the United States. The idea that there can be security in a purely North American policy has merely tended to raise the prestige of the international anarchy now prevailing throughout the world.

The League of Nations failed because it was unable to invest an unhappy Europe with a vital sense of security. The inability to muster the necessary two-thirds' vote in the American Senate—by just a narrow margin—robbed the dawning internationalist diplomacy of one of its chief pillars. The League was denied that great voice which could have tilted the balance to an enlightened revisionist growth. The world has not recovered from that blow. Mr. Fischer has ably pointed out that the rising fascist star is a by-product of democratic disinterestedness.

MARVIN B. GELBER
Toronto, Canada, March 28

Does Collective Action Mean War?

Dear Sirs: In view of the failure of collective action by democratic powers to uphold the Covenant of the League of Nations in Manchuria, Ethiopia, and Spain, is not The Nation a bit too optimistic about the future of collective action, even with the United States included?

Optimism reveals shallowness sometimes, at other times dishonesty. And is The Nation dealing straight with its readers when it assures them that collective action, though it may lead to war for other partners to agreement, will not drag the United States into the combat?

F. D. SLOCUM
New York, March 19

Irishmen in Spain

Dear Sirs: I read in a recent number of The Nation a short write-up of General O'Duffy's Irish Brigade of some 500 men gone to swell the rebel invader's army in Spain. I have read since in the Boston Post and also in Irish papers to hand that another force under the command of Commandant Ryan of the Irish republican army is also in Spain, but the latter body is fighting on the opposite side, with the present Spanish government armies, which fight for liberty and human progress!

Why not give the latter body of Irishmen a little publicity?

AN IRISH REPUBLICAN
Boston, March 7

COMPASS TOURS

A. THIRD SOVIET SEMINAR

England, Denmark, Sweden. 32 days in RUSSIA and Armenia, Poland, France. Sail July 3.

60 days all inclusive $485 UP

Leader: PROF. BERNHARD J. STERN, Sociologist, Columbia University, Editor Science and Society.

C. UNITED FRONT GROUP

Denmark, Sweden, Finland. 30 days in RUSSIA, Poland, France. Sail July 4.

60 days all inclusive $398

Leader: ALVIN E. COONS, University of Iowa.

E. SOCIAL SECURITY SEMINAR

England, Sweden, Russia, Czecho, Austria, Italy, Switzerland, France. Sail July 3.

63 days all inclusive $545

Leader: CHARLOTTE TODES, Labor Organizer and Journalist.

B. SOCIAL CHANGES IN EUROPE

England, Denmark, Sweden. 20 days in RUSSIA, Hungary, Austria, France. Sail July 3.

85 days all inclusive $495

Leader: DR. CLINTON J. TAFT, Director C. L. U. of S. Cal.

D. NEW WORLD AND THE OLD

England, Scandinavia, Russia, Turkey, Greece, Palestine, Italy, France. Sail July 3.

60 days all inclusive $595

Leader: PROFESSOR BERNHARD OSTROLENK, Economist, Author, Editor.

F. MIDNIGHT SUN CRUISE

Scandinavian Capitals, Fjords, North Cape.

48 days all inclusive $396

Using Modern Third-Class on the Atlantic

For descriptive pamphlets apply

COMPASS TRAVEL BUREAU

55 West 42nd St., New York

Longacre 5-3070

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 17, 1937

NUMBER 16

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

421

EDITORIALS:

THE WAGNER DECISIONS

423

SHOWDOWN IN ROME

424

ECONOMICS AT HARVARD

425

TEACHER'S PET

426

WILL ROOSEVELT HOLD DOWN PRICES?

by Paul W. Ward

427

I STAND WITH THE SPANISH PEOPLE

by Thomas Mann

429

WHO OWNS THE AIR? by Ruth Brindze

430

SLOW DEATH IN ILLINOIS by Milton S. Mayer

432

HEART BALM AND SEDUCTION

by William Seagle

434

THE WAR—TWENTY YEARS AFTER

by Oswald Garrison Villard

436

IS THERE A NATION? by Heywood Broun

437

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

WHAT IS A GOOD REVIEW? by Joseph Wood Krutch

438

OUR PECULIAR INSTITUTION

by Stephen Raushenbush

439

THE "NEW" ANTHROPOLOGY AT WORK

by Robert S. Lynd

440

BUCK MULLIGAN'S MEMOIRS by William Troy

441

JOHN DONNE AND OTHERS by Mark Van Doren

442

MARSHAL NEY IN AMERICA? by Geoffrey Bruun

443

SHORTER NOTICES

444

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

446

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

A MEETING IN BALTIMORE OF THE LEAGUE Against War and Fascism last Saturday was suddenly invaded by a black-shirted group of "American fascists" in full fascist regalia who proceeded to pay questionable tribute to the American flag by giving it Mussolini's salute. The incident was a trifle, but a trifle may be a portent. We agree with Congress that the Dickstein committee had a dangerous slant, and that an inquiry into "un-American" activities could be made so broad as to threaten legitimate liberal and labor groups. But this should not tie our hands in banning uniformed groups.

★

THE DECISIVE DEFEAT OF LEON DEGRELLE, leader of the Belgian Rexist Party, by Premier Paul van Zeeland may well mark the end of the present Belgian fascist movement. The results could scarcely have been more convincing. In an election forced upon the government by the Rexist leader, Degrelle obtained less than one-fifth of all the votes cast, and 4,400 fewer votes than were obtained by the Rexist candidate in the last election. The decisiveness of the verdict may be attributed primarily to popular-front tactics. The National Democratic Front, which was formed specifically to fight the election, was supported by all anti-fascist groups from the Catholics to the Communists and forced the Rexists into a hopelessly defensive position. It is significant to note that wherever a genuine united front has been formed, fascism has failed to score a victory.

★

HEYWOOD BROUN'S PAGE IN THIS ISSUE raises the whole question of the function of a liberal journal. Mr. Broun tells us that he is "getting a little sick of The Nation's policy of fair play." This is an amazing statement. We had assumed it was a passion for fair play that underlay his fight in behalf of the Newspaper Guild and his many other battles in the liberal cause. It is a strange and new theory that fair play should be required only of reactionary employers and not of us—or, for that matter, of him. We conceive of our task as a double one—on the one hand, to map out a clear and firm line of policy; on the other, in the phrase of Justice Holmes, never to forget that we are not God. Heywood Broun should know that The Nation has this task, just as he knows that it will not attempt to censor what he may choose to write on his own page.

STANLEY BALDWIN, BY HIS DECISION NOT TO call Franco's bluff on the food blockade of Bilbao, has done his best to bring victory to the fascists. He has not only thereby abandoned the British principle of freedom of the seas; he has also set a precedent whereby Britain, so precariously dependent on outside sources for its food, may, in an emergency of its own like that of Bilbao, be subjected to similar treatment.

★

THE 1937 STUDENT PEACE STRIKE PROMISES to be a far more impressive demonstration against war than any of those which have preceded it. Thirteen national organizations having student programs are cooperating as sponsors. Among them are groups as dissimilar as the National Council of Methodist Youth, the National Student Federation of America, the American Youth Congress, and the War Resisters' League. As might be expected with a cooperative undertaking of this kind, the program of the strike, as outlined in the call, leaves much to be desired. No recognition is taken of the basic issues presented by the Spanish conflict or of the necessity of building a political structure to enforce peace. Nevertheless, it is encouraging to notice that for the first time the strike is part of a long-range peace program primarily educational in character.

★

HENRY FORD OF DETROIT AND PREMIER Mitchell Hepburn of Toronto are sitting, as we go to press, at the end of the same limb of an old-fashioned tree called the open shop. Mr. Lewis has already labeled as "quaint" Mr. Ford's idea that he will never recognize any union—and the Wagner Act decision makes the fall of Ford seem imminent. Since Premier Hepburn has the Canadian Mounted Police at his disposal he may be able to hold out a little longer in his gallant fight for General Motors of Canada, Ltd. He will not deal, he says, with "foreign agitators" from Detroit! The union maintains that the Detroit agreement to bargain collectively applies to all G. M. C. plants. In any case it can tolerate a cut-rate labor market in Canada only at the cost of undermining its hard-won victories in the United States. Hepburn, like Ford, must fall. The danger lies in his apparent determination to sacrifice workers' lives as well as their living standards in order to make Canada safe for that good old native-born industry, General Motors.

★

ONCE MORE A PATERNALISTIC EMPLOYER HAS discovered that his workers are not entirely happy. The workers in the Hershey chocolate factory in the model Pennsylvania town of that name recently started a sitdown strike. A few days later they were forcibly thrown out by a crowd of 3,000 or 4,000 people sentimentally described as old-fashioned, outraged, patriotic Mennonite farmers who were angry because a new-fangled sitdown strike had closed down their market for milk. The raid, which was bloody, was preceded by a mass-meeting, and the crowd dispersed at once after it had completed its work. What remains unexplained is the sudden solidarity among the stolid individualistic farm population, the lynching spirit that seized the peaceful town, and the extraordinary efficiency of the impromptu assault. There is evidence that the crowd was not limited to farmers, and that the attack came after the strikers had agreed to leave the plant; there is also evidence that the hall where the mass-meeting was held was well stocked with sticks and clubs. Incitement of farmers to attacks upon town workers is an old and dangerous device. If the outbreak in Hershey was a vigilante affair, those responsible for it are guilty of high crime. Meanwhile the strike has been settled by an agreement to hold an election under the Wagner Act.

★

THE STOCK MARKET SUFFERED A NERVOUS collapse last week on a rumor that the dollar would be revalued upward in terms of gold. While the law would only permit the President to raise the gold value of the dollar from 59.04 to 60 per cent of its old value, the Secretary of the Treasury is allowed full freedom in fixing the buying rate of gold—which is really what determines the dollar's worth in terms of foreign currencies. Lowering the buying price of gold at this time would strike at the root of the inflationary danger. The problems inhering in eleven billion dollars of idle gold and more than a billion dollars in excess bank reserves have arisen because of the severity of the devaluation of the dollar. Economists are rather generally agreed that even now the dollar is still undervalued in terms of the world's currencies. The present high prices of copper, lead, zinc, and other metals are at least partly the result of the previously established, artificially high prices of gold and silver. While a sudden return to the pre-depression value of the dollar would precipitate a deflationary process comparable in degree to the inflationary boom of June-July, 1933, a small change, not greater than 5 per cent, would exercise a healthy corrective influence. Once such a change is made, it would be wise to make it clear that the period for tinkering with the exchange is past, and to arrange a permanent basis for international stabilization.

★

WE FEEL HONORED AGAIN IN PUBLISHING in this issue Thomas Mann's article on the meaning of the struggle in Spain and his own stand with relation to it. It is the analysis of an artist who does not ordinarily think in political terms, but who has been forced by the compulsions of the age to take account of political realities and to reorient his thinking to them. Thomas Mann's growth into political consciousness since the triumph of Hitlerism will, we feel certain, go down as an important chapter in literary history. He is now in America for a brief visit. And it is characteristic of him that his purpose in coming should be to speak at the celebration of the fourth anniversary of the "University in Exile"—the graduate faculty of German and Italian émigrés founded by Alvin Johnson at the New School in New York City.

PROPOSALS MADE AT THE WORLD TEXTILE Conference for a forty-hour week throughout the industry have met with firm opposition from the employers' delegates of Japan and England, the two chief exporting nations. They contend that as long as the United States and other countries maintain high tariff barriers, they must keep long hours in order to hold their markets. To this the American representatives have replied that the tariff barriers must be preserved in order to keep out the products of "sweated" labor. The reply is not, however, wholly convincing. The Japanese have a legitimate grievance when they point out that in addition to importing all of their raw materials they have to combat all manner of discrimination in the markets of the world, particularly in this country. As long as we maintain a holier-than-thou attitude, the basic problem will remain unsolved, and textile workers the world over will continue to be subjected to merciless exploitation. If an agreement on a short week is to be reached, the more favored countries must be prepared to make sweeping tariff concessions on a quid pro quo basis. As one of the serious offenders, the United States should lead the way.

★

THE JENNINGS CASE, WHICH SMELLED SO strongly of frame-up that the district attorney refused to prosecute it, has again become Pennsylvania's cause célèbre, thanks to a curious decision by Judge Samuel E. Shull. Emerson Jennings, it will be recalled, was the printer for the rebel hard-coal union which has since made its peace with the United Mine Workers of America. He was also a thorn in the side of the coal barons and their friends of the public utilities; he printed the handbills and newspapers which attacked them, and he led the demand for the impeachment of Judge W. Alfred Valentine in the anthracite strike of 1935. During the strike Judge Valentine's car was blown up. Several months later Jennings was arrested, and after he had been denied trial for a year was finally found guilty. Meanwhile, however, as we pointed out in our issue of January 30, the entire case against him had collapsed, and the witnesses against him were under arrest for perjury. In spite of this, Judge Shull refused to grant a new trial to Jennings and sentenced him to a five-to-ten-year prison term. It is a sufficient commentary on the decision that the prosecution, as well as the defense, was amazed at Judge Shull's action. The case will of course be appealed.

★

THE APPOINTMENT OF KARL LLEWELLYN TO the Industrial Advisory Board of New York City by Mayor LaGuardia is an excellent one. But our approval is tempered by the fact that it will deprive our readers of Professor Llewellyn's projected articles on Law and Sit-down which we had scheduled for publication beginning with this issue. The judicial character of the board makes it obviously inadvisable for a member of it publicly to express his opinion in advance on the issues that will come before him.

The Wagner Decisions

WHAT happened in the Wagner decisions was nothing short of a miracle. The trend of the court in the last two years had left little hope for so crucial a regulation of capitalist enterprise as the Wagner Act represents. The act was bitterly fought before its passage by big enterprise and its allies; it was systematically sabotaged after its passage in the name of the Higher Law of property rights and freedom of contract; the work of the Labor Board was obstructed at every step and its decisions jettisoned with an insolent indifference. And yet the court has now sustained the entire act. Given the split personality of the capitalist democratic state, the decisions are a triumph of democracy in its series of tilts with an irresponsible capitalism.

The cases fall into four groups. In the first is the motor-bus case, where the fact that the bus company was an instrument of interstate commerce was unchallenged, and where Justice Roberts wrote the unanimous opinion of the court: this decision occasioned no surprise. In the second is the Associated Press case. It was fought out not so much on the interstate-commerce issue, for it would have been fantastic to assert that news pays homage to state lines, but rather on the issue of freedom of press. The case was crucial, for without it the Newspaper Guild would collapse and the big newspaper owners become a law to themselves. In the third group is the Jones and Laughlin Steel case, where the major battle between the two camps within the court was fought. Chief Justice Hughes, speaking for the same majority of five as in the A. P. case, marshaled his best precedents and made this one of the key decisions of constitutional law for the future; Justice McReynolds, speaking for the same court minority, fought back stubbornly and—especially in the impromptu oral opinion which he has now made classically his own—bitterly. It is in this case that manufacturing was subjected to federal regulation; it is here that "the plainest facts of our national life" arranged themselves in a pattern of economic realism to confront reasoning "in an intellectual vacuum." In the fourth group are the Fruehauf Trailer case and the Friedman-Marks Clothing case, again five-to-four decisions; following the same reasoning as the Jones-Laughlin decision, these cases in a sense go even farther, for the firms involved here are relatively small, and their interstate character is not immediately clear as the far-flung activities of a huge steel company, employing hundreds of thousands of men, drawing its raw material from the four corners of the nation, sending its products back to the same four corners, and dominating our prosperity and industrial peace.

In short, the victory of the federal government was as sweeping as anything in constitutional history since John Marshall's day. To write as he did, Chief Justice Hughes had to ignore the decision on the Guffey Act in the Carter Coal case and play ducks and drakes with his own opinion in the Schechter case. Leaping quite blithely over the last two years of judicial reasoning, he went back to the more liberal interstate-commerce reasoning of the court in an earlier period—to Stafford vs. Wallace and Chicago Board of Trade vs. Olsen.

But while the victory of the federal power was expressed in legalistic terms through the traditional conceptual juggling and verbal mumbo-jumbo of the court, the dynamics of the victory were political and its substance was economic. Even his opponents must now credit Mr. Roosevelt with having been the immediate cause of the court's new liberalism. We may all recognize now the strategy involved in making his proposal before and not after the Wagner decisions. For it presented the court majority with the bitter alternative of upholding the Wagner Act or giving the final fillip needed for passing the reorganization measure. But even more important than the threat involved was the fact that the President's proposal stirred up a vast amount of discussion of the nature of the judicial process. The common man now sees more clearly than ever that the decisions of the court are decisions of social policy.

In one respect at least the effects of the decisions are clear. They will give an enormous impetus to the task of labor organization now being carried on primarily by the C. I. O.; they constitute the final validation of collective bargaining as a social reality, coming from the group that is always the last to recognize social realities; they furnish the effective answer to the primitivist bravado of Henry Ford. Undoubtedly they will spur also the movement for outlawing the sitdown, incorporating labor unions, and other repressive legislation. But the same labor strength and labor restraint which in the last analysis were responsible for these decisions should operate also to defeat counter-legislation.

The effects of the decisions on the President's court proposal are not so clear. By decreasing the bitterness against the court, they weaken the proposal; they have the same effect, moreover, by revealing that the court is responsive to popular opinion when expressed with sufficient force. Our own guess, however, is that these effects will be balanced by others. Once more it has become clear that our national destiny hangs on the slender thread of a single justice's vote. And once more it has become clear that the court is a political agency like any other in the government.

The Nation's concern has been a dual one. We have favored removing the obstructions which the court as constituted interposes to the important social legislation of today and the immediate future; we have favored also loosening the hold of the judicial power upon our social policy in general. From the beginning, therefore, The Nation has stood for the President's proposal plus an amendment. The first of our objectives is now on the way to being accomplished. We still feel that something like the President's proposal should be passed. But since the court can be counted on to continue its present trend, Mr. Roosevelt would do well to agree to a measure that does not defeat his essential aim and then proceed to channel the strongest energies of the country into more fundamental judicial reform. Even the conservatives have spoken for an amendment. It is time to test their good faith.

Showdown in Rome

THE visit of Juan March and the rumored second visit of General Göring have made Rome once more the focal point in European developments. It may be assumed that Señor March, who is the principal financial backer of the Spanish rebels, is asking Mussolini for even more extensive aid than has been given in the past. It may likewise be assumed that Mussolini will ask Göring for a pledge of more active intervention by the Reich. But there can be no certainty regarding the decision to be reached. The series of accusations in the semi-official Giornale d'Italia against France and the Soviet Union have prepared the way for repudiation of the non-intervention pact if such a step is decided upon. Similarly, the announced construction of a four-million-dollar naval base at Assab indicates that Mussolini has by no means given up his imperial ambitions. But there is nothing to suggest that an irrevocable decision has yet been reached with regard to Spain. It is likely that such a decision will not be made until it is possible to get a clearer idea of the outcome of the present battles on the Cordoba, Bilbao, and Madrid fronts. Il Duce cannot be accused of entertaining a desire for martyrdom.

An important reason for believing that he may draw back before committing Italy to an adventure from which there could be no retreat may be found in the increasing strength of French policy. For the first time since the beginning of the Spanish conflict last July, the Blum government appears to be energetically attempting to check fascist aid to the insurgents. The French reply to the Italian accusations was blunt and direct. From Mussolini's standpoint France has definitely abandoned the type of passive neutrality which has played so completely into his hands in previous months.

The British government's acceptance of the rebels' illegal blockade of Bilbao, on the other hand, suggests that it is not yet ready to abandon its tacit support of Franco. While there are obviously some things which cannot be proved, we have it on good authority that the British government entered into a "gentlemen's agreement" with Italy sometime in January whereby Britain agreed to permit Mussolini to go ahead with his intervention provided it was carried out as unobtrusively as possible and he agreed to use his influence to obtain the withdrawal of German troops from Spain. The Italian defeat at Guadalajara appears to have shaken British confidence in the ultimate victory of the rebels, but it has not induced a change in policy.

Yet England and France dare not work at cross-purposes on a matter as important as the ultimate policy toward Spain. At the beginning of the war Blum yielded somewhat unwillingly to British pressure for an illegal non-intervention policy. The very fact that he is now openly seeking to bring pressure to bear on Italy suggests that this time Britain will have to accommodate itself to French policy if it wishes to escape isolation. With the Socialist congress to be held at Marseilles next Sunday, it is evident that Blum dare not give way. Moreover, the success of President Benes's visit to Yugoslavia greatly strengthens the diplomatic position of the democratic countries with respect to Italy. Mussolini will undoubtedly utilize every available device to delay the enforcement of the non-intervention agreement. In this he will have the advantage of the powers' long-established traditions of procrastination and delay.

But the time has passed when secret aid will save the rebels. Mussolini will have to send his regular army or stay out altogether. And it is difficult to believe that he will risk plunging his none-too-effective forces into a first-class war merely to restore his tarnished prestige.

Economics at Harvard

THE recent action of Harvard University in warning two members of its Economics Department that their appointments would be terminated in two years was more than the routine matter which the university wishes it to appear. "Their cases present no unusual features," says an official university statement. We prefer to think otherwise for the honor and good name of Harvard and for the future of social-science instruction in American universities.

What are the facts? On March 31 Dr. Alan Sweezy, instructor in the Economics Department, was called in by Dean Birkhoff and handed a letter stating baldly that the department had recommended his reappointment for three years but that the President's office had cut the appointment to two years and recommended that he use the intervening time to get placed elsewhere. On April 7 Dr. J. Raymond Walsh, of the same department, received a similar call from the Dean. First, however, he was called in by Professor H. H. Burbank, the department head, who sought to break the news to him gently and with great sympathy. Professor Burbank expressed the high admiration of the department for the teaching of both men, and the distress that everyone felt over the action of the Dean and President. He went on, however, to talk of budgetary difficulties and ended with, "We just can't do a thing. Our hands are tied." The interview with the Dean followed. At first he said that the grounds for terminating the appointment were budgetary. When challenged on this, however, he shifted to new ground. "Of course," he said, "it is the judgment of one's peers that is important." Dr. Walsh pointed out that the recommendation for the regular three-year appointment for both Dr. Sweezy and himself had been made by their peers—their associates in the department. With this the Dean again hurriedly left the subject. "You are a brilliant teacher, Mr. Walsh," he said, "a very brilliant teacher indeed. The university does not wish to keep you from taking advantage of the excellent opportunities that are available for you elsewhere." And with that he looked at his watch and terminated the conference.

When on Monday, April 5, the Boston Traveler published an account of the incident, the university issued a statement with President Conant's approval saying that the decisions had been made "solely on the grounds of teaching capacity and scholarly ability." Since then there has been a storm of alumni and labor protest.

The issues cannot be reduced to a simple and clear-cut question of academic freedom. The Harvard tradition of freedom is a long and honorable one. Both the instructors involved are liberals, and both have been active in the formation of the Cambridge local of the Teachers' Union. Dr. Walsh came out vigorously in support of the child-labor amendment at the hearings by the Massachusetts legislature. Nevertheless, we cannot believe that Harvard is seeking to govern by "gag rule."

The real issues are more indirect and subtle but just as far-reaching. The first has to do with teaching tenure at Harvard and what criteria should be used in judging a teacher's competence. If the decision on Walsh and Sweezy is not reconsidered, no Harvard teacher can possibly feel safe in the future. For the university has, in the total handling of this matter, shown a shocking degree of irresponsibility. The department, knowing that an earlier decision had been made to send only two men up for promotion, and having chosen the two, nevertheless recommends keeping Walsh and Sweezy. It thus puts the burden of overruling it on the Dean and President. They, in turn, point to the earlier decision and to the budget. Thus the department and the administration pass the buck to each other. All we can fall back upon, therefore, is the last formal statement issued, which bases the decision "solely on the grounds of teaching capacity and scholarly ability." But everyone, including the department, seems to agree that in teaching capacity the men are more than satisfactory—they are brilliant. In the Confidential Guides to Freshmen, in which students express their opinion of the teaching capacity of the faculty, Drs. Walsh and Sweezy have always stood at the top. As for scholarly ability, the fact that Dr. Sweezy had been given two traveling fellowships by the university and that Dr. Walsh only last year was awarded the Wertheim fellowship in labor relations must stand as an earnest of the expectations of their peers. The only safe criteria for judging a teacher's competence lie in the opinion of his fellow-teachers and students.

The second issue is even more important. Harvard is after all a center of learning and teaching. What kind of economics shall be learned and taught there? The two men involved were among the few in the department who stood for a realistic approach to economics in terms of an awareness of the struggles of the day and a desire to analyze our property institutions. These deviations from the accepted neo-classical and Austrian schools of economic theory are now on the way to being eliminated. Admiration for the ability of these two men on the part of the members of the department is evidently not incompatible with a sense of discomfort at the direction of their thought. The final responsibility for the decision taken must rest with the department. The final responsibility for reconsidering the decision must rest with the administration. A university in which only one brand of economics is taught may present the appearance of unity and consistency. But it offers no prospect of growth and no assurance of fulfilling its function in our culture.

Teacher's Pet

THE General Motors strike marked the beginning of a new era. In the old days it was customary for the New York Times to send Louis Stark to the scene of first-string "labor trouble" to cover the major aspects of both sides. One could be sure then of a cool, objective, even scholarly account, since Mr. Stark is by common agreement one of the two or three best labor reporters in the country. In the General Motors strike Louis Stark was on hand; but Mr. Russell B. Porter was there too, apparently working the employers' side of the street.

His dispatches must have pleased the public-relations counsel of General Motors, and his glowing stories of that monster in newspaper mache, the Flint Alliance, deserve to rank with some of the creations of Dexter Fellowes. In view of the speed with which the alliance folded up, those dispatches should have earned for Mr. Porter early retirement as a strike reporter for the world's most reliable newspaper. They did lead to his being boycotted by the strikers in Flint. Whereupon Mr. Porter became the hero of a front-page story of the perils of a reporter among the wild men of the C. I. O.—which probably had its effect upon readers who did not recognize the pathetic victim as teacher's pet.

Mr. Porter was not demoted. Instead he went to the head of the class. When the Chrysler strike was called, Stark was missing and Porter emerged as star reporter. His stories seemed to show some improvement in the direction of objectivity. Two weeks ago, however, what seemed to be a pent-up resentment toward the sitdown, the strikers, and the C. I. O. burst out in two stories which must have warmed the hearts of the Chrysler executives then in conference with Mr. Lewis.

On April 2 a "staff correspondent" in Lansing—he was nameless—reported that the union was seeking "desperately tonight to regain control" of the strike situation—referring to a series of small sitdowns which had occurred since the General Motors settlement; and predicted a "red purge" by union leaders. On April 3 a dispatch from Lansing signed by Mr. Porter began with an alarming paragraph:

Walter P. Chrysler and John L. Lewis resumed their conference . . . in an atmosphere charged with the remembrance of the "quickie" sitdown strikes in General Motors plants this week, the union's drive to "purge" Communist and other trouble-makers from the ranks, and the state elections to be held on Monday.

A little farther on he wrote that "Mr. Lewis and other union leaders are pictured [our italics] as stressing their current purge of Communist and other radical elements." Boiling over on to a back page, Mr. Porter insisted that "the union insists that it is doing everything it can to drive out subversive elements"; and then gathering his forces, he rolled together a paragraph which was a masterpiece of Lewis-baiting.

In this connection [he said] it was reported on the best of authority [he gave none] that Mr. Lewis, as chairman of the Committee for Industrial Organization, might soon send some "flying squadrons" of "strong-arm men" from his own United Mine Workers to Flint and possibly to Detroit . . . to keep the trouble-makers in line [italics ours].

Toward the end of a long tale full of alarms and excursions, Mr. Porter revealed that Governor Murphy, at least, was far less disturbed by a few spontaneous sitdowns than was the reporter for the New York Times. He even quoted the Governor's very sensible and soothing statement which urged the public to bear in mind that "new labor relationships are being worked out here in Michigan. . . . This process is attended by minor difficulties, but that is all." But Mr. Porter's temperature did not fall. Farther on he made as if to cover the labor side by saying that union leaders, who ought to know, emphasized that their "purge" (Mr. Porter's word) was not directed against Communists as such; he immediately overruled them, however, by asserting that the "purge" was directed against the inciters of "unauthorized sitdowns for the sake of ultimate revolutionary objectives"—Porter speaking. In his very last paragraph he did manage to state the union's point of view, namely, that while some difficulties are to be expected of a young and rapidly growing organization, it has sound leadership and is entirely responsible. But these twelve lines could hardly be expected to counteract the red scare that had run rampant through three columns.

On the same day, in the Sunday magazine section, Mr. Porter, writing of "The Broad Challenge of the Sitdown," developed further the thesis of its "revolutionary objectives." The sitdown, like the general strike, is, to be sure, a possible revolutionary technique. So far the automobile workers have used it only to force employers to confer with their union representatives. But this obvious and simple fact did not prevent Mr. Porter from intoning portentously that the workers have employed it to "correct the abuses of the old economic order." And he gave full play to those "critics" who see the sitdown leading to "chaos, anarchy, mob rule, and dictatorship in successive steps."

It is a token of Mr. Porter's good intentions perhaps that within a week he had arrived at a more sober view—when the strike had been settled and sobriety was less essential. In another Sunday story he indicated that the "wildcat" sitdowns had been mainly the result of an excess of enthusiasm and a new sense of freedom rather than attempts at revolution; he seemed confident that the union would be able to control its men, the union "purge" was presented in its true light as being mainly directed at stool pigeons and provocateurs; and the raids by "flying squadrons" of "strong-arm" men from the United Mine Workers appeared only as the dispatching of veteran union campaigners to give their fellow-unionists in automobiles the benefit of long experience.

Mr. Porter is an inferior sociologist, which might be forgiven in a newspaperman; his own hindsight shows that he is also a careless and highly excitable observer under fire—which is inexcusable.

We want Stark!

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Will Roosevelt Hold Down Prices?

Washington, April 11

A FEW weeks ago there appeared in this space a dispatch entitled Planning the Next Depression. It reported that important federal economists and other members of the real Brain Trust were privately fearful that in little more than a year the nation was going to be plunged into a depression more severe than the last and one for which it would find itself even less well prepared. Since then those hidden fears have forced their way to the surface. First, Secretary Wallace sounded off on the dangers inherent in the current boom in prices. Then the Federal Reserve Board's chairman, Marriner Eccles, set up an alibi in anticipation of an impending crash by subtly inserting in the record a notation that the New Deal's monetary and fiscal controls, previously touted as depression preventives, could not be counted on to check suicidal price rises produced by monopolistic devices. Meanwhile, Henry Morgenthau, already harassed by prospects that federal tax receipts this year will fall half a billion below the total he had counted on, faced the prospect that price increases will reduce the effectiveness of federal expenditures for the next fiscal year and thus throw his beloved budget farther out of gear; he held some very secret conferences on the matter but kept his mouth shut so far as the public was concerned. Harry Hopkins, busy fighting for a relief appropriation that must be much bigger than Roosevelt is willing to allow, got even busier when he was persuaded that the lumber which cost the WPA $40,000,000 this year will cost it $50,000,000 next year, or, in short, that the meager relief appropriation he can count on will not even go as far as he had expected.

Finally, the President himself took a hand, or so it seemed to many a week ago, and at a press conference on April 2 let go with both barrels at the skyrocketing tendency of prices in the durable-goods industries, particularly steel and copper. It was plain he had at last been persuaded that the crash-provoking conditions of 1929 were returning despite his repeated pledge to banish them for all eternity and at any cost. For a few minutes on April 2 it looked as if the President was ready to fight to prevent a recurrence of that awful disparity between profits and purchasing power which produced the last depression, but now there is large room for doubt.

The case for doubt as yet is purely circumstantial. There is space here to set down only a few of its salient points, including the sudden appearance of Donald Richberg in the picture a few days ago; and that space must be further reduced to make room for a brief review of the price picture itself and the effect upon it of the President's recent utterances. The picture frames itself in the statement that, as figures of the Bureau of Labor Statistics show, the wholesale price level is now within easy jumping distance of the 1929 average and is soaring so fast that the wholesale index shows an increase of 11.5 per cent in the last twelve months. More important still is the fact that there has been an increase of 10 per cent in prices since last September and of 2.6 per cent within the past month. The more important types of steel have jumped 22 per cent in price in a year and are now 10 to 13 per cent above their 1929 levels. Cement prices also are above 1929 levels. Copper prices have jumped nearly 100 per cent in a year, while lumber, rubber, zinc, and lead prices have been climbing 20 to 60 per cent. Nearly all these dizzy price rises in vital, basic commodities have been produced by monopolistic devices, nearly all of them have occurred in industries tied up with international cartels, and nearly all of them have followed a planned reduction in stocks on hand which the New Deal has helped these industries to achieve at the public's expense. In none of these industries, with the possible exception of steel, has there been a rise in production to match the rise in prices, and in none is there a condition approximating scarcity except of the kind that monopoly devises for profit's sake.

John T. Flynn has suggested what these price increases mean in human terms by pointing out that canceling the annual pay rolls of the steel, automobile, and rubber industries and throwing out of work their hundreds of thousands of employees would take no more out of the national till than the price increases since September have done. The human side of the thing also is reflected in the finding of Louis H. Bean, AAA economic adviser, that "the various processes of recovery" have increased the average industrial worker's income from $933 in 1933 to $1,180 in 1936, and that the increase in food prices alone has gobbled up $69 out of this $187 increase, leaving the average worker $118 with which to meet price increases in other items. The recent price increases so alarmingly recorded by the Bureau of Labor Statistics wholesale index are only beginning to make themselves felt in retail channels, where the average worker spends most of his $1,180 a year. Their full force will not be felt there until next fall. All that the President's thundering at the price-boosters has accomplished to date has been a slight sagging of rubber, cotton, copper, hides, silk, and cocoa quotations, and since these are all highly speculative commodities, the slight recession in their prices this past week may be nothing more than a passing tendency to wince when the President cracks his rhetorical whip. The steel magnates did not wince, but thundered back with a defense of present prices, which some of the economists here thought contained a threat of further price boosts.

It was at steel prices that the President directed most of his attack, and in the attack itself we find most of the circumstantial evidence for doubt of the validity of his intentions. He had before him a host of concrete recommendations as to what the government might do to halt the mad rush of prices and prevent impending chaos. But overlooking a series of recommendations for frontal attacks on the devices of monopoly, including the tariff wall and the patent laws, he elected to use publicity, namely, his own voice, combined with a threat to halt government purchases of steel, copper, and other durable goods if their prices kept on skyrocketing. He was trying by the device of publicity to subject to the pressure of public opinion that group of industries farthest removed from public influence and best armored against it by the devices of corporate ownership. And by talk of a shift in federal spending policies he was trying to threaten that group of industrialists which is least impressed by threats from the White House. The steel industry, for example, has tangled with Mr. Roosevelt on no less than six major occasions since the New Deal began, and each time has made him bend the knee. Not even the receipt in December, 1934, of reports from the NRA and the Federal Trade Commission which agreed, in effect, that the steel industry was more powerful than the government could move him to attempt disproof of that insulting thesis. On the contrary, he assigned Mr. Richberg to the task of trying to get it erased from the reports before they were made public and, more particularly, of getting the FTC to temper its finding that the industry's pricing practices, to which Roosevelt had given his blessing in the steel code, were a violation of the anti-trust laws and inimical to the public welfare. Even the NRA report, with which Richberg was more successful, contained evidences of the steel industry's arrogance; it noted that the NRA had been unable to obtain through the code authority certain essential information about the industry.

One of the reasons that the steel magnates knew they had no reason to fear the President's bluster of April 2 was that just a week earlier Attorney General Cummings had let it be known that the Justice Department, after nearly a year of intensive investigation, had been unable to find evidence justifying prosecution of the industry under the anti-trust laws. A few months ago John Dickinson had told a House committee the same thing in executive session. Dickinson was then head of the Justice Department's anti-trust division, and he was the same Dickinson who, before entering federal service, had helped prepare the Sugar Institute's defense to an anti-trust prosecution, finally lost by the institute in the Supreme Court. The investigation to which Cummings referred and which Dickinson had directed was ordered by the President more than a year ago, after Ickes had raised a row about collusive bids on PWA steel contracts and had sent to the White House the whole mess of identical bids on contract after contract. Having passed the buck to the Justice Department, Roosevelt promptly forgot the matter, or so he indicated when at a press conference four days after his initial attack on steel prices he was asked what had come of the investigation he had ordered. He thanked the inquirer for reminding him of it and directed a secretary further to refresh his memory by asking the Justice Department about the probe. That inquiry had this apparent result: at a press conference three days later, when asked again about the fate of the investigation, he announced that he had asked Cummings and Richberg to make an investigation and report to him on pricing practices in the durable-goods industries. Richberg, no longer a federal employee, is the same Richberg who in April, 1935, as acting chairman of the NRA, censored and suppressed the NRA's report of an investigation the President had ordered nearly a year earlier of the effect of an executive order of June, 1934, aimed at restoring competitive bidding for public contracts by removing the excuse which would-be contractors were advancing for the predominance of identical bids. In the version of the report which Richberg sent to the White House and permitted to be made public he held that the available data did not justify definite conclusions of any kind. He also held that identical bids were a symbol of perfect competition. The report, before Richberg censored and abbreviated it, said the President's order had "not served to loosen at all the grip of strongly organized industries upon the prices and upon the consumers of their products." It found that, if anything, the incidence of identical bids had increased after the President's order was issued, and it drew the supporting data—which Richberg had belittled as insufficient evidence—from weekly reports from 102 federal, state, and municipal purchasing agents, plus a survey of practically all bids received by federal purchasing agents since January 1, 1933.

Another reason that the steel magnates must have known that Roosevelt's threat to divert federal spending away from steel and other durable-goods industries and into consumers' goods was not serious is that the great federal expenditures for steel and allied products have been made in the last year or more not as a part of the WPA and PWA programs to which he referred but through the Navy and War departments as part of the New Deal's record-breaking armaments program. Roosevelt gave no sign of planning to curb that program.

The chief effect of Mr. Roosevelt's little speech was to provide a form of justification for his intention of cutting relief outlays to the bone. And it seems to have escaped attention in most places that Mr. Roosevelt's price outburst served the additional purpose of sounding the death knell of low-cost housing legislation. He was asked about that and replied that though housing legislation might be passed at this session, any real attempt to put it into operation through a program of actual construction would have to be deferred for a year or more. With those words he pigeonholed another one of the recommendations he had received for snatching the body politic back from the rim of chaos; the experts had suggested that a real housing program was one way to do the trick.

I Stand with the Spanish People

BY THOMAS MANN

Küsnacht, Switzerland

I WAS not born a political man, that is to say, a partisan whose will exercises restraints and limitations upon his intellect. Nor is it interest that bids me speak, but only my suffering and indignant conscience. It is interest that commits all the great rascalities in the world. As now in Spain. Then whose affair is it, if not the creative artist's—the man's whose emotions are free—to assert the human conscience against the baseness of interest, at once so presumptuous and so petty; to protest against the stultifying, all-embracing confusion made in our time between politics and villainy?

There is no lower kind of scorn than that visited upon the artist who "descends into the arena." And the ground of that scorn is interest—interest which prefers to gain its ends in darkness and silence, unchecked by the forces of the intellect or the spirit. Interest would confine artists to their proper domain of the cultural by telling them that politics is beneath their dignity. The result is that the cultural becomes the slave of interest, its accessory and accomplice, all for the false coin of a little dignity in return. The artist must not see that in this stately retreat to his ivory tower he is committing an act of anachronistic folly—must not see, yet today can hardly fail to see.

Democracy is a realized and intrinsic fact today to the extent that politics is everybody's business. Nobody can deny this; it stares us in the face with an immediacy never known before. Sometimes we hear somebody say, "I take no interest in politics." The words strike us as absurd, and not only absurd but egotistical and anti-social, a stupid self-deception, a piece of folly. But they are more; they betray an ignorance not only intellectual but ethical. For the politico-social field is an undeniable and inalienable part of the all-embracing human; it is one section of the human problem, the human task, which the non-political man thinks to set off, as the decisive and actual, against the political sphere. The decisive and the actual: it is indeed that, for in the guise of the political the problem of the human being, man himself, is put to us today with a final, life-and-death seriousness unknown before. Then shall the artist—he who by nature and destiny ever occupies humanity's farthest outposts—shall he alone be allowed to shirk a decision?

Life-and-death seriousness. I use these words to express the conviction that a man's—and how much more an artist's—opinions are today bound up with the salvation of his soul. I deliberately use a religious terminology; so convinced am I that an artist who in our time avoids the issue, shirks the human problem when politically presented, and betrays to interest the things of the spirit is a lost soul. He must be stunted; not only because he sacrifices his existence as an artist, his "talent," and produces nothing more which is available for life, but because even his earlier work, not created under the pressure of such guilt and once good, will cease to be good and crumble to dust before humanity's eyes. That is my conviction. I have instances in mind as I write.

I shall be asked what I mean by spirit and what by interest. Well, then, the spiritual, seen from the politico-social angle, is the longing of the people for better, juster, happier conditions of life, more adequate to the developed human consciousness. And interest—interest is all that which seeks to thwart this consummation because it would thereby be cut off from certain advantages and privileges. In Spain interest rages. Rages with a shamelessness such as the world has seldom seen. What has been happening there for many months is one of the most scandalous and mortifying pages which history has to show. Does the world see it, feel it? Only very partially. For murderous interest understands only too well how to besot the world and throw dust in its eyes.

Have we then no hearts? No understanding? Shall we let ourselves be unresistingly deprived of our last remnant of free human judgment by interest, which unfailingly appeals to the worst instincts, though it clothe itself in lying names such as order, culture, God, and native land? A people held down and exploited with all the instruments of the most obsolete reaction strives toward a brighter existence more compatible with human dignity, a social order more creditable to the face of civilization. There freedom and progress are conceptions not yet vitiated by philosophical irony and skepticism. For these people they are conditions of national honor, values to be striven for to the utmost. The government, with all the caution prescribed by the special circumstances, undertakes to remove the grossest abuses, to carry out the most imperative reforms. What happens? An insurrection of generals, occurring in the interest of the old exploiters and oppressors, concocted with the help of hopeful foreign interest, blazes up and misfires. When it is already as good as beaten, it is propped up by foreign governments inimical to freedom in return for promises of strategic and economic advantage in case of victory. It is supported by money, men, and material, fostered and prolonged, until there seems no end to the bloodshed, the tragic, ruthless, obstinate carnage. Against a people desperately fighting for its freedom and its human rights the troops of its own colony are led into battle. Its cities are demolished by foreign bombing planes, women and children are butchered; and all this is called a national movement; this villainy crying out to heaven is called God, Order, and Beauty. If the interested European press could have its way, the capital would have fallen long since; the triumph of Order and Beauty over the Marxist rabble would long since have been consummated. But the half-demolished capital is not yet conquered, and the "red mob," as the interested press puts it in referring to the Spanish people, is defending its life, its higher life, with a lion-like courage which must make even the most besotted slave of interest pause and consider the moral forces here engaged.

The right of peoples to self-determination enjoys high official honor throughout the world today. Even our dictators and our totalitarian states lay stress upon it, finding it important to show that they have 90 to 98 per cent of their people behind them. Well, so much is clear: the revolting military have not got the Spanish people behind them and cannot pretend that they have. They must do their best with Moors and foreign troops. It may not be quite settled what the Spanish people want. But what they do not want is abundantly clear—General Franco. Those European governments which are interested in the strangulation of freedom have recognized as legal the rebel junta, in the midst of a furious struggle which they support even if they did not connive at its inception. At home they betray a considerable degree of sensitiveness in the matter of high treason. In Spain they support a man who delivers up his country to the foreigner. At home they call themselves nationalists. In Spain they enforce the power of a man to whom his country's independence is naught if he can do to death freedom and the rights of humanity, who declares that rather shall two-thirds of the Spanish people die than that Marxism—that is to say, a better, juster, more humane order—shall triumph.

Who Owns the Air?

BY RUTH BRINDZE

CONGRESS is again discussing the broadcasting monopoly, and in preparation for the investigation which appears to be indicated, the radio industry is assuming the role of injured innocence.

The facts, as the broadcasters present them, are these. On January 1, 1937, the National Broadcasting Company owned only ten stations and operated five others. An even less impressive number of stations is owned and operated by the Columbia Broadcasting System: in all there are ten, eight owned by the system and two operated under leases. The Mutual Broadcasting System, the third national network, is a cooperative enterprise and owns no stations.

Of the 685 radio stations in the United States, then, the two major chains have absolute control over only 25. Even if all stations affiliated with the networks were included, the total would be by no means overwhelming. In the blue and red networks of the National Broadcasting Company there are 111, in the Columbia System 99. In other words, only 29 per cent of the radio stations in the country are members of one of the Big Two.

But in the radio world it is not numbers that count but transmitting power and the desirability of the wave length. The major networks and the Mutual System control every high-powered station in the country and every clear channel. Their stations are so strategically located that the network programs are transmitted from the Atlantic Coast to the Pacific, from Mexico to Canada. Of the 22,869,000 "radio homes" in the United States, the National Broadcasting Company estimates that it reaches approximately 22,500,000. The circulation claimed by the Columbia network is even greater.

But the dominant position of the chains is even more clearly illustrated by the power of their transmitting apparatus. The total transmission power of all broadcasting stations in the United States is 2,634,200 watts. This is divided among networks and independents as follows:

NBC Red and Blue Networks.....	1,686,100 watts
Columbia Broadcasting System.....	644,900 "
Mutual Broadcasting System.....	690,200 "
Total controlled by the chains...	2,447,600 "
Total controlled by all others....	186,600 "

(Allowance has been made for the duplication of membership of stations in Mutual and one of the other chains.)

In other words, the stations that comprise the two major networks have 88.4 per cent of the total transmitting power; the three leading networks have 92.9 per cent. Broadcasting in the United States is the networks' show. And the networks are operated by a few banker-dominated corporations.

The National Broadcasting Company, wholly owned subsidiary of the Radio Corporation of America, controls the most powerful chain in the country. Its board of directors is chosen from the directorate of the R. C. A.; its president is named by men who are directors of the broadcasting subsidiary as well as of the parent company. Although it is frequently asserted that the broadcasting unit is operated independently of the Radio Corporation, its management is directly responsible to the 'men who direct the affairs of the radio trust. Who are these men and what interests do they represent?

The chairman of the board is General James G. Harbord, a Morgan man. The retired general is also a director of the Bankers' Trust Company (which loaned $20,000 to the Liberty League), of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad, and of the American Legion Publishing Corporation. The members of the board are Newton D. Baker, legal adviser to Morgan utilities; Cornelius Bliss, a member of the investment firm of Bliss, Fabyan and Company and a director of the Bankers' Trust Company; Arthur E. Braun of Pittsburgh, president of the Mellon-dominated Farmers' Deposit National Bank;

Bertram Cutler, described in Poor's "Register of Directors" as "with John D. Rockefeller"; John Hays Hammond, Jr., consulting engineer both for R. C. A. and its two former affiliates, General Electric and Westinghouse; Edward J. Nally, a septuagenarian who retired from active service in 1925; Edward Harden, DeWitt Millhauser, and Frederick Strauss, representatives of the brokerage houses and underwriters which have helped to raise funds for the R. C. A.; James R. Sheffield, corporation lawyer, former president of the Union League Club and the National Republican Club; and David Sarnoff, whose rise to fame and fortune is on the Horatio Alger model except that his dominant position in the industry is due largely to his ability to negotiate with bankers. He is chairman of the board of the National Broadcasting Company.

Not only the financial affiliations of the Radio Corporation's directors but their personal sentiments on such important matters as war and peace are significant. Controlling as they do one of the largest networks in the country—and the world—they are in an almost unsurpassed position to mold the public mind. Newton D. Baker was, of course, President Wilson's Secretary of War. General Harbord is a retired army man who believes that "war represents a permanent factor in human life and a very noble one. It is the school of heroism from which a nation's noblest sons graduate into highest manhood." Colonel Manton Davis, general attorney for the Radio Corporation, testified at a Congressional hearing a few years ago that the trust was "an organization whose every important official and technician is a reserve officer of the army or navy." John Hays Hammond, Jr., although not a munitions manufacturer, is through his inventions closely allied to the murder-for-profit industry; Major Lenox R. Lohr, who succeeded Merlin H. Aylesworth as president of the N. B. C., came to his post from the army via the Chicago World's Fair. Altogether, a jingoistic crew to intrust with the control of public opinion.

Unlike its competitor, the Columbia Broadcasting System is not affiliated with any manufacturer of radio equipment. Since 1932, when it bought back the 50 per cent interest in the network which had been sold to Paramount-Famous-Players-Lasky corporation four years before, the Columbia Broadcasting System has been controlled by the Paley family—and by the bankers who supplied the cash needed to repurchase the stock from Paramount.

When the network was founded in 1927 as the United Independent Broadcasters, Inc., the captains of the electrical-equipment business, who were steadily losing money on the National Broadcasting Company, were tremendously amused at the idea of a profit from broadcasting. The founders of the new organization—Major J. Andrew White, one of the old-timers of commercial broadcasting and formerly a vice-president of the R. C. A. subsidiary; Wireless Press, Inc.; Arthur Judson, manager of concert stars; and George A. Coats, a promoter—were soon in a bad hole. In the nick of time a good angel appeared in the form of the Columbia Phonograph Company, which bought the operating rights of United Independent because it was worried by the premature announcement that its rival, the Victor Talking Machine Company, was about to be gathered in by the acquisitive Mr. Sarnoff. But after three months of broadcasting at a loss reputed to have been $100,000 a month, the phonograph company was ready to retire. United Independent bought back the operating company, then known as the Columbia Phonograph Broadcasting System, for $10,000.

Dr. Leon Levy, a former dentist and the owner of WCAU, one of the original stations in the network, produced the next angel, Jerome H. Louchheim, owner of a racing stable, friend of the late W. W. Atterbury, and a member of Philadelphia's inner financial circle. In 1928 Dr. Levy's brother-in-law, William Samuel Paley, appeared on the scene. Affairs at Columbia were in fairly good order, but the National Broadcasting Company still had no cause to worry about competition. It had prestige, a treasury which the General Electric and the Westinghouse companies kept full, a preferential contract with the Bell System, and the stations with the best wave lengths. Columbia was poor, and it had to take the stations that N. B. C. did not want. Mr. Paley's triumph is a success story of the millionaire who made good. The original sum by which he became the dominant stockholder is estimated to have been $300,000, and his total investment to date is said to be over a million and a half. Except for the representatives of the bankers, Mr. Louchheim, and Herbert B. Swope, the board of directors of C. B. S. is a family affair. Besides William S. there are Samuel and Jacob Paley, Isaac D. Levy, and Dr. Leon Levy.

Dr. Levy supplies an interesting link between Columbia and its chief rival, the National Broadcasting Company. Dr. Levy is the managing director of station WCAU, Columbia's Philadelphia outlet; in 1936 he was also the managing director of KYW, a Westinghouse station which is the Philadelphia unit of the National Broadcasting Company's red network. This was carrying to an extreme Philadelphia's reputation for brotherly love. Apparently Dr. Levy was not troubled by a situation which forced him to compete with himself for business and to further the interests of N. B. C. while a major stockholder and a member of the board of its chief rival.

There is another indirect tie-up between the two networks. Herbert B. Swope is a director of the Columbia Broadcasting System and a member of its executive committee. His brother, Gerard Swope, is head of the General Electric Company, one of the corporations which originally organized the R. C. A. Until the spring of 1936 Herbert Swope was also chairman of the board of Keith-Albee-Orpheum, a subsidiary of the Radio-Keith-Orpheum Corporation, in which the R. C. A. had substantial financial interests.

The bankers' representatives were added to the Columbia Broadcasting System's board after the financiers had put up the cash required to buy back control of the network from Paramount. The firms which helped with this and subsequent financing, and which for their efforts were given approximately 50 per cent of the C. B. S. Class A stock, are Brown Brothers, Harriman and Company,

W. E. Hutton and Company, and Lehman Brothers. Their representatives on the board are Prescott S. Bush, partner in Brown Brothers; Joseph A. W. Iglehart, partner in Hutton and Company; and Dorsey Richardson of the Lehman firm. Except that Brown Brothers was on Morgan's preferred list, there appears to be no tie-up with the house of Morgan.

The history of Columbia illustrates the danger of treating a great radio chain merely as a profit-making venture. It has been bartered back and forth, first to the Columbia Phonograph Company, then to Louchheim, then to Paramount, and finally to the bankers. A minor item like the social significance of control of the air can of course play no part in finance. So far the bankers and the other members of the board have been well satisfied with President Paley and his policies. "Mr. Paley, as a business man," writes Fortune, "is a theme that practically brings tears to the eyes of his directors—never in all their lives, they say, have they been associated with anybody so clever at business. Not only is he a master advertiser and feeler of the public pulse, but these gentlemen say that he is the greatest organizer, the best executive, the quickest thinker, the coolest negotiator they have ever seen."

President Paley has always understood the value of political connections. To head the department of station relations he selected Sam Pickard, described by Fortune as "the brightest commissioner." Pickard resigned as a federal radio commissioner to take the Columbia job. In 1933 Mr. Paley added to his executive personnel Henry Adams Bellows, also a former radio commissioner and a classmate at Harvard of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Vice-President Bellows was placed in charge of Columbia's Washington station WJSV and proved a most useful ambassador of C. B. S. in Washington during the first days of the New Deal. Both Bellows and Pickard have now resigned. But even though the two former radio commissioners are no longer on active duty, the network stands in well with the Federal Communications Commission and has received many favors from it.

Slow Death in Illinois

BY MILTON S. MAYER

Peoria, Illinois, March 31

LAST September the 1,400 foundry workers at the Caterpillar Tractor Company here were given a complete physical examination. They weren't told why; Caterpillar wasn't in the habit of discussing anything, except how to vote, with its "earthworms," as they called themselves. Every employee had been examined at the time he was hired; this had been customary ever since the company moved from California, seven years before, in the face of "labor trouble" there. But this mass examination was different: it included an X-ray of the chest.

The men were never told the results of the examination. But on November 13 the foundry was shut down for the installation of "new machinery," protective devices to comply with the new Illinois Occupational Diseases Act. On November 19 the men received their pay checks for the week ending the thirteenth. The envelopes of 179 men contained a slip of paper. It was not another of President Heacock's encyclicals against the New Deal. It was an order to appear at the company's personnel office the following morning.

The 179 men were led into the presence of the personnel manager in groups of 20. Some 80 to 100 were told they were first-class silicotics. The rest were second and third class. The company was sorry, very sorry, but its insurers had refused to carry the risk on these men. There was nothing to be done about it. The men's work—many of them had been there since the plant opened—was satisfactory. But the company had no choice.

Ten days later the new Occupational Diseases Act went into effect, providing decent, if not liberal, compensation for silicotics, and holding the last employer of a silicotic fully liable. A year and a half before, the old act, which had been in operation since 1911, had been held unconstitutional in a series of decisions notorious even for the Illinois Supreme Court. "Boys," said one of the condemned earthworms, as they stood outside the "sunshine" plant talking it over, "it looks like we haven't got a lung to stand on." The boys laughed, but some of them suddenly had to sit down, because the exertion of laughing left them winded.

The earthworms at Caterpillar work for one of the most profitable monopolies in the country. Holding basic patents, the company is the largest manufacturer of track-type tractors in the world. Whenever there is a war anywhere, the company's exports of unassembled "tractors" jump. Sales in 1936 amounted to $54,000,000, a 48 per cent increase over 1935. Net income for 1936 was $9,850,000, compared with $5,949,000 for 1935. Increase in volume of 1936 operations, Standard Statistics points out, "more than absorbed advancing wages and higher material costs." The company's 1937 income to date is far above that for the corresponding period of 1936.

The 179 discharged men knew that under the laws—actually, under the absence of laws—of the state of Illinois the company was in the clear. They knew that they were dying of an incurable disease, contracted in making machinery "to be used," as President Heacock puts it, "to advance the welfare of mankind." They knew that they would never get work anywhere else, because no employer would be fool enough to trap himself under the "last-employer" liability clause of the new act.

Caterpillar paid its foundry workers a base rate of 52½ cents an hour, since raised to 62½ cents following similar raises in steel. The company "voluntarily" operated on a forty-hour week—without, however, a minimum weekly wage—and provided its 12,000 employees with all the furbelows of paternalism—girls' club, baseball league, and the like. The biggest industry in Peoria, Caterpillar exemplified the city's vaunted open-shop traditions. Half a dozen impotent A. F. of L. unions had a few members apiece in the Caterpillar plant. The molders' union struck the foundry in 1934, and when the strike was broken, its membership fell to twenty-five or thirty.

The silica dust in the Caterpillar foundry was so thick that the men operating hand trucks collided in the main gangway. There were no masks at all, except for the two men operating the pressure hoses in the sand-blast, and no partitions separating the blasting and cleaning rooms from the rest of the foundry. The swing-grinders carried the carborundum dust directly into the face of the man ahead. The sand used for cleaning, instead of being drawn off, rose to the ceiling and floated through the foundry, hanging in a cloud everywhere. Floors were not swept between shifts. Men assigned to sprinkling were transferred to "useful" jobs. Broken doors hung open for a month, creating a draft that kept the dust from settling. Cranemen working twenty feet above the men on the floor couldn't see the floorman's signal to raise or lower.

The company has never denied the existence of these conditions in the foundry—which President Heacock describes as "a pretty good place in which to work"—nor, since silicosis was inevitable under the circumstances, has it denied that the men contracted it there. The turnover was very high. Men quit after a few days because they couldn't breathe or keep their eyes open. But farm boys, whom the company preferred to the wiser denizens of the city, were plentiful. Workers didn't know they had silicosis until long after they had quit, and some of them never knew it. One Caterpillar silicotic who died last month at the age of thirty-one was never able to work again after nine months in the foundry in 1932. His widow and three small children live in a shanty outside Peoria. The Metropolitan Life Insurance Company, in which all Caterpillar workers carry a group policy, paid him $10 a week for the first year of his disability, then $36 a month until his death, and then a $2,000 death benefit, most of which will go to the doctor, the undertaker, and the lawyer.

The brazenness of the Caterpillar Company is perhaps unique in the long story of industrial murder. To understand it you have to understand Peoria. Peoria has grown rich on boom industries and the American Way. Its population of industrial serfs has increased from 75,000 in 1920 to 150,000 today. The law and the press are the errand boys of the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association. The slot-machine syndicate operates even in grocery stores. Prostitution displays the red lights of a long gone era. The baseball pool, which amounts to $5,000 on Saturdays, has its headquarters in an all-day, wide-open gambling joint on a main-floor front in the heart of the city. The employees in such factories as the Peoria Cordage Company may live in piano boxes on Cinder Point, but the mansions on Grand View Drive are evidence that the open shop pays, even if operating expenses include the politicians.

A successful general strike in Pekin, ten miles away, last February taught the Peoria industrialists nothing. The 1936 election, in which the Democrats swept Peoria County for the first time, taught the Peoria industrialists nothing. The coming of the C. I. O. last summer taught them nothing. Their espionage system, operating at maximum efficiency in plants like the Caterpillar, would take care of the workers, and the company-owned city police, old hands at mauling "agitators," would take care of the John L. Lewises. The Caterpillar Company was sorry, very sorry, that its negligence had pitted the lungs of 179 men, but this was Peoria.

When the silicotics asked the company for claim blanks furnished by the Metropolitan, Caterpillar's Mr. Carlson refused them. "You aren't sick," he said, "and you aren't disabled." Last month the Metropolitan sent an agent to Peoria to investigate. The agent told the men that the company's report to the Metropolitan stated that the wholesale discharge was due to "a reduction in the force." Meanwhile the victims sent a committee to see President Heacock. President Heacock was sorry, but he didn't see what he could do for them. "Labor seems to control the state government," he told the committee. "Maybe somebody in Springfield can help you." The men pointed out that the new act permitted incipient silicotics to remain on the job if they waived 50 per cent of all future compensation. "A small firm might be able to accept such waivers in a few cases," said President Heacock, "but a big firm can't be bothered."

Some of the men were members of the molders' union. Surely they would get help from the Peoria Trades and Labor Assembly, which had just described Heacock in his capacity of president of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association as "corrupter-in-chief of the Illinois General Assembly." But the A. F. of L. could do nothing for them; its unions had fewer than a thousand members altogether in the Caterpillar plant. The men nobody wanted began filing suits against the Caterpillar Company, charging negligence. The Illinois Industrial Commission "persuaded" the company to underwrite its own occupational-disease risk and rehire the less seriously afflicted men, thereby reducing the suits.

From forty-five to fifty cases are awaiting the outcome of the $75,000 test suit now in federal court. The company has moved to dismiss the suit on the ground that silicotics have no remedy under the common law of Illinois—the last appeal of these condemned men and of hundreds of other Illinois workers discharged between the collapse of the old Occupational Diseases Act and the effective date of the new one. In its brief for dismissal the company called upon the federal court to defer to the unanimous opinion of the Illinois Supreme Court of May 12, 1936, in which Justice Shaw stated: "One searches in vain for any precedent at common law establishing any duties as to healthfulness or sanitation." Silicotics having been deprived of health by due process of law, in accordance with both federal and state constitutions, it is likely that the federal court, like the Caterpillar Company, will have to confine its relief to being sorry for the plaintiffs.

But industry's lepers want something more. In the C. I. O. they have found a protagonist. With the automobile and steel victories behind it and the Peoria A. F. of L. mislaying Green's order to turn the rascals out, the C. I. O. is getting under way at Caterpillar, its first Peoria objective. The silicotics—those who are still able to get around—have joined the C. I. O. organizing staff.

A few weeks ago the C. I. O. committee walked into President Heacock's office for a preliminary conference. At President Heacock's invitation more than a hundred Caterpillar "employees," including company executives and craft-union officials, were present. President Heacock read a twenty-minute prepared speech in the course of which he said: "... Next let us discuss the most misrepresented group, the owners. ... About 15,000 common ordinary people did refrain from spending all their income, did save up a few hundred dollars, and did pool their savings to place these buildings and tools here. ... We believe that every 'Caterpillar' man has a perfect right to discuss his employment with the management any way he pleases. ... If I want some dirty, stinking Negro or Communist to represent me, I shall not thank the company for signing away my right. ..."

President Heacock then asked the committee just what their demands were. The committee outlined the United States Steel contract. When they got to the impartial-umpire clause, President Heacock interrupted: "Now, gentlemen, you had just as well withdraw that request. Your ideas of having committees is O. K. You can have all the committees you want. ... But when you ask that neither you nor we have the authority to manage the business, that can't be, because there wouldn't be any business two years from now if such a ridiculous thing were made operative. That is all an impartial umpire is. ... The point is, when there is a disagreement, management opinion goes."

[Shortly after this article was written, the C. I. O., which has a clear majority of Caterpillar's 12,000 earthworms, sent a committee to wait on President Heacock. He agreed to negotiate but refused to sign the agreement. Thereupon the union closed down the plant in a combination of sitdown and walkout. After forty-eight hours the plant reopened with the understanding that collective bargaining is to begin at once.]

Heart Balm and Seduction

BY WILLIAM SEAGLE

MANY of our state legislatures, in the last few years, have been making tremendous concessions to sex liberalism. Bills abolishing in one swoop all actions for breach of promise, alienation of affection, criminal conversation, and seduction have been introduced into the legislatures of a number of states, and in New York, New Jersey, Illinois, and Indiana they have been enacted into law. Naturally the champions of sex freedom have rejoiced. The great victory in New York received honorable mention at literary cocktail parties. But bankers and brokers, captains of industry, matinee idols, and radio crooners had even more reason to heave sighs of relief.

The rich are the natural victims of the heart-balm racket. As long as money was easy, the payment of heart balm was simply one of the inconveniences of living a fast life. But with the market gone to smash the situation became quite different. That extra twenty-five or fifty thousand was needed to cushion a margin. The charming blackmailer became a genuine menace. Soon the great moguls of the bar began to hear from their wealthy clients, and the lawmakers were advised of their duty.

The Solons were willing. They were, however, guilty of a curious inconsistency. While they abolished the heart-balm actions, they left standing the criminal penalties for seduction. To remove all doubt it was expressly provided in the acts of abolition that they should not be construed as repealing any of the provisions of the penal codes. The discrimination in favor of the rich resulting from this preservation of the criminal penalties is apparent. Since heart-balm actions are civil suits for damages, there is no point in bringing them against any male who is only a few jumps ahead of the WPA. As a practical matter vengeance can be wreaked on the proletarian Don Juan only by invoking the pains and penalties of the criminal law against seduction.

This is the heyday of the New Deal, and it is high time that someone spoke in the interest of the little fellow who has had his fling. The seduction statutes operate in a very precise manner to railroad the importunate but impecunious swain to the altar. They make it a crime to seduce under promise of marriage a "virtuous female" or a "female of previous reputation for chastity." The gravamen of the offense is thus that the woman was induced to surrender her virtue under promise of marriage. Only thirteen states have no provisions for the punishment of seduction as such.

The age of the woman who charges that she has been seduced makes no difference except in a few states, where it must be below either eighteen or twenty-one, in other words, intermediary between the age of consent and the age of majority. This is the case in both Illinois and Indiana. But in New York there is no age limit, and the same is true in twenty-one other states. The woman may be sweet sixteen or over forty. Moreover, many courts have held that she may be a widow or a divorcee, and a few courts have even extended the protection of the seduction statutes to a "fallen" woman who has "reformed"!

The punishments under the seduction statutes are obviously calculated to make any careless male "do the right thing by the girl." The maximum penalty is usually five years but in several Southern states it is ten. Of course prosecution usually abates if the seducer offers to marry his victim, but this is only to say that seduction is the one crime for which the penalty is marriage. Moreover, in Georgia, Iowa, Oklahoma, Texas, and Washington, prosecution revives or more stringent penalties are applied if the woman is subsequently abandoned within a period ranging from two to five years without such cause as constitutes a valid ground for divorce, and in Georgia if such abandonment occurs at any time after the forced marriage! It is little wonder that many a woman who has been jilted is ready to admit a lapse of virtue to her lawyer and subsequently to the district attorney.

It is a fundamental axiom of the law of domestic relations that it is against public policy to decree the specific performance of a marriage contract. The reason for this highly salutary rule is obvious: the law should not compel a couple to marry who have already demonstrated their incompatibility. But the seduction statutes tend to accomplish the specific performance of promises to marry when the incompatibility of the parties has been demonstrated beyond a doubt. This is legal shotgun marriage with a vengeance.

The greatest paradox of the seduction statutes is that, like most laws which are intended to bolster morality, they actually encourage immorality. In effect the law says to a woman: "If your fiance has jilted you, and you have had no pre-marital experience, you are practically without a remedy. If, however, you have not been virtuous, you can, at the cost perhaps of a little unpleasant publicity, force the man to marry you."

The seduction statutes bespeak the mores of the lower classes when the church did not bother too greatly to combat the rather informal habit of common-law marriage. In all parts of the world primitive folk have tended to treat betrothal as practically tantamount to marriage, and old customs often survive in curious forms. It is no wonder that the promise to marry is the essence of the crime of seduction. But when the social level is low, the breach of the promise may be disregarded entirely. Thus in the deep South prosecutions of Negroes for seduction have been practically unknown.

Seduction has never been recognized as a crime by the English common law. In the eighteenth century in England the seduction of wenches of the lower classes by gentlemen was considered almost a privilege of rank. In France and other Latin countries there has, of course, never been recognized any such crime as the seduction of a mature woman under promise of marriage. Indeed, Germany appears to be the only country in the world except the United States in which this is a major crime.

Since seduction was not a crime at common law, American states had to make it such by statute. Nevertheless the first statutes were long in coming. To the credit of the early Puritans it must be said that they were too realistic to believe in the virtue of a woman who could not resist temptation. To this day almost none of the original New England states has made seduction a crime.

The rapid multiplication of the seduction statutes undoubtedly had some connection with the constant shifting of the frontier. In a frontier community the unattached male is welcome, but because of his unknown past he is also a danger to the all-too-trusting woman. He may have a wife in the East. Indeed in a few states it was made a special crime for a married man to seduce a woman under promise of marriage. The later waves of immigration reinforced the argument for seduction statutes. The forgotten wife might now be in Italy, or Russia, or Germany. Moreover, the eighties and nineties were also the heyday of Comstockery, and the idea of the helpless female occupied a prominent place in life and literature. There was still to be popularized the Shavian paradox that it is the woman who seduces the male.

The seduction statutes, however, are far from being dead letters. It is safe to say that several thousand prosecutions for seduction are instituted every year. In New York City in the last decade there have been approximately sixty arrests a year for seduction. In North Carolina in the last three years the annual number of prosecutions has been near the one hundred mark. In Alabama, in the decade from 1922 to 1932, there was an average of fifty-two prosecutions a year.

The chances are that prosecutions for seduction may now increase. The abolition of the civil actions may lead some of the more unscrupulous gold-diggers to attempt to jail even bankers and captains of industry out of a spirit of pure revenge. The heart-balm actions may be legally outlawed, but attempts to levy blackmail do not depend so much upon the availability of the legal remedies as on the fear of exposure. The evil has probably only been driven underground. With this thought the little fellows may comfort themselves.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

The War—Twenty Years After

THESE lines are being formulated on the twentieth anniversary of America's entrance into the World War. In 1917 I was a member of the board of directors of the Associated Press. I sat alone in one of its offices as they brought me the "flash" that Woodrow Wilson had appeared before Congress to demand the declaration of war; of all those Associated Press directors I was the only one to oppose this national action. As I read that dispatch and knew that the end of the fight to keep the United States out of the war had come, I confess I could hardly keep back the tears. It seemed to me as if I were witnessing the death of the American Republic. I knew it was the end of Woodrow Wilson as a liberal leader and of his "New Freedom"—we had to wait twenty years for the New Deal, its successor. I knew that it meant the retarding, if not the destruction, of every liberal and progressive movement and the triumph of black reaction. I was not wrong, for the prosecution of the war was promptly turned over to the very big-business men whom Wilson had inveighed against as the "masters of America" who had stolen the government.

Just one week later, on April 13, 1917, in the midst of the first hysteria of the war, I wrote to my good friend, Joseph P. Tumulty, secretary to President Wilson. Here are some extracts from my letter:

You have had my sincerest sympathy during these trying days, and I am glad to learn from your message through Dave Lawrence that you have not altogether forgotten me in this crisis. I know how you must have been suffering mentally and morally, and I can, I am sure, wholly enter into the feelings that must have been yours. To see your beloved chief congratulated by Henry Cabot Lodge, warmly indorsed and called upon by Theodore Roosevelt, and acclaimed with joy by every munitions maker, every agent of big business, and all the evil forces combined, against whom he has fought for American democracy until recently—all this, I know, must have caused you profound concern and unhappiness.

As for the conscription proposal, of course you were good enough to prepare me for that. Do you remember our ride with Dave down to Mr. Burleson's office, when you assured me that the President would never, never sign such a bill? And do you remember my saying that you two [the President and Tumulty] were the "weakest links in the chain"? Remembering certain similar incidents in the past, I came back from Washington feeling convinced that the President would be won over to universal service before very long; and my reputation as a prophet has been enhanced.

Believe me I am ready for any concentration camp, or conscription camp, or prison, but I am not at war and no one can put me into war—not the President of the United States with all his power. My loyalty to American traditions and ideals renders that impossible.

We shall see what we shall see, but what I should like to know now is, what shall we newspapermen say who loyally supported the President's speech of January 22, in which he said: "It must be a peace without victory. . . . Victory would mean peace forced upon the loser, a victor's terms imposed upon the vanquished. It would be accepted in humiliation, under duress, at an intolerable sacrifice, and would leave a sting, a resentment, a bitter memory upon which terms of peace would rest not permanently but only as upon quicksand"?

Well, the years have brought their compensations. This prophecy of Wilson's which I have just quoted has been triumphantly upheld; his war speeches, with all their fustian, false sentiment, vindictiveness, and, often, falsehood, have perished or are vanishing. I never dreamed that I should live to see an Institute of Public Opinion take a poll in which 70 per cent registered their deliberate opinion that our entry into war was a horrible mistake. Never did I think that I should live to see the twentieth anniversary of the war marked by the most widespread acclaim and recognition of the six Senators and fifty Representatives who stood by their convictions and voted against the war resolution. Senator Norris, the dispatches report, "has never been so sought after for interviews as in the last day or two." Yet I remember how John Sharp Williams, Senator from Mississippi, denounced Norris in the Senate as a disgrace to the United States, "a pro-German, a pro-Goth, a pro-Vandal." Williams is dead and forgotten. In his extraordinary record of achievement, in the majesty of his patriotism, in the glory of his consistent fidelity to conscience, George Norris stands out today as the greatest figure in our Congress. And here is Congressman W. A. Ashbrook, of Ohio, who voted for the war and is still Congressman, admitting what I wrote at the time, that if "the members of the war Congress had voted their honest convictions . . . that great blunder of twenty years ago would not have been made." He does not hesitate to express humiliation and shame that he voted for it.

I am sorry that Woodrow Wilson is not alive, and Robert Lansing, and some of the others who put us into that war. This is not vindictiveness, but only the wish that they might have lived to be convinced of the utter folly, now so completely demonstrated by Adolf Hitler, of their theory that you could shoot democracy into the Germans and militarism out of them. And are the foundations of our Republic as safe and sound as when we entered the war? Is the future secure? I seem to recall some words about "All they that take up the sword . . ."

BROUN'S PAGE

Is There a Nation?

THESE has been a good deal of discussion in the pages of this magazine recently as to what is wrong with The Nation. What isn't? To my mind the place has become all cluttered up with liberals who have been springing out of odd corners. First it was Oswald Garrison Villard, and now it is Maurice Wertheim who has come forward to urge this weekly to stand with the Times and the Herald Tribune in the fight for human freedom.

Mr. Villard says that when I get my teeth in the neck of an unfortunate I shake him until all the disgraceful facts about his grandfather, his father, and his predecessor in his present job come tumbling out. I have no recollection of having mentioned anybody's progenitors, since there are enough disgraceful facts in the present generation to occupy the time of even the most industrious columnist. But since Mr. Villard raises the point I think there may be some pertinence in appealing from Oswald Garrison to William Lloyd. The elder Garrison was not one to mince words and in his own polemics he had small patience with liberals and others in the caravan which travels along the middle of the road. He was rude and violent and he intended to be when, in his fight against slavery, he stigmatized the Constitution, after the Taney decision, as "a covenant with Death and an agreement with Hell."

For the sake of his conscience Oswald Garrison Villard is arguing that nothing but an amendment will do and therefore he opposes the plan of Franklin Roosevelt. According to the news reports of Mr. Villard's testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, he advanced as the ideal amendment one which would clarify and amplify the "general-welfare" clause. And Mr. Villard, according to the press, went on to state with pride that he had been fighting forty years for just such an amendment. And knowing the high character and tenacity of Oswald Garrison Villard I have no doubt that he would be delighted to keep his record clean by continuing the fight for a liberal court through another forty years.

But American industrial and agricultural workers are not content to wait so long. Not even for the sake of maintaining the conscientious scruples of Mr. Villard. Like many liberals I suspect that my confrere enjoys the battle so much that he hates to see an opportunity arise by which the enemy's line may be breached and broken. Much should be said of the gallantry and even the wisdom of those who devote their lives to lost causes, but it does not follow that it becomes vicious to win.

Since Mr. Villard has brought up the interesting problem of ancestry I may admit that I, too, take some fugitive interest in blood lines. Oswald Garrison Villard is the product of an interesting experiment. His grandfather was an abolitionist and his father a railroad magnate. As far as the researches of science have gone, the rule seems to be that when you cross abolition blood with railroad stock you get a liberal.

The case of Maurice Wertheim is a little more simple. Mr. Wertheim is a Wall Street progressive. A Wall Street progressive is a man who has just left the room when the fight begins. If Mr. Wertheim were arguing about a financial matter he would go to the best authorities before making any dogmatic statement. He repeats the familiar assertion that at the present time a constitutional amendment could easily be passed. He throws the child-labor amendment rather blithely out of the picture. You can't do that. The record of that particular amendment shows that at the present time one religious body in the United States has the power to block any change whatsoever in the Constitution. And the present temper of the Catholic church quite evidently is that it wishes to preserve the status quo. Before Mr. Wertheim hits upon an amendment which he feels sure can be passed, let him first go to Cardinal Hayes and get an enabling letter.

And Maurice Wertheim can make another simple test if he cares to go to the best sources of information. In my opinion the correspondents in Washington are extremely well informed as to the political state of the nation. I have put a hypothetical question to at least fifty reporters in the capital and have had an unvarying reply. The question goes like this: "Regardless of your personal opinion as to whether the President's proposals are good or evil, tell me what chance you think any amendment at all would have if Mr. Roosevelt is defeated?" Without exception every single reporter has replied in effect as follows: "If Roosevelt is licked, all the amendment boys can take their several and separate amendments up an alley and throw them in the garbage can. The judgment of the Congress and the country will be that the court and the Constitution are dynamite and that the only safe rule is hands off. If Roosevelt is licked there will be no change whatsoever in the judicial set-up for at least another generation."

I do not know whether I will come again to this pasture. I'm getting a little sick of The Nation's policy of fair play, and everybody must be heard whether or not he has anything to say. This isn't an amateur tennis match. It's a fight, and the well-being of masses of men and women depends upon the result. So I am not for the principle of bowing to your adversary and remarking, "After you, sir." Even an open mind needs to pull down the windows at certain times or it becomes less a mind than a cave of the winds. And speaking of open minds, before I put up the shutters I am curious to know just who it is who owns The Nation. All I can say is that the pottage isn't very hot and the service is something terrible.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

WHAT IS A GOOD REVIEW?

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

OF ALL literary forms the book review is the one most widely cultivated and least often esteemed. To many the very phrase "literary form" may smack of pretense when applied to a kind of writing which is usually so casual; and formlessness may, indeed, be the only form of many commentaries on books. Book reviewing can, nevertheless, become an art in itself and would be such more often if the ambitious reviewer would only devote himself to the cultivation of its particular excellences instead of attempting, as he so often does, to demonstrate his capacities by producing something "more than a mere review." The best review is not the one which is trying to be something else. It is not an independent essay on the subject of the book in hand and not an aesthetic discourse upon one of the literary genres. The best book review is the best review of the book in question, and the better it is the closer it sticks to its ostensible subject.

To say this is not to say that a good review is easy to write; in certain technical respects it is, indeed, the most difficult of all forms of literary criticism for the simple reason that in no other is the writer called upon to do so many things in so short a space. The critical essay, no matter how extended it may be, is not compelled to aim at any particular degree of completeness. It may—in fact it usually does—assume that the reader is sufficiently familiar with the work under discussion to make description unnecessary and it may also confine itself to whatever aspects of the subject the critic may choose.

But the book review as a literary form implies completeness; it has not really performed its function unless, to begin with, it puts the reader in possession of the facts upon which the criticism is based, and unless—no matter upon how small a scale—its consideration is complete. However penetrating a piece of writing may be, it is not a good review if it leaves the reader wondering what the book itself is like as a whole or if it is concerned with only some aspects of the book's quality.

I shall not pretend to say how large a proportion of the so-called reviews published in The Nation or anywhere else actually achieve the distinguishing characteristics of the book-review form, but a certain number of them do, and the sense of satisfactoriness which they give can always be traced to the fact that, whatever other qualities they may have, they accomplish the three minimum tasks of the book reviewer. They describe the book, they communicate something of its quality, and they pass a judgment upon it.

Each of these things is quite different from the others, but only the last is usually considered as carefully as it ought to be by either reader or writer. Adequate description implies a simple account of the scope and contents of the book; its presence guarantees that the reader will not be left wondering what, in the simplest terms, the book is about. "Communication of quality" implies, on the other hand, a miniature specimen of what is commonly called "impressionistic criticism"; it means that the reviewer must somehow manage to recreate in the mind of the reader some approximation of the reaction produced in his own mind by the book itself. And in however low esteem this form of criticism may be held as a be-all and end-all (Mr. Eliot calls it the result of a weak creative instinct rather than of a critical impulse), it is indispensable in a book review if that review is to perform the function it is supposed to perform, and if it is to become what it is supposed to be—namely, not merely an account of a book on the one hand or an independent piece of criticism on the other, but a brief critical essay which includes within itself all that is necessary to make the criticism comprehensible and significant.

Your "reviewer" often envies the more lofty "critic" because the critic is supposed to be read for his own sake while the reviewer must assume that the reader is attracted more by his interest in the book discussed than by the reviewer himself. For that very reason he is likely either to treat reviewing as a casual affair or to seek for an opportunity to write something else under the guise of a review. He might be happier himself and make his readers happier also if he would, instead, take the trouble to ask what a review ought to be and if he would examine his own work in the light of his conclusions. It is not easy to do within the space of a thousand words or less the three things enumerated. It is less easy still to combine the description, the impression, and the judgment into a whole which seems to be, not three things at least, but one.

How many reviewers of novels, for instance, seem to know how much of a particular story has to be told in order to provide a solid basis for the impression they intend to convey? And if it is decided that some part of the story must be told, how many know, as a story-teller must, whether the incidents are striking enough to come first or must be introduced with some comment which creates the interest? Yet a first-rate review, despite its miniature scale, raises precisely the same problems as long narratives or expositions raise, and each must be solved as artfully if the review is to have such beauty of form as it is capable of. Doubtless the finest reviewer can hardly hope to have his art fully appreciated by the public. But there is every reason why he should respect it himself.

BOOKS

Our Peculiar Institution

THE PRIVATE MANUFACTURE OF ARMAMENTS.

By Philip Noel-Baker, M.P. Oxford University Press. $3.75.

THE "wise money" of the world is back in munitions stocks. Happy days are here again for the producers of very ultimate consumer goods. We have even given diplomatic recognition to the belligerent status of our present prosperity, and with it to the possibility of its sudden death. Now comes Mr. Philip Noel-Baker, with ten years of study behind him, to put 560 pages before us to the effect that the private manufacture of arms should be abolished forthwith.

Apparently only the People's Front government in France is following his advice. It is correcting a situation where this peculiar institution has not only grown powerful and arrogant but sufficiently suspect, by reason of its own domestic and international diplomacy, to make a realistic people's government wonder how much of production and how much of sabotage could be expected from it in the course of a war against civil factions or foreign governments devoted to the sanctity of this and other private institutions.

Noel-Baker makes a convincing case on most of the matters usually considered in connection with private manufacture of armaments, and promises a second volume to cover the rest. Formerly professor of international relations in the University of London, fellow at Cambridge, assistant to the president of the Disarmament Conference, 1932-33, he was aided in his study by the Rockefeller Foundation and by James J. Forstall of Chicago. He goes at the subject with calm curiosity, without any attempt to find wicked men lusting for blood, and scrupulously cites the defense of the munitions manufacturers at every turn. Until that day when someone on the inside of the big munitions companies of the world decides that he wants to do something for the peace of the world and tells the full story from the inside, this book is likely to be the most complete work on the subject.

Those who believe that there can be peaceful change in the world will find themselves sharply challenged by his story. Probably no other single institution has been the center of so much fear and so much interference with peace as this one, and yet it survives, hardy and husky. President Wilson tried to abolish it at Versailles, but his attempt was quickly and skillfully diverted. Perhaps the least satisfactory part of this book is the failure to meet the question of the unwillingness of the various governments to abolish private manufacture in the immediate post-war period when everybody was oversupplied with munitions and lean years loomed for the companies.

The author lays the responsibility for private manufacture at the doors of the governments. They encourage the system. Why? Laziness? Social aversion of military men to engaging in trade? The desire of armies and navies to have widespread business support for growing militarisms? The desire of the governments not to let the foreigners get the business? Honest belief that private manufacture is cheaper? High diplomacy, which holds that a foreign army using our material becomes militarily allied to us? Simply interest in more work for local workmen? Mr. Baker does not weight the answers to the major question, but leaves the alliance between governments and private manufacturers standing as a challenge.

The two are tied together and speak almost the same language in defense of themselves and each other. His analysis of the manufacturers almost becomes the analysis of the governments. When the chairman of Vickers says that the prejudice against private manufacture "is the expression of an honorable but perhaps mistaken ideal respecting the sanctity of life and the iniquity of war" he is using less discreet words but not different ideas than governments use.

Noel-Baker points out the paradox of arming potential enemies, a practice which involves increased arming at home—what Admiral Wemyss called a "subterranean conspiracy against peace." England, France, and the United States have all helped arm Hitler. By instances he proves that the munitions firms have been active in fomenting war scares to increase armaments, have bribed and corrupted government officials, have influenced public opinion, have helped destroy peace and disarmament efforts, have, together with self-styled "patriotic" societies, helped guide the thinking of the world to the happy place where people feel certain that big guns and ships and armies are their only protection.

How they go about doing these things is something which can be established only from their own records, and very little is available outside the Senate Munitions Committee hearings in this country. The author credits the British Air League as well as the French munitions interests with an assist in blowing up the Disarmament Conference of 1932-33 and thinks the British air officers were largely responsible for the failure of air-disarmament proposals there. Going back a little he holds that a real Franco-German rapprochement was "prevented by the clamor of the purchased press, by all the propaganda which the armament interests conducted in both countries against the policies of peace." He credits a large share of the failure of the League in the Manchurian affair to the traders in arms. Japanese munitions purchases in France and England and "a frenzied defense of Japanese aggression by the Paris armament press" are cited as cause and effect. The other stories are here, too—of Skoda in Rumania, of Krupp's, of the Poutiloff scandal, the St. Gotthard shipments, Shearer, the Chemical Defense Association, the Mulliner panic, and the others, more or less well known.

Mr. Noel-Baker's book should be required reading for those who believe in international cooperation and are unwilling to help make it possible by cleaning up the one international nuisance they are obviously in a position to do something about.

STEPHEN RAUSHENBUSH

Rugby and the Tragic Muse

THE ASCENT OF F6. By W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood. Random House. $1.50.

ACCORDING to the title-page, the authors of "The Ascent of F6" reckon their newest offering a "tragedy in two acts." Its stock of choruses, corpses, and soliloquies is consequently impressive, and there is abundant talk concerning "the destructive element of the will"; yet the play is essentially of a piece with its satirical predecessor, "The Dog Beneath the Skin." It offers, again, polite "revolutionary" farce for the salon rather than the open market, conceived on the principle of the rugby match, wherein a symbol serves the function of a football, in contest of endurance between the actors, the authors, and a handful of selected visitors including Shakespeare, Noel Coward, W. S. Gilbert, and T. S. Eliot.

The symbol, in the present case, is a haunted mountain

(F6) strategically situated on the boundary between British and Ostnian Sudoland, and presided over by a demon and a legend. At the opening of the play British colonial investors have been apprised of the latter, the general import of which is that the Sudolands shall become the property of the first white man to make a successful ascent of F6. Accordingly, an expedition of five has been deputized to attempt the climb in the name of England and progressive enlightenment, at the same time that a rival party of climbers is dispatched on a similar mission by the Ostnians. The remainder of the play concerns the race to the summit, with satirical flashbacks which lampoon propagandic hypocrisy and the technique by which power and "benevolence" combine to produce an imperialist errand of mercy.

The unpardonable sin of the satirist is perhaps mere silliness, which defeats not only the author but the critic as well; and "The Ascent of F6" is a continuous offender. The most useful comment which suggests itself is that the protagonists, in a moment of stress during which they are rapidly turning into symbols and helping themselves to Eliot's epilogue to "Murder in the Cathedral," are instructed to "behave, in general, like the Marx brothers." Similarly, the performance as a whole is executed in the temper of a comic strip fallen by some odd chance among homilies. Even "tragic" protagonists like Lamp, the botanist, with his chatter of "Stagnium meningitis," "frustrax abominum," and other "rare specimens" are cartoons which border upon the infantile. It is less than astonishing under the circumstances that the play should eventually stiffen under its own paltriness and expire in a clutter of allegorical visitations. Auden and Isherwood are not the first of their calling who have omitted to go to school to the playwright before sitting down to their poetic tragedy; but few have further encumbered themselves with the baggage of a symbol so spurious and noncommittal that it overturns the vehicle it is intended to propel. The final word, perhaps, must be reserved for Walter de la Mare, who in a lecture before the British Academy suggested not long ago that "satire and poetry, the one destructive, the other creative, in intent, are unusually uneasy bedfellows." Certainly "The Ascent of F6" is one of their bad dreams.

BEN BELITT

The "New" Anthropology at Work

COMPETITION AND COOPERATION AMONG PRIMITIVE PEOPLES. Edited by Margaret Mead. McGraw-Hill Book Company. $4.

THIS book is recommended in the highest terms by the reviewer for two large groups of readers: for all professionals in the social sciences, and for non-professional readers who are interested in adding extra dimensions to the flat-surface view of human nature and of culture that most of us are wont to carry about as our equipment for analyzing current problems.

Dr. Mead is something of a storm center in anthropology. The old guard, those whose problems were defined by the safe orthodoxies of this field and also, be it added, those who seek scrupulously never to generalize beyond their data, criticize her penchant for generalizing brilliantly at the fragile edge of her data. On the other hand, there is a widening group of alert workers in her own and in related fields who regard Dr. Mead's as one of the most fertile and stimulating minds at work in the social sciences today.

The present volume is important both for its specific content and for its methodology. Every science tends to become "pot-bound" by its familiar structure of problems and procedures. In the case of anthropology this has tended to mean that, when the rest of us have taken our problems to the monographic studies of the ethnologists in the hope of testing the range of cultural adaptation about the problem in question, we have found that our problems as students of contemporary society are not the problems of ethnology. Perhaps one should not expect the ethnologist to go into the field with any concern to help answer the urgent questions of non-primitive societies.

Dr. Mead asks in the present volume questions that are crucial to an individualistic, competitive culture such as our own: How do whole societies of people get patterned—as does our own—around the competitive pursuit of the carrot of personal "success"? Is this restless competitiveness due, as many assume, to the stark "nature" of the human critter or to other factors? And to what extent is cooperativeness where it exists merely an enforced expedient, the result, for example, of the crowding pressure of enemies or of the scarcity of basic necessities such as food? Presumably the answers to such questions lie in the close scrutiny of the patterning of personality and culture as regards competition and cooperation over the face of the earth. Dr. Mead has worked through thirteen diverse types of primitive cultures with a group of associates. In more than half the cases existing printed materials have been supplemented by vital additional material from persons familiar at first hand with the culture in question. The end product here presented represents that all too rare bird in the social sciences, a genuinely cooperative piece of analysis which asks fresh, cross-cutting questions of conventional materials.

The conclusions stress the great variability of the personality emphases which different cultures select and stress through their respective institutionalized processes of character formation: "There is no correlation at all between major emphases [upon competition and cooperation] and a classification of cultures into food-gathering, hunting, agricultural, or pastoral peoples." "Whether a group has a minimum or a plentiful subsistence level is not directly relevant to the question of how cooperative or competitive in emphasis a culture will be." Structurally, cooperative societies contain well-defined and integrated closed groups, defining status and giving security to their members; while competitive societies are not closed—status can be lost and must constantly be won and rewon by the individual's own initiative. Cooperative societies do not necessarily involve the muting of the individual ego, for "strong ego development can occur in individualistic, competitive, or cooperative societies." "The social conception of success and the structural framework into which the individual success is fitted are more determinative than the state of technology or the plentifulness of food." "There is a correspondence between: a major emphasis upon competition, a social structure which depends upon the initiative of the individual, a valuation of property for individual ends, a single scale of success, and a strong development of the ego." "There is a correspondence between: a major emphasis upon cooperation, a social structure which does not depend upon individual initiative or the exercise of power over persons, a faith in an ordered universe, weak emphasis upon rising in status, and a high degree of security for the individual."

The introduction and concluding interpretative statement by Dr. Mead contain brilliant, conceptually fresh analysis. Here one sees the new social research grappling with its problems.

ROBERT S. LYND

Buck Mulligan's Memoirs

AS I WAS GOING DOWN SACKVILLE STREET. By Oliver St. John Gogarty. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.50.

FOR no clear reason Dr. Gogarty opens his memoirs with an account of an itinerant eccentric named Endymion, one of those "naturals" that abound in the streets of Dublin and are treated by the populace with mingled ridicule and affection. But it soon becomes apparent that this is by way of a preparation for the impression that the celebrated doctor is desirous of building up of himself—a "natural" well supplied with Latin quotations, Rolls Royces, castles in Connemara, and epigrams at the expense of his country. Dr. Gogarty is the professional man become professional "natural"; and so contented does he seem with the role that we cannot but take him at his word. When he protests that he is a figment in the mind of a city gone mad, we are able to make the necessary deductions. Undoubtedly, the city would put the matter in a different way.

In an equivocal preface Francis Hackett ascribes the equivocal character of his friend to the circumstances of his having been christened Oliver St. John. This is a penetrating observation that explains, if it does not quite condone, much in this book. It explains how the doctor had been able to give shelter to Michael Collins, veteran enemy of the British Empire, only a few months before he matched platitudes with the Duke of Connaught in a London drawing-room. It explains how he can contribute so richly to the playboy tradition in almost the same breath that he denounces his countrymen as a race of poltroons. And it explains also that peculiarly opaque and childlike humor which caused Joyce to represent him as the type of the unfeeling man. (While there is nothing here comparable to the remark that Buck Mulligan made to Stephen in the opening episode of "Ulysses," the reader is referred to the story of George Moore's eczema as an instance of the cruelty to which the doctor's fondness for practical jokes can lead him.) The dichotomy that Mr. Hackett finds symbolized in his name is never resolved; it is dissolved in a spattering humor that falls on friend and enemy alike. The Catholic Irishman looks at the Anglo-Irish gentleman with an inveterate distrust of his pretensions; and the alien looks down upon the native with a self-protective scorn. These are the psychological ingredients of a Swift, a Congreve, or a Shaw. But somehow the present brew does not quite attain to the strength of a Wilde.

The best portions of the book are those relating the conversation with Yeats, the meeting between Michael Collins and AE, and the death of Arthur Griffith. These give evidence of powers that have been sacrificed on the altar of professional wit. Dr. Gogarty's politics are those of the merchant and land-owning class, for whom De Valera has become an incarnation of the Inquisition. For this reason many of the passionately expressed opinions will have a tiresome remoteness for the American reader. They are more likely to appeal to the tory section of the English audience, who will also be gratified by what Dr. Gogarty has to say of Austen Chamberlain, Birkenhead, and other ornaments of the Empire. "What do you think of Buck Mulligan?" Mr. Joyce asked Frank Budgen, to whom he had shown one of the later episodes of his work. The latter replied that he was as witty and entertaining as ever. "He should begin to pall on the reader the day goes on," Mr. Joyce remarked; and it is hardly possible to improve on the description.

WILLIAM TROY

Funk & Wagnalls Company

PRESENTS FOR Spring

The School at the Crossroads

by THURRA GRAYMAR

Frank and fearless discussion of the vital question: Which road will the schools of the future follow, progressive or traditional? $2.00.

Crime, Crooks and Cops

by AUGUST VOLLMER and ALFRED E. PARKER

A real "insider" gives us the graphic details of many of the great criminal cases of our time! Thrills to satisfy even the most jaded detective story fan, by the former Chief of Police of Los Angeles. $2.00.

The Land That Time Forgot

by MICHAEL LEAHY and MAURICE CRAIN

Thrilling adventures and amazing discoveries in search of gold in New Guinea, where a quarter of a million stone-age savages make the forests "impenetrable." Illustrated. $3.00.

Nicholas II

PRISONER OF THE PURPLE

by MOHAMMED ESSAD-BEY

English version by PAUL MAERKER BRANDEN and ELSA BRANDEN

The biography of the most remarkable and least understood figure in modern history. "Vital, dramatic, tremendously interesting."—Virginia Kirkus. 371 pages, $3.00.

The Story of King Cotton

by HARRIS DICKSON

The saga of a new world civilization and the 14,000,000 Americans who derive their livelihood from cotton. To them it is not only an agricultural commodity but a vital force inextricably interwoven with their daily destinies. Illustrated. $2.50.

FUNK & WAGNALLS COMPANY
354-360 Fourth Avenue New York

What's happening to England?

Here's Hilaire Belloc's
answer!

THIS DYNAMIC book is a piercing analysis of the gradually changing pattern of British society and institutions today, by the noted author and parliamentarian who has seen many of his former prophecies come true with depressing accuracy. His concise study—and its startling conclusions—clearly reveals why English policy vacillates while the rest of the world takes sides in today's vital issues. 91 pages, $1.25.

AN ESSAY ON THE NATURE OF Contemporary England

At all bookstores, or from
SHEED & WARD, 63 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

GEORGE ALBEE

American Writers' Union, Local No. 1 has written a vital modern novel . . .

YOUNG ROBERT

THE NATION says it is "an admirable novel, lively, thoughtful, lavish with epithet and metaphor, rich with incident, and implicit with wisdom."

The gusty story of a wild, eccentric San Francisco family. "Better, perhaps, than Frank Norris, Albee has caught and understood the tremendous, undisciplined vitality which flows deep in the veins of San Francisco."—Archie Binns, N. Y. Herald Tribune.

"I was deeply touched by this sensitive volume, so simple and yet so complex . . . an elusive and delicate work of art,"—Charles Hanson Towne, N. Y. American

$2.50

REYNAL & HITCHCOCK

NEW YORK

John Donne and Others

JOHN DONNE AND THE NEW PHILOSOPHY. By Charles Monroe Coffin. Columbia University Press. $3.50.

THE METAPHYSICAL POETS. A STUDY IN RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. By Helen C. White. The Macmillan Company. $3.

THESE two volumes are ample evidence in support of Miss White's own statement that certain English poets of the seventeenth century have ceased to "enjoy the immunities of the remote and happily irrelevant." The nineteenth century rediscovered them and thought them quaint; or, if it thought them more than that, it did not suppose that their peculiar power could be explained. The twentieth century has been explaining them in a fairly systematic fashion; so that now two books can come out of American universities equipped with every known sort of apparatus tending to indicate that the mystery has been measured. For as time has gone on an affinity has been found between the "situations" of Donne, for instance, and any modern poet. In either situation there is the problem for the poet of reconciling the symbols he has inherited from the past with new symbols thrust upon him by the science of his time—the same science in both cases, as it happens, since Bacon and Copernicus and Newton are still in the ascendant despite occasional alarms (or hymns) to the contrary. It was not surprising in 1934 to discover that Basil Willey's excellent book, "The Seventeenth-Century Background," was written under the influence of I. A. Richards's "Science and Poetry." Nor is it surprising to discover that Mr. Coffin is interested in Joseph Wood Krutch's "The Modern Temper," the classic expression for our time of the terror which imagination can experience when the climate of knowledge changes.

How much Mr. Coffin and Miss White have explained, however, remains a question. They know the lives of their poets; they know the astronomy, the physics, the psychology, and the theology of the century; they have the advantage of building upon earlier researches in literary and philosophical history; and yet I cannot escape the impression that a certain step which Mr. Coffin at least would like to take has not been taken and cannot be taken. He proves beyond a doubt that Donne was in immediate contact with "the new philosophy," or as we should say with the new science. And he asserts what can be as little doubted, namely, that Donne was influenced by it. But exactly how is another matter. Miss White, who to be sure treats also of Herbert, Crashaw, Vaughan, and Traherne, and who is especially interested in mystical poetry, begins one of her paragraphs with this sentence: "The metaphysical poetry of Donne is, then, what might reasonably be expected at such a juncture from such a man." Reasonably? Yes, provided the juncture and the man are not variables, and provided we know at any time what to expect from poets. Given the juncture and the man, and assuming that Donne's poetry had never been published, could Miss White predict what it would be like? I doubt it; and so I doubt that either she or Mr. Coffin actually provides us with much in the way of explanation. Mr. Coffin seems always to be preparing to do so; the next chapter promises to clear up questions which the last one has merely raised. But when we get to it we are put off with metaphors. The new philosophy "sharpened the contours" of Donne's thought, or something like that. It has always been known that the sharpness was there. It still is not known, I think, what the whetstone was.

Not that our authors should be accused of pride. They advance no claims to omniscience, and both of them write with grace no less than with learning. It is simply that they have demonstrated—and for this we may be grateful—the limits of our knowledge.

MARK VAN DOREN

Marshal Ney in America?

MARSHAL NEY: A DUAL LIFE. By LeGette Blythe. Stackpole Sons. $3.50.

THE Ney legend in America is a tantalizing example of what James Joyce once called the leaning of sophists toward apocrypha. For a century the tradition has persisted that Peter Stuart Ney, whilom school teacher of the Carolinas who died in 1846, was in reality Michel Ney, bravest of Napoleon's marshals, supposedly executed after the return of the Bourbons in 1815. It is now over forty years since the Reverend James A. Weston defended this inviting thesis by sifting the gossip and collating the evidence in a conscientious study, "Historic Doubts as to the Execution of Marshal Ney." It is nearly ten years since Dr. J. E. Smoot added further embellishments to the story by publishing a disarming tribute to Southern hospitality and lost causes which he entitled "Marshal Ney Before and After His Execution." Now comes Mr. LeGette Blythe, literary critic on the Charlotte Observer, to refurbish the legend in an entertaining biography, "Marshal Ney: A Dual Life."

Satisfactory lives of Ney, the historic Ney, already exist in French and English. The main justification for Mr. Blythe's contribution depends, therefore, on the validity of its central thesis that Michel Ney and P. S. Ney were the same person. Yet Mr. Blythe offers little that is new and nothing that can be considered definitive to prove this thesis. He has drawn his arguments, with due acknowledgment, from the books of Smoot and Weston, and his outline of Ney's military career from A. H. Atteridge's "Marshal Ney, the Bravest of the Brave." His bibliography, which makes no claim to be exhaustive, is restricted almost exclusively to works available in English.

This latter limitation is the more to be regretted because it has led Mr. Blythe to overlook the criticism leveled at the legend by M. René Arnaud in Les annales politiques et littéraires for 1935 and 1936. With Gallic tact and Gallic logic M. Arnaud has pointed out that Marshal Ney's death is amply attested by the archival records in Paris; that a hardy soldier who knew no English at forty-seven could not plausibly have written fluent Byronic verses in that language a few years later; and that P. S. Ney's information regarding Napoleon's campaigns, which so astonished his Carolina neighbors, might easily have been derived from books already in print. The corrections which the erudite school teacher scribbled in the margins of several such books, books which are now offered as proof that he was indeed the Duke of Elchingen, convict him of a dozen errors of fact which the Marshal could not reasonably have committed, and his recorded comments on the Spanish and Waterloo campaigns suggest that if he really viewed the fighting it was from the English lines. It is not easy to believe that a Frenchman, and a Prince of the Moskowa, would refer to the battle in which he won his title as Borodino, or that he would write cinque for cinq and Louis for Louis. Furthermore, M. Arnaud calls attention to the fact that Michel Ney was born at Sarre Louis in 1769, whereas Peter Stuart Ney, when receiving American citizenship in 1820, affirmed that he was born in Stirlingshire in 1787. It would not be easy for a Frenchmen of fifty-two

A Manual for Students and for the General Reader
HIS LATEST BOOK ON THE SEXUAL LIFE
 Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime
COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse; Physical Factors; Mental Factors	Divorce Monogamy; Polygamy The Nature of Birth Control The Question of Abortion Frequency of Coitus	Ethetics ■ Coitus Expression and Repression Substitutes for ■■ Treatment of Sexual Complaints
The Sexual Zones The Sexual Impulse in Youth Masturbation Frigidity; Frequency of; Nature of; Factors in; Treatment of Impotence; Frequency of; Nature of; Temporary; Psycho; Neurasthenic; Treatment of First Intercourse Secondary Sexual Characters	The Nation says: "There is probably no better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."	Medical and Legal Treatment of Abnormal Gratification Nature and Habits ■ the Invert; Medical and Legal Treatment of Bisexual Attraction: Intersexuality Eonism (Identification with opposite sex) The Marriage Relationship The Power of the Sexual Urge Sexual Maladjustments in Marriage Wide Range ■ the Sexual Impulse Relationship of Sex to Happiness in Marriage Chastity: the Primitive Attitude; the Attitude Today The Treatment of Sexual Anesthesia in Women
The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed" Sexual Abnormalities Sexual Irregularities Exhibitionism The Sexual Criminal Analysis of Courtship Woman's Change of Life: Adjustments; Advantages; Effect on Sexual Desire The Dangerous Age in Men: Symptoms; Physical and Psychic Aspects	The Sexual Athlete: Satyriasis; Nymphomania Jealousy Married Love Psychoanalytic Concepts of Sex Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience Modesty; Nudism Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after Sexual Feeling in Women Sex Practice in Marriage Methods and Technique of Coitus Sexual Pleasure and Conception Positions in Coitus Sex Life and Nervous Disorders Sexual Difficulties Freud's "Unconscious"; "Libido" Dreams; Their Significance Sex Life of Unmarried Adults Sexual Follies and Symbols The Art of Love Sexual Adjustments Sex Happiness Age and the Sexual Impulse The Sexual Impulse and Love Love Rights of Women; of Men The Choice of a ■■	Bertrand Russell says: "Few books on sex ■ be so confidently recommended ■ this truly admirable volume."
Carl Van Doren says: "The best one-volume treatment of ■ in the English language."	Sadism and Masochism Cruelty and Pain in Relation to Sex Homosexuality: Background and Prevalence; Types and States Homosexuality: Temporary; Pseudo; in Youth; in Later Life; in Normal Persons Hermaphroditism Sexual Abstinence ■■ Intercourse and Health	Restriction of Sex Activity How the Physician May Help Main Channels of ■■ Procedure Factors in Erotic Personality Sex as an Instinct versus Sex ■■ Appetite Preparation for Marriage Fertility and Sterility Glossary of Sexual Terms Index

Science News Letter

■■: "Not alone the psychological, but also the biological and medical aspects of marriage, love, and the sexual impulse ■ discussed, and ■ light ■ given on more or less universal problems."

Journal of Nervous and Mental Diseases says: "Some of the finest and, in many respects, ■ most advanced findings in this field."

Birth Control Review

says: "Sums up the phenomena of sex psychology in their normal relation to life, so that the average person may get sufficient information ■ serve both in life ■ in conversation."

AUTHORIZED

$3.00

POSTPAID

6TH PRINTING

389 PAGES

SEND NO MONEY

MAIL THIS COUPON

Mail this coupon ■ your bookseller or to Emerson Books, Inc., Dept. 941-N 251 West 19th St., New York City
 Send ■ a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. ■ will deposit $3.00 and a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded, if returned within ■ days.
 Name.....
 Address.....
☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only ■ thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

RUSSIAN TOURS

EDUTRAVEL, Inc.

An Institute for Educational Travel
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.
Telephones: GRamercy 7-3284-3285

PLANNED TO YOUR ORDER

TELL US how long you ■■■ be away, what phase of Soviet Russian life you ■■■ especially interested in, and ■■■ will plan a fascinating itinerary for you. All transportation details will be prearranged by us, insuring complete comfort ■■■ enjoyment at a minimum all-inclusive price.

31 DAYS
$259

Write, call or phone
—and mention THE NATION.

SPECIAL EDITION

Autographed

dedicated to the loyal friends who gave so much of their time and resources to the fight in behalf of Angelo Herndon.

ANGELO HERNDON'S Gripping AUTOBIOGRAPHY

"LET ME LIVE"

409 pages, including 74 pages of documents
Published by Random House

$2.19

at the WORKERS BOOKSHOPS
50 East 13th Street, New York City

Mail Orders:

WORKERS LIBRARY PUBLISHERS
P. O. Box 148, Station D New York City

HEAR THOMAS MANN

Germany's Foremost Writer
Winner of the Nobel Prize in Literature

at

MEMORIAL MEETING

For the 13,000 German People Murdered by Hitler's Rule

WEDNESDAY — APRIL 21ST — 8 P. M.

MECCA TEMPLE, 133 WEST 55TH STREET
New York City

Among Other Speakers—

Archibald MacLeish Cornelia Bryce Pinchot John J. Lewis

Auspices: League of American Writers

Joint Committee of German-American Organizations of Greater New York

20 Vesey Street, Room 301, N. Y. C.

ADMISSION: 25c, 49c, and $1.00 to pass himself off as an Englishman of thirty-three. Even the coincidence of the unusual name becomes less impressive when it is realized that there were Neys in Great Britain, and for that matter in North Carolina, before the enigmatic Peter Stuart appeared.

There remains, to offset these negative arguments, the troublesome testimony of two handwriting experts, cited by Mr. Blythe, that alleged holographs of Marshal Ney and P. S. Ney were almost certainly written by the same hand. There remains, too, a gravestone in Rowan County, North Carolina, erected to Peter Stuart Ney, a soldier of France who served under Napoleon and died in 1846 at the age of seventy-seven. All evidence considered, there would seem to be little doubt that P. S. Ney allowed his American neighbors to believe, and perhaps came to believe himself, that he was the Marshal. But there would seem to be far less doubt that Michel Ney, Duke of Elchingen and Prince of the Moskowa, died in the Luxembourg Gardens on December 7, 1815, with eleven bullets through his body, while his wife pleaded in vain for an audience with Louis XVIII.

GEOFFREY BRUN

Shorter Notices

MIDNIGHT ON THE DESERT. By J. B. Priestley. Harper and Brothers. $3.

Men are judged by their success, according to the maxim, but must they also be condemned? Although Mr. Priestley is the author of a jolly and popular novel, he has written more important books before and after "The Good Companions," and he is not only good, he is growing. "The English Comic Characters," for example, though an engaging literary study, suffered from a certain mellifluousness of tone. In his "English Journey" Mr. Priestley advanced from smaller human problems to larger ones, but in gathering an astounding quantity of rather melancholy material the author was somewhat overpowered by his own efforts: the volume, though rich and solid, is amorphous. In his latest work, however, Mr. Priestley has succeeded in uniting the more attractive qualities of these earlier studies. Meditating at midnight in the Arizona desert on the fantastic and fecund American scene, on prize fights and politics and the desolation of our hinterland, on cowboys, Harpo Marx, and the strain of being an American woman, on Boulder Dam and our anonymous artists in steel and concrete, he has produced, in the form of a witty, vivid, and highly personalized reverie, a most discerning study of our American culture—it is almost as if, as it were, Virginia Woolf had written a chapter of "Middle-town."

MAXWELL GEISMAR

MAJOR NOAH: AMERICAN-JEWISH PIONEER. By Isaac Goldberg. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

Mordecai Manuel Noah was the most energetic and versatile American Jew of the post-revolutionary epoch. Though he achieved nothing of really first-rate importance, his life (1785-1851) was fastened to the life of his time at so many significant points that his name has provided an indispensable footnote to the historians of our early drama, journalism, and politics. The dual motif of Noah's career, as his biographer demonstrates, was patriotism for Israel and for America. In politics he was a Jeffersonian. Grand Sachem of Tammany Hall at a time when this was a libertarian organization, he held political posts ranging from that of consul at Tunis to sheriff of New York. Dr. Goldberg aptly comments that Noah was theatrical in his politics and political in his theatricals; his flag-waving melodramas were extremely popular on the New York and Philadelphia stage, and one of them in particular, "She Would Be a Soldier," survives as a model of our early patriotic drama. As the most influential newspaper editor in New York for a time, he engaged in feuds with two young upstarts, James Gordon Bennett and Horace Greeley. Shrewd, opportunistic, ambitious, he nevertheless had a streak of the visionary in him which is especially reflected in his pioneer attempt to form an American Zion. Dr. Goldberg's biography is compact, firmly documented, and written with his usual freshness of style. He has rescued Noah's interesting personality from the distorted perspective of footnotes. SAMUEL SILLEN

YOU MUST BREAK OUT—SOMETIMES. By T. O. Beachcroft. Harper and Brothers. $2.

England's recent discovery of the proletariat as material for fiction has so far produced only competent writing, an objective but limited approach to characters and situations, and a style refreshingly free of the flourishes and diffidences of the Bloomsbury school. Mr. Beachcroft's volume of short stories dealing with lower-class life is no exception to the rule. He writes a clean, candid prose; he can deal sympathetically with certain emotional states on the part of his characters; he has his facts well in hand, and he presents them intelligently. But the tragedy implicit in these facts, the dilemma of his people and its inevitable relation to a social system at large, never get to the reader's consciousness. In addition, the ideas behind a great many of these stories are distressingly trivial. A young lorry-driver, forced by meager pay to do a bit of poaching on the side, successfully outwits the police. A furniture-maker loses his job and after a dreary period of unemployment lands another in a munitions factory: this situation (the business of the factory is never disclosed until the last sentence) obviously exists for the sole purpose of creating suspense and a surprise ending. The quotation from "The Waste Land" at the beginning of the book—"My people humble people who expect Nothing"—is unfortunate, for it merely serves to remind us how Eliot the royalist, in a few sentences in a highly imaginative work, was able to portray the horror and hopelessness of lower-class English life far better than Mr. Beachcroft has been able to do in a whole volume of short stories which are frankly aimed at such a portrayal. HELEN NEVILLE

THE PERSIAN JOURNEY OF THE REVEREND ASHLEY WISHARD AND HIS SERVANT FATHI. By Elgin Groseclose. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $2.50.

Mr. Groseclose's novel has something to say, and says it on every page. We have here a machine which turns out two hundred forms of the proposition that the West doesn't know much about the East as it thinks it does. Mr. Groseclose has invented an American missionary and set him down in Persia with designs against the religion of Islam, which it seems is different from the religion of the New World in that it is less dynamic (this word drops out of a special chute perhaps eighty-seven times); but Ashley Wishard discovers that the daily ways of the Orient are at the worst no ungodlier than ours, and he even advances to the point of suspecting that the essential truth of Christianity is more at home there than here. The reader should make no mistake, however. It is Mr. Groseclose who is speaking rather than Mr. Wishard, and it is his machine out of which the sentiments hop so uniformly

Seeing SOVIET RUSSIA

with

ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Author of "I Change Worlds," "This Soviet World," "The New Soviet Constitution," etc. Just back from fifteen years in Russia.

A comprehensive survey of activities in city and country, illuminated by informal meetings with leaders and workers. Special program. High standards of comfort. Sailing July 4. Membership limited. $895
Roundtrip with Tourist passage

Other group tours from $394

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

INTRODUCTORY OFFER — 13 issues of the Manchester Guardian Weekly for $1

To form sound judgments on the crucial events in Europe, you require complete unbiased news from abroad and candid interpretation prepared by the best minds in England.

For more than a century, The Manchester Guardian has been recognized as Europe's leading liberal paper. It presents to well-informed English speaking people who live outside of England the complete news of public affairs plus interpretation from the critical, liberal point of view. As the weekly edition of the Manchester Guardian Daily, it offers, too, the most interesting of the special articles which have appeared in the Daily on a great variety of events—political, historical, economic, religious, literary, dramatic and scientific.

In actual square inches devoted to editorial matter, each issue measures the equivalent of 66 pages of the ordinary American news weekly.

Hundreds of Nation readers find The Manchester Guardian Weekly indispensable. We think that you will, too, if you take advantage of our offer of thirteen weeks for one dollar—less than 8c a copy including postage from Manchester, England, to your home.

Mail the order form at once!

THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY,
224 West 42nd Street,
New York City.

I enclose a dollar for your 13 weeks' trial offer
of THE MANCHESTER
GUARDIAN WEEKLY.

4-17-37

sized and so squarely packaged. Bearing so obvious a message, and bearing it so many times, the book will either get nowhere or go very, very far. There is never any telling in such cases.

M. V. D.

RECORDS

WE ARE told that what has bored us until now has been not Bruckner but his editors. The editors' alterations have been removed; and I am now bored by Bruckner as he is presented in a performance of the Fourth Symphony by the Saxon State Orchestra under Karl Böhm which is said to follow the original manuscript (eight records, $16). For one thing the man lacks the constructive power and the capacity for sustained thinking that are necessary to produce integrated large-scale form. Though a movement of a Haydn or a Mozart symphony is sectional, I feel in it an impulse that gives a single unswerving direction to the succession of details, that makes one follow logically after the other, and that gives them coherence despite their diversity. But with Bruckner there is no connection between details and sections other than the one he imposes arbitrarily of succession in time. The defect appears even in the construction of the single phrase: rarely can he get to the end of it without an awkward modulation. After that a few bald sequences with further awkward modulations, and he has gone as far with this line of thought as he can go; and he drops it and begins another. In the end the movement, as a piece of large-scale construction, is a series of bits of things held together by safety-pins. A movement could be that, and yet be interesting because of its individual ideas; what makes Bruckner impossible for me is the banality of his thinking.

The Adolf Busch Chamber Players' performances of Bach's Brandenburg Concertos on Columbia records were something of a sensation last year; and Victor now offers their performances of Bach's Suite No. 1 in C major and Suite No. 2 in B minor (six records, $9). The playing is again breath-taking, the recording excellent. As for the music, perhaps you have wondered why it was always the Suite No. 2 that was played, and not the others. When you hear these records you will know why. The Suite No. 2 is delightful; the Suite No. 1 is one of the worst examples of the aridity that resulted when Bach's craftsmanship ground out music without the prompting or participation of feeling.

I prefer Stokowski's early set of Franck's Symphony to the one that Victor has just issued (six records, $12). The new one staggers you with its sheer magnificence of sound; but I have mentioned before the amazing excellence of Stokowski's early recordings—the volume, the fidelity of timbre, the unfailing distinctness even where there is poor balance. And the early set of the Franck gives Stokowski's performance before it became afflicted with elephantiasis. For this reason I hope that Victor will continue to list it.

The business of subscription recording has been questionable and confused from the start, and remains so today. Thus, Victor has only now given the first Sibelius Society album a listing in its catalogue, which will make some people aware for the first time that they can have something which has been available for four years. It contains the Fifth Symphony, which I consider one of Sibelius's best and most characteristic works in ideas and construction, the tone-poem "Tapiola," which I consider one of the worst, and the tone-poem "Pohjola's Daughter," which I find enjoyable. The performances by the London Symphony under Kajanus are, I realize now, excellent; it is the recording that lacks clarity and balance occasionally, but not enough to make the set less than good (seven records, $10.50). The accompanying booklet by Ernest Newman offers valuable analyses of the works, and a foreword which deals penetratingly with the Sibelius who is, and fantastically with the Sibelius who is not.

Musicraft has issued two works, each on a single record ($1.50), which I find only mildly charming: Buxtehude's Easter Cantata "O fröhliche Stunden," performed by Ethel Luening, soprano, Joseph Reilich and Ralph Hersh, violins, Sterling Hunkins, 'cello, and Ernst Victor Wolff, harpsichord; and Händel's secular cantata "Nell dolce dell' oblio," performed by Miss Luening, Otto Luening, flute, and Mr. Wolff. Performances and recording are excellent, and surfaces are extraordinarily quiet. On other single records are two works which merely satisfy an interest: a sonata by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, and another sonata by Wilhelm Friedemann Bach which I find the most interesting of all these works. They are well played on the piano by Mr. Wolff, and well recorded. Less good in all respects is the record of a string quartet by Johann Christoph Friedrich Bach, played by the Perole Quartet.

B. H. HAGGIN

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with HENRY HULL DUDLEY DIGGES

PAULINE FREDERICK

MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Mats.
Thurs. ■ Sat., 2:40 Evgs. 8:40, 300 seats $1.10

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

STORM over PATSY

by Bruno Frank, adapted by James Bridle

SARA ALLGOOD

ROGER LIVESEY

CLAUDIA MORGAN

IAN McLEAN

LEO G. CARROLL

GUILD THEATRE, 52nd Street, West of Broadway.
Mats. Thursday and Saturday, 2:40. Eve., 8:40.

MASS MEETING APRIL 18TH 2:30 P.M. HIPPODROME

43rd and 6th Avenue

PROTEST FASCIST INVASION OF DEMOCRATIC SPAIN!
CELEBRATE RECENT LOYALIST VICTORIES!

SPONSORS: North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy
For information call The Italian Anti-Fascist Committee
Murray Hill The Spanish Anti-Fascist Committee
4-5301 Irish-American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy
The Artist's Union

SPEAKERS:

Chairman, Bishop Francis J. McConnell
Fernando De Los Rios Pietro Allegra
Spain's Ambassador to America Italian Anti-Fascist Committee
Dr. Walter B. Cannon Chet La More
Professor at Harvard University Well-known Baltimore artist Presentation of the Artist's Union ambulance by Phil Bard to the Medical Committee

SPANISH DEMOCRACY MUST LIVE!

Letters to the Editors

Hugh Johnson vs. Paul Ward

Dear Sirs: Your letter inclosing advanced proof of Paul Ward's article on me was received a week late. In the meantime, I saw its publication and also another by Mr. Ward in the Baltimore Sun.

I don't know why I should make any statement about the almost completely false reporting, by a personal enemy, whom you have permitted to use your columns in attempted character assassination by a bunch of assertions of which almost the only completely true one is that I was employed by R. C. A.—which everybody knew at the time—and that I received $40,000 fee.

Such statements as that I assumed the role of amicus curiae until Chairman Madden put a blunt question is completely refuted by the fact that my name was signed as counsel to all important documents in the case.

This is merely one example of repeated false reporting throughout the document.

If anybody on the side of labor has occasion to be dissatisfied about my conduct of the case, it should be Mr. John L. Lewis. He has expressed himself to the contrary and when he heard of this attack voluntarily offered to go before the La Follette committee and straighten the record. I begged him not to do so because there is nothing there that needs straightening so far as I am concerned—except in Mr. Ward's scurrilous perversion of the record—and that is too insignificant and obscure to merit any attention from either Mr. Lewis or myself.

HUGH S. JOHNSON

Washington, March 25

Dear Sirs: The General completely evades the issue. Does he deny that while he served as labor counsel to R. C. A., the company employed virtually every known form of union-busting and strike-breaking? Does he deny that it employed as guards approximately 300 thugs supplied by a notorious strike-breaking agency whose head still is dodging the La Follette committee's subpoenas? Does he deny that it took on as permanent additions to its labor-relations department while he still was labor counsel one Manning "noble" and five or six Manning "finks"? Does he deny that in argument before the NLRB he took cognizance of the terroristic campaign of the company's union to force a boycott of the collective-bargaining election which was part of the peace pact he had engineered and that he defended that campaign at least to the point of arguing that it had no bearing upon how the board should rule? Does he deny that he pestered an individual board member, John M. Carmody, at his home and at his office, trying to induce him to give the R. C. A. a "break" such had been denied other companies? And does he deny that he publicly advised R. C. A. to defy the NLRB when the "break" he sought was not forthcoming and that the company followed and still follows his advice?

Of course he doesn't deny these things for they are all matters of public record. The General says I distort that record, but he takes great care not to present a bill of particulars. I challenge him to do so, knowing full well that he cannot, for the record is clear beyond possibility of distortion.

What the General does, instead, is to present a sort of character testimony in his defense. First, he calls me "a personal enemy." I don't mind being so regarded by the General, but for the record I should like to say that I have always been fond of the General as a person—his is a magnetic and likable old carcass—but I have never been able to respect his intellect. He is the most unstable and undependable figure to occupy an important role in American public life in recent years.

Secondly, the General calls upon John L. Lewis to testify in his behalf. Frankly, I do not believe what he says of Lewis's willingness to defend him before the La Follette committee and will not believe it until I hear it from Lewis himself. As Lewis is far from Washington at the moment and engaged in much more important affairs than this matter, I cannot satisfy myself on this point at present.

There is only one other point in the General's letter that deserves notice. He denies—by indirection—that he bespoke for himself the role of amicus curiae when he stepped up to argue before the NLRB. As my piece noted, the fact is not recorded in the record but members of the board recall the episode clearly.

It is Johnson's word against theirs, and I'll take theirs, especially since the transcript does record his arguing that he was called into the case by "both sides" and as an "impartial arbiter." It is perhaps needless to add that impartial arbiters draw their pay, if any at all, from both sides.

PAUL W. WARD

Washington, March 31

Puerto Rico Harvest

Dear Sirs: I was amazed to read in The Nation the following declaration: "It is significant that the strength of popular feeling against the United States should have increased rather than diminished under the supposed beneficence of New Deal administration." This statement was made in connection with the deplorable slaughter in Ponce, Puerto Rico, when eighteen persons were wounded, ten of them fatally.

One would infer from such a statement that the people of Puerto Rico are ungrateful to the United States government for the benefits received under the New Deal; in reality, nothing could be farther from the truth. The great majority of the people of Puerto Rico have been extremely grateful and loyal to the New Deal. Occurrences like the Ponce incident happened in the years before the New Deal, the difference being that the police used to be blissfully blind and deaf to the Nationalists' threats against others.

The people of Puerto Rico are now harvesting a crop from seeds of violent propaganda which have been permitted to germinate and spread over a period of at least ten years.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS

Washington, March 29

Malraux Was Worth It

Dear Sirs: I have just renewed my subscription to The Nation for one year. Now, five dollars means much to a teacher—even to a teacher in the sit-down region of Michigan. I have also just finished reading Forging Man's Fate in Spain, by André Malraux, in your issue of March 20. I consider that I have already had my money's worth. The story was splendid.

HENRY F. BETZING

Dearborn, Mich., April 2

The Jefferson Memorial

Dear Sirs: I want to register an emphatic protest against the construction of the proposed Jefferson Memorial in Potomac Park, Washington, D. C., for the following reasons:

1. The building is completely inappropriate in that (a) it is an "adaptation" of a second-rate imperial Roman building—the so-called Pantheon; (b) it in no way reflects the character, life, or accomplishment of Jefferson, who abhorred everything imperial and whose University of Virginia is one of the most beautiful and deeply felt creations in the country; (c) it will make America ridiculous in the eyes of other nations, where architecture is a serious contemporary art, not an exercise in archaeology; (d) it will mar the beauty of the Tidal Basin and its cherry trees.

2. The basis for the selection of the architect is unknown. The building was awarded without competition, an incredible and high-handed procedure for a public monument of such importance.

3. The building will be a useless structure and, if published reports of foundation conditions are true, will cost for foundations alone almost as much as the present appropriation of $3,000,000. A memorial to Jefferson should be something for use and enjoyment by the people; it should be democratic architecture of today, not imperial pomp.

Why not substitute a planetarium?

JOSIAH P. MARVEL

HENRY S. CHURCHILL

New York, April 3

[Similar protests against the Jefferson Memorial have been made by the Designers of Shelter in America, the American Sculptors' Society, and the staff of the School of Architecture of Columbia University.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Tune in on Madrid

Dear Sirs: The following data on a series of broadcasts in English from the new Madrid station (EAQ No. 2—31.65 meters) were obtained from announcements made during their transmission this evening. As the station can be heard with exceptional clarity you may wish to pass this information along to your readers.

A group of English-speaking correspondents now in Madrid will be heard Tuesdays and Fridays at 9 p. m., eastern standard time, and Mondays at 8 p. m., reporting their experiences and events of interest in the Spanish War.

New York, March 29 J. MAGUIRE

Help Southern Labor!

Dear Sirs: American liberals may well be proud of their aid to the cause of the people of Spain, which is of course the cause of anti-fascists everywhere. However, fascist tendencies in our own South remain undefeated, and we must carry on the fight for democracy there.

Recent news from Washington indicates that party politics will prevent any attempt by Congress at solving the problems of the South. Even the woefully inadequate Tenant Farmer and Share-Cropper bill was thrown out of committee as "socialistic."

The only hope for an improvement of conditions which Secretary Wallace describes as worse than those which exist "among any peasantry of Europe" is in Southern labor and liberal forces. Two schools, Highlander Folk School at Monteagle, Tennessee, and Commonwealth College at Mena, Arkansas, have been fighting heroically against the intolerable Southern conditions. Faculties of both schools work without compensation. In addition to their resident work at the colleges, the faculties also conduct extension work in labor centers of the South. Both teachers and students help organize strikes when needed and serve on the picket lines, thus combining front-line experience with study.

These two schools form centers of liberalizing thought in this most difficult section of our country. We believe readers of The Nation will realize this and will help to make it possible for them to carry on. The address of the Committee for Southern Resident Labor Colleges is 18 East Forty-eighth Street, New York.

IRENE THOMAS

New York, April 5 Executive Secretary

CONTRIBUTORS

THOMAS MANN is now in New York and will deliver a series of lectures at the New School. A letter clarifying his attitude toward the Hitler regime appeared in The Nation for March 6.

RUTH BRINDZE has just published a new book, "Not to Be Broadcast. The Truth About the Radio."

MILTON S. MAYER is a free-lance journalist. Another of his articles, Chicago Goes Broke, appeared in our issue of February 13.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "There Ought to Be a Law" and is at present working on a new book tracing the history of the law for the layman.

STEPHEN RAUSHENBUSH was in charge of preparing the material for the Senate Munitions Investigating Committee and acted as counsel for the committee during the hearings.

ROBERT S. LYND is coauthor with Helen Merrell Lynd of "Middletown in Transition."

WILLIAM TROY, formerly film critic for The Nation, is now a member of the English Department of Bennington College.

GEOFFREY BRUUN is on the faculty of New York University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

TRAVEL

TOURS CONDUCTED OR INDEPENDENT
TO SOVIET RUSSIA, PALESTINE AND WESTERN EUROPE
Ask for free literature
AMALGAMATED BANK
11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

VISIT

Soviet Union, Roumania, Hungary, Austria, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Finland, France
SOCIAL ECONOMIC SURVEY GROUP
M. B. Sherman, Leader
July 10-Sept. 4—$587—Complete
Lectures, Discussions, Interviews
DRAMA LEAGUE TRAVEL BUREAU
127 West 43rd Street, N. Y.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES
62 cents a line
Minimum three lines

POSITIONS WANTED

Well-known editor seeks position for admirable secretary-stenographer capable of writing English, Dutch and German letters. Some French and Italian. Broadest experience in Paris, Berlin, Washington and New York. Admirable assistant to a journalist or literary man. Unqualified recommendations. Box No. 884, c/o The Nation.

Young lady, 22, college graduate with Teacher's certificate, as traveling companion or tutor. Specialized training in French, Spanish, English. Attractive, cooperative. References exchanged. Write Box No. 890, c/o The Nation.

Young woman, Bryn Mawr student, seeks tutoring job for summer: piano, swimming, as well as French and various other scholastic subjects. Box No. 891, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Couple or small family to share large bungalow on Koven Estate in the Watchung Mountains. Ideal vacation spot, easy commutation New York. Write F. C. Haart, P. O. Box 155, Plainfield, N. J.

Summer Cottage, 4-5 rooms. 1½ hrs. from Manhattan. Conveniences, bathing, transportation from station. Write full information. Box 892, c/o The Nation.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

GASOLINE SAVING DEVICES

Ford V-8's, 1935-36-37; 2 to 4 more miles per gallon—$1.00. Walert Co., 3429 N. 10th St., Milwaukee, Wisconsin.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • APRIL 24, 1937

NUMBER 17

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

JUDGES ARE HUMAN	449
THE BUDGET DEFICIT	451
WORLD VIEW OF TEXTILES	452
AL SMITH, RED-BAITER	453
SCANDAL IN THE AIR by Paul W. Ward	454
THE WAR FOR RAW MATERIALS IN SPAIN	455
by Frank C. Hanighen	456
RHETORIC—OR LIFE by Ignazio Silone	459
SAVE THE FOOD AND DRUG BILL!	461
by Henry Lewis	463
WHO OWNS THE PHILIPPINES?	466
by James S. Allen	467
ALIQUIPPA CELEBRATES by Rose M. Stein	468
ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard	469
A MORRIS DANCE by Heywood Broun	471
BOOKS AND THE ARTS:
"COMMUNION WITH HER VISIBLE FORMS"
by Joseph Wood Krutch	472
HAPPENINGS AFTER DEATH by Ross Pierce	473
THE LOWER DEPTHS by Dorothy Brewster	474
VARIATIONS ON A THEME by William Troy	476
AMERICAN MICROCOSM by Melville J. Herskovits	477
"A LONG AND FOOLISH LIFE"
by Oswald Garrison Villard	478
SWEAT SHOPS AND CHERRY BLOSSOMS
by Barbara Wertheim	479
BACK ALLEYS OF LANGUAGE by George Genzmer	480
OUR NATIONAL DEFENSE POLICY
by Gerald P. Nye	481
PORTRAIT OF LENIN by Ludwig Lore	482
SUNSET AT GRASMERE by Mark Van Doren	483
INTRODUCTION TO MUSIC by Jacques Barzun	484
HISTORY BY A LOVER
by Clara Gruening Stillman	485
BREAD AND THE ARTIST by Dorothy Van Doren	486
IN TIMES OF REALISM by Harry Levin	487
REVOLUTION'S "TIME PAST" by Philip Rahv	488
FOUR WINDS by Christopher Lazare	489
"HENCEFORTH FROM THE MIND"
by Eda Lou Walton
FILMS: BOY OF INDIA by Mark Van Doren

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

PREMIER HEPBURN OF ONTARIO HAS TANGLED with a whole series of windmills since we last went to press. He fired two of his Cabinet ministers when they refused to stand firm in defense of General Motors of Canada; he quarreled with the Ottawa government when the Minister of Justice refused to send additional troops to Oshawa; and he rebuked Ian Mackenzie, Dominion Minister of National Defense, when that official denied that he had promised Mr. Hepburn the full support of the federal government in the strike situation. He prepared to fight another windmill when he swore in 200 special police in the name of a Communist "menace." His refusal to deal with a "foreign" representative of the U. A. W. reached a ridiculous climax when he broke up a conference with local union representatives because they conferred by telephone with Homer Martin. At the moment the Premier, with the eager support of Canadian employers (including J. S. Bache of New York!), is crusading for laws to license international unions and keep out the C. I. O. The Oshawa strikers, however, are standing firm for recognition of the U. A. W.

★

MEANWHILE THE TALK OF A SYMPATHETIC strike in the United States has wisely been scotched by Homer Martin, though the U. A. W. has assured the Oshawa strikers of financial support. The sources of this talk and the persistence with which it was being promoted aroused suspicion that it was not entirely union made. The Federated Press pointed out, for instance, that Mayor Hall of Oshawa is not the friend of labor he pretends to be—he is a member of the Conservative Party and maneuvering for political position. His "ultimatum" of April 14, in which he said that unless Homer Martin called the strike in all General Motors plants in the United States by the following Monday he, the Mayor, would call a mass-meeting of strikers and advise them to drop their demand for recognition, looked like a strike-breaking move, and his hysterical and unsuccessful attempt to sell a settlement to the strikers that did not include union recognition confirmed the suspicion. Certainly a strike in the United States at this juncture would do the union more harm both here and in Canada than Mr. Hepburn's blustering. It is a tribute to the responsibility of the C. I. O. and the U. A. W. that the leaders of both have kept their heads in the face of intense provocation.

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Burlingame, Cal.

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES HAS PASSED, in 1937, a law to end the lynching of Negroes by making peace officers responsible for the safe conduct of their prisoners into a duly constituted court of justice. The law also permits an injured person to institute suit against the guilty peace officer for personal damages. The safeguards provided are of the most elementary sort; yet the storm of sectional debate that preceded its passage was a civil war in miniature. The solid South, with the honorable exception of Maury Maverick, fought as one man against the invasion of the "states' rights" to "take care" of their colored citizens in their own way. "The color line in the South is a permanent institution," said Cox of Georgia, who charged that the measure would "mongrelize the white race." "When you talk about equality for niggers in theaters and restaurants," shouted Ford of Mississippi, "every man with a wife and daughter will arm himself to the teeth . . ." More enlightened members insisted that the South was working out its problem and pointed to the decrease in murder by mobs. The bill was passed on April 15 by a vote of 277 to 119—and the final argument was a particularly brutal lynching of two Negroes at Duck Hill, Mississippi, two days before. It now goes to the Senate. The passage of the Gavagan bill is a hopeful event. But the very simplicity of its provisions and the passions it roused throw a lurid light on the long road the Negro must yet travel before he reaches genuine social and economic emancipation in the republic that set him "free" three-quarters of a century ago.

★

OPPOSITION TO BLUM'S NON-INTERVENTION policies flared up at the meeting of the National Council of the Socialist Party of France last week-end and threatened to disrupt the party. It has been evident for many months that Blum's policy toward Spain is highly unpopular with the rank and file of the party membership, particularly in working-class districts. The same groups have shown increasing impatience with the government's slow progress in carrying out its social program. The issues at stake are those which are bound to arise in any effort at collaboration between revolutionary and reformist parties. Although Blum has shown great skill in handling domestic policies, the average worker finds himself little better off than a year ago. The gains won by the sitdown strikes of last June have largely been offset by the increased cost of living resulting from the devaluation of the franc. Yet the Radical Socialists have made it clear that they will not support any further concessions to labor at this time. Only in his suppression of the armed fascist bands has Blum received full support from the Popular Front parties. Since he is unable to offer tangible concessions in domestic policy, Blum's best chance of saving his government and the unity of his party would seem to be action in the international field. A vigilant policy to compel the fascist powers to conform to the non-intervention pact would go far toward restoring France's prestige and at the same time save the French democracy from internal corrosion.

THE CHECKING OF THE REBEL DRIVE ON Bilbao and Italy's sudden capitulation on the non-intervention agreement have aroused hope that the end of the Spanish conflict is not so far off as appeared a few months ago. For the first time since the outbreak of the war the government is carrying out a series of offensives on widely scattered fronts. At Madrid a large rebel detachment has been isolated in the University City sector; the offensive which was launched late last week against the rebel salient at Teruel appears to be completely successful; and further progress has been made in the vicinity of Cordoba. Perhaps the most hopeful sign that all is not going well with the rebel cause has been the appearance of seemingly inspired reports of a possible armistice. It is significant that no such rumors arose as long as the rebels seemed to have a chance of winning. The duration of the conflict would now seem to depend on the faithfulness with which the non-intervention pact is carried through. Unfortunately, great loopholes exist in the arrangements for enforcement. No measures have been taken to prevent direct transportation into Spain by air; many of the British observers on the Portuguese border are men whose sympathies are, to say the least, dubious; and the Valencia government is justifiably skeptical of the part German and Italian warships will play. A few more victories for the Loyalists, however, should discourage still further any ambitions Mussolini may have in the Iberian Peninsula.

★

GÖTTINGEN UNIVERSITY WILL BE THE SCENE this summer, as Heidelberg was last year, of a grotesque spectacle in which the misshapen Kultur of the Third Reich will appear disguised in the flowing gown of the higher learning in honor of the university's two-hundredth anniversary. Seven American universities have already consented to be accessories to this fraud; eleven others will send representatives if possible. Harvard, Yale, and Princeton are still considering invitations. Meanwhile official apologists are doing their best to make it easier for the world's universities to condone the intellectual pogrom that has been in operation now for four years, but their statistics contradict them. The Göttingen rectorate "asserts categorically" that no member of the university's faculty has been dismissed or forced to resign because of his political opinions; yet by some strange coincidence forty-five out of ninety full professors have left since 1932—a record which almost matches that of Heidelberg; thirteen of the forty-five were Jewish professors cut down by the "racial ruling"—which of course had nothing to do with politics! It is further stated that these "non-politicals" are receiving pensions unless exchange laws interfere. We are glad to see that Cambridge University, at least, has maintained its academic and moral standing by curtly refusing to be a party to the Göttingen farce; eleven American colleges have also refused. Perhaps they will join us in the commemoration on the appointed day of another incident in the history of Göttingen which occurred just a hundred years ago. In 1837 seven professors were expelled from

April 24, 1937

Göttingen for protesting against the revocation of the liberal constitution of 1833. These events, says the Encyclopedia Britannica, "reduced the prosperity of the university." History repeats itself.

★

THE NAMING OF PAI CHUNG-HSI AS CHINA'S new War Minister seems to indicate a final victory for the Chinese "popular-front" groups in conflict with the pro-Japanese elements in the Nanking government. Less than a year ago Pai Chung-hsi, one of the leaders of the old left wing of the Kuomintang, came out in open armed revolt against Chiang Kai-shek because of the latter's weakness in the face of Japanese aggression. While the struggle apparently ended in a stalemate, Pai and his associate, Li Tsung-jen, emerged with heightened prestige as the men best fitted to lead the growing anti-Japanese movement. On the proposed new Supreme War Council Pai will have the support of Marshal Feng Yuxiang to balance the pro-Japanese sympathies of the retiring War Minister, General Ho Ying-ching, another member of the council. Chiang Kai-shek, as commander-in-chief of the army, will be chairman, but the bitterness with which the pro-Japanese clique has fought Chiang since his release from Sian precludes the possibility that he will side with General Ho. Meanwhile in Japan the repudiation of the Hayashi government by the Kokumin Domei, one of the few political groups which had supported it, foreshadows a decisive victory for the civilian parties in the coming election which may lead to an even more moderate policy toward China. Barring some wholly unexpected development, the prospects for peace in the East are greater than at any time since 1931.

★

THE ISSUES BEHIND THE DISMISSAL FROM Harvard of the two economics instructors, J. Raymond Walsh and Alan R. Sweezy, are profound, and the agitation shows no signs of subsiding. On the contrary, criticism of the university is developing in new quarters every day. We have an idea that the authorities, who from the start have shown signs of a protesting conscience, must feel increasingly uneasy behind their smooth barricade of technical justification. The Teachers' Union has issued a long statement reviewing the case, pointing out the irresponsible and disingenuous acts of the administration, and asking President Conant for a retraction and an apology. The union has also adopted unanimously a proposal made by Professor Henry Hart of the Law School calling for an investigation of the whole affair by a group of senior professors. The proposal carries the signatures of almost a hundred faculty members outside the union. It carries no hint of coercion but rather promises a serious analysis of the problems of administration and the educational policy underlying an apparent unimportant incident. President Conant would demonstrate genuine statesmanship if he were to pull down the barricades, admit the gravity of the issues involved, and encourage the formation of this special professorial grand jury.

MAYOR LAGUARDIA'S ATTACK ON THE BILL passed by the New York Assembly to end the third degree may have endeared him to the police; it was a blow to those who feel that confessions forced by torture do not serve the ends of justice. The crucial provision in the bill is that a prisoner shall be taken before a magistrate immediately, and if this is not possible, that he shall be held for the next court session not by the police department but by some other detention agency. The purpose is not to deprive the police of the opportunity to question a prisoner between the time of his arrest and his arraignment—when the third degree is brought into play—but to make that questioning subject to the safeguards consonant with the principle that a man is to be held innocent until he is proved guilty. Other provisions require that records be kept of the beginning and end of all questioning periods and that questionings take place in the presence of a duly authorized official of the agency of detention. The bill has been strongly opposed by police departments on the ground that the third degree does not exist. The Wickersham report alone disposes of that contention, and there is no other valid argument against it; it has been indorsed by the New York City Bar Association as well as by the American Civil Liberties Union and many welfare agencies. Mayor LaGuardia's outburst, along with the statewide opposition of police departments, will go far toward killing the bill in the Senate, but well-placed protests may yet save it.

Judges Are Human

HISTORY has a way of weeding out the essential from the familiar. When future historians try to sum up the results of the 1937 controversy over the Supreme Court, they will pass by the arguments and slogans that have been staled by repetition—the talk either of packing or of unpacking the court, the charges of dictatorship leveled against the President or the judges. And they will find the most lasting result in the mind of the ordinary citizen is his increasing awareness, as a result of the Great Debate of 1937, that judges are after all human.

In that sense, whether the vote in the Senate on the reorganization proposal goes for or against Mr. Roosevelt, he has already won. There was a vast area in which the American people were politically untaught—the area of the judicial power; just as there was a vast area—that of federal regulation and labor bargaining—in which they were economically untaught. It has been Mr. Roosevelt's historic fate to serve, more or less consciously, as the instrument for these tasks of national education. Under him the New Deal has accustomed us to regard federal action as a necessary part of the modern economy. Under him Lewis and the C. I. O. have accustomed us to accept the trade union as part of the industrial scheme of things. Under him the judges of the Supreme Court have accustomed us to regard them as interested in social policy and capable of changing their minds.

The Wagner decisions are historic because they gather up the threads of all three trends. They open the door to federal regulation within the commerce clause; they are a response to the immense strength of labor organization, and place legal sanction upon it for the future; and they complete our education on how the judicial power works. They have shown us that in America the real political sovereignty resides in the odd man on the Supreme Court—today in Justice Roberts. But they have shown us also that the odd man on the court cannot remain an isolated globule of individual desires and convictions but must respond finally to the desires and convictions of the people and the facts of the national life. For what we have thus learned we have had to sweat mightily, but a democracy can in the long run proceed only by education.

We have learned other things in the past few months, among them the fact that Mr. Roosevelt is not the strategist we thought he was. Like judges, Presidents also are human, and we needed this reminder that even the smartest President can err. Mr. Roosevelt's strength lies in dramatic surprise; but he underrates his capacity to carry through reforms more slowly by preparing the public mind for them. The area of the judicial power was not the right area in which to use the technique of surprise. The myths of judicial independence and judicial divinity were still too deeply imbedded in the American mind—even in the minds of Congressmen—to permit a prompt success to follow a swift move. Overnight swiftness was indispensable in the bank crisis of 1933: it was a blunder in the constitutional crisis of 1937. Only now, after months of discussion, is the country beginning to understand the inwardness of Mr. Roosevelt's desire for judicial reform. The President should have laid the ground first by speeches, public hearings, consultations with the key men.

The mistake was a tactical one, and should not prejudice us on the proposal itself, which has merits and defects of its own. But it was a mistake that seemed to lend credence to the charges that Mr. Roosevelt was seeking to grasp dictatorial power by "packing" the court. We have never had the slightest belief in these charges. But the argument, less crudely stated, that a whittling away of the judicial power may lead toward dictatorship is one that must be seriously faced.

The Wagner decisions themselves have sharpened the issue. The Labor Relations Act, from the standpoint of progressives, is the most important single piece of legislation of the whole New Deal. It had been so bitterly fought and sabotaged by big enterprise that it was almost a dead letter. Yet when five out of nine justices of the court placed their imprimatur upon it, big enterprise accepted it. Thus we have the Supreme Court acting as a stabilizing force in our national life—as a way of giving finality to the settlement of social conflict. On the other hand—so the argument would run—if you once create a precedent for packing the court, you undermine the belief in the judges and thus undermine the finality of any settlement. The result is to open the road through social conflict and reactionary repression to dictatorship.

The argument bears thinking through. But we do not find it finally persuasive. It turns on the belief that any break in the formal fabric of legality leads to dictatorship. But what brought dictatorship in Germany was the paralysis of the Reichstag and the resulting disbelief in party action and pressure for government by decree. What is likely to lead to dictatorship in any capitalist democracy is a similar paralysis of parliamentary institutions, and their consequent inability to deal with the crises of a capitalism in decline.

It is in this basic belief that we have from the beginning wanted a constitutional amendment to break the deadlock in our democratic system. It is in this basic belief also that we support the President's proposal to get new blood into the court and make it more responsive to the popular will and to popular needs. We deplore the way in which the proposal was made. We regret that the President did not advance his plan as part of a larger program of constitutional change. We regret that he does not now see fit to support actively the movement for a constitutional amendment. We urge him to strike an agreement with the Congressional leaders which will, by adding several new justices, insure a liberal court majority and yet allow the opposition to feel that reasonable concessions have been made. Obviously it would be catastrophic for him to abandon the essence of his proposal: it would be construed immediately as a vindication of the judicial power and as proof that the American people want no tampering with court or Constitution, whatever the stakes. And if that happened, whatever chance we have at present to put through an amendment would be lost.

But the President can now afford to reach a compromise agreement, and move on to other governmental business. For the real victory has been won. The people have been educated to the idea that the judicial power is no more sacred in our governmental scheme than any other power. And they have learned from the decisions themselves that judges are human.

The Budget Deficit

OWING to an unexpected shrinkage in federal revenues, it now appears that the deficit for the present fiscal year will be more than $3,000,000,000 instead of the $2,652,000,000 predicted in the President's budget message of last January. While this is considerably better than the $4,763,000,000 deficit incurred last year or the $3,500,000,000 deficit of 1934-35, it is serious enough to cause concern. What is more serious is the fact that the estimates for the 1938 fiscal year are likely to be equally inaccurate. Although part of the shortage in revenues appears to be due to the postponement of income, social-security, and "windfall" tax payments, the larger part of the gap is to be accounted for by an over-optimistic estimate of the effects of recovery on federal revenues. It is not to be supposed that there has been an actual falling off in federal income. On the contrary, the total receipts by the federal government from all sources during the first nine and a half months were more than $700,000,000, or 22 per cent above those for the corresponding period of last year. Income taxes alone rose nearly $500,000,000, or 50 per cent, in this period, though they were still some $100,000,000 less than had been anticipated. But the expenditures of the regular government departments are running nearly $600,000,000 higher than last year, and the outlay for emergency purposes is only $350,000,000 less.

During the past six years The Nation has refused to join the cohorts who were prophesying an early doom for the American government because it was running a deficit of from two to five billion dollars a year. We have repeatedly pointed out that in proportion to its income and real wealth, the United States government was less burdened by debt than any other great power. The danger of financial collapse is certainly no worse today than it was seven years ago, when the federal debt had been reduced to $16,000,000,000. Doubtless the government could go on for another six years piling up deficits without placing an intolerable burden on future generations. On the other hand, it should be evident that if the government is ever to put its finances on a sound basis it must do so during periods of transitory prosperity. If the budget cannot be balanced in 1937-38, there is good reason to doubt whether it can ever be balanced. The urgency is the greater because an unbalanced budget in a period of rapidly rising prices is the surest path to an uncontrolled inflation. Since taxes are always collected on the previous year's income, an inflation could only be headed off by a fundamental change in our tax structure.

While no one questions the desirability of balancing the budget and, if possible, reducing the national indebtedness at this time, there is the widest divergence of opinion regarding the method. Most newspapers and not a few Administration leaders in Congress are urging greater economies. The President has indicated that he will propose a cut of $250,000,000 in expenditures as compared with his previous budget message. While the full details of his message have not yet been disclosed, it is reported that $150,000,000 of this amount will be slashed from the appropriations for the regular governmental departments, and $100,000,000 will be cut from the proposed outlay for relief. What departments will bear the brunt of the $150,000,000 slash we do not know. But we strongly suspect that it will not be the departments that are guilty of the most flagrant waste. The greatest rise in expenditures, for example, has been in the field of "national defense," where the budget entry has risen from $535,000,000 in 1933-34 to an estimated $980,000,000 for the coming fiscal year. Presumably all of this vast increase could be eliminated without injury to the legitimate defenses of the United States; but this is not what is usually regarded as economy. "Economy," as defined by common usage, means the elimination of aid for the unemployed and the drought-scourged farmers. That there are almost as many families in need of aid today as in the depths of the depression is regarded as irrelevant. The relief figures are the one item in the budget which is capable of compression without an outcry from highly organized and politically powerful minorities. If it cannot save here, the Administration will have to turn its attention to the unpopular task of raising taxes.

With a knowledge that some rise in taxes is almost inevitable, conservative elements have started their usual campaign for a reduction in the exemption from income taxes and an increase in the tax on the lower brackets. In justification of this proposal it is urged that everyone should be made conscious of the obligation of tax-paying. Were this reduction in the exemption accompanied by the repeal of all sales taxes and chain-store taxes, as proposed by the Twentieth Century Fund, the effect would be salutary. But the chances of such action are unfortunately very slight. The sales taxes have been imposed by city and state governments and would not be repealed in the event of a change in the exemption in the federal income levy. Nor is it necessary to descend to families with incomes of less than $2,500 in order to find sufficient revenue to balance the budget. In 1929 no less than one-half of the national income went to the 13 per cent of the population receiving more than $4,000 a year. Despite increases in recent years, income taxes paid by our millions of families enjoying over $3,000 a year do not yet approach those levied on Britishers of the same income. It may ultimately be desirable to extend the principle of progressive taxation to the lower brackets, but let us first make sure that the well-to-do are bearing their full share of the nation's fiscal burden.

World View of Textiles

THE international textile conference in Washington was a considerable success for the very reason that its aims were modest. It was not called for the purpose of concluding international agreements to reduce the work week to forty hours or to level tariff barriers. The conference was rather a preliminary exchange of views on the various factors, economic and social, which affect the application of major labor reforms in the world textile industry.

Not until this summer will it be possible to judge the concrete results of the discussions. At that time the annual conference at Geneva of the International Labor Organization will consider the proposed draft convention on the forty-hour work week in the industry, and the ensuing decisions will determine how far, if at all, the preliminary exchange of views just ended has been effective in improving conditions of labor for the world's 14,000,000 textile workers.

Within the narrow limits of its terms of reference, the proceedings of the textile conference were impressive. Above the roar of oratory, the voice of reason made itself heard more often than might have been expected at a meeting in which national economic rivalries played so large a part. True, the conference came to no final agreement on its principal preoccupation, the forty-hour week; but the debates made it clear that the fight for this reform has a better chance than most observers supposed of reaching a successful issue at Geneva in June. With the United States and France taking the lead, a surprisingly large bloc of delegates supported the measure. Even the Japanese hinted that they were ready to consider shortening the textile work week if it could be accomplished without wiping out entirely the present differential in working hours between Eastern and Western countries. Substantial support for the forty-hour week proposal came even from the side of the employers, particularly the French and the American. Of course, support of this kind is not altogether disinterested; there is no national group of mill-owners which would not welcome a heightening of its competitors' labor costs. But the solid wall of employer resistance is perceptibly crumbling.

Al Smith, Red-Baiter

Other significant results emerged. From a variety of sources came strong hints that the time was ripe to consider bartering lower trade barriers for a universal leveling up of labor standards. This argument was put positively and forcefully by the United States spokesmen. The French delegates urged that stiff tariff sanctions be applied specifically against the textile goods of countries with excessively low labor standards. The Japanese, against whom the American feint and the French thrust were obviously directed, expressed their readiness to consider higher wages and shorter hours in return for lower tariff rates. Unfortunately no position was taken by Great Britain; and India gave a negative response.

The conference issued resounding pronouncements in favor of collective bargaining and minimum-wage machinery. Even the owners of Southern mill villages joined the general chorus of approval for collective bargaining. Skeptics will remain unconvinced that the owners of textile plants in the Piedmont industrial crescent have undergone a true change of heart. But these are new and strange times; the Supreme Court has recognized that the economic system not only exists but also changes, and America's textile workers are being prepared by the C. I. O. to win the same victories as have been won by their fellows in steel and automobiles.

Equally important was the emphasis given to the abysmally low levels of textile consumption in all countries. The textile industry, like most others, has been rife with cure-all schemes for curtailing production. The occasions have been few when attention has been directed to the blunt fact that the laboring masses of the world are not only underfed but underclothed. To stage a full-dress repetition of this fundamental truth was alone worth the trouble and expense of the conference. It was also useful that the spokesmen for China had a chance to demonstrate to the world the iniquities of the extra-territorial system which permits foreign mills in the concessions to avoid factory-law regulation.

In sum, the textile conference was notable mainly for the attitudes it brought to light and the problems it posed. International gatherings of this kind can do little or nothing to transform attitudes into directed action. To persuade governments to adopt and enforce appropriate measures is a task for the organized workers, farmers, and consumers in all countries.

"LET us look," said Al Smith, "at the record." Time was when that familiar and provocative phrase was the prelude to a keen, colloquial dissection of the claims of the "interests" against the welfare of the "people." But the "people" have become more radical and a little bad-tempered; and Al Smith has moved to the top of the Empire State Building, eighty-six stories above the noisy street. Last week his famous phrase rang out again, at the Hippodrome in New York, but the house was only two-thirds full and the phrase introduced a summons to a red hunt and served to advertise the political ambitions of a Republican martinet from Queens, George U. Harvey. Al Smith spoke from a platform banked high with reaction. Matthew Woll, formerly of the Civic Federation, was there to represent the worst in American organized labor; Father Edward Lodge Curran, founder of the two red-baiting organizations which sponsored the meeting, spoke in secular accents of "giving it" to the Communists, and cited Spain as an example. Raoul Desvernines, representing the American Liberty League, sat at Al's side.

Among them the speakers at the Hippodrome spectacle whipped up the audience to a "wildly cheering" frenzy of intolerance, in the name of religion and liberty, that reached a climax in the ravings of Mr. Harvey, vest-pocket dictator of Queens, who wants to be Mayor of Greater New York.

The New York police [he said] are the finest body of men in the world, but the poorest directed body of men in the world. I'd like to have charge of them for about two weeks and I'd guarantee to you that there wouldn't be a single Communist left in New York. I wouldn't need any fancy orders. I'd just say, "Boys, get about three feet of rubber hose, and don't bring any of them back to the station house."

We hardly regret Mr. Harvey's exhibition. Our disapproval of public executions melts before the spectacle of a cheap politician hanging himself; and unless we are a poor judge of timing, Mr. Harvey has done just that. His red-baiting, falling, so to speak, between two depressions, should put him out of the running before the real fight starts.

But for old times' sake we wish Al Smith would stay in his steel mooring mast and lick his wounds in private. He is doomed to function publicly only as the tool of reaction. And since he has forfeited his popular appeal, his usefulness, even as a tool, will become more and more limited. Two years ago, at the bidding of the church, he was waging a mighty battle against nudism. At the bidding of the Liberty League he took the stump for Alf Landon; but that was probably his last big assignment for the simple reason that he helped to roll up a colossal Republican defeat. With his most recent appearance, as a crusader for Harveyism and the religious bigotry he once sincerely despised, he fell to a new low. If he has any regard for his own record, Al Smith will close the books now.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Scandal in the Air

Washington, April 18

IT looked a few days ago as if we were going to have that badly needed thing, a Congressional investigation of the radio industry. But now it seems that the Roosevelt Administration is out to head it off because it will be impossible to investigate the radio industry without investigating the Federal Communications Commission, which is supposed to regulate it, and the Administration does not want the smells emanating from that New Deal agency traced to their source. As a result, Representative Connery's investigation resolution still lies dormant in the House Rules Committee.

Congress owes both itself and the public an investigation such as Connery proposes. It owes it to itself because of the FCC's complete and insolent disregard of its instructions from Congress as written into the law governing its operations with respect to broadcasting. It owes it to the public because such an investigation will show that the FCC has steadily and lawlessly been frittering away the public's "last great resource," as that remarkable person, Commissioner George Henry Payne, has dubbed the air. It owes it to the public especially because, as another commissioner, Irvin Stewart, recently said, "the person who has the largest stake in American broadcasting is the listener. . . . In theory, broadcasting is for the benefit of the listener. It should be, for its heart is an uncompensated use of public property, and the listener is the man who foots the bill for broadcasting when he pays the cost of governmental regulation and when he buys the advertised product."

The rumors about the FCC which swirl about Washington these days are so numerous and so libelous that I shall not attempt to deal with them here beyond noting that if even half of them are true, the commission, which the Roosevelt Administration brought into being, is one of the most corrupt federal agencies in history. What follows here will be confined to matters of public record, to Senator White's recent and persuasive indictment of the FCC in the Senate, and to two recent speeches by Commissioners Stewart and Payne. Payne and Stewart, incidentally, are not members of the commission's broadcast division. Its chairman is Eugene O. Sykes, a holdover from the old Radio Commission and a protege of Mississippi's Senator Harrison. Its other members are the FCC chairman, Anning S. Prall, a former Congressman who at least poses as a protege of Senator Wagner, and Norman S. Case, former Governor of Rhode Island, the division's Republican member. Case, Payne, Stewart, and Paul A. Walker comprise what is regarded as the progressive wing of the seven-man commission, but only Payne to date has shown a determination to fight for the public interest. Unfortunately for the public, the most vigorous fighting has taken the form of squabbles between Sykes and Prall over what looks very much like the spoils. This squabbling has gone to such lengths that some months ago Prall reported to the FCC that he had heard Sykes was to receive a $25,000 bribe for handling a license application for a Schenectady outfit. When the Department of Justice investigated and the G-men reported that no evidence had been found, Prall did his best to keep their report off the record. Payne has called attention to the disgraceful antics of the lobby that operates around the FCC, and the Congressional Record is dotted with references to reports that to do business with the broadcast division one must first pay tribute to any one of three political law firms here. Senator White has charged that the division violates its own rules and standards, and there are on record innumerable cases of favoritism shown certain license applicants.

The basic case against the broadcast division is much less stealthy and more simple than the matters just mentioned. It hinges chiefly upon the fact that the division has completely disregarded the fundamental principle of the act under which it operates. First enacted in 1927 and reenacted in 1934 when the FCC was set up and the old Federal Radio Commission abolished, that measure provides as its fundamental tenet that the ether belongs to the public and that the radio industry shall not be allowed to acquire or develop a vested interest in the air which may in time take this "last great resource" away from the public or interfere with its recapture and public development. Referring to radio frequencies, it directs the commission to "provide for the use of such channels but not the ownership thereof," and to that end the law stipulates that a broadcasting license is a privilege which the commission is under no compulsion to grant, that licenses shall be granted only for limited periods, and that before receiving a license an applicant must waive in writing any claim to use of the frequency or ether because of previous use. Furthermore, it specifically directs the commission to guard against the development of a radio monopoly or monopolies and empowers it to regulate broadcasting chains. In addition, the commission is charged with seeing that broadcasting licenses are distributed on the basis of "public convenience or interest or public necessity."

Far from obeying its orders, the commission has set itself up as the guardian angel and aid of those who are exploiting the last great resource in much the same fashion that our water, timber, land, oil, and mineral resources have been exploited and despoiled. It has functioned chiefly to smooth out competition in the industry.

Without the FCC policing of the air waves to keep the various stations from raiding each other's territories and frequencies, the industry would be in chaos, but for this policing, which costs the taxpayers $1,500,000 a year, the industry pays nothing. Nor does it pay for broadcasting licenses, of which there are 696 outstanding covering the ninety channels or frequencies available to broadcasters. That virtually all the clear channels have been allotted to the chains and that they own or control 249 of the licensed stations only begins to tell the story of the monopolistic picture the FCC has allowed to develop. It is better told by the fact that out of a total of 2,500,000 watts in licensed broadcasting power, only 60,000 watts belong to independent stations. The monopoly trend does not stop there. Only recently certain members of the FCC moved to take away from the navy two out of five short-wave frequencies allotted this government by international agreement and turn them over to Columbia for private exploitation, just as the naval oil reserves were turned over to Fall, Doheny, and the rest in the Teapot Dome case; a cry of "Teapot Dome again" within the commission itself broke up the play for the time being.

If the monopoly trend which the FCC is permitting, if not fostering, is not soon abated, the public will inevitably be faced with as hard a fight to recapture its stake in the air as it has been having to recapture its stake in the nation's power resources. Historians have noted that the government could have bought the basic patents of the telegraph industry for $100,000 at the outset and that, when Congress twenty-five years later awoke to their desirability, the price had jumped to $50,000,000. The radio industry in its brief existence has gone way beyond that. Although it represents an investment of only $40,000,000 at the outside, its 1936 gross was $107,550,000 and is expected to reach $135,000,000 this year. The significance of these startling profit indicators will be brought home with devastating force when, as must happen, Congress declares the radio industry a public utility and subjects its rates to regulation.

The most incredible aspect of the FCC's performance to date has yet to be mentioned. It involves the trafficking in licenses and station leases which the commission has allowed to develop until it is now little more than a brokerage house or a trading post for the traffickers. As a step toward carrying out the Congressional mandate that a license to use a frequency is merely a license for use and not a symbol of ownership, the commission has established the practice of granting licenses for only six months at a time. A new application must be made by the licensee every half-year. That, however, has not stopped the industry from treating these licenses as long-term, negotiable contracts for exclusive use and ownership of frequencies. Licensed stations are being bought and sold for ten and twenty times the value of their physical assets, which would be only so much junk without a frequency on which to employ them. Columbia last year, for example, paid $1,250,000 for a California station, and by any system of reckoning at least $1,000,000 out of that price was for the frequency on which the station had a license. Similarly, under a new practice, stations are being leased for periods ranging from one to fifteen years at annual rentals nearly equal to the cost of the station itself. Worse still, stock-jobbing is going on; station securities are being sold to the public at prices which recover for the promoters their full investment in the station and still leave them in control of it, and the asset which the investors get for their money is an interest in a license which is good for only six months and, so Congress has ruled, can never be construed as representing ownership of anything. All these transfers, leases, and assignments have to be and are approved by the FCC, which doesn't believe Congress meant what it said any more than do the radio barons.

The War for Raw Materials in Spain

BY FRANK C. HANIGHEN

NO ONE takes seriously the claims of Hitler and Mussolini that they are fighting in Spain only to defeat "communism." Nor can any detached observer believe that the two fascist powers have any real hope of cutting the life lines of British and French imperialisms—the routes to India and French North Africa. The British Admiralty and the French General Staff know how to take care of their life lines. Dispatches in the New York Times on March 26 and 27 stating that the Italians had started a big drive in the south to capture rich mining territory in the vicinity of the Almaden mercury mine suggested that the foreign invaders of Spain have other, more concrete aims. Is the Spanish war an extension of the world-wide struggle for raw materials? Are the two mineral-poor dictators making a little war in Spain to provide themselves with the sinews of a big war?

Spain constitutes a far richer preserve of the basic mineral elements which nourish industry than either Ethiopia or the former German colonies. Iron, the principal staple in munitions making, which both Germany and Italy lack, exists in abundance near Oviedo and in the Basque provinces. The best copper mine in Europe lies in Huelva. Not far from the mercury of Almaden the famous Peñarroya mine produces high-grade lead. Other essential minerals—tin, tungsten, zinc, silver, molybdenum, salt, phosphates, sulphur, pyrites, coal, and graphite—are scattered throughout the peninsula, while Spanish Morocco across the Straits of Gibraltar contains iron, lead, and manganese. Under the monarchy and republic foreign and domestic interests developed only part of these resources. When the republic faced serious civil strife, it was natural that the two most predatory powers in Europe should look hungrily at the region.

The first move of Italy and Germany came late in 1934, when an Italo-German consortium of business interests was formed to exploit the Spanish mineral wealth. The Federation of Italian Industrialists made up the Italian half of the deal. On the German side the Metallgesellschaft led a group of firms which included I. G. Farbenindustrie, Krupp, Rheinmetall, Kloeene, and Siemens and Halske. They chose as technical adviser M. George Dubnikov, a White Russian engineer, who had worked as a tungsten expert for Metallgesellschaft interests. M. Dubnikov arrived in Spain late in 1934.

The time of his arrival is important. In this year the right parties won the elections and in October suppressed the revolt of the Asturian miners. Lerroux, friend of big business, dominated politics with the cooperation of Gil Robles, fascist aspirant for dictator and friend of German and Italian fascism. The time seemed ripe for Germany and Italy to gain a foothold in Spain. The consortium, according to Charles Reber, writing in L'Oeuvre, February 11, 1937, was formed with the avowed object of rendering "Germany and Italy absolutely independent of London, France, and Sweden" for all minerals, especially iron. (M. Reber writes with authority, for he was the first to expose the part which the Alpin Montan Gesellschaft, an iron company, played in the overthrow of the Austrian Socialists and the murder of Dollfuss.)

M. Dubnikov established headquarters in Barcelona and set up a testing laboratory. He made a thorough survey of Spanish territory. Among other matters, he became particularly interested in the lignite deposits in Isabena, Aragon, and sent samples to the Metallgesellschaft. He reported that these deposits amounted to 20,000,000 tons and that the lignite could be distilled on the ground into synthetic motor fuel. As a result of his report a military memorandum went into the dossiers of the consortium stressing the importance of distilling synthetic fuel in Spain so that German submarines and airplanes could be supplied there. Toward the end of his stay in Spain M. Dubnikov appeared to throw most of his allegiance to the Italian wing of the consortium, and it was to Italy that he went when he closed his Barcelona headquarters in April, 1936, just two months after the victory of the Popular Front, which put an end to the power of Lerroux and Gil Robles, and three months before the revolt.

In these critical intervening months the rebellion, as everyone knows, was hatched with the complicity of Germany and Italy. What bargain was made between the Spanish rebels and these two powers remains unknown. But the arrival of both German and Italian planes, followed by the virtual invasion of Spain by troops of both nations, certainly sealed whatever deal existed. M. Dubnikoff's researches simply provided a blueprint.

One section covered by the blueprint, the rich mineral region of Spanish Morocco, was the first to get into the news. The Germans trod familiar ground here, for before the World War the activities of the German mining firm of Mannesmann in both Spanish and French Morocco resulted in the famous Agadir incident. (Driven out by the war, Mannesmann returned later and, according to a New York Times dispatch from Berlin, January 11, 1937, got a mining concession there.) But on August 27, 1936, Franco seized the Riff mines, German concessions and all, and set up a company in Seville called Hisma Limitado, Carranza y Bernhardt, with a monopoly on all raw materials from Moroccan mines. All for España and the Burgos government, of course.

As details of the deal leaked out, the real power behind Hisma became manifest. Curiously enough, Carranza and Bernhardt had long served as special representatives of German mining firms in Spain, and their new creation produced a branch in Berlin called Rowak. All existing contracts were canceled and new ones, it seems, had to be approved by Rowak. The deal contained a clause providing that the transport of minerals should be carried out at the risk of German consignees and that the latter would put German ships at the disposal of Hisma-Rowak under the protection of German warships. German payments for these minerals should be made by deducting the sums from the debt which Franco owed Germany (rumored to be approximately 320,000,000 pesetas). There could be no doubt who would get the inside track on the purchase of the ores. Reynolds' News, the organ of the British cooperatives, summed up the deal as follows: "In reality, Hisma is a German organization with a Spanish name."

Germany lost little time in obtaining shipments of the 800,000 tons due it under the terms of the contract. The SS. Procida of 2,600 tons, the Garganti of 2,225 tons, the Pasajes of 3,200 tons, the Capri of 2,753 tons, and many more set out for Germany loaded with iron ore. On December 22 Edgar Ansel Mowrer, who reported the deal in the Chicago Daily News, cabled, "An entire fleet of ships is engaged in bringing arms to Spain, returning loaded with iron ore for Germany."

As a matter of fact, Germany had no time to lose. The iron-ore situation had become acute. Great Britain, itself in the throes of an armament boom, was now competing for Swedish ore. The French Socialists, in power in France, had long been talking of an embargo on the ores in Lorraine. Spanish iron ore for the past year had been virtually unavailable because Spanish importers could not obtain German import licenses owing to the German currency shortage. Dr. Schacht, who had rationed butter, now began to talk of rationing the material which makes cannon.

The Italians, for reasons not yet clear, became most active on the side of Franco later than the Germans and after German military aid fell off; possibly because the Italian armament program was farther advanced than the German and the need for minerals less urgent. At any rate, the Italians now entered the race for raw materials and in a rather dramatic way beat the Germans to it. The latter, in December, had obtained concessions for iron in Galicia and for iron near Vigo, and were inspecting vanadium and tungsten deposits in Estramadura. At this juncture some of the surprisingly large Italian detachments which were landed at Cadiz late in December proceeded not to the battle front but to the sites of the tungsten and vanadium deposits far behind the lines. Their apparent object was to prevent German occupation.

In January the Italians, now the most numerous of the foreign forces, started their drive on Malaga, which they captured a month later. Another push up the coast on this front would bring them to Cartagena, where lie some of the best iron, lead, copper, and sulphur mines in Spain. In December the Germans had attempted a drive for the Almaden mercury mine north of Cordoba in Ciudad Real province, but apparently dropped it, possibly for lack of troops. More recently Italian troops resumed the drive. Spain, the largest, and Italy, the next largest producer of mercury in the world, formerly had a cartel which fixed prices and controlled production. (Former Austrian territory, ceded to Italy after the World War, contains a large part of Italy's mercury mines.) The Loyalist government in October broke up the cartel, "for political reasons" as the Italians complained, and is rumored to have given an exclusive sales agency to the British firm, Alexander Pickering and Company. Since the Almaden mine, if fully exploited, could probably dominate the world market, Italy seemingly launched this military drive to take this commanding trade position from the Loyalist government. Meanwhile, Messrs. Pickering may prove to be a valuable friend to Madrid—perhaps the only friend—in the very unsympathetic City.

Elsewhere other battles rage. Rebels and loyalists still fiercely dispute the mining center of Oviedo. Farther to the east the Basque government defends rich iron mines. In Aragon German troops have appeared, oddly enough, not far from those lignite deposits which, as we have seen, might provide fuel for German submarines and airplanes in a World War. Down in Rio de Oro, a Spanish colony in tropical Africa, Loyalists have scored a victory over the rebels. Rio de Oro contains large rubber plantations for which Germany has acquired concessions to meet her serious lack of this vital raw material.

While Germany and Italy quite openly fight for raw materials, international capital takes a stand which can only be construed as cooperation with these powers. In the Riff, for instance, British and French mines receive no payment for their ore which goes to Germany; all payments, as it has been shown, are applied to Franco's armament debt. Yet these companies show a strange diffidence about the matter. Not only have they and their governments filed no protest, but the newspapers in London and Paris which usually voice their opinions have come out quite openly on the side of Franco.

Again the Rio Tinto mines in the province of Huelva, British owned, produce most of the copper in Europe. Renowned for its ruthless labor policy and the scandalous deal with the monarchy by which it obtained the concession for a song, Rio Tinto naturally feared that the Popular Front victory would bring retaliation. Shares dropped following the elections from a high of twenty-two to thirteen in August. They recovered sharply after the rebels took Huelva in August and lately touched a high of thirty. Yet, while Sir Andrew McFadyean, commercial director, vociferously proclaims his sympathy for the rebels, the Manchester Guardian reports that the output of Rio Tinto is being requisitioned and sold to Germany at a price of forty-two pesetas to the pound sterling, whereas the current peseta's level is from eighty to ninety to the pound. Has an international capitalist "understanding" been reached with Franco and his German and Italian backers?

Viewed from this angle, the puzzling farce of non-intervention, probably the strongest element on Franco's side, becomes a little clearer. Consider how intricately French, British, German, and Italian capital—and American, too—is interwoven in the Spanish economy. That highly cosmopolitan family, the Rothschilds, besides holding an interest in the Almaden mercury mine, is said to own the famous lead mine of Peñarroya, now held by the rebels. (Remember Peñarroya's brilliant exploit during the World War? This company, in alliance with the Metallgesellschaft, Dubnikov's late employer, sent 150,000 tons of lead to Germany via Switzerland.) Today the Peñarroya's board of directors includes some interesting personalities: Frederic Ledoux, who sits on the board of the Spanish company Union Española de Explosivos in profitable proximity to Dr. Aufschlager, prominent in the German munitions industry; M. Humbert de Wendel, whose munitions interests straddle the Rhine; and the Italian Count Henrico San Martino de Valperga. The late Sir Basil Zaharoff, whose interests knew no frontiers, held (presumably his estate still does) a large share in the Logrosan mines, and his activities in the Spanish armament industry became justly celebrated as a result of the Nye investigation. These same Spanish armament factories, in which Vickers has heavy interests, at present carry on quite actively in Ferrol and Cadiz, which are held by the rebels. Rio Tinto works hand in hand with Metallgesellschaft in European Pyrites, Ltd., jointly owned by these two firms, and interlocks in some of its holdings with the interests of the house of Morgan. The Morgans have their finger in the Spanish situation through the International Telephone and Telegraph Company, which has a monopoly in Spain, and Catalonian power plants. Meanwhile Deterding and Standard Oil, still smarting from the rebuff which Primo de Rivera administered to them during his oil-monopoly adventure, are said to be standing by. But British capital dominates foreign interests in Spain, and it would take a long article to do justice to the extraordinary way in which British capital, often in conjunction with Spanish, French, Belgian, and German interests, has exploited the country.

In view of this situation, it is not hard to perceive at least one reason why the Baldwin government, representative as it is of finance capital, has stubbornly kept the non-intervention agreement going, against the sentiments of Léon Blum and to the detriment of the Loyalist cause. Apparently the knowing ones who insist that Britain could "control" a victorious Franco speak with authority.

Rhetoric—or Life

BY IGNAZIO SILONE

(Translated from the Italian by Eric Mosbacher)

A YOUNG Fascist writer who served voluntarily in the Abyssinian War has made a really important confession. In some correspondence which appeared in Italia Letteraria of April 19 last (Testimonianze dell Guerra, by Indro Montanelli), he wrote:

In this war there are already a number of dead who died for the sake of conformity; I might almost say a number of artificial dead, dead who did not wish to live, or were not able to live; as if they thought, or rather felt, that death was the only way of paying off the moral debt contracted before the war.

"In one sense," one of these men said to me a few days before he fell, "in one sense we pledged ourselves not to return. In reality we started pledging ourselves at the age of fourteen or fifteen. It was a crescendo of words."

Then he fell silent, bored by words; and the silence seemed to clinch the pledges. We made no attempt to hide that we were awaiting the test of deeds.

This war will bring many to maturity in the sense that in the future it will impel them to keep a more severe check on their words; many who, having pledged themselves not to return, will return. . . .

This war would be infinitely easier if there were not behind us that signed promissory note which we shall never in any way be able to meet. . . .

I think that this war will turn out to have offered to those who have taken part in it a gift more precious than oil wells; namely, the gift of a check on the written word, and still more on the printed word; a vigilant sense of responsibility for words. . . .

Many Italians who are here to fight proclaim that they are here in order to demonstrate their conformity to all the world. I have rarely found any who have had the "formal" courage to state that they are here because their conscience demanded it. Conscience is a word that is beginning to disappear from ordinary language. Whether it be an effect of collectivism or whatever it may be, the aim today is to justify oneself in the eyes of society. It is a fashion. I myself have cooperated, within the modest limits of my modest authority, in launching this fashion of "depersonalization." I do this or that because I have to justify myself in the eyes of public opinion. I project myself without. There are things that I ought not to do, but how should I justify myself in the eyes of others if I did not do them? I have to do them all the same. There no longer exists my, thy, his duty. There exists Duty; a standardized imperative, which is the same for everybody; and diversity of interpretation is taboo. It is judgment made easy, as easy as the application of an article in the penal code. This is an impoverishment. . . .

It would not be so if everyone confined his words to communion with himself. The habit of self-interrogation has been lost.

The quotation has been a rather long one, but it was worth bringing to your attention. This young author's confession has an importance that goes far beyond the field of literature, for it reveals a distortion typical of Italian society, which is tainted to the core with the ancient disease of rhetoric. Amid the superficial changes of regimes and governments, the most prominent figure in the life of our country has always been that of the orator, and the supreme political art has been that of eloquence. When the ecclesiastical preacher or the government propagandist has proved inadequate, violence has invariably intervened on their behalf; invariably, even before the days of Fascism, in the so-called liberal epoch. If you examine our cultural history you will find that at bottom it is a picturesque tissue of magnificent but empty rhetoric and of refined brutality; from the time of the Jesuit quaresimalisti and the spies of the Inquisition up to Etcetera Etcetera with his blackshirts and their castor oil. Socialist eloquence was defeated and eliminated from our public life because at the decisive moment it was not backed up with force. The Socialists had many eloquent charlatans, many Don Circostanzas and Don Zabagliones,* but no fighters armed with daggers and bombs. Our socialism, particularly our parliamentary socialism, consisted predominantly of unarmed rhetoric enlisted in the service of a humanitarian mythology. Our Socialists were a mob of poverty-stricken workers and cafoni organized by innumerable lawyers, barbers, and commercial travelers; three types who are unquestionably eloquent but cowardly. Could our Socialist movement have come to any other end? It could not.

Our country is a country of rhetoric, but of armed rhetoric. The conditions in which the workers and peasants have lived their lives have always been so appalling that in self-defense the country's whole political and social superstructure has always had to resort to a great deal of ranting about culture, patriotism, religion, and order. Situations arise, however, when words no longer suffice, and then it becomes necessary to use force to save culture and all those other fine things.

It is well known that Etcetera Etcetera has assigned to the intellectuals of the government party the motto of "Book and Rifle," which is to be seen reproduced in the form of a vignette on many Italian Youth publications at the present time. A rifle is shown resting on a book. In reality it is the book that rests on the rifle. Nevertheless, Italian literature is in a state of acute depression, in spite of the rifle's support.

The depression is of a kind different from that afflicting other countries; it has a specifically Italian stamp. Italians read fewer and fewer books, and when they do read they avoid the books supported by rifles and pick out translations of foreign books. They turn from choice to pre-revolutionary Russian books. In 1927 the Minister of the Interior notified booksellers and publishers that in future it would be an offense to display pre-revolutionary Russian books in the window, and ordered that they be sold at a much higher price than Italian novels. Thus since 1927 Italian novels have been supported not only by rifles but by a considerable price advantage. Even this, however, has availed them nothing.

* Don Circostanza and Don Zabaglione are characters in "Fontamara" and "Bread and Wine," respectively.

Every two or three years the awkward problem of why Italians do not read the authors of their own country but prefer foreign authors is discussed at length in the Italian literary press. It has actually become a classic subject for debate, and a whole literature has sprung up about it. Giuseppe Prezzolini, now a Fascist propagandist in North America, states in his book "La Cultura Italiana":

Bonghi raised the question of why literature is not popular in Italy. The answer is easy; it is that Italian literature does not come from the people but has always been an upper-class product. Italian literature has been a literature of nobles, courtiers, priests, monks, and, in our century, professors. It was originally developed at the Sicilian court and it is still an appanage of the Middle School or of the Academy.

The literary dilettante who has nothing to say but has to imagine feelings that he does not experience is a feature of every century. . . . The doctrine of "pure art" that ran its course in the time of futurism, or the "pure literature" advocated with a certain dignity by La Ronda, which left behind it the memory of its name if of nothing else, exemplified the same flaw in the national character. Many Italians of the nineteenth century, particularly De Sanctis, dedicated themselves to the task of destroying this type of literature, root and branch; one of the last efforts in this direction was that made by La Voce and allied journals. But all these efforts were quixotic, because it would be necessary to make a desert of Italy to make sure of exterminating the weed, so luxuriously does it flourish in every nook and cranny of the country.

Bonghi lived at the end of the nineteenth century. Thus, as I have already mentioned, the evil is not one of recent growth; there is no question of its having been introduced by the dictatorship. The dictatorship was not responsible for the disease of rhetoric; on the contrary, it was one of its results. It is true that quixotic attempts have been made to liberate the cultural life of Italy from the sway of the rhetoricians, but all of them failed, as Prezzolini said. The literary history of modern Italy is nothing but the history of these abortive attempts.

During the years in which the generation to which I belong was being brought face to face with life the shining star in the heaven of our national rhetoric was D'Annunzio. This is what Croce says of him:

He borrowed first from Carducci and the realists, then from the pre-Raphaelites, then from the Russian mystics, then from Nietzsche; and later a belligerent Garibaldian influence made itself felt. But whatever he touched he transformed, to make of it an object of sensuous delectation, for the pleasure of eye, ear, touch, smell, of all the senses; and his ideal, if he had an ideal that was his very own, seems to have been a totally new sense, different from any already possessed by the human animal.

The contagion was in the air. Another typical example is provided by Pascoli, who, though his poetical inspiration seemed of a very different order from D'Annunzio's, was also a victim of the disease of rhetoric.

As a disciple of Carducci and a painter of idyllic, rustic scenes in a style derived from old popular poetry [Croce writes] his [Pascoli's] aim was to elevate himself to the status of a heroic, mystical bard, and dissolve his dryness and calm into a fluid impressionism, in which humanism and patriotism and mysticism remained his aims, while over all of them there reigned a tearful, sighing voluptuousness that did not take long to turn into a mannerism.

Contemporary with Pascoli great public buildings were being put up in Italy entirely for show, and government palazzi, lyric theaters, and expensive, ugly, and cumbersome monuments were erected even in places where facilities for the most elementary hygiene were lacking.

There were men who reacted against this method of hiding the meanness and hardness of real life behind a façade of marble and sonorous verse, but their revolt was always ineffective, because they lacked comprehension of the social forces underlying all the rhetoric. They were certainly able to criticize its effects but not its causes. In reaction against D'Annunzio, such men as Soffici, Boine, Jahier, Slataper proclaimed the necessity of an art that should be serious and moral, addressed to the inner conscience. The group of writers associated with La Voce of Florence—Papini, Prezzolini, Amendola—reacted against the influence of D'Annunzio by demanding a literature of ideas. The crepuscolari—Gaeta, Gozzano, Corazzini, Palazzeschi—wanted to escape from the aesthetic of false magnificence by returning to that of the provinces in the nineteenth century. It may be said that no literary paper was founded by Italian young men without raising the flag of revolt against D'Annunzianism and all its affinities and derivatives. The revolt against D'Annunzianism was only victorious, however, controversially and intellectually; as regards artistic creation, its results were inferior to its premises; they were not entirely immune from the contagion of rhetoric themselves. La Ronda petered out into sensuous, descriptive, autobiographical fragmentarism, in which calligraphic preciousness was called in to hide the interior void. La Voce passed from the control of Prezzolini to that of De Robertis, lost Salvemini, Amendola, and other who went over to politics, and also tailed off into refined aestheticism.

In 1920, after all these failures, the critic Russo proposed making a fresh start by proclaiming the necessity of a return to Verga. Borgese announced his "return to classic, humanistic construction, to inquiry into the problems of the soul, to an essential style stripped of all ornament." The drive in this new direction had matured during the war. Its greatest fruit was Borgese's novel "Rubè," which was a merciless self-criticism and a condemnation of the moral insufficiency of the Italian petty bourgeoisie. Apart from "Rubè" there were the isolated, marginal comments of Tozzi, Linati, Stuparich, Svevo, Betti, and others, in each of whom in turn the critics discovered native echoes of great foreign writers or anticipation and promise of an originality that failed to materialize. The exigencies of the novel remained unfulfilled. An attempt was even made to rationalize this impotence and present it as ■ characteristic of the Italian mind. Papini wrote:

Being, as he generally is, a subjectivist, the Italian of genius can do many things; he can express his own feelings, dreams, desires (lyric poetry); try to convince others, to his own advantage or that of his ideas (eloquence); artistically present his ideas on man, society, or other general themes (theoretical works); describe great deeds of the past, looking to the political causes and external events rather than to the inner mind of the protagonists (history); or, finally, attack these in order to ridicule them, criticize them, or defend himself (satire and controversy). But he cannot create creatures of the imagination who talk and act as living beings; or can only do so badly. In short, he is no novelist or dramatist.

But that is an arbitrary statement, confuted by the history of Italian literature itself, which can boast of great story-sellers, such as Boccaccio, Manzoni, and Verga. A far more profound study of the relationship between race and narrative genius would be required before it would be possible to accept it. On one point, however, there is general agreement, namely, that real novels are lacking in modern Italian literature, which is devoid of real, creative, profound, original, living works, showing great cross-sections of society. And the gap has not been filled by Moravia, who, after the quixotic and abortive efforts described above, has made one more. His purpose has been described as that of pure narration. The pure narration of the author of "Le Ambizioni Sbagliate" is a last echo of the aesthetic of pure intuition. Moravia instructs a world of his own, the sole coherence of which is that of narrative, in contrast to the effective and human truth, hence also the moral and historical truth, of the great impure story-tellers. With Moravia art dissolves once more into technique and aestheticism; it may arouse the admiration of his colleagues but not that of his compatriots, who continue to prefer Gogol and Tolstoy. Moravia has penetrated to the very last frontier permitted to an Italian author, the frontier between rhetoric and living art. In our country that frontier coincides with that placed by the state between legality and illegality, between that which is permitted and favored and that which is banned and persecuted. That frontier looks even more prodigious and insurmountable if one remembers what Bonghi and Prezzolini have said of the social position of Italian literary men; the frontier, that is to say, is a class frontier. It is impossible to paint ■ true picture of any society without judging it. For an Italian writer that means going to prison or into exile. It means something else: breaking the courtly, cap-and-motley tradition of Italian literature; changing class.

Save the Food and Drug Bill!

BY HENRY LEWIS

WITHIN the next few days Congress will decide whether consumers are to get a new food-and-drug bill embodying the few minimum safeguards that have survived the attack of industrial lobbies or a pitifully inept measure that will destroy the hope of any effective action for another generation. The choice is sharp and distinct.

More than a month ago the Senate passed the Copeland measure, which is the legitimate, though pathetically emasculated, heir of the original food-and-drug bill. At present that bill is neatly pigeonholed in Representative Lea's House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Meanwhile Chairman Lea is pushing ardently for the passage of a bill of his own which would enlarge the powers of the Federal Trade Commission. A companion measure, sponsored by Senator Wheeler, has passed the Senate, but House action has been fortunately delayed.

There is no quarrel with the general purpose of this bill—to increase the power of the Federal Trade Commission by giving it authority to regulate all "unfair or deceptive acts or practices in commerce" instead of just those which represent "unfair competition." But there are vital objections to the exact provisions of the Lea bill which would reserve to the Federal Trade Commission exclusive powers to regulate food-and-drug advertising. If Mr. Lea gets his bill through the House, if he prevails on the Senate conferees to favor his bill rather than the Wheeler measure, which contains no such provisions, and if the bill has clear sailing from that time on—all of which appears to be in the cards—the Food and Drug Administration of the Department of Agriculture will lose all chance of gaining the one new and essential weapon it has been fighting for—control over advertising. The sections in the pending Copeland bill which would give the Food and Drug Administration that authority would be nullified by passage of the Lea bill.

Why should that control be vested with the Food and Drug Administration rather than with the Federal Trade Commission? Briefly, because the function of the administration is to protect the consumer; and because it is the only agency which has the information, the laboratory equipment, and the technical personnel necessary for regulating advertising. On the other hand, the Federal Trade Commission was set up to be an umpire in business disputes, and its record over a period of years shows an attitude more than friendly toward some of those very manufacturers whose advertising is most objectionable.

Just how effectively the commission might be expected to crack down can be surmised from the story of its tender dealings with Dr. C. A. Constantine. The commission apparently was not aware of Dr. Constantine's activities, for it did nothing to put an end to them. It was the Post Office Department which finally stepped in and issued a fraud order requiring Constantine to cease operation of his mail-order business. But that is not the whole story. In the course of the inquiry the good doctor introduced a testimonial letter as evidence of his own stalwart character and of the sterling worth of his cure for pyorrhea. The letter appears below:

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION

Washington, D. C., April 28, 1931

Dear Dr. Constantine: The pyorrhea treatment was duly received, and I very much appreciate your kindness in sending it with your compliments. However, as the members of the Special Board have made a rule for themselves not to accept gifts from a party while his matter is still pending before them, I am returning the check herewith.

I have delayed writing for a few days until I should have time to try out and report upon your treatment. I have been using it, as per directions, and find it really wonderful. I have never seen anything like it. My gums stopped bleeding overnight, and began at once to improve noticeably in the matter of soreness and sponginess. While my case is not bad, I would go to the dentist, in Seattle, about every six months, for a few weeks of treatment, using common table salt between times, as that seemed more efficacious than any of the varied and sundry dentifrices tried and discarded in their turn.

I have noted another effect upon me, although it may be my imagination: that is, that your treatment so penetrates the gums and makes them feel so fine—with an agreeable taste moreover—that I do not crave for tobacco or a cigar as I had been doing. I am pleasantly surprised at times to find I have gone several hours without even thinking about tobacco, something quite unusual. I am wondering if my gums, saturated with nicotine, have not been calling for more.

I'll drop you a line when I've completed the course of treatment, and we'll see then how it holds up.

Again thanking you for your courtesy, and with best wishes, I am,

CLYDE M. HADLEY

Mr. Hadley is a member of the Federal Trade Commission's Special Board of Investigation. His letter reveals a susceptibility to the claims of patent-medicine dispensers hardly fitting in a presumably scientific investigator; aside from that, his solicitude for Dr. Constantine is all too revealing an indication of the tenderness with which the commission handles, for example, a big drug manufacturer like the Bayer Company.

Back in 1934, when Bayer was no longer enjoying its monopoly of the aspirin business because of patent expirations, the company was straining desperately to preserve its exclusive market and to protect its ridiculously high prices. Bayer aspirin, the company advertised, was the one and only original aspirin—or words to that effect.

It did not depress the heart, it did not upset the stomach, it was "perfectly harmless, one tablet would put you to sleep. "Anyone can take Bayer Aspirin," the ads boasted, the implication being that if you took any other kind of aspirin you did so at your own risk.

Other manufacturers who were struggling to get a foothold in the market complained, and the Federal Trade Commission had to do something about it. But no one could have asked for more thoughtful consideration. Sparing the company the embarrassment of a public trial and dispensing entirely with evidence and findings of facts, the FTC issued a "consent" cease-and-desist order against the Bayer Company which was a model of restraint and indirection. The commission ordered the company to stop making such representations as have already been noted "unless properly qualified, limited, or explained." A most helpful suggestion. But the commission went even further; it stipulated that "nothing in this order shall be construed as preventing the respondent from making proper therapeutic claims or recommendations which are based on reputable medical opinion or recognized medical or pharmaceutical literature."

The attorney who negotiated this remarkable contract for the Bayer Company was Edward S. Rogers of the New York law firm of Rogers, Ramsay, and Hoge. His partner, "Jimmy" Hoge, is counsel for the Proprietary Association, which is generally credited with having done the most effective work in knifing the food-and-drug bill during the past four years. (For example, needled into Senator Copeland's measure as it passed the upper house last month is one provision singularly reminiscent of the Bayer stipulation. That provision exempts from the ban on false advertising and misbranding all such representations as are "supported by persons who, by reason of scientific training and experience, are qualified as experts on the subject.")

It is the same star collaborators, the patent-medicine men and the Federal Trade Commission, which now threaten the food-and-drug bill. The nostrum makers covet for the commission and the commission covets for itself control over all food-and-drug advertising. Last year their strength was sufficient to block passage of the Copeland measure in the House. This year history threatens to repeat itself.

In this connection it is significant that even various business groups, anxious to preserve the dwindling confidence of their customers, feel that the Copeland bill as it now stands is inadequate. It definitely weakens the seizure provisions of the 1906 law; it provides no civil or criminal penalties for false advertising; and it is full of dangerous loopholes. To hand over control of advertising to the Federal Trade Commission would be to yield the last hope of protection for the consumer. On this point the record of the FTC is all too clear.

For example, take the case of three nostrums presented as cures for rheumatism—Renton's Hydrocin Tablets, Allenru Capsules, and Sisson's Formula Tablets, Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The commission simply instructed the manufacturers to qualify their advertising claims by limiting them exclusively to cases of rheumatism caused by excessive uric acid. This order, misleading as it is to the consumer who doesn't know whether his rheumatism is caused by uric acid or sunspots, would be bad enough if the theory that rheumatism is caused by excess uric acid had been established. On the contrary, the causative role of uric acid is today more obscure than ever.

When Renton's Hydrocin Tablets came on the market in 1929, the Food and Drug Administration clamped down on them immediately, for in common with Sisson's Tablets they contained cinchophen, a drug which dangerously affects the liver. The manufacturer had to revise his labels, but was required only to restrict his advertising claims to those conditions caused by uric acid.

The Food and Drug Administration has repeatedly pointed out that "it is the consensus of present-day medical opinion that none of these conditions, with the exception of gout, is due to excessive uric acid." The commission knew the administration's stand.

What has been the inevitable result of such forbearance? The American Medical Association reports that in 1932 Renton's Hydrocin Tablets caused at least six deaths. And in a "Letter to Periodical Publishers," dated December 27, 1933, the National Better Business Bureau reports that when information concerning the A. M. A.'s investigation of this death-dealing product was conveyed to the manufacturer, "the company replied that it was conducting its advertising in accordance with a stipulation executed with the Federal Trade Commission."

It is this commission that is now asking for more power "for the consumer's sake."

Who Owns the Philippines?

BY JAMES S. ALLEN

THE Philippine question is being shifted almost entirely at present to economic grounds because of the forthcoming trade conference between the United States and the Philippine Commonwealth. The dispute between the two countries now centers around the economic clauses of the Tydings-McDuffie Independence Act, which grants a greater degree of self-government to the Philippines and promises independence in 1946, at the close of the ten-year "transition period."

The act was passed through the combined efforts of the Cuban sugar lobby and the Philippine independence missions, and as a result of this curious alliance contained compromises which are satisfactory to neither group. The Cuban sugar lobby is dominated by the National City Bank of New York and the Bank of Nova Scotia. These institutions represent the American investment in the Cuban sugar industry, the largest supplier of the American market. Their motive in favoring Philippine independence is to deprive the Islands of the American free market, which they have enjoyed since 1908, and thus remove the differential which permits Philippine sugar to compete successfully with Cuban. To assure this result they succeeded in writing into the Tydings-McDuffie Act a clause which provides that after the fifth year of the commonwealth an export tax amounting to 5 per cent of the United States duty is to be levied on Philippine sugar and other products and that this tax is to be increased from year to year until it reaches 25 per cent of the American duty in 1945. During this period American products are to be admitted to the Islands duty free.

As the result of protests from the Philippines, President Roosevelt, before signing the measure, promised President Quezon that a conference would be held to reconsider these clauses. Further pressure from the Philippine sugar industry and political developments in the Far East which render stability in the Islands imperative for the United States have hastened the conference. The diplomatic spokesmen of the Philippine sugar interests have played up this need for stability.

Sugar, it is held, is the life blood of the Philippine economy. In 1934 about 60 per cent of the value of all Philippine exports was in sugar going to the American free market. Figures have been produced to show that 2,000,000 Filipinos are directly dependent upon the sugar industry, which is said to be responsible for a "high standard of living" (wages on the sugar plantations are about 20 cents a day), and that direct and indirect taxes paid by the sugar industry amount to about 40 per cent of the insular government's revenues. Frank Murphy, while he was Governor-General, in a cable to the Secretary of War (September 9, 1934) produced additional data to prove that the whole country faced economic disintegration: thirteen financial institutions had made 47 per cent of their total advances of $72,500,000 on sugar; the Philippine National Bank alone, government owned (the Philippine government bonds are held in the United States), advanced 77 per cent of all its outstanding funds on sugar; the government railways derived 40 per cent of their freight revenues from sugar.

The Cuban sugar lobby has a number of allies, of which the most important are the refiners of American beet sugar and the National Dairy Union. More later about the beet-sugar men. If one excludes gold production, coconut products constitute the second Philippine export. A. M. Loomis, secretary of the Dairy Union, has been fighting for the last fifteen years against the admittance of coconut products from the Philippines duty free, holding that they compete directly with our domestic fats. A tax of three cents a pound has already been levied on Philippine coconut oil, and an effort is now being made to raise the tax to five cents. Mr. Loomis believes that "the one solution to the competition is Philippine Independence."

It is presumed that independence would mean the end of trade preference for all Philippine exports. This is the great moral argument which has won over an important sector of American big business for independence. But the prospect of losing the free market and possibly even a preferential market in the United States has caused the dominant Filipinos to view with alarm the possibility of independence.

The United States may have been more liberal than other powers in dealing with its colonial subjects after armed conquest, but it has not been less thorough in dominating the economy of its colonies. In twenty-five years the United States was able to transform the Philippines into an appendage of its own economy. In the years 1903-08, when the Philippines enjoyed a duty preference, average yearly exports to the United States were valued at $12,000,000 and to other countries at $20,000,000. Since 1909 free trade has prevailed. In 1929, the high mark in foreign trade, exports to the United States reached $124,500,000, while all other countries received only $40,000,000 worth of Philippine products. By 1934 the value of exports to countries outside the United States was less than the 1903-08 average. The Philippines thus gained a favorable American market at the price of losing all their other important markets. Under the impetus of the World War demand, sugar became by far the most important Philippine crop.

The Philippines have had to pay an even greater price for the favor of the American market. The American market could be obtained only on American terms, and these were, above all else, a monopoly of the Philippine market. In 1909 imports of American goods amounted to 17 per cent of total imports; in 1934, 64 per cent, despite heavy Japanese competition in textiles. A list of the chief imports demonstrates the industrial poverty of the Philippines: textiles, iron and steel and their manufactures, mineral oils, tobacco products, paper, wheat flour, automobiles and trucks, dairy products, chemicals, and silks.

The favorable United States market for agricultural products has tended to maintain and bolster the colonial agrarian economy which has made the Philippines a classic land of peonage. At the same time the American monopoly of the Philippine market has effectively hindered the development of native industry. Even the old-established tobacco industry of the Islands is suffering from the preferences established for American products, which are admitted duty and tax free. While Philippine tobacco products are taxed in the United States, American cigarettes selling at from 12½ to 15 cents in New York may be bought for 7½ cents in Manila. Philippine textiles and the iron and steel industry have hardly a chance of development. Although the necessary raw materials can be produced or are to be found in the Islands, Philippine industry is doomed as long as American products dominate the market and are not threatened by a tariff wall. The backward agrarian economy to which the Filipinos are thus sentenced has placed the imported American standards of democracy and of living teasingly out of reach of the masses. Tragic, one might say, but also a powerful ferment in the caldron of social change.

To know who owns the Philippines is to understand the politics of Filipino-American economics. The United States Bureau of Insular Affairs in 1932 drew up a chart of capital investments in the Islands on the basis of data supplied by the Governor-General's office. It shows that 50 per cent of all capital investments in the Philippines, exclusive of real estate and farm lands, is American. Investments of American citizens totaled about $275,000,000, of which $150,000,000 was in government and railroad bonds. The next largest investors were the Chinese, who held 17 per cent of the investments, and the Filipinos, who came third with 15 per cent.

The American economic stake in the Islands is much larger than these figures indicate. Capital investments in themselves do not tell the whole story. Trade is a major item, but fixed capital investment is necessarily small. In addition, the chief attraction for capitalists is the exceedingly high rate of profit on a relatively small investment. The sugar centrals, for example, make a yearly profit of at least 50 per cent, and gold mines have been paying dividends of 100 per cent and 125 per cent.

The export industries, that is, the industries directly involved in the trade dispute, are predominantly owned or controlled by Americans. The dispute, therefore, is not primarily between Filipinos seeking an autonomous economy and American monopoly interests, but between one group of American capitalists whose principal interests are in the Philippines and another group interested in Cuba and in competitive industries in the United States. The principal exports, in order of importance, are sugar, gold, cocoanut products, abaca and cordage, tobacco products, embroideries, and timber and lumber. Sugar is the main lump of contention. Although most of the sugar is grown by Filipino planters, the industry is controlled by the owners of the sugar centrals. Of the total capacity of the centrals, 33.4 per cent is owned by Americans, 31.5 per cent by Spaniards, and 31.4 per cent by Filipinos. The remainder is in the hands of the Catholic archbishop, the Dominican friars, and a small Danish company. As Governor Murphy was kind enough to point out, the railroads and the banks are up to their necks in sugar.

In the American and Spanish groups control is more highly concentrated than in the Filipino group. In the Spanish group control is divided between the Tabacalera Company, the old Spanish tobacco monopoly, and the Elizaldes, a powerful industrial family. Among the Americans there are two principal groups: the largest comprises the American-Hawaiian interests, chiefly the Bishop estate, but the most compact is made up of the Alfred Ehrman-Spreckles interests of San Francisco, whose associates also have large holdings in the Dollar Line, the Pacific Commercial Company (largest import and export house in the Philippines), and other interests in the Islands. The American group, having the benefit of powerful allies, determines the policy of the Philippine Sugar Association. It is interesting to note that Alfred Ehrman is also the owner of the Great Western Sugar Refinery, the largest beet-sugar producer in the United States. It is not improbable, therefore, that he participates in the sugar lobby at Washington which has been demanding tariffs against Philippine sugar and, incidentally, favoring independence. The Filipino-owned centrals are divided among a number of wealthy families, one of the largest being the Montilla family. Gil Montilla is speaker of the National Assembly.

The Filipinos have an important, although indecisive, stake in the industry, and here their misfortunes begin. The question of independence has been transformed into a question of dollars and cents. The Filipino sugar men, and these have the greatest influence in the commonwealth government, are now quite openly demanding that the Philippines be forever retained as a possession of the United States. They are asking for "continued commonwealth status" or some form of protectorate under the United States. In this they are repeating the demands of the leading American interests in the Islands, which want the assurance of United States protection against internal and external foes and the benefits of a free or preferential market. Other factors also enter into the situation, such as the menace of Japanese aggression. But the fact remains that a growing group of influential Filipinos are now finding sugar sweeter than liberty.

Although the gold-mining industry is not directly involved in the trade dispute, it has important bearings upon the situation since it is being hailed as the "new hope" of the Philippines, just as sugar was hailed a score of years ago. The industry is new and is being spoken of as a great factor making for the economic self-sufficiency of the country to the extent even of creating a prosperity independent of the fortunes of sugar. But these expectations are largely illusory. While Filipinos are investing their capital in highly speculative stock companies, dreaming of sudden wealth, foreigners have their hands on the actual gold resources. The American "gold king," Judge John W. Haussermann, controls 60 per cent of the gold production, which in 1936 rose to more than $20,000,000. The Spanish Soriano group controls 17 per cent; another European-American group 15 per cent; the remainder is distributed among small Filipino and American companies. Other mineral resources have suffered the same fate. The Zambales chromite deposits, said to be the largest in the world, were transformed mysteriously from a United States government reservation into the private property of Judge Haussermann, who recently visited the United States to negotiate the sale of the mineral. The only large-scale producer and exporter of iron ore, practically all of which goes to Japan, is an American company. The Haussermann gold mines, with a paid-up capital of $5,600,000 reported net profits of $6,850,000 for 1935. Far from tending to make the Islands self-sufficient, the growth of the industry is increasing the American stake.

Copra and its products are important export items, but even more than sugar they are in the hands of Americans. The entire cocoanut-oil production is controlled by American and some British capital; the dessicated-cocoanut sector of the industry is also entirely in foreign hands. There is not a single Filipino company in the entire cocoanut-processing industry.

Even the production of Manila hemp, the next most important export, is hardly controlled by Filipinos. The middlemen in the industry are mostly Chinese, while the large exporters are American, British, Chinese, and Japanese. In the cordage industry half of the total investment is American, while the other half is Elizalde (Spanish). In the tobacco industry 65 per cent of the investment is Spanish (most of it Tabacalera), while the American share is 8 per cent. Embroidery is a cottage industry, but it is done entirely on American cotton textiles (20 per cent of American cotton-cloth imports is for use in this industry). In timber and lumber 45 per cent of the total investment is American, 18 per cent Filipino, and 16 per cent Chinese. Nor do Filipinos have any stake to speak of in overseas shipping.

American investments in other than export industries will be indirectly affected by the trade conference. The most important of these is the Manila Electric Company, a subsidiary of J. G. White and Company of New York, which enjoys a virtual monopoly of electric power, and the Philippine Long Distance Telephone Company, a subsidiary of the Bell Telephone; of the two railroads one is owned by an American group and the other by the government. Of the total bank resources in the Islands amounting to $140,000,000, 40 per cent is owned by the government, another 10 per cent by private Americans, 20 per cent by the Archbishop and the friar orders, and an equal amount by the British.

Even in the less important branches of the Islands' economy non-Filipinos dominate. The Chinese and, with growing persistency, the Japanese control 70 per cent of the retail trade. Filipino peasants grow the rice, but generally Chinese middlemen and wholesalers distribute the crop and collect a heavy tribute. Americans and a few old Spanish families control inter-island shipping. In bus transportation the Filipinos have made some headway, but the larger companies are in the hands of the power monopoly and other American interests. Of the two airlines, one is owned by Americans, the other by a wealthy Filipino sugar family. The largest owners of farm lands and city real estate are the Catholic church—originally a Spanish hierarchy, now largely American, Irish, and Spanish—and the Spanish friar corporations. Filipinos have grown rich only as hacienderos, sugar barons, and, a few, as government employees.

At the coming trade conference Washington will find among the Filipinos a disposition to continue trading away their national patrimony for preferential treatment of Philippine products in the American market. Prior to and during his present visit to the United States President Quezon has indicated that he favors retaining the American naval bases in the Islands while opposing any immediate steps for political neutralization of the country. The maintenance in essence of the economic status quo—either under formal independence in the style of Cuba or under commonwealth status—can be only a preliminary to the ultimate complete dependence of the Philippines upon the United States.

Aliquippa Celebrates

BY ROSE M. STEIN

Aliquippa, Pennsylvania, April 12

"WHEN I hear Wagner bill went constitutional I happy like anything. I say, good, now Aliquippa become part of United States." The speaker, Pete C——, was fired from his job in the Jones and Laughlin steel mill in Aliquippa last June. Pete figured there was something un-American about his dismissal after twenty-six years of steady and apparently satisfactory service. He thought it un-American, too, when stool pigeons turned his wife and son against him, and when company police threatened him with bodily harm if he did not quit signing up the "hunkies" for the union. He did not quit. "Hell, no!" He flashed a bunch of signed application cards in proof as he climbed into an automobile to join the parade in celebration of the Supreme Court's decision in the Jones and Laughlin case. "Joke on stool pigeon all right. Even Supreme Court say to workingman, go ahead and organize, ho, ho, ho." He laughed till the tears came.

A line of cars covered with bright signs and blowing their horns moved along Franklin Avenue, the main street of Aliquippa, whose 30,000 inhabitants are solely dependent for their livelihood upon the Jones and Laughlin mills. The traffic police gave them right of way; company police were nowhere to be seen. The first two cars bore signs reading, "We Are the Ten Men Fired for Union Activity by J. & L. We Are Ordered Back to Work by the Supreme Court." Aliquippa's business community poked heads out of doors and windows, looked, smiled, occasionally waved. There was obvious restraint. Even a phenomenal court decision cannot overnight instill courage and enthusiasm into a community accustomed to walking the chalk line. But when the cars began their climb up to the hills where the 12,000 steel workers live, they were greeted with cheers and applause. No sign of fear there, no hesitancy, no restraint. All welcomed Aliquippa's ten heroes, all greeted with enthusiasm the sign on one of the cars, "The Workers of Aliquippa Are Now Free Men."

The heroes of Aliquippa, and the number of years they worked for Jones and Laughlin before they were fired, are Royal Boyer, eleven years; Eli Bozich, eight years; Domenic Brandy, twenty-five years; Ronald Cox, fifteen years; Martin Dunn, five years; Martin Gerstner, fourteen years; George Marell, fourteen years; Harry Phillips had worked for the company off and on since before the war and had been steadily employed for three years; Angelo Razanno, eight years; Angelo Volpe, twenty-one years. All were members of the Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel, and Tin Workers at the time of their dismissal. All joined that union as soon as it was organized in the fall of 1934. Phillips, Volpe, and Gerstner were officers. The others were active in recruiting members, especially Domenic Brandy among Italians, Eli Bozich among Serbians, Royal Boyer among Negroes. All defied the management's request to vote in the 1935 company-union election. All were warned that the company "would close the plant and throw the key in the river before it would recognize an outside union," that the union was "no damned good," and that the active unionists were "on the spot." All were shadowed twenty-four hours a day. All had their homes watched. Some were beaten up.

Neither the warnings nor the terrorism were of any avail, and when the inevitable dismissals came, they were accepted with a fortitude rarely known to white-collar workers. Most of the men found work now and again on WPA jobs. One of them, Harry Phillips, became an S.W.O.C. organizer when that committee began to function last June. None earned anywhere near what their jobs in the mill had paid them. Since the board's decision calls for payment to them by the company "of a sum equal to that which each would normally have earned as wages," less amounts earned during that period on other jobs, the ten men are scheduled to receive by way of back pay what to them is equivalent to a fortune. In some instances it will amount to more than $1,000.

Behind the comparatively simple story of the ten men who lost their jobs for union activity, and who are now celebrating their restoration with back pay, lies a long chain of circumstances the significance of which cannot be fully measured or even realized. There are at least seventy more discharged men in the Jones and Laughlin plants alone whose claims have either been filed with the Labor Board and held in abeyance pending the court's decision or are being filed now. There are several hundred such cases throughout the steel industry. In all industry the cases will probably run into thousands. The restoration of each job gives labor a sense of power, dignity, and self-importance. With but few exceptions the fired men became the most active union workers. Twenty-five became full-time organizers. Most of the fired men will go back to their mill jobs if given the opportunity. They will go back with a great deal of experience in labor organization, and it is safe to predict that before long they will become union officers and grievance-committee representatives. Unwittingly industry helped the union drive by sending some of the best workers into it.

Managers and straw bosses who did the firing will find it very difficult to negotiate grievances with these men, and since promiscuous firing is now forbidden, some of the bosses will have to go. Something in the nature of an exodus has already begun, and bosses of a more liberal turn of mind are being installed. One of Jones and Laughlin's vice-presidents in charge of the terroristic activities in Aliquippa has lost his job. He did not make good. Rumor has it that others will follow, including the heads of the company's private police force. All this was brought about by the Wagner bill, mused Pete as he settled himself in the back seat of the car. "Wagner bill sure gonna do lots for workingman. Maybe you can send me Wagner bill?" he asked. "I wanna see what him like."

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

TO TELL the truth about Henry Ford one has to be a bit brutal. It is not a rare phenomenon in American life for tremendous financial and business success to come to a man because of a single discovery, or because of knowledge along a single line. Plenty have struck it rich by an invention, or by finding a mine, or by genuine talent in making money through one operation or in one kind of enterprise. I have met many such, only to find that when one got them out of their field they were among the stupidest and worst-informed of men—narrow, intolerant, utterly prejudiced. Henry Ford is one of them. His chief trouble is lack of education. He is perhaps the richest man in the United States, and therefore the press constantly quotes him as if his opinions were worth while, and business men gape at him because of his success in piling up millions.

Now I have met Mr. Ford on a very few occasions, but when I have, as in connection with his peace ship, I have been struck by the incredible limitations of his mind. I knew he was of humble origin, just as I knew he had had the genius and inspiration to see that the man who utilized the gas engine to displace the horse and buggy would render a great service to his countrymen. I don't believe he did else than stumble into mass production, and it will always remain a question how much of his success was due to the late Senator James Couzens and the Dodge brothers and his other early associates. But I have met plenty of other men in various walks of life who started where Ford did and became good mechanics and shop foremen and somewhat successful, out of whose society I have got a great deal. They had a certain homely wisdom and understanding which was, I have always felt, the basis for Lincoln's faith in the plain people. I have found them shrewd and often able to go to the roots of some national or international problem much more quickly and directly than many highly educated, sophisticated people. I have learned from them, admired them, and been happy to be with them.

Mr. Ford's colossal ignorance and cocksureness on so many questions have always deeply repelled me. I was with him when he coined the slogan: "We'll get the boys out of the trenches by Christmas." As he first enunciated this it read: "Get the boys home by Christmas!" I pointed out to him that he had chartered one of the slowest liners on the ocean, that he would not sail until December 9 or arrive until December 20, and that if he got the nations to agree to peace the day he arrived, the ten million in the trenches could not possibly be sent home under weeks and weeks. So he changed the slogan to the historic line. But his reaction showed that he had in such matters only the mind of an immature child.

Years afterwards I interviewed him for a press association on the tariff and other issues and found myself utterly baffled by his basic ignorance, which, however, never prevented his expressing his childish views.

I have retold this story because it seems to me essential that the public should not be misled by the stuff and nonsense Ford is now talking in regard to labor. The public ought to know how untrustworthy, because ignorant and quite unworldly, are his views on anything outside of automobile production. "But is not the handling of labor one of the great successes of his life?" I hear someone ask. By no means. Despite the five-dollar-a-day wage, he has been one of the worst and most unsocial of our great employers. His factory "belts" have often been belts of torture—read in the April Atlantic what one worker has to tell of this dreadful slavery. He has done extremely cruel things not only to his labor but even to his executives. If you doubt that, read the Reverend Samuel S. Marquis's amazing book, "Henry Ford, an Interpretation" (Little, Brown and Company, 1923). After you have put that down you will understand why his plants are protected by barbed (some say electrified) wire; why he has an all-dominating private police ready to shoot, as in 1931, and spies to betray his laboring men. Dr. Marquis was for years Ford's personal adviser in religious and philanthropic matters. While he gives Ford credit for doing a lot for the welfare of his employees, he convicts him in specific cases of absolute injustice, failure to keep his word, and almost sadistic conduct toward men he has decided to hate and discharge.

It is a sorry subject, but here are the facts and they are vital to an understanding of the man in view of the gravity of the problems which his recalcitrance poses. Well, perhaps the Supreme Court's making the Wagner Labor Act the law of the land may have hit him between the eyes sufficiently hard to enable him to understand that when he says he will have no union in his factories he is going counter to the power and the authority of the United States government. Probably when he told the press he would never, never recognize any union, he had never heard of the Wagner Act; or if he had heard, his mind had not registered the fact. Now we shall see whether he is going to be a loyal American and accept the law of the land, or whether, from conscientious scruples or stubbornness of mind, he is going to violate it and pay the penalty the courts will demand. The answer will come in due course. Surely his son and his lawyers will prevail upon this untrained mind, which so often seems as destitute of reasoning power as of factual knowledge, to do the right thing and end the shameful servitude of his workers to his own arbitrary will.

BROUN'S PAGE

A Morris Dance

EVERYBODY told Morris he'd get fired. Years ago, that is, at least three or four, when the Newspaper Guild had its first convention in Washington, all the correspondents said, "No wire service will stand for a man who organizes." I remember that at that convention we had invited General Johnson to come around to a luncheon and make a speech. Morris Watson insisted that he wanted to hand the General a petition just as he got up to make his address. He was going to ask the chief keeper of the Blue Eagle to do something about wire-service men. They didn't get any benefits from the code such as it was. Nobody had much concern for them except Morris Watson. And he was almost a nuisance at times with his petitions and what not.

"General Johnson's our guest," I said, "and you want to stick a petition in front of him the minute he sits down to eat his lunch."

"To hell with his lunch," said Morris Watson; "we've got to do something about the press associations."

"Well," I argued with him, "in addition to everything else you'll get fired. All the Washington reporters say you'll get fired. And they're always right about things."

"So what?" asked Morris Watson.

"Just this. They don't say you'll get fired today or tomorrow. The guess is that it will happen presently, and quietly of course. But if you stand up there in front of the whole crowd and badger General Johnson with that petition you've been carrying around all morning, then you'll certainly get in trouble. You'll be sticking your neck out."

"Don't be silly," said Morris. "I've got my neck out part of the way already. I figure that if you're going to stick your neck out you might as well stick it out all the way. Then if you do get the ax, it won't just rip the top of your head off. It will do the trick more quickly and painlessly."

And so Morris Watson thrust his petition under the nose of General Johnson, and that got written up in all the newspapers, and eventually Watson did get fired. His head was chopped off and now it's been glued back again. And as I see it Watson is a happier man. I can't say he's wiser, because he was wise from the beginning. Naturally he had courage, but it wasn't in any sense that crazy kind of courage which makes a man want to go out and martyrize himself for the thrill and the excitement. All the time Watson was thinking of what would be good for the Guild. And he was right in his assumption that if he made his position as an organizer perfectly plain he was really in a stronger spot than acting under cover. It took them quite a while to fire him. The whole thing was very well timed as far as the Guild was concerned.

I'm not recommending legal action as anything like the perfect remedy for a labor organization. It took eighteen months between the original incident and the favorable decision in the Supreme Court. And in addition there was the risk. After all, the final score was five to four. A year and a half is a long chunk to take out of the career of a newspaperman. Morris Watson did get a job which was interesting, and that was a break. At the time he got fired he didn't have the slightest notion of what he was going to do next. He knew and we all knew that no newspaper would find him "available."

During the long interval we used to talk sometimes and reminisce. We had both been at one of the very early preliminary meetings of the Guild when nine or ten gathered together in the living-room of a little flat. "My golly, Morris," I used to say. "Back in those days I never dreamed that you were going to be Dred Scott and that the Newspaper Guild would be right up there in the big marble barn on top of the hill where the nine men sit. But there we are and even more there you are. And may God have mercy on your soul."

It looks as though He did, but Morris Ernst helped a lot. The Lord may have supplied the good intent, but it was Ernst who attended to the legal details. You see a case before the Supreme Court of the United States is a little like winning a heavy-weight boxing championship. You may be managing a promising contender but you can't chuck him into the big ring right away. He must go out and lick a whole lot of guys on the way up before he gets his crack at the championship. Some of these heavy-weights in the lower courts may be palookas, but any judge at all can ruin your man if he happens to swing from the floor and land a right hand on the point of the jaw. There certainly were occasions on the way up when both the Morrisses had reason to worry. There was one federal judge, for instance, who said that economics had no place in a court of law.

And then at the very end there was John W. Davis, rich in reputation and prestige, standing before nine men not all of whom are liberal. And he raised that old wolf cry of the freedom of the press. He did it with dramatic gestures. He shook his silver thatch and said in the tones of one about to play Hamlet rather badly, "And now we come to the freedom of the press."

John W. Davis was just coming to it and from the outside at that. Morris Watson had been looking for that freedom all his life. His search had taken him right out of his job. And the Guild and he were making the battle to give reporters the right to be free men in a free craft. And so Morris Watson becomes the man who came back and not on his shield but with it. They've been good fighters, the two Morrisses, and I don't see how anybody can deny that they deserve their victory.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

"COMMUNION WITH HER VISIBLE FORMS"

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WHAT has interested me most in the books of Donald Culross Peattie is an attitude toward the world of nature recognizably individual and unmistakably modern. No pantheist ever had a completer sense of oneness with all created things, but that sense is accompanied by a detailed knowledge of the actual ways of life which many pantheists have actively avoided for the simple reason that it so obviously put them out. The Wordsworthian has a horror of those who "peep and botanize." He feels closer to mountains and sunsets than to elephants or salamanders because what he really feels close to is himself and his own sensibility as it is projected upon insensate things. He is, indeed, even likely to fear that the red claw—and cloven hoof—which the Victorian was horrified to discover put an end to all that; and he is prone to take refuge in something pleasantly innocuous like the mathematical God of certain modern physicists, which enables him once again to get away from actual nature in the paradoxical sense that Wordsworth may be said to have got away from it when he mistook his aesthetic pleasure in setting suns for a mystical penetration into ultimate reality.

But the oneness which Mr. Peattie celebrates is, if I may put it this way, protoplasmic rather than spiritual. All living things are literally and materially one by virtue of that colloidal aggregate out of which all are built up. Theirs is the fellowship of a great common adventure which began no one knows when or how and will end no one knows when or in what.

It is precisely because his latest book* has less of the trained naturalist's knowledge in it that it seems to me the weakest of the series. "Green Laurels" was ostensibly a history of the great naturalists and of the different aspects of natural knowledge to which different epochs devoted attention. "An Almanac for Moderns"—to which "A Book of Hours" is a kind of pendant—was based pretty closely upon mental and emotional reactions to specific scientific facts about living things. But the new book is far less continuously the book of a naturalist. It is a series of meditations, one for each hour of the twenty-four, and there are references, of course, to natural phenomena. But the tone and substance seem to me far more conventionally literary and to that extent far less original or individual. Some of the passages are fine, but there is a tendency to the cultivation of the purple patch, and it is a relatively rare phrase which stands out of a generally too mellifluous context. A reference to girl workers hurrying to lunch and "clothed in all their salaries" is one. Another good passage is a little dissertation on pockets from which I shall quote:

Men rejoice in pockets, and by what a man fills them with before he sets out on the day's adventure shall you know him. The doctor slips his stethoscope into his coat. The thief drops his skeleton key into his trousers. The man with the failing heart puts strychnine in his vest. . . . Knives from caveman days have pointed what emergencies a fellow expects to meet. Various they betray the clerk with the forest of pencils to be sharpened, the hunter, the angler, the idle whittler, the nobleman, the king's assassin. The naturalist pockets a lens, or binoculars. Last, almost all of us put in something to barter or give away. Tobacco is social money inherited from savages. A horseman stows sugar about him. You may carry beads for the natives or seeds for the birds. I take bribes for children, that they will go away and let me pretend to work.

But all too often things seem pumped up, and the author is obviously in need of a subject.

Having said that much, I am going to be impudent enough to suggest one. What I should like to see Mr. Peattie attempt is a sort of history of the love of nature, which has been, I am sure, as complicated as the history of sex love and characterized by its own romantic and mystical and common-sense epochs. There exist of course treatises on the philosophical idea of nature as well as studies of the attitudes of various poets. There is even a Columbia dissertation on the attitude toward animals in the seventeenth century. But I know of nothing very close to what I have in mind, and perhaps I can suggest what that is by comparing quotations.

Take, for example, two sentences attributed to Augustine: "He created Angels in Heaven and worms in the Earth; and he did not show himself superior in the one nor inferior in the other. For if no other hand could have created Angels, neither could any other create worms." In a way that sounds quaint and remote, but if one allows for the theological language and considers only the attitude, it is actually much closer to the feeling of Peattie than the complacency of another bit from the once fabulously popular clerical naturalist, the Reverend John Wood: "The Study of Entymology is one of the most fascinating of pursuits. . . . It lays open before us another world of which we have been hitherto unconscious and shows us that the tiniest insect . . . has its work to do in the world and does it." That is not merely priggishly moralistic where Augustine is ecstatic, and utilitarian where he is reverent. It is also grossly homocentric; so that a whole volume of history lies between Augustine and the Reverend John Wood and another whole

* "A Book of Hours." By Donald Culross Peattie. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.50.

By Robert S. and Helen Merrell Lynd

MIDDLETOWN IN TRANSITION

What has happened in Middletown in the ten eventful years since the Lynds made its name famous—and what lies ahead? That first famous book, it now appears, set the stage for the action, the conflicts, the new developments revealed here. For here are remarkable new findings about the American way of life since 1925. A book as absorbing as it is important, because its absorbing topic is ourselves. $5.00

Virginia Woolf's New Novel THE YEARS

The novel which shows Mrs. Woolf at the height of her powers. "Rich and lovely with the poetry of life. . . . There is everywhere, on one lovely page after another, a kind of writing which reveals a kind of feeling that is more illuminating than a dozen well-made and documented novels."—Peter Monro Jack, N. Y. Times.

4th printing, $2.50

Sixteen foreign correspondents gather together in a book which catches completely the spirit of their exciting calling

WE COVER THE WORLD

Edited by Eugene Lyons. James A. Mills, Karl von Wiegand, Webb Miller, Negley Farson, Linton Wells, Mary Knight, Frazier Hunt, Frank H. Hedges, Randall Gould, Jack Starr-Hunt, William H. Chamberlin, J. B. Wood, H. R. Ekins, George Seldes, Hallett Abend—they all have stories to tell about how they got their information, how they scooped their colleagues, duped the censors. Here for the first time between the covers of one book they are talking freely about the job they're doing—a factual, bold, intimate book that introduces you to the best informed group of commentators you could meet. $3.00

THE LETTERS OF LENIN

Translated and edited by Elizabeth Hill and Doris Mudie. A large selection of Lenin's correspondence brought together in one volume in English for the first time.

$4.00

BROTHERS OF LIGHT

by Alice Corbin Henderson. A sympathetic study of the Penitentes of the Southwest, and the primitive Passion Play enacted each year. Illustrated by William Penhallow Henderson.

$2.50

LIVING IN TOKYO

by Katharine Sansom. A clear, intimate picture of the daily life of the Japanese city by an intelligent and sensitive friend of the Japanese people. Beautifully illustrated in color by Marjorie Nishiwaki.

$5.00

MODERN BUILDING

by Walter Curt Behrendt. "This book distinguishes itself from the numerous books about modern architecture that have been written during the last ten years because it is both compact and authoritative. It traces the movement back to its origins, with equal emphasis on both Europe and America, and relates the task of architecture today to the fundamental social problems."

—LEWIS MUMFORD.

Illustrated. $3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY

383 MADISON AVENUE,

NEW YORK

volume between the Reverend Mr. Wood and something in Mr. Peattie much closer to the attitude of Augustine.

Or take the case of Dr. Thomas Arnold, who, so Lytton Strachey informs me, found Wordsworth's susceptibility to the meanest flower that blows "morbid." "Life," he said, "is not long enough to take such intense interest in objects in themselves so little"; and the objection would doubtless have held, a fortiori, against Augustine's concern with worms, if not, indeed, against God's waste of His time in creating them. But this was not all. "The whole subject of the brute creation is to me one of such painful mystery that I dare not approach it." Presumably what shocked Dr. Arnold was the absence in brutes of that "sense of moral evil" to which he attached so much importance. They could sin without suffering even the pangs of conscience by way of retribution. But is not that exactly the fact which moved Whitman to such envious admiration for the animals, who did not make him sick "discussing their duty to God"? "Not one is respectable or unhappy over the whole earth." I doubt if men have loved or hated women for more different reasons or in more different ways.

Happenings After Death

BY ROSS PIERCE

I

We have spent years in ruling and scribing and painting
a page
To catch a glimmer of divine rage
And carved green peaks and strange lotus flowers on pieces of moonlight jade Far drawn by ponderous caravans serpentining out in long parade
Back into and across the infinite snows of the lands beyond Scheherezade
And leaped to brawny toil to song and to spade
And have seen those who produced copy by the cart,
To their own and everybody's hurt,
And stood by tables in factories till our bones would crack
And behind counters in stores till our spirits were stretched on the rack
Of time seeing the permanent display in the counters' track
Day after day, stack after stack
Till we have run where the guns boom back
And tripped on the wrecked roads over remnants of bodies whose incrusts flesh burned black.
And seen the unicorn
When the broad moon rides level with the morn
And all the glistening country side reechoed to the echoing horn
And then the ribbon of concrete the seam of steel warms, Down which pass the disaster and damnation of the zooming locust swarms:
The blustering engines shriek out and the mills blast their iron yields—
The decorations of the fields.

And the mahogany and the ebony and the ferny solitudes
Where only the snowy silent summit obtrudes
And the stab of chimney stack and howling sign bloods,
Sordid smudge factory suffocating hoods—
The graveyards of the woods.

II

And we have lifted our heads even as the lilies of the fields and praised the Almighty until of Him we were a part,
Found Him even in the high heaven of the human heart
And have come to look on God as an old heirloom to be got out and handed around on stark wintry nights
When it is too cold to go out and see the sights.
We have scorned the spirit that was to be
And the bright garment of immortality
And let lechery tingle to the tips of our fingers and our toes
And gloried in all that goes.
Shouted after saints
Down streets of yellow noon when the spirit faints
And mocked with ministers who thought themselves on a perch
Because they went to church—
And we know how the tiger goes
And the cormorant slows
Before the long white silence of the snows.

III

We have known lands where princes were able To go away for years and come back and find things as credible
And lands where the legislature could not turn out laws fast enough
As if the legislature were afraid by next year the people would say they were old stuff,
And by next year the people did say they were old stuff.
We have partaken of such voluminous viands
On the purple-veined sands
By the blue sea strands
And we have snatched for the rank seaweed that strews the shore where floated and bobbed up and down the wreck
And seen ourselves as the nightmare with streaming black hair and the ghost that walked.
Been swift as the winds, tall as the sky, broad as earth and deep as the sea
Towering to infinity
And we have been small as a rat's hole and lacked control and gone into ulterior parts
And considered the hurts.

IV

We have seen one borne off the stage as a soldier to the cannon's boom
And the wealthy on the stage and the rabble in the pit were amazed and sat hushed—and rose up and stamped and clapped and shouted for the glory of it long after in the purpling gloom
In one small north arc of the planet that shall sound till the trumpet of doom

And we have seen one vanish into the house of hell forever
 And with everything outside communication sever
 To rot and rust
 In the bitter sweet of despair and tart licorice lust—
 And departure of all sense of the fine and the fair and the just.
 And we have seen a philosopher standing out on the horizon whose face shone like a star afar

V

And we have seen Phosphor holding aloft his azure taper in the still misty eastern sky, for sailors to steer by
 And we have seen Hesperus put up her silver candle in the wide window of the west
 And none none at all came home to their rest
 And none none at all found aught on their quest,
 Only the ocean sweeps in and recedes, sweeps in and recedes again down the long dark curving beaches in a perpetual unrest.
 And we have sped the white horses of the dawn far out over the gleaming heavenly vault,
 In titanic tumult
 Out where the broad bright clouds do glorious exult
 And we have stood in the subway to see it vanishing down the long, staked tunnel flinging its flickering red spark Rocketing through the unresponsive dark . . .

And shall I speak of happenings after death
 Of the stricken breath
 Of the unseen power
 Casual at the breaking of a flower
 Of the wind that blows
 Holding the secret of a world beyond the snows?

BOOKS

The Lower Depths

RAINBOW FISH. By Ralph Bates. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

THE prologue of Mr. Bates's new novel offers us three washed-up bodies carried in from the breakwater rocks of the Greek island of Skarpa. Captain Wells, whose ship has just been honestly wrecked on that coast with the loss of four men, fails to identify them. But the Greek harbor master presently recognizes them as part of a sponge-diving gang of seven: "rascals, misters, no good, dear officers, one of them has be stabbed, oh, very bad rascals, thieves, murderers!" The captain, the harbor master, the pilot, the consul, and the other officials thereupon turn indifferently from the bodies to the more important business of manifests, bills of lading, and insurance claims.

Rascals they were, by any of the usual standards, this gang of sponge divers, whose stories, up to the disaster in which they were drowned, are told in the following pages. By crooked ways each of the seven had come to this last job of the socially outcast—diving for sponges for which the company paid them one-fifteenth of the wholesale price on Skarpa market. One of them is an English captain, Skinner, who had been engaged in a wrecking racket to swindle insurance companies, which finally brought him to grief. Another, Freeth, ex-soldier, ex-mechanic, ex-member of a touring theatrical company, has behind him the memory of a sudden murder in a dingy bedroom at Marseille. A third, Legge, an English writer tormented by failure, has had several unfortunate experiences with his mistresses, who have a way of dying on his hands and leaving him socially discredited and conscience-stricken, though not criminally liable. O'Phelan, the Irishman, is full of tales of his exploits as a member of the Irish Republican Army, but is suspected by his mates of having never been nearer Ireland than the slums of Liverpool. Weisendonck, the London Jew, has succumbed too often to the temptation of dubious get-rich-quick schemes. Malatesta, member of the Mafia, has had to escape from Sicily, abandoning violence to the organized government monopoly. And of Phil, the little Albanian, we know nothing except that he is always packing up to go home to his mountains, but never goes. Within the gang are sympathies and antagonisms: a reluctant cooperation between Freeth and Skinner, who know all about each other; a more friendly understanding between Legge and Weisendonck, for Legge is capable of honest thinking and the Jew of honest feeling. Whose were the three washed-up bodies? It really doesn't matter, though we have learned who the stabbed one is by the time we have finished the book. All were undoubtedly lost in the storm that made the battered yacht, taking them to a new diving field, spring a whole line of rivets on the port bow.

Why should we care whether such "rascals, no good," were drowned or not? They remind one of the derelicts in Gorki's "Lower Depths"; even the dreams two or three of them cherish of a new life have become as hopelessly unrealizable as those of Gorki's outcasts in the night lodging-house. Had they ever been worth saving? The answer is clear enough in the case of Freeth, whose story is the most complete. It is a biography developed by brevities of statement, flash-backs, glimpses; but it compasses boyhood, family relationships, emotional and intellectual growth, pressure of the economic and social system. It puts into our hands all the clues to the understanding of temperament and molding circumstance that we need—if we are willing to work a little. We must pause over an image, a half-told incident, a fragmentary scene, a repeated reverie pattern, and search out the implications and connections. If we do, we see precisely where Freeth was thwarted, how innocently his neurotic escape technique of a double life began, how stealthily his habit of violence grew upon him, which were the decisive moments when adjustment and fulfilment might have taken place. In presenting only the essentials this is as fine a character study as any in recent fiction. It is one of the richest harvests of the new techniques and the new understandings we ascribe roughly to the pioneer work of Joyce and Freud. Fifteen years ago Virginia Woolf, convinced that the old tools no longer did the work of the novelist, urged us as readers, while experimentation with new tools was going on, to tolerate the spasmodic, the obscure, the fragmentary, the failure in a good cause. With such work as this of Ralph Bates before us, we no longer need to tolerate. We can rejoice in an achieved mastery.

It is the early promise of Bobby Freeth, the boy in the organ loft and the library, which convinces us that he had been worth saving. It is the final achievement of Captain Skinner that makes us regret his death. In his long struggle to hold the ship against the storm in the treacherous channels among the rocky islands, he wins back his integrity as a seaman. These two are the striking examples. But in his concern to understand these outcasts, stressing in each one certain traits, certain ways of thought and feeling, certain balked possibilities, never sinking into conventional and sentimental interpretation, Bates is making as striking a revolutionary affirmation of human values as Gorki did—though he is not explicit (and oratorical) about it, as Gorki often was. Like Gorki, Bates, as "Lean Men," "The Olive Field," and this novel all demonstrate, knows his proletarian, his peasant, his ex-men. Like Gorki, in the ways suitable to the contemporary phase of a long struggle, he brings his faith to the test of action on the revolutionary front, and offers us the exciting spectacle of the integrated activity of man and artist. The nearest approach to explicit statement of revolutionary faith is placed in the mouth of Legge, who once dives very deep and almost dies of it, but is led by that experience to face the fears that have made him timid, evasive, insincere. He faces less personal fears as well. "I used to feel how miserable human life is. We've come all the way, yes, that's it, out of the first idiocy or out of matter, out of the depths of the sea if you like, and all we can do is to quarrel and scratch in the dirt . . . knock together tables like that or sweat grease and drink a bottle empty and light a penny candle against the darkness. . . . Yet I feel we could be anything because we have got out of the depths." "I understand what you mean," replies Weisendonck, "about life being all canteen tables and candle stumps, but we could make something of life. . . . We've got to plan for it, make a new social order." Irony—in the mouth of Weisendonck, the outcast? No more than in the mouth of Satine, the tramp, in Gorki's play. Rather a challenge and a faith.

"The rainbow fish swam across the reef . . . the school streamed over in arrow formation, blue and red and yellow and silver, flashing between their legs and arms; they slid between Freeth's fingers as he grasped at a sponge. He saw them stream down O'Phelan's back, right in the center, over his spine; then the arrow burst into a cloud of flashing prisms." Later O'Phelan ponders: "Say, Bob, do you know what them bloody fish was like? I had a bag of glass marbles when I was a kid, with colored stripes in 'em."

Men: creatures who may become as diversely beautiful, as swift and sure and harmonious as rainbow fish in the corner of the universe that is their element? Or marbles, counters in some purposeless game of chance in the gutter?

DOROTHY BREWSTER

Variations on a Theme

THE YEARS. By Virginia Woolf. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

BY THIS time so little that is fundamental remains to be said of the merits or limitations of Mrs. Woolf's narrative method that a review of her new novel, which is a reshuffling of elements already familiar to all readers of her work, is doomed to the same sort of repetitiousness from which that work itself has for some time suffered. Her admirers, writing in a style too suspiciously like her own to be altogether convincing, will revive the phrases about the beauty and the distinction and the ultimate truth to life of everything that Mrs. Woolf has written. And a few others, still disturbed by the persistence of these claims, will take the trouble to point out that each of them is capable of a little more exact definition—particularly the reference to the truth about life. They will doubtless protest that what we probably get in these distinguished novels is not so much life as a special vision of a special kind of life—a vision, moreover, that has been largely created, nurtured, and corroborated by the conditions of this life. "We receive but what we give," in Coleridge's well-known formula; and if Mrs. Woolf's impression of the years is what it is, it may be only because she has superimposed on them an impression that was, in the first place, the kind of impression that the Ramsays, the Pargiters, and the rest were forced to draw from their own experience. From this maddening shuttle of cause and effect, this rankest of determinisms, we are never released through that vigorous act of imagination by which the writer attempts to transcend the limiting conditions of his materials: the deep voice of Coleridge mumbling of the fusion of "*sum*ject" and "*oom*ject" is stilled like everything else by the resounding waters of time. So also in the set pieces of beautiful writing—precisely distributed here at the beginning of each of those divisions by which the immeasurable is arbitrarily measured—what we get thrown back at us, in this charming evocation of a summer day, this clever impersonation of a March wind, are images and words and phrases so hoarily incrusting in the characters' collective consciousness that nothing really fresh is added to our perception. And it is undoubtedly the total effect of language of this sort that is referred to by the somewhat vague term distinction. It is now apparent that final evaluation of Mrs. Woolf's work must revolve monotonously around the question of the experience and the attitude toward experience of her typical characters. This is a standard imposed by her faithful refusal to oppose any attitude of her own by which we can measure them within the perspective of her work. And it is, needless to say, a standard that cannot be very successfully applied beyond a certain point. Either these people will be found to glow with a still potent charm of well-bred sensitivity or they will emit a most unpleasant smell as of something already quite dead and decayed.

All that is perhaps necessary in this review, therefore, is to consider the reshuffling that has taken place in the light of its possible consequences on the theme. For the book is of course another celebration of the flux, another slow passage down the most traversed river in modern fiction, another extended prose gloss on Eheu fugaces, anni labuntur. But where in "Jacob's Room" and "Orlando" the theme was rendered in terms of a single individual, and where in "Mrs. Dalloway" and "To the Lighthouse" the period covered was relatively short, we have here a chronicle of a whole typical middle-class English family, with their accumulating host of relatives and friends, from 1880 to the present. Such distinctions should not, however, be stressed too much; for in "The Waves" also Mrs. Woolf was concerned with tracing the destinies of a group of people over the whole course of their lives. The great difference would be that for the first time she is trying to maintain something like a balance between the outer and the inner reality, between the public and the personal, between the mechanical ticking of Big Ben and the sound of time's passing in the mind's ear. In this effort she has returned somewhat to the form and style of her very earliest novels; she has adopted a simple chronological order; and she has practically put a stop to the direction which reached its climax in "The Waves."

The most immediate changes to be observed will be in fact the reduction of those prolonged subjective improvisations that have been so much admired in all Mrs. Woolf's more recent novels. From another point of view of course, this shift to a neater, more rapid, less mannered style will be welcomed. It promises, at least at the beginning, a corresponding modification of other important things—most notably the conception of human character as little more than a highly sensitized instrument for registering impressions. But this is unfortunately a promise that recedes in exact proportion to the characters' uniform failure, through the unfolding years, to exhibit anything resembling moral progress. Time goes on and on, but the Edwards, the Delias, the Eleanors, and the Kittys retain the same niceties, the same frustrations, the same terror of existence with which they began. All suffer from a malady of will that makes them as inappropriate to the purposes of fiction as to the bustle and dirt of the London street.

Of all the symbolical scenes in the book none is more symbolical than the one in which a member of the Pargiter clan, looking out from the tastefully furnished room in the slums which she shares with her sister, is made to exclaim: "In time to come . . . people, looking into this room—this cave, this little antre, scooped out of mud and dung, will hold their fingers to their noses"—she held her fingers to her nose—"and say, 'Pah! They stink!'" With characters possessing such a view of themselves, Mrs. Woolf is hardly able to do very much that she has not already done, with consummate perfection, in the past. The present book merely throws into new relief the fact that no expansion of scale, no experimentation with method can lend meaning and significance where neither is implicit in the experience. It seems more than ever unlikely that Mrs. Woolf's talents, which are considerable in so many different departments of fiction, will develop to their full measure while she persists in limiting herself to purely formal variations on the same old dirge-like tune.

WILLIAM TROY

American Microcosm

MIDDLETOWN IN TRANSITION. By Robert S. Lynd and Helen Merrell Lynd. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

EVERY student of man seeks those "laboratory situations" which, through some quirk of history, resemble to a degree the finely drawn controls of his fellows who work with the lower animals, plants, or inanimate matter. Such situations are found only occasionally; even more seldom is one permitted to reexamine his own materials after a lapse of time to see what has occurred in the interim. Ivanovsky, a Russian student of human physical form who measured White Russians before the Great War and later through subsequent measurements was able to record the shocking effects of starvation resulting from the cordon sanitaire drawn about Russia after the peace of Versailles, was one of these; Boas, retesting his hypothesis of the effect of their new environment on immigrants to the United States a generation after he had made his original investigation, is another. The Lynds have been placed in a similar fortunate position and, like these others, have made the most of their opportunity.

Their new description of life in Middletown, though it stands on its own feet and can be read without too much reference to its predecessor, must inevitably be compared with their earlier work. The striking difference between the two books is the sureness of this later attack. In their earlier volume, which was perhaps handicapped by too much preliminary acclaim because of its supposed application to an American city of the techniques developed in the study of primitive cultures, one was impressed with the thesis-like nature of the treatment, with which went an attempt at "impartiality" often made by those whose experience in research has not been sufficient to teach them that the surest impartiality is found in the work of one who knows his biases and faces them openly. These objections do not apply to the present volume, which shows a tremendous growth on the part of the authors. Their material is not so heavily weighted with irrelevant statistical data; there is a greater realization and a much finer treatment of the subtleties of culture; and there is assurance in departing from well-trodden paths that only comes with maturity and tested control of technique.

The preface and first chapter tell how Mr. Lynd with his five assistants went back to "Middletown" in June, 1935, for a "brief . . . restudy" of his original material, and how "what was to have been an exciting summer interlude . . . turned into an intensive analysis of more than a year" and resulted in a book larger than its predecessor. After this introduction the authors move at once to their data with a chapter on the economic background. Here is told what happened to the businesses of Middletown, its manufacturing enterprises, and its workers in the years of boom and depression; in what terms the consumer was assessed, how the business group controlled the labor situation, and what happened to that universal opportunity to "get on" that is acclaimed as the American heritage. The next chapter, a case-study of the powerful "X" family, shows, far better than more extended and elaborate researches can perhaps show, how the concentration of wealth affects the lives of the members of a community as this octopus steadily extends its tentacles.

Next we come to various other segments of Middletown life. The chapter on relief, both in its placing and length, demonstrates how important "caring for the unable" has become in recent years. The chapter on the changes that have taken place in home life includes a classification of occupations followed by Middletown women of the "business class," and the relative degree of acceptance of these occupations by the members of that class, that is one of the shrewdest appraisals of the "social" aspects of American small-city life to be found anywhere. Other chapters deal with education, religion (of pathetic shortness, as befits religion's place in Middletown's real interests), government, the press, and sanitation. In these chapters can be seen the patterns of use and abuse we find in most American cities. If the degree to which behavior associated with the "flapper age" characterizes Middletown's younger set of today comes as a surprise, the venality of government and the courts, and the distaste of the medical profession for whatever might tend to invade its vested interests are anything but startling.

The book ends with two revealing chapters and as many statistical tables as are needed adequately to document the text. The chapter entitled The Middletown Spirit is noteworthy for its freshness of approach in summarizing a social setting; the final discussion, Middletown Faces Both Ways, analyzes with unusual keenness the motivations underlying the life that has been objectively recorded. Especially important here are the account of how socio-economic classes are in process of formation in this midland city where democracy is a fundamental tenet, and the discussion of Middletown's attitude toward fascism and communism.

AN IMPRESSIVE NEW NOVEL BY THE BRILLIANT AUTHOR OF "THE OLIVE FIELD"

RAINBOW FISH

By RALPH BATES

"Ralph Bates is indisputably the first novelist of major equipment to come out of England since the war, and RAINBOW FISH is a compelling and brilliantly written story."—Alfred Kazin, New York Times Book Review.

"It is a rank injustice that the name of Ralph Bates is not as well known as that of Charles Morgan or J. B. Priestley or even Margaret Mitchell. He seems to me to be one of the few living novelists of rank. I say flatly and dogmatically that RAINBOW FISH is, in its genre, a masterpiece. If there is a man alive who can write a better story than this, he had better hurry up and write it. For story qua story, for excitement, character analysis, local color and sheer brilliance of style—well, Conrad rarely did better, and that also goes for Maugham, Hemingway, McFee, Virginia Woolf, Tomlinson and the rest."—Ralph Thompson, New York Times. ($2.00)

FLOWERING of New England

By VAN WYCK BROOKS

- (1) Enthusiastically recommended by America's most distinguished critics.
- (2) On every national Best-Seller list.
- (3) On every list of "The Year's Best Books."
- (4) Chosen by popular vote as "THE MOST DISTINGUISHED NON-FICTION OF THE YEAR" by the most critical body of book people in this country: the Book-sellers of America. ($4.00)

FOUNTAINS OF YOUTH

The Life of
Marie Bashkirtseff

"An absorbing biography of one of the first of those all-telling young ladies who have their cake and their diaries, too."—New York Times. A fascinating new best-seller by Dormer Creston, author of "Andromeda in Wimpole Street."

(Illustrated, $3)

by
DORMER CRESTON

DON GYPSY

Adventures with a Fiddle in Southern Spain and Barbary. "One of the best of all modern travel books."—New York Post. "Invaluable for readers seeking intelligent escape from a humdrum world."—Chicago News. By the author of the ever popular "Raggle-Taggle," etc.

(3rd Printing, $3.50)

by
WALTER STARKIE

HENRY OF NAVARRE

By MARCELLE VIOUX

Our most important non-fiction for the Spring of 1937, to be published May 12th. Out of the pages of living history comes this thrilling, romantic story of "Le Vert-Gallant," the lusty warrior king, to whom a pretty face was worth more than Paris. "A rich and highly spiced slice of History that makes far better reading than most novels . . ." with a savage background of torture chambers, inquisitors, and "fine ladies" of court with their corrupt morals.

(Illustrated, $3.50)

SHOWMAN

"A thrilling autobiography which I read in a state of continuous excitement."—William Lyon Phelps. The extraordinary autobiography of as dynamic a man and as talented a producer as America has ever seen. A story of many scenes, each full of human tragedy and comedy—an epic struggle of discouragement and dazzling success—a drama of life itself.

(Illustrated, $3)

by
WILLIAM A. BRADY

FOR READERS ONLY

An extraordinary and fascinating collection of stories concerning the reading habits of the illustrious visitors to the library of the British Museum, who include Butler, Carlyle, Swinburne, Macaulay, Dickens, Gissing, Marx, Mazzini, Lenin, Trotsky, Kropotkin, Bennet, Ghandi, etc. J. Penn is the pseudonym of Doris Mundie and Elizabeth Hill, authors of "The Letters of Lenin." (With cartoons by Low, $2.50)

by
J. PENN

E. P. DUTTON & COMPANY

300 FOURTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

"Middletown in Transition" is thus a work that should stimulate us to do the very thing that is most difficult for us or for any people to do—objectify our own existence. For the life described so well here by the Lynds is not the life of Middletown alone, it is the life of the United States; and whatever of significance there is in the story of Middletown's past ten years—the changes that have occurred, and the patterns that have withstood the onslaughts of the depression—must hold significance for an understanding of American life viewed in its wider perspective.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS

"A Long and Foolish Life"

FORTY YEARS ON MAIN STREET. By William Allen White. Compiled by Russell H. Fitzgibbon from the Columns of the Emporia Gazette. Farrar and Rinehart. $3.

OF ALL the American liberals Bill White of Emporia is the most pernicky, perverse, pernicious, and periodic. He is the most often mistaken, inconstant, inconsistent, unwise, short-sighted, percipient, emotional, banal, self-righteous, self-critical, partisan and independent, generally maddening, and altogether lovable conservative in the entire country. If anyone doesn't believe me, let him read this book, in which William Allen White will prove to him the correctness of every adjective that I have used about him and many more besides. "A long and foolish life," he terms his existence, heaven bless him! But it has been a foolishness for which men and women innumerable have loved him; which has made him an American institution, as variable as a weather vane but as serene and happy as the leadenest rooster perched on any Kansas barn; a source of infinite betting as to which side he will jump to whenever an issue comes up; a joy forever.

This very book is born, I venture to wager, out of the love of the men who work for him. He, I am sure, never suggested it. They just came to him, now the granddaddy of them all, and said: "Here, Bill, here is something we are going to do to you. Better come aboard." So come aboard he did and then redeemed this book and made it something far more worth while than a mere chronicle of his own chronicling of Main Street by adding in footnotes his own deliciously frank comments on that editorial slush of his which Mr. Fitzgibbon has picked out. Yes, slush—a lot of it, and any amount of local tittle-tattle, and then, every now and then, something to make you want to go to the nearest street corner and whoop with joy. What pride he takes in his own mistaken judgments! What other editor would have written of his editorial on "The Gaiety of War," "This is terrible, and the editorial on the next page is about as bad. I don't believe in a thing in either of them now"? What other editor would stand such a gaff (may little I be dead before anybody deadly parallels any of my miles of error!) and disarm the reader by the frankness of his confessions of guilt?

When I entered journalism as a cub reporter just out of Harvard I got called down one night by the managing editor of the Philadelphia Press for being too highfalutin. "Write it over again," he said, "in a corner-grocery style." Well, Bill White would never have earned that rebuke. He knows not only the corner grocery but the morgue, the saloon, the Y. W. C. A., the D. A. R., and all other low forms of life in Emporia and Kansas—and all the best, too. But who else could do an editorial like this?

Dr. Hiram Evans, the Imperial Wizard of the kluxes, is bringing his consecrated shirt tail to Kansas this spring, and from five gloomy klaverns will make five Kansas speeches. We welcome him. Enter the Wizard—sound the bull roarers and hewgags. Beat the tom-toms. He will see what was once a thriving and profitable hate-factory and bigotorium now laughed into a busted community; where the cock-eyed he-dragon wails for its first-born and the nightshirts of a once salubrious pageantry sag in the spring breezes and at the wobbly knees. The kluxers in Kansas are as dejected and sad as a last year's bird-nest, afflicted with general debility, dizziness on going up stairs, and general aversion to female society!

Or this utterly frank and truthful characterization of Frank Munsey:

Frank Munsey, the great publisher, is dead.

Frank Munsey contributed to the journalism of his day the talents of a meat packer, the morals of a money changer, and the manners of an undertaker. He and his kind have about succeeded in transforming a once noble profession into an 11 per cent security.

May he rest in trust!

Well, when the World War came, this liberal editor was just about as wrong as he possibly could be, as he freely confesses when he writes today that, as he looks back on the war, it "seems to be meaningless." He was carried away by Woodrow Wilson, describing him on May 1, 1917, as a "wonderful man," "a great man," of "splendid stewardship," "because of his last great note . . . mankind is considering seriously whether or not there is a God in Israel." Now he says, "How the pious wishful thinking of Woodrow Wilson did mess up the world." On February 8, 1917, Bernstorff had done "great work to preserve peace between the German and American people." Three weeks later Bernstorff "should have been put in jail for incendiary conduct"—an ambassador! Similarly he was wrong on the men who voted against the war, wrong on Debs, wrong on Sacco and Vanzetti (whom he now declares not guilty), wrong on Harding, wrong on Coolidge, and he admits all these sins. He clings only to his personal love of Theodore Roosevelt, the biggest political faker of them all, and he is the only brainy man I know of who still says a good word for Herbert Hoover, whose nomination this great liberal editor seconded; if I hadn't heard him with my own ears I couldn't have believed it.

All right. The book is well worth while if only as a hair shirt for all editors. And if I live long enough I will vote to have Bill White's bust placed in the Hall of Fame. That will be pretty tough on him, I admit, but there will be something the matter with Kansas if it doesn't have one Kansan in that mortuary. OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Sweat Shops and Cherry Blossoms

JAPAN'S FEET OF CLAY. By Freda Uteley. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

LIVING IN TOKYO. By Katharine Sansom. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

HERE are two books, both written at the same time, both by Englishwomen, both about Japan. Yet one might be about the Middle Ages and the other about the moon for all that they have in common. The country seen through the pages of "Living in Tokyo" is fresh and gay, a color-print background for gentle lives among the rice fields and the temples. But Job afflicted by boils suffered little compared to the country of "Japan's Feet of Clay," racked by every social and economic ill the state is heir to. Lady Sansom, walking among the Japanese, understands; Dr. Utley, peering at them through an economist's microscope, judges. The former loves the land and the people, while the latter is consumed with a fierce hatred for the nation and all its works.

Dr. Utley's thesis is that Japan, for all its mail-clad exterior, is being rotted away inside by poverty, starvation, cruelty, corruption, ignorance, injustice, and repression. Knowing the country's inherent instability, the author is angry that the Western world should allow itself to be intimidated by the swagger Japan puts up. So with merciless scalpel she sets out to dissect the economic and social organism of the country and demonstrate its inner decay. She analyzes the precarious and tottering balance of Japan's foreign trade, the top-heavy industrial structure, the dangerously bloated financial structure, the corrupt political system, and, worst of all, the agrarian structure which imposes on half Japan's population an existence of scraping poverty under submarginal conditions. She digs into problems of malnutrition, disease, sweated labor, denial of civil liberties, the fierce struggle for education, the burden of military service, oppression of women, police brutality, crime, torture, suicides, prostitution—nothing bad about Japan escapes her eye. It is a grim indictment, terribly true in its particulars, and supported by a stern mass of evidence.

The material Dr. Utley has gathered is much of it new and all of it important. But where she deserts facts for interpretation she weakens her case. Repeatedly she asserts as her solution for the problem of Japan that if Great Britain and the United States would agree not to trade with it, they could "destroy Japan at a stroke." Here the author goes off on a wild-goose chase. Given their present policies and economic systems, it is hardly likely that England and America would out of the blue impose what would amount to economic sanctions on Japan when they did not so much as hold up a single shipment during the Manchurian war. Apparently the author believes that the "collapse" of Japan which would be brought about by such sanctions would be followed by the cure-all of revolution. But it seems astonishingly naive of Dr. Utley, particularly in view of her orthodox Marxism, seriously to suggest that capitalist England and America should sacrifice a valuable trade for the sake of a revolution in Japan.

Again she goes astray in arguing that because the Japanese are hungry and repressed they are ipso facto "seething" with "social hatreds, revengeful passions." The rigidity with which Dr. Utley applies her economic interpretation prevents her from opening her eyes to the human side of Japan. Thus she has overlooked an inescapable fact about the Japanese which no other foreigner who has lived among them could fail to notice: that they are a happy people, happier than those of any Western nation where the so-called standard of living is higher. Hunger—which we may take as a symbol of all the miseries Dr. Utley ascribes to Japan—is a relative thing. The Japanese diet of rice, tea, soya-bean soup, and an occasional dab of fish means hunger and malnutrition to Dr. Utley, who is accustomed to bread, meat, and vegetables. But to the Japanese it means simply an everyday fact of everyday existence and no cause for "seething."

It is here that Lady Sansom's book is such a valuable corrective. Through more than twenty years' residence in Japan and the ability to speak Japanese she has come to know the Japanese people as Japanese people and not as bricks with which to build a dialectic. She captures just that quality about

This book IS "molding public opinion" . . .

WHEN THE ULTIMATE POWER — published, a few weeks ago, Ralph Thompson wrote in the N. Y. Times: "Of all the recent books dealing with the Constitution and the Supreme Court, none seems to me quite so persuasive and generally intelligible as The Ultimate Power. . . . It is the sort of book that can mold public opinion." And judging from the widespread praise and blame which the book has brought forth, it is apparent that Mr. Ernst's brilliant discussion IS influencing the American public. Here are a few representative comments:

JOHN GUNTHER, in a letter to the N. Y. Times: "I can't but believe there must be a great number of persons who, like me, are avid for just the sort of information that Mr. Ernst gives."

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE: "I have read Mr. Ernst's book with delight. I think he has done a fine job."

BURGESS MEREDITH: "I have long awaited a book containing the liberal viewpoint and I am glad that it is now published and that it is written with power and fearlessness."

HARRY HANSEN: "It has been written by an earnest student of affairs who wants the resources of democracy used."

Herald-Tribune BOOKS: "The intricacy of the constitutional questions confronting the nation can only be understood if the simple grievances of a large proportion of the population are made articulate. Mr. Ernst has stated these grievances clearly and well."

JOHN CHAMBERLAIN devotes his whole article on books in the April Scribner's to a discussion of The Ultimate Power. It is a book which no one who is seriously concerned about American affairs can afford to pass by.

THE ULTIMATE POWER

by Morris L. Ernst

$3.00 at all booksellers
DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

the Japanese which Dr. Utley misses: their infinite capacity for joy in little things, without which, no doubt, they would have had a revolution long ago. She does not work herself into a rage like Dr. Utley at the sight of a Japanese woman walking decorously three feet behind her husband and carrying his bundles. She knows that for one Baroness Ishimoto there are ten million Japanese women who feel no indignity in their traditional subservience. She knows that the rigid regimentation of Japanese social and intellectual life is not the iron prison Dr. Utley's sturdy Western soul imagines it, but the source of that sense of security which the Japanese derives from fitting his life into customs and traditions tried, polished, and perfected through the centuries. She appreciates the elegance the Japanese infuse into the crannies of their daily life, the unquarrelsomeness of their intercourse among themselves, the stoicism that tradition demands of them in the face of misfortune. "Living in Tokyo" has about it a quality of humanity which is enhanced by the decisive and delicate illustrations of Marjorie Nishiwaki, as true as they are good.

No reader, however exasperated at Japan's swagger and bluff, however angry at Japan's ruthless carving up of China, could fail to relax a little under the spell of Lady Sansom's sympathetic and easy style or to warm a little to the Japanese people. She has given us the best of the Japanese character where Dr. Utley has given us the worst of the Japanese state. Both books are one-sided, and the real Japan lies somewhere in between them. No one should venture to read either without quickly taking the other as a chaser.

BARBARA WERTHEIM

Back Alleys of Language

A DICTIONARY OF SLANG AND UNCONVENTIONAL ENGLISH. By Eric Partridge. The Macmillan Company. $12.50.

MR. PARTRIDGE'S dictionary occupies a large tract of the dark, brambly, uncivil linguistic territory that lies for the most part beyond the decent bounds of the unabridged. It is difficult terrain for any lexicographer to explore, but Mr. Partridge has been traversing it in this direction and that for many years and has finally incorporated his discoveries in a single volume, constructed on historical principles and comprehending the slang, cant, colloquialisms, catch-phrases, solecisms, catachreses, nicknames, and vulgarisms of every part of the British Empire that owns allegiance to the King's English. But no set of terms or random samplings will describe it adequately; one must read it through to realize the variety of matter, curious, informing, recondite, or merely tedious, that is to be found in its 999 quarto pages.

Comprehensiveness, however, is not its only merit. Besides making full, systematic use of his predecessors, Mr. Partridge has read widely and has observed the living speech for himself and has brought solid scholarship to bear on the interpretation of his collections. Wherever it was feasible to do so, he has dated his terms and has tried to indicate their ecology. Numerous quotations and citations, which might with advantage have been still more numerous, add greatly to the value and liveliness of the book, making it good to read as well as to refer to. Accurate, intelligent, and full, it is the only work on its subject that is any longer worth having, and it will probably remain the indispensable authority for years to come.

Mr. Partridge does not include non-standard Americanisms in his dictionary except as they have become naturalized somewhere within the British Empire. That does not mean, however, that his pages are not plentifully garnished with American slang. The British vogue of American books and talkies has inundated England with Yankee verbal notions. The Australians, who are adepts at concocting slang on their own account, are fairly infested with American slang, and so too are the New Zealanders and, as one would expect, the Canadians. Mr. Partridge evidently is not aware of the extent to which the various colonials have taken over American terms, for he frequently lists them without mentioning their origin in the United States. At least I, for one, find it hard to accept his ascription of "mad-money" to New Zealand soldiers of 1916-18, of "crow-bait" to Englishmen residing in South America, of "stick-up" to Australia, or of "Scandiwegian" and "Scandihoovian" to western Canada; and these are only a few instances. They are honest errors, however, and not the result of prejudice. They indicate plainly how much we need a dictionary of American slang and colloquialisms that can stand beside Mr. Partridge's work.

One of the features of the book is its admirably complete and judicious treatment of vulgarisms. Since he had to include many of them, Mr. Partridge has consistently included them all, even those ancient Indo-Germanic disreputables that must have their middle letters excised and replaced with asterisks. Some of them have never appeared in a published lexicon since the days of Cotgrave and Florio. Mr. Partridge, to use his own words, has dealt with them "as briefly, as astringently, as aseptically as was consistent with clarity and adequacy." Thereby he has done a real service to lexicography.

One cannot read far into the dictionary without wondering where the line should be drawn between genuine slang, which acquires a considerable degree of currency however transient, and those images or metaphors that, strictly speaking, remain the private property of their inventors. A few years ago, to take a random example, a vaudeville performer named Dunk was divorced by his wife, and Variety headlined the news with three terse words: "Dunk Gets Dunked." A foreign student of American speech, reading in the English seminar at Uppsala, Prague, or Dorpat, might thereupon enter in his card-index: "Dunk, verb, Am. theat. slang for to divorce." He would, of course, be wrong. Except in that particular context, "dunk" has never been put to that unwonted use; probably it never will be. Yet the older dictionaries of slang are crammed with such vigorous individual creations which have never got into general use, which, if repeated at all, have been used as quotations or allusions. Mr. Partridge, despite his usual keenness, has let some of them slip into his dictionary. Is it really possible that a term so pedantic as "Athanasian wench," alluding to the first words in the Latin text of the Athanasian Creed, quicumque vult, was ever much used, even by theological students, to designate "a forward girl, ready to oblige every man that shall ask her?" Surely, this is a lexical ghost. Is "confiscate the macaroon" worth recording as a variant of "take the cake"? Was "arrested by the bailiff of Marshland" for "stricken with ague" ever a genuine colloquialism? It hardly seems possible. One might as well stuff an American dictionary with George Ade's dreary coinages. If Mr. Partridge had scrutinized such impostors more closely, he could have found room for more quotations like the one from Clemenceau on page 634, which make his dictionary so rich and humane. But it seems almost petty to direct attention to a minor shortcoming in this excellent dictionary.

GEORGE BENZMER

Our National Defense Policy

THE TRAGIC FALLACY. By Mauritz A. Hallgren. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

THOUGH we hope for more, if Mauritz Hallgren never writes again he will have given us a work which should afford him a lasting place as an author. "The Tragic Fallacy" is much more than an ordinary study of America's war policies. It is a masterpiece in its especial field, and it is fair to guess that it is going to cause considerable uneasiness and stir, even though America's military leaders choose to ignore its very positive challenge, just as military leaders so often do when they encounter that which deflates and discounts their pet preachings. Every reader is bound to give it high rank as an authoritative, well-organized, thoughtful study of policies touching the purse and having to do with the welfare of every citizen of the land.

Scares intended to cause America to fear its national defense inadequate come annually. Those with whom we leave the shaping and executing of our war-preparation policies very seriously suggest, in their own ways, our lack of preparation for possible attack upon us. When it is undertaken to ascertain how many ships, guns, sailors, soldiers, and marines are counted necessary to make us feel secure in our defensive preparation, the answer is never direct or satisfying, but always this: "More, more, more." And now along comes Hallgren with most convincing and direct word that our policy makers are not concerned about the danger of an attack upon us at all, that they quite acknowledge that there is not the slightest danger of an invasion of our land by a foe or group of foes, that the thought of such invasion is "utterly absurd," and that our military policy is not one even intended to guard the country against invasion. More than that, and without reservation, "The Tragic Fallacy" insists that our policy is one of preparation to make possible a swift expedition to war abroad. Never was a finer job of debunking our so-called national-defense policy done than that undertaken and completed by the author of this work. Never have our policy makers in this field been so sharply challenged.

Boldly the author charges that our "military bureaucracy" is preparing for another mass war abroad, and then follows with findings which build a most powerful case. Disclosures of the kind Hallgren brings forth would, in other lands, be followed by resignations of governments. "The Tragic Fallacy" challenges Congress and the people and will keep admirals and generals at long hours of weaving words of explanation, if explanation is to be offered at all. The work translates our national-defense policy as a policy of preparation for a return engagement in Europe.

Hallgren tells well the story of our try at neutrality starting in 1914. "Freedom of the seas" was the challenger of neutrality then. The author sees it moving again, "a mantle of righteousness and justice" covering our selfishness. He notes our imperialistic tendencies at home and abroad and finds us moving warward once again in defense of trade.

In one breath "The Tragic Fallacy" has us mindful that the author is "trimming" and soft pedaling when he pictures our decision to enter the war as "coincidental" with Allied credit needs, but he moves on into the blunt declaration that "America did go to war for the sole purpose of protecting its war trade."

"The Tragic Fallacy" is well done. It is a splendidly recorded warning. And it is as timely as it is challenging.

GERALD P. NYE

BOOK BARGAINS

UP 80% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

★ These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 80% of their regular retail price. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 53-year-old MONEY GUARANTEE. Free Catalog describes hundreds of similar bargains.

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. SEXUAL LIFE IN ANCIENT ROME. By Otto Kiefer. Illustrated with 16 full-page plates. Acute portraits of the sexual life of leading Roman men and women, the sadism of the masses, the causes of the Empire's decay. $1.90 ($5.00) Our Special Price

2. THE ELIZABETHAN UNDERWORLD.

With 20 interesting illustrations. A most unusual and interesting book. — Outlook. "Daring studies of rogue life and behavior as gleaned from the lowlife literature of the Elizabethan pamphleteers." 543 pages. $2.98 ($10.00) Our Special Price

3. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOES. Twelve prints in full color. Size, 9 by 12 inches. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued, they were sold FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) 98c Our Special Price

4. FAMOUS VAN GOGH PAINTINGS IN FULL COLOR. Zuave—Still Life—Cornfield—Blooming Apple Orchard—four famous Van Goghs beautifully reproduced in full color. Ideal for framing—they look like original oil paintings. Together with Introductory Booklet by G. Benson, containing 17 Van Gogh halftones. Size, 14½ by 18 inches. $1.98 Our Special Price for all

5. ENCYCLOPAEDIA SEXUALIS. Written by 117 world-famous authorities. A comprehensive encyclopaedia-dictionary of the sexual sciences. Profusely illustrated. Complete in one large, well-printed volume, handsomely bound. 819 pages. "No volume of similar character has ever before been published in this or any other country." It contains "up-to-date information on all sexual matters, in a concise, authoritative and lucid manner." $3.44 Our Special Price

6. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much-suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. $1.58 ($3.00) Our Special Price

7. By the First White Man to Cross The Rockies: VOYAGES FROM MONTREAL. By Sir Alexander Mackenzie. This book, difficult to obtain in any edition, "is VASTLY MORE INTERESTING THAN FICTION." Fully illustrated. ($9.00) Our Special Price $1.98

8. MILTON'S COMPLETE POEMS, including "Paradise Lost" and all his other poems. Profusely illustrated by the famous Gustave Doré. "Second only to the Bible and Shakespeare."—Encyclopedia Americana on "Paradise Lost" contained in this volume. 688 pages. ($10.00) $1.98 Our Special Price

9. ORIGINAL SIGNED ETCHINGS by foremost Foreign and American etchers. Many of these exact same originals are in the world-famous galleries of the Louvre, British Museum, Metropolitan Museum of Art, etc. Retailled at $5.00 to $20.00 each. 98c Our Special Price, each

10. SEXUAL LIFE IN ANCIENT INDIA. By Otto Kiefer. With 16 full-page plates. "No people have ever made such profound inquiry into sex and love as the ancient Indians, and the author has set down the results of their many centuries of study and experiment. Complete in 2 volumes. ($10.00) $3.98 Our Special Price, the set

11. "The best biography of a great man ever written": THE LIFE OF WILLIAM E. GLADSTONE. By John Morley. (Three volumes bound in one—1968 pages.) "A masterpiece of historical writing." ($5.00) $1.79 Our Special Price

12. THE PSALMS FOR MODERN LIFE. Interpreted by Arthur Wragg. Profusely illustrated with 48 full-page black and white drawings. "It is a great book," says the Living Church. "It cannot but awaken the social conscience of all men of good-will, and drive home the realization of the presence of God in all life." 89c Our Special Price

• SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR MONEY BACK •

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $.....for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12

(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 282-N, Just off press!

Name

Address

City..... State.....

Portrait of Lenin

THE LETTERS OF LENIN. Translated and Edited by Elizabeth Hill and Doris Mudie. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.

"IT WOULD be a difficult task to paint the portrait of Nicolai Lenin. His words were as much a part of his external appearance as scales are of fish. The simplicity and straightforwardness of everything he said were an essential part of his nature. The heroic deeds which he achieved are surrounded by no glittering halo. . . ." These words which Maxim Gorki wrote when his great friend and comrade died come back to us as we read the letters Lenin wrote. Truly, there can be no more fitting monument to the great Lenin than that which he himself created in these simple, unstudied self-portraits.

Many of the letters here presented were written to Lenin's relatives, friends, and associates during his long years of exile from Czarist Russia. Some of them deal with those trivial matters that go to make up the life of the party organizer and propagandist to whom the question of raising money to pay the printer's bill seems momentarily almost as important as the most profound theoretical discussion. But the man himself is never trivial. Bitter, yes, and ruthless in his criticism of the leaders and thinkers of the labor movement who disagreed with him, but never small or petty.

Vladimir Uljanow (Lenin) was twenty-five years old when he wrote the first of the letters in this noteworthy collection. The last was written twenty-six years later, in November, 1922, just about two months before he died in January, 1923. In the restless life of the Russian exile there was neither time nor chance for personal contacts, and letter-writing was an important part of his life and activity. But comparatively few of the thousands of letters he must have written are still extant. Many were written with chemical ink that vanishes after it was read. Many were lost and destroyed because those who received them were also restless wanderers on the face of the earth, who traveled light and could not afford the luxury of keeping letters. From those that were preserved, the collection which lies before us, the first collection of Lenin letters to be published in the English language, was carefully chosen.

I know of no man who played a leading part in the Russian Revolution who was as Russian as Lenin. His letters show a sensitive understanding of the soul of the Russian peasant. That and his intelligent grasp of the problems of Russia's industrial proletariat made him the great strategist of the revolution. But this intense Russianism was an element of weakness in his relations with the labor movement outside Russia. Lenin lived abroad for almost two decades, during which the problems of the European revolutionary movement were the subject of countless letters and notes to comrades all over the continent. As one reads these critical, often impatient, and sometimes indignant comments on labor politics in the various countries of Europe, one cannot help seeing how largely his opinions are a reflex of his preoccupation with Russian problems.

It was the Russian in Lenin who refused to recognize that the peasant in England, in Germany, and in France was of a different pattern from the downtrodden slave of Czarist medievalism. It was the Russian in him who disposed of democracy with a wave of the hand, because he had never consciously lived the life of a free man. His letters during the war period are full of vitriolic comments on the "mistakes" of the Socialist leaders. The last ten years of European history have proved that he was right when he condemned constitutional monarchy as reaction wearing the mask of democracy and demanded industrial democracy. But they have also shown how wrong it was to underestimate the democratic instincts of the European worker and to believe that Russian "war communism" and the "third period" could be superimposed on the life of Western Europe.

It is regrettable that so little remains of his correspondence with his wife Krupskaya. The letters he wrote to her in the early years of their marriage were all destroyed. They were mostly secret documents, full of conspiratorial instructions. The four that this collection contains give a vivid picture of the deep understanding on which this marriage was founded. Krupskaya was the one being in whom he had absolute trust.

The bulk of the correspondence contained in this volume consists of letters written to his mother. They are always short but of a surprising warmth, full of personal interest and anxiety for her well-being. The letters to his sister Ulianova breathe the same affectionate concern, but deal less with personal than with political questions, in which she too was actively interested. These letters are invaluable, for they show a humaneness and a depth of feeling that might otherwise have been lost to view.

It is unfortunate that such an important work should have been distorted by ulterior considerations. I refer to what was deliberately left out of this valuable collection. The material bears the Soviet stamp—it could hardly be otherwise since the editors were naturally dependent on government sources for most of their material. There is, in consequence, clearly discernible a studied evasion of those things which might react unfavorably on the present regime. The three letters to Stalin are full of political instructions and political opinion, with nothing that would indicate the personal relationship between the leader of the Russian Revolution and his latter-day successor. The one letter to Stalin which might have proved illuminating—it is reported to have been the last letter Lenin ever wrote—is not in the collection. One looks in vain, also, for the letters he wrote to Trotsky against the position taken by Sokolnikov, Sinoviev, and others on the agrarian question, industrial planning, and nationalities.

One appreciates, of course, that the question of Lenin's correspondence with Trotsky is a delicate one. Indeed, knowing that it was possible to write an official history of the Russian Revolution without mentioning the Red Army chief's name, one hardly expected to find the ties that bound these two together reflected here. But it is unfair, not only to Trotsky but to Lenin himself, to find that where Leon Trotsky is mentioned at all, it is in a sharply critical tone. Such comments as "Balalaikin Trotsky," "What a swine this Trotsky is!" "Trotsky's pamphlet ["Our Political Task"] is as rotten as himself," "Trotsky and the company of foreign lackeys of opportunism" belong in any true representation of the relations between these two men. But there is nothing in the book to indicate that Lenin knew a different Trotsky later, that their irreconcilable differences were fused in the fire of the great struggle of the proletariat.

This reviewer is not a Trotskyite. He believes that Trotsky's present policies are wrong and harmful to the interests of the international working class. But he resents, and so will any fair-minded person, an expurgated presentation of Lenin in what should have been an unbiased presentation of the man through his personal writings.

One can hardly blame the editors for this shortcoming. They worked under insurmountable handicaps, and there is the justified suspicion that they are not too familiar with the story of the international labor movement. Would it have been possible otherwise to assemble so many misspelled names under a single cover—Hilkvit for Hillquit, Legin for Legien, Manilski for Manuiski, Pannekuk for Pannekoek, Scheiderman for Scheidemann, Trul'stra for Troelstra, Samba for Sembat, Longe for Longuet—to mention only a few of those which came to my notice.

LUDWIG LORE

Sunset at Grasmere

THE LETTERS OF WILLIAM AND DOROTHY WORDSWORTH. THE MIDDLE YEARS (1806-1820). Arranged and Edited by Ernest de Selincourt. Oxford University Press. Two Volumes. $14.

THESE two volumes are a sequel to the "Early Letters of William and Dorothy Wordsworth (1787-1805)" which Mr. de Selincourt edited in 1935, and they will be followed in another year or so by the letters written after 1820. The work when completed will be a necessary part of any Wordsworth library, as it will be an honorable part of the great series of English "Letters" which the Oxford University Press is in the slow process of publishing. Mr. de Selincourt already has printed nearly three hundred letters which were not to be found in the best collection before his; and he has been able to correct many errors both of date and of address by the editor of that collection, William Knight, as well as to supply full texts in many places where Knight deleted what he considered to be insignificant. Knight was correct enough in supposing much of this correspondence to be dull; Wordsworth was far inferior to his sister as a letter writer; but no one can be sure that anything by a great poet is without interest, and Mr. de Selincourt has wisely restored everything. The result as far as the present volumes are concerned is the fullest available record of the years during which the sun of Wordsworth's genius set over the Vale of Grasmere.

The rim of it was barely visible in 1806. By that time Wordsworth had completed the first and most important draft of his greatest poem, The Prelude; a poem which had proved, though Wordsworth did not know this, that he would never be able to do anything as good again. He had intended it merely as an earnest of the philosophical poem to come—and an introduction to it in the form of an inquiry into the nature both of his own mind and of the material available to him. During the next forty-five years he was to lament his incapacity for the exalted task he had set himself; not quite willing to recognize that The Prelude was his poem, and prevented by a certain lack of perspective from realizing that history had fated him to do only so much. The great poets who were his heroes had in some cases, notably Milton's, found it difficult to settle on their subjects; but they had done so, and they had written about those subjects. Wordsworth, ancestor of all modern poets in this respect as in many others, had only himself to write about. Subjects had disappeared along with mythologies and world-views. His recourse was to make poetry out of himself—out of what he thought had been his past, and out of that present mind over which he brooded as if he had been its creator. He did so, and magnificently; but the impulse was exhausted, and after that there was nothing of major importance for him to do.

Also by 1806 his friendship with Coleridge had ceased to

"SUPPOSE A CRIMINAL ATTACKED YOUR WIFE ...

In 1914 pacifists were met with this crushing argument. Today the argument runs that if Fascism wins in Spain then England and America will be devoured by the monster in due course."

WAR MONGERING ON THE LEFT

by ALFRED M. BINGHAM

... is an article that blows the lid off the current sentimentality and confusion on the left. It begins: "America is being prepared for another slaughter, and once more it will be 'to make the world safe for democracy.' This time, however, the public mind is being prepared, not by bankers anxious for their foreign loans, but by some of the most idealistic and intelligent leaders of thought in the country: liberals, radicals ... the same men and women who recanted most humbly after the last war are putting their very considerable brains and influence to work to spread the idea over America that we must fight again 'for democracy' and once more against the same enemy—though he is labelled 'Nazism' instead of 'Prussian militarism' and his moustache is one inch long instead of four ... " If you read this whole article you may lose your temper BUT—

WOULD YOU RATHER LOSE YOUR TEMPER OR YOUR SCALP?

Wars are not fought by idealists who utter slogans—nor will democracy survive the next war. For the next "war to save democracy" will be on the part of Imperial Powers (France and England) to keep their gains from Unsatisfied Powers (Italy and Germany).

WOULD YOU FIGHT IN THIS WAR?

Yes or No, you cannot afford to ignore this powerful article. A startling sequel to it will appear in the following issue of Common Sense. In the same number: Articles and reviews by John Dewey, Representative T. R. Amlie, Lewis Corey, and Representative R. G. Allen and the exciting new serial 79 OLD MEN by the co-authors of THE NINE OLD MEN.

COMMON SENSE, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York G
Enclosed find $1. Beginning with the issue containing WAR MONGERING ON THE LEFT, please send COMMON SENSE for 7 months to:

Name

Address

.....

be fruitful. Professor Garrod has brilliantly argued that Wordsworth was a good poet only during the decade of this friendship, and indeed because of it. The present volumes show the friendship in a rapid and fatal decline from the day when Dorothy and William, hastening to meet "dearest Coleridge" upon his return from Malta, were shocked by the change in his appearance for the worse, through the difficult days of his separation from his wife and of the complaints he began to make of his treatment by his former friends, to the unfortunate but perhaps inescapable breach of 1811 when Montagu repeated to him what William had said concerning his personal habits. Professor Garrod's theory may not explain everything about Wordsworth's poetry; but there can be no doubt that Coleridge in these years, at least as he was seen from the latitude of the Lake Country, was unattractive. Wordsworth could learn nothing more from him; and he had already, as I have said, explored his own mind to the bottom.

The letters of the "middle years," then, are grown over with aftergrass. This does not mean that they are uninteresting, but it does mean that they are filled with family worries rather than with intellectual adventures. Children and money are incessantly discussed in them. The note of anxiety is always there, along with the sense of a world that is too much with Wordsworth, not to say for him. We learn very little about the poems William is writing. The best pieces of the period are The Happy Warrior, Personal Talk, The World Is Too Much with Us, and the great Ode, most of which is in fact earlier; but these receive scanty mention from a man who seems more concerned about the reviews he will get or has already got of "The Excursion" and of the "Poems" in 1807 and 1815. Jeffrey, of course, is constantly under his skin; he deserves to be "kicked" for his review of Southey, and as for his reviews of Wordsworth himself—well, Dorothy puts the case in various letters which call Jeffrey a "fool" and an "ignorant coxcomb."

There is one passage on "The Excursion," however, in which William unwittingly confesses its weakness. Since it lacks "incident," he writes to Thomas Poole, "it cannot be expected to make its way without difficulty, and it is therefore especially incumbent on those who value it to exert themselves in its behalf." A month before he had shown less personal zeal for a poem by his friend R. P. Gillies which had precisely the same defect: "in turning so much upon internal feelings, and those of a peculiar kind, without a sufficiency of incident or imagery to substantiate them." He had spent his own supply of symbols in his masterpiece about himself; and now was calling on his public to overlook the fact. He must almost have known how far desire had outlived performance. Almost, but never quite.

MARK VAN DOREN

Introduction to Music

A BOOK OF THE SYMPHONY. By B. H. Haggin. Oxford University Press. $5.

MR. HAGGIN has done a unique thing: he has written on an old subject a work conceived on an entirely new pattern, and he has achieved with a minimum of means a maximum of much-needed enlightenment. Unlike all previous attempts to "explain" music, "A Book of the Symphony" actually bridges the gap between the untrained listener and the meaning of music, and this without loss of either accuracy or self-respect. How is it done? Simply by referring every statement concerning music to a particular part of a particular composition as played on a gramophone record. The place on the record where the music may be heard is measured in inches from the outermost groove by means of a celluloid ruler furnished with every copy of the book. To use the book effectively one need only have curiosity, a little patience, and one of the standard sets of the standard compositions analyzed. To forestall the necessity of purchasing a special group of recordings, Mr. Haggin has worked out his directions so that for each symphony any of three or five or sometimes seven different recordings may be used. His patient collating of the score with so many playings of it would alone deserve thanks from a lay public eager to know the difference between a coda and a chaconne, but when one takes into account the author's unfailing ability to combine the musically significant elements of each piece with vivid and unsentimental indications in words, the conclusion forces itself on the mind that the present work marks an epoch in the use of grooved discs and letterpress for the cultural education of the country.

The words cultural education need not make the aesthetes shudder. It is a remarkable and praiseworthy fact that among all circles and at all levels of understanding there has been in this country for the past quarter-century a continuous, though often shamefaced, effort to become truly acquainted with the masterpieces of the several arts, particularly music. The large literature designed to introduce the untrained painlessly into the realm where sound makes sense apart from words is a witness to the persistence of the interest, but hitherto all such books have fallen into one of two lamentable errors. They have either provided word parallels for musical compositions and let it go at that or they have assumed the very thing they sought to remedy, namely, a knowledge of musical notation and musical form. Mr. Haggin makes a radical departure and, indeed, states a central point in criticism when he says: "A statement about music will mean nothing to the person who reads it unless he has heard the music or can hear it when he reads the statement."

But it would be a mistake to suppose that the author and his book support the notion that because music is not translatable into words therefore it means nothing, expresses only "pure form," and is a kind of diaphanous incense perceptible only to those who have a Mus.D. or can play an instrument. On the contrary, a good many so-called musicians would do well to read Mr. Haggin and to follow his examples with record and ruler, book in hand. They would discover that what they thought was a "formal" arrangement of things was also a thing-in-itself, with a meaning as precise—no more and no less—as a speech in a tragedy, and that its development, radically different in method from that of speech, is none the less the addition, amplification, or qualification of meaning, where meaning is not to be taken as information or story-telling but as a reference to life which makes sense when compared with it.

With these premises it follows that the point of Mr. Haggin's book is not merely to make would-be music lovers glib and correct in the use of the technical lingo relevant to the symphony; nor is it to enable them to spot themes in augmentation or the trio in a minuet. It is rather to teach them the meaning of music through an analysis of certain great symphonies. From a phrase which, in Haggin's words, "causes the person who has not studied music no difficulty" the listener can learn to recognize its development by modification and recurrence until the sense of the whole business—his sense of it, that is, within the framework of sound presented—is discoverable without further use of words. The process is very much like Poe's solution of the cipher in "The Gold Bug," and it is idle to imagine that there is any other means of introduction to the arts than by just such self-teaching under the guidance of an analyst who neither solves the riddle himself nor seeks to impress you with its mystical impenetrability.

The symphonies so analyzed by Mr. Haggin include not only the best of Haydn's, Mozart's, and Schubert's, and all of Beethoven's, but also the favorites of the American public by Brahms, Tchaikovsky, and Franck. To the analyses the author has added a short section on the orchestra and its conductor and an excellent chapter on eight of the classical forms. The lay reader as well as the critic will await his discussion and illustration of modern forms and works with pleasurable anticipation.

JACQUES BARZUN

History by a Lover

THE MIRACLE OF ENGLAND: AN ACCOUNT OF HER RISE TO PREEMINENCE AND HER PRESENT POSITION. By André Maurois. Translated by Hamish Miles. Harper and Brothers. $3.75.

THE miracle of England, for M. Maurois, is twofold. A small barbaric island, on the misty rim of the known world, becomes a great empire whose conquests cover one-fourth of the globe. In the process it invents new institutions which give rise to a new conception of freedom, and originates the only new form of human society since Greece. These institutions, this conception are the source of similar developments in America and France. England originated democracy and established the Pax Britannica, the only parallel to the Pax Romana.

In 500 pages M. Maurois "answers" the miracle, as he says, and in fact shows that it is not a miracle but a traceable development of geographic, economic, and social forces. He traces and explains the internal history of England, the growth of its political and civil institutions, its internal and external policies as they grew out of this complex of forces, the clashes and harmonies of group interests, and the actions of dominant historic personalities. There is no attempt to tell the history of Scotland, Ireland, or the British Empire except as they are related to this island epic.

Lucidity and lack of sensationalism are the outstanding virtues of this presentation, especially, roughly speaking, in the first two-thirds of the book. The origins of organized English life up to the Norman Conquest, the French kings, the developing struggles between king and nobles with their repercussions on the lower orders, the conflict between king and pope, the beginnings of towns, corporations, universities, and mendicant orders, the rationale of legal and administrative reform, the origin and growth of Parliament, the first capitalists, the first dissenters, the Hundred Years' War, the Black Death, the Peasants' Revolt, and the War of the Roses bring us to the peak and decline of feudalism and the end of the Middle Ages. Under the Tudors we see the triumph of the monarchy and the importance of the sea power which, with the liberal subsidizing of allies on the Continent, is to be England's great instrument of power and conquest. The struggle between Stuarts and Parliament, Cromwell as man and revolutionist, Puritans and Cavaliers, Parliament and the army, the dilemma that ended in the Restoration, and the significance of the struggles in political terms fill another division. M. Maurois is a skilful popularizer as far as readability and clarity go. When we come to the two last divisions, which cover from the eighteenth century to the present day,

Two dramatic new books

by

Anna Louise STRONG

SPAIN IN ARMS 1937

The author of I Change Worlds has just returned from Spain where she toured front-line trenches, interviewed soldiers and statesmen, talked with Malraux, Nicoletti and the other heroic fighters. Her stirring book is packed with the overwhelming drama of one of the most crucial struggles of our time. Ill. $1.00

THE NEW SOVIET CONSTITUTION

The foremost American interpreter of Soviet Russia tells the dramatic story of the creation by many races and peoples of the new Soviet charter. She provides a brilliant interpretation and a new, accurate translation and makes a striking comparison with our own Constitution. $1.50

HENRY HOLT & CO. 257 FOURTH AVE. N. Y.

NOW

America's critics join those of Europe in calling this novel a literary event of world importance

BREAD and WINE

BY IGNAZIO SILONE

author of FONTAMARA

"One of the most truly contemporary and significant writers . . . strikes out into newer areas, coming to grips with problems so modern that fiction has scarcely touched them."

—The Nation.

"How strange and how exalting!—to read a full-blooded, hotly human story of passion, the ups and downs of whose plot turn . . . on whether human liberty will live or die."—Dorothy Canfield, Book-of-the-Month Club News.

"A loving knowledge of the Italian people and a passionate love of freedom are here most happily blended."—Thomas Mann.

"Reverent, mature and powerful . . . more impressive than either Bates' The Olive Field or Malraux's Man's Fate."

—Ralph Thompson, N. Y. Times.

APRIL BOOK-OF-THE-MONTH CLUB CHOICE

A Story Press Book • $2.50 • HARPERS

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

the defects of his approach and method are more apparent.

The fundamental defect from which flow all others is that M. Maurois loves England, an abstraction. He writes out of a deep admiration and a personal knowledge of the country and its people. This adds to the warmth and charm of his narrative, and doubtless the fact that he is not an Englishman adds a freshness and piquancy to his observations. But in this book he writes like a lover, though like a lover who is determined to be impartial and record the faults as well as the virtues of the beloved. But can a lover do this? He obviously tries to leave out nothing essential, to show two or more sides of every controversy, and it is true that he mentions almost everything. He mentions everything, but some things he develops at greater or less length; others he merely mentions. A difference in emphasis often changes the main values of a picture. To give one of many instances: in his treatment of the South African War his emphasis is all on the "moderation" and "generosity" of the peace terms. To one who remembers, as I do, the furious opposition to this war in England and its effect on the younger generation of the time, this is little short of astonishing. True, there are a few vague sentences indicating that the war was unwise, that it aroused antagonisms and revealed weaknesses, but the final effect is a pervasive beamishness as to the true-to-type nobility of England's way.

In the last two centuries events and facts come thick and complex, selection becomes difficult, and M. Maurois thinks more and more officially. The Industrial Revolution and its results throughout the nineteenth century are astonishingly scamped and minimized, as is also the terroristic repression resulting from the French Revolution. There is just one paragraph on trade unions, a sentence or two on the woman movement, not a word about education from the Renaissance universities to the Forster Act in 1873. The Labor Party is barely mentioned and does not appear in the index.

The World War is represented as an almost spontaneous uprising in England; the profound world changes resulting are sketched with a somewhat roseate pencil. What will the future be? Air forces may soon be more important than navies. Can the English compromise between discipline and liberty prevail against the spread of totalitarianism? England suggested sanctions against Italy. Unfortunately they failed. England's part in the failure is not gone into, and the story stops before the war in Spain.

Crammed with information and pleasantly written until the massing of modern facts induces a catalogue-like style, this history lacks a critical spirit at least in the more recent parts. Perhaps lack of space is a contributing factor. All in all, it is a success story, an adolescent's History of England. Historians should not be lovers.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Bread and the Artist

BREAD AND A SWORD. By Evelyn Scott. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.75.

IN A longish and sometimes clumsily written preface Mrs. Scott offers the prolegomena for her problem of the artist today and how he shall make a living. Mrs. Scott of course knows that the problem is not peculiar to our own time; Mozart and Rembrandt are conspicuous examples of it in the past. But today, she avers, the machine has accelerated our tempo of living and flattened out our values; if an artist is not a commercial success, he is thrown to the dogs, or more specifically to the bread lines. If he has been so rash as to acquire a family, they, too, are not spared. When patronage is occasionally offered, it is either in the form of a grudging charity or it is capricious, vulgar, and irrelevant to the quality of the art that is being practiced. And the alternative, to get a job that will provide a living, is destructive to the art.

To illustrate this thesis, Mrs. Scott offers a novelist—husband of a woman who once thought of herself as a painter and poet, and father of two boys. He has written a couple of novels that have sold something like 15,000 copies each; but his royalty checks are diminishing steadily; he has taken the family to France, where living is cheaper and life is supposed to be simpler; he owes several thousand dollars; he is at work on another novel. And it doesn't work. Even in France bread costs money; poverty is too much for the wife's temper; the petty chores of primitive housekeeping interrupt the necessary typewriter; and the bourgeois French shopkeepers are suspicious and contemptuous of a man who writes and cannot make a decent living by it. When they go back home, there is a stupid father-in-law beginning to suffer from the depression, with whom the family tries to live while the novelist, thoroughly cowed, is looking for a white-collar job. But there are no such jobs. The alternative, to take a farm laborer's job while the wife works in the farm kitchen, doesn't work either. Publishers refuse advances on problematical novels. And patronage, when it comes, is offered by a wealthy woman who discovers that her assistant gardener is really a literary lion in a small way, and who gets an erotic kick out of that fact.

It is a bitter story. Nobody describes family bickering brought on by poverty more relentlessly than Mrs. Scott does. Nobody delineates stupidity and vulgarity more devastatingly. Her hero is damned by a world that will not tolerate artists unless it is forced to—a situation which contains enough hard truth to give any artist pause. But she fails to make her case sufficiently convincing, first by lightening the gloom and providing the contrast which the reader must have in order to be able to endure her story at all. There is not a person in her book who is unquestionably sympathetic, or simply intelligent, or fundamentally good. Conceive of the torments of a Lear unrelieved by an Edgar; conceive of a Hamlet without a friend like Horatio. If this is really a world in which the only law is that of tooth and claw, in which every man looks only to his own advantage, in which bread is the only reality, then it is a world damned by its own shortcomings and not worth writing about. But Mrs. Scott's second failure is more serious even than this: she does not convince the reader that her artist is worth saving. If Mozart was plagued by debt and illness, he kept on writing incomparable music just the same; and Rembrandt, at the end of a long life of bitter struggle, left a series of paintings by which an intolerant world was obliged to remember him.

All this is simply to say that Mrs. Scott is a novelist of power and much more than average intelligence, and that she has chosen a subject which is in itself powerful and worth attention. But having set herself a difficult and worth-while task, she would have solved it better by attacking it perhaps less directly. An oblique approach, which would have given her novelist a break or two—not necessarily by a happy ending—would have been more illuminating and more persuasive. It is permissible to harass and torment a reader, but he must be offered occasional balm, he must have time off to contemplate his scars. Otherwise the struggle has no meaning, and the end does not seem worth all the trouble.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

In Times of Realism

THREE COMRADES. By Erich Maria Remarque. Translated by A. W. Wheen. Little, Brown and Company. $2.75.

UNDERSTANDABLY enough, Erich Maria Remarque prefers to keep a distance of ten years between the theme of his books and the current of contemporary life. In 1928, ten years after the first World War, "All Quiet on the Western Front" succeeded, with all the force of its underscored irony and over-explicit symbolism, in capturing the mood of German defeat. It was cast as a Bildungsroman, a study in the formation of character, autobiographical in method and episodic in structure; but it broke this traditional mold of the German novel by conducting the education of its characters under circumstances of concentrated violence, and by terminating their apprenticeship with abrupt destruction. To gain his point, Remarque presented the immediate experience and concrete fact of the front-line trenches against a conceptual background supplied by schoolmaster and drill-sergeant, and thereby improvised a series of fresh variations upon the old theme of Alles nicht was im Buche steht.

Now, almost a decade later, Remarque is writing about 1928 and the Germany whose restless and distrustful atmosphere his book did so much to formulate. His schoolboy heroes, to the extent that they have survived at all, have struggled into their thirties living from hand to mouth, from moment to moment. The present instalment treats of the boy allies in the used-car business. Again the narrator is one of the great demobilized, a mechanic, who ekes out his existence by running a taxi and improves his leisure by playing the piano in a bawdy house. His thirtieth birthday finds him and his two comrades in arms busy salvaging automobiles, and introduces him to the girl who will be with them for the rest of a short life and a long book. The components of their story are fast driving and hard drinking, boarding-house pathos and tabloid adventure. "The thing has poetry and punch, eh?" exclaims one of them. "In times of realism be romantic, that's the trick."

In the interval between "All Quiet on the Western Front" and "Three Comrades" Remarque, the contemporary of his characters, went to Switzerland for his health and found it wise to remain there for political reasons. Exile above the clouds does not seem to have clarified his perspective. He will not forge myths for the new Germany, but he is ill equipped to continue his exposures of the old. "All Quiet on the Western Front" derived its importance from the fact that its issues and outcome were known, and could lend their meaning to Remarque's kind of rank-and-file impressionism. "Three Comrades" is something less than historical fiction; National Socialism makes only a single, shadowy appearance, although that results in the characteristically pointless death of one of the three comrades. The incidents appear forced and unconvincing because they are not strung together with anything more relevant than a few vague axioms—war is hell, religion is a mockery, or, for a speculative flight: "Not to laugh at the twentieth century is to shoot yourself. But you can't laugh for long. It's too much a matter for tears."

Recently, in the figure of Charley Anderson, John Dos Passos created a more significant protagonist than Remarque's alcohol-obsessed, financially harassed, mechanically minded war veterans. The concluding pages of "Three Comrades" merely serve to remind the reader that it was Thomas Mann who turned the tuberculosis sanitarium into a symbol for post-war Europe. As a prophet, Erich Maria Remarque has

At last—a unique new guide for musical people with or without musical training

A BOOK OF THE SYMPHONY

by B. H. HAGGIN

Musical Critic for the Brooklyn Eagle

Any reader can now learn to understand and enjoy symphonic music. This unique volume gives detailed analyses of 32 symphonies, and by an ingenious device for use with phonograph records the reader can hear as he reads the particular passages under discussion. The book contains musical scores of the passages being discussed and can be used equally well with phonograph or piano. $5.00

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue New York, N. Y.

An astute, intelligent answer to this vital question

Neutrality FOR THE UNITED STATES

By EDWIN M. BORCHARD and WILLIAM P. LAGE

This is one of the most significant and devastating books that has been written about how America got into one war, and what she must do to escape entanglement in the next. It contains hitherto unpublished evidence against the unneutral officers in high places who from the beginning pursued a course that was certain to involve this country as a belligerent. Edwin Borchard is one of the world's outstanding authorities on International Law. $3.50

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven, Conn.

WHY DID

John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

WRITE TO JIM FARLEY?

See if you can answer this question after reading the remarkable article, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma", by Louis Wallis in The Christian Century, reprinted free for you.

Here is the dilemma: Business recovery must go much further; else the New Deal fails.—But if recovery DOES go on, it will inevitably drive up land prices, and inflate ground rents, and lead to another period of land speculation, which will produce another economic slump. Most "frozen paper" in banks is based on inflated land values.

Two remarkable articles by Louis Wallis, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma" and "The Economic Problem,"—both reprinted from The Christian Century—will be forwarded to you free by sending your name clearly written on a postal card to

Dept. C

WILLETT, CLARK & CO.,

440 South Dearborn Street

Chicago, Illinois

What's happening to England?

Here's Hilaire Belloc's
answer!

THIS DYNAMIC book is a piercing analysis of the gradually changing pattern of British society and institutions today, by the noted author and parliamentarian who has many of his former prophecies come true with depressing accuracy. His concise study—and its startling conclusions—clearly reveals why English policy vacillates while the rest of the world takes sides on today's vital issues. 91 pages, $1.25.

AN ESSAY ON THE NATURE OF Contemporary England

At all bookstores, or from
SHEED ■ WARD, 63 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

lost his ardor because his millennium has already come and gone and because whatever happens afterward is to him uniformly trivial. He definitely resents having his chaos disturbed. Therefore, even after another ten years, it would be unwarranted to expect from him an incisive depiction of the country he no longer knows. In the meanwhile, "Three Comrades" has successfully appeared in a woman's magazine, and nobody is going to burn it.

HARRY LEVIN

Revolution's "Time Past"

PEACE IS WHERE THE TEMPESTS BLOW. By Valentine Kataev. Translated from the Russian by Charles Malamuth. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THE scene of this novel is Odessa and the time 1905—that in itself is, in a way, a definition of it. For Odessa, a Ukrainian city on the Black Sea, belongs among the halcyon place-names of the revolution's Remembrance of Things Past. It was there that the events of 1905 were foreshadowed in the mutiny on the armored cruiser Potemkin; and in the memory of bolshevism and Soviet literature alike, that prelude of insurrection has transmuted the city where it occurred into an image of beginnings, of spring thunder, and of that mood of solemn and intimate sadness that suggests the eve of a long-awaited holiday.

With this emotional tone suffusing his narrative, Kataev combines the themes of childhood and revolution in a fertile and meaningful exchange. In his plastic prose, lively with colors, sights, and sounds, the accepted Soviet symbols function efficiently and not without that effervescent humor inherent in objects and ideas so long cherished that they have begun to fit snugly. Thus the two boys whose adventures make up most of the episodes are each representative of a social class, and the friendship between them signifies the alliance of workers and intellectuals. Moreover, since the doctrine teaches that the workers lead in this union, it is Gavrik, the proletarian street urchin, who knows what to do, and Petya, the son of a schoolmaster, who helps him do it. Gavrik is so brave and resourceful that he emerges as a youthful Odysseus of the class struggle. And what a multitude of historical associations is evoked by the fact that it is precisely a sailor who is placed at the head of the fight, and whose marvelous escapes and feats of underground activity are aided by the two boys, forever distracted from their play by the greater excitement of overthrowing an oppressive regime! Terence, Gavrik's brother, is cool and determined, as befits a metal worker; Petya's father and aunt, however, are well-meaning but easily frightened. As revolutionists Terence and the sailor are typical Soviet literary figures, in that they are seldom worried by problems of consciousness. They are pure personifications of practice.

The story tells all the characteristic experiences of childhood, rendered pictorially and with comic elation, yet cunningly woven into a political texture. In a Western novel such a pattern would appear awkward, the politics imposed; with the Soviet writer, on the other hand, politics not only affects his beliefs but has entered into his very sensibility. The details of political struggle live not in historical works alone but in the creative imagination, crystallizing into a tradition nourishing to art. Hence even the horrors of Czarism are described by Kataev with that happy shudder peculiar to disasters recalled in the security of triumph. The Czarist detective is no longer the vicious character common to Western revolutionary fiction but as appealing in his villainy as any bandit or pirate in a boys' adventure story. Thus what would seem strained and crude in our fiction strikes us as charming naivete as told by Kataev, for he has been able to weld an old and a new theme into a romantic work of inimitable mirth and tenderness. True, it is lacking in depth and somewhat smug in its underlying certainty that the problems of humanity have at last all been solved, but these seem to be the general limitations of much Soviet writing.

In the past Kataev has been known to indulge his flair for the grotesque and the satiric. "The Embezzlers" was written in that vein. In this work, however, the lyrical strain in him has evidently had full sway.

PHILIP RAHV

Four Winds

JORDANTOWN. By Josephine Johnson. Simon and Schuster. $2.

MISS JOHNSON'S intentions are inadvertently revealed in the first pages of "Jordanstown." Peter Stefan, a baker, middle-aged, rosy-cheeked, and philosophic, engages some dough in casual contemplation. "Poor, pale, white things!" he says as he shuts the raw loaves in his oven, "I give you some color quick." The bread is subsequently baked and sold, and the stale remaining loaves are idealistically distributed to the Jordanstown unemployed in exchange for various services. Those same unemployed are the central characters of Jordanstown, and it might be noted that on Labor Day, as they march toward their newly built Workers' Center, they are rewarded with fresh rolls. No further mention is made of "color," but by that time the reader is sufficiently aware of the pigmentation of Miss Johnson's rhetoric to interpret Peter's speech as having more reference to the author's creative methods than to the baker's oven.

Miss Johnson's novel is rich in color; her poor pale characters are not characters at all but metaphors with an economic locus. As for the action, that is divided into four great winds. There is the "west wind of hate," "the arctic wind of necessity driving each new life before it," "the foul east wind of desire for power," and in the concluding paragraph "the south wind of love." Then there is the young hero, Allen Craig, a disenfranchised member of the landed gentry, who appears first as a grocer's clerk and then as the innovator of the town's class-conscious newspaper, "flourishing his pen like a sword." And Allen's friend, David ("a grand boy but born with a fever"), who with Allen organizes the unemployed in building a Workers' Center. Finally there is the workers' triumphal Labor Day parade, nipped in the bud by armed sheriffs. Allen's head is bashed in; David's injuries are fatal. On the next morning the disillusioned workers find their Center burned to the ground, and "Jordanstown" comes to an end on a note of defeat. It is true that Allen faces the future with plans for another Center, but Miss Johnson has in no way proved the future to hold less fire and more success for the workers than the past. The casual reader might readily conclude from her account that the proletarian cause is doomed to infinite repetitious failure. Considering the author's fervid approach throughout, that is a curious slip to make in conclusion.

The explanation lies not in Miss Johnson's attitude toward oppression but in her attitude toward words. In attempting to give her characters color Miss Johnson has exploited them verbally. They carry artificiality rather than conviction, are wrapped in a kind of poetry which springs neither from character nor situation but is imposed upon both as a pro-

SEEING SOVIET RUSSIA with JULIEN BRYAN

*Traveler, explorer, photographer and roving reporter for
"March of Time"*

For the sixth season Julien Bryan will guide a group through the Soviet Union. You touch Soviet life in a genuine, intimate way. You visit the great cities and spend ten days in hidden villages of the Caucasus, mostly on horseback.

Sailing from New York on the ILE DE FRANCE June 19, you travel nine weeks, spending a week in Finland and a month in the U.S.S.R. Inclusive rate $695

Other group tours (at least a month in the U.S.S.R. with roundtrip passage) from $394

Or you may travel on your own.

THE OPEN ROAD

Eleventh Season

8 WEST 40TH ST. NEW YORK

12th Floor

Cooperating with Intourist

THE GRADUATE SCHOOL FOR JEWISH SOCIAL WORK

offers graduate professional curricula for the acquisition of the necessary knowledge and skills for social work, leading to the Master's and Doctor's degrees.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE SOCIAL WORK AGENCIES increasingly require such knowledge and skill from candidates for positions.

*April 30th is the last day for filing applications for fellowships.
For full information write to*

DR. M. J. KARPF, Director

The Graduate School

For Jewish
Social Work

71 West 47th Street, New York City

Sane, authoritative, detailed information on a subject about which most men are ignorant—

SEXUAL POWER

By Chester T. Stone, M. D.

Loss of sexual power is a source of great and continual fear to many men. It may come from psychological reasons but in the greatest number of cases it derives from physical difficulties, temporary if heeded and treated, permanent if neglected. Dr. Stone tells how best to reach full efficiency and satisfaction. He tells what impotence is in all its manifestations and outlines what can be done for treatment. The book includes such important topics as the psychic and physical causes of sexual difficulties, the role of the glands which play such an important role in man's sexual make-up, and how sexual efficiency can be maintained to the fullest degree. Explanatory charts and illustrations. $1.50

D. APPLETON-CENTURY CO., 35 W. 32nd St., N. Y.

JOHN L. SPIVAK
57 Day Tour Sailing July 3
BROADUS MITCHELL
49 Day Tour Sailing July 24
LANGSTON HUGHES
60 Day Tour Sailing July 3

There is still time to send in your application for these three EDUTRAVEL
Tours

EDUTRAVEL, Inc.

An Institute for Educational Travel
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.
Telephone GRamercy 7-3284-3285

Write, call or phone
—and mention The Nation.

48 AMERICAN PAINTINGS of the YEAR

The representative work of our foremost painters, selected by a distinguished jury and reproduced in collotype by Max Jaffe of Vienna.

$5⁰⁰
EACH

"These are about as faithful facsimiles as could be desired."—Royal Cortissoz, New York Herald Tribune.

Write today for FREE leaflet of photographs

LIVING AMERICAN ART, INC.

55 Fifth Avenue Dept. B New York

pective coloration against banality. Yet banality is the integument of "Jordanstown," and in making a bête noire of it rather than of the system she intended to expose, Miss Johnson defeats her own ends.

CHRISTOPHER LAZARE

"Henceforth from the Mind"

THE SLEEPING FURY. By Louise Bogan. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.50.

THIS is Louise Bogan's first book of lyrics since the publication in 1929 of "Dark Summer," and it is unmistakably the poet's most mature and distinguished volume. Miss Bogan's admirable precision of language and expert craftsmanship remain unchanged, but the conflict between emotional intensity and an intellectual analysis almost equally violent—so characteristic of all her work—is in these poems resolved.

Betrayal has long been Miss Bogan's theme. At first it was the betrayal inevitable in love. Now this poet sees betrayal as common to all, as a betrayal by life itself. It is life itself which so changes body and spirit that they become their opposites. This is the ultimate, bitter truth. And whatever of personal bitterness there was in Miss Bogan's earlier lyrics becomes in these later poems either a deep impersonal hatred of human fate or an austere acceptance of that fate. In the long title poem, built upon a magnificent image, the Fury who has tortured the poet is faced at last and seen:

Beautiful now as a child whose hair, wet with rage and tears,
Clings to its face. And now I may look upon you,
Having once met your eyes. You lie asleep and forget me.
Alone and strong in my peace, I look upon you in yours.

Or, again, we find the main theme of this book in such a stanza as this:

Henceforth from the mind,
For your whole joy, must spring
Such joy as you may find
In any earthly thing,
And ever time and place
Will take your thought for grace.

Distinguished is the word one always thinks of in connection with Louise Bogan's poetry. Whatever form she tries, her art is sure, economical, and self-definitive. There is never in her poems a wasted adjective or phrase but always perfect clarity and a consistent mood precisely set down. She can write the completely artless lyric or the very subtle poem worked out through complex imagery. Sensuousness is here but it is always reined in by the strict mind. Poems like "Italian Morning" express perfectly the atmosphere of the old carved rooms and the sense of timelessness in contrast with personal time and loss. The sheer passion to create in words is behind much of this poetry and is the theme of one of the loveliest lyrics in the book "Roman Fountain." This passion, the poet believes, persists despite defeat in life. Another poem in Swiftian mood denounces Swift as a rare hypocrite in his letters to Stella. Miss Bogan is a good hater, but never allows hatred to become mere emotionalism:

With so much hatred still so close behind
The sterile shores before us must be faced
Again, against the body and the mind,
The hate that bruises, though the heart is braced.

And so, in the end, one is impressed by a kind of wisdom in these poems, the wisdom of profound intuition and of a rapier analysis turned inward rather than outward.

EDA LOU WALTON

FILMS

Boy of India

ROBERT FLAHERTY is generally and properly recognized as the best of those directors who go for material to faraway places and come back with this material in a pure state, or almost a pure state. It is the place that interests them, along with the human life lived there; and it is their assumption that we have similar tastes—that we shall not require, for instance, fiction on top of geography and ethnology. We shall not expect the Eskimo or the Bushman to behave as if he were on the banks of the Wabash, far away from himself but near enough home to take part in a plot surprisingly like those of Hollywood. The strangeness, the difference is what we want; and we know that the camera is the only thing which can give it to us. Mr. Flaherty's best films have been superior travelogues; superior because they stopped at a really interesting place and stayed there long enough for us to learn something about the life which we should never have known otherwise. Some manipulation, of course, has been resorted to; the family in "Man of Aran" was coached, even if the waves at the shore were not; and Nanook of the North never even pretended to be ignorant of Mr. Flaherty's camera as it turned before him. But so much manipulation was necessary if the films were to have unity; and only so much took place.

For the material of his new film, "Elephant Boy" (United Artists: Rialto) Mr. Flaherty has gone to India. And for good measure he has thrown in a story by Kipling; or rather he has used "Toomai of the Elephants" as a center around which to organize his data. The resulting mixture is both agreeable and disagreeable. Since the story employs the Cinderella theme it has a certain power in spite of everything, and we can well understand the tears of Toomai at the close when his unexpected recognition as a hunter by the grizzled elders of his race proves too much for him. For it is he, the despised youngster, who has seen the elephants dance, and there is nothing for the elders to do now except elect him as their leader. This, as I have said, is in spite of everything a good story. But Mr. Flaherty has not told it well, being without experience in fiction. His principals stand interminably while they say things that are perfectly obvious to us. Two men, for instance, come upon Toomai one night when he is sleeping by the corral. They look deliberately at him and at each other, and then one of them says: "He is asleep." Of course. And there is much more of the same thing; just as at the end there is the suspicion in our minds that the Indian elders would not have put on this rather British show for Toomai if they had not been directed to do it, and if they had been Indian in fact. They are Englishmen behind beads, as the program rather superfluously states; just as the elephants are from the herd of the Maharajah of Mysore, who lent them for the film.

Yet "Elephant Boy" is worth seeing for what remains in it of India and Robert Flaherty. One cannot after all doubt that this is India, whether the scene be a jungle or the streets of a city bestridden by towering stone gods. And Sabu, the twelve-year-old boy who plays Toomai, is not only Indian but immensely attractive and convincing in himself. He and his one great elephant are worth seeing if any two things are on the current screen.

MARK VAN DOREN

THE THEATRE GUILD presents

Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

HENRY HULL

with

DUDLEY DIGGES

PAULINE FREDERICK

MAJESTIC

THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Mats.
Thurs. & Sat., 2.40 Evgs. 8:40. 494 seats $1.10

BEN LEIDER

DIED FOR SPAIN!

Honor his memory at the

MASS MEETING

Monday, April 26, 8 p.m.

HIPPODROME

44th St. and 6th Ave.

HEYWOOD BROWN, Chairman

Senora Ernestina Gonzalez

Dr. Stephen S. Wise

Julius Hochman

Roy Wilkins

Louis Weinstock

Rep. John T. Bernard

Tucker Smith

Charles Zimmerman

Leroy Bowman

Fellow Member of Leider's Squadron

Auspices

BEN LEIDER MEMORIAL FUND

545 Fifth Avenue, Room 910

Murray Hill 2-6544

Tickets $1.10, 50c, 25c

VACATION TOURS TO EUROPE
and Soviet

RUSSIA

Conducted by Independent

Including COPENHAGEN, STOCKHOLM, HELSINGFORS or PALESTINE, EGYPT and on return trip visit WARSAW, VIENNA, DALMATIA, VENICE, BERN and PARIS.

Special Arrangements for Teachers
Consult us about your travel plans
—Our service is FREE—

Ask for literature.

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 Union Sq., N.Y. ALgonquin 4-1500

B MEDICAL TOUR

For Physicians and Dentists
July 3, 1937

Conducted by
DR. EDWARD COHEN
and DR. D. M. ROLLET

A European Study Tour to Investigate

HOUSING AND CITY PLANNING

in England — Norway — Sweden — Holland — Belgium — France

Leaders — Dr. Carol Aronovici — Professor Dorothy Schaffter.
7 Weeks — Sails on Queen Mary July 28.

POCONO STUDY TOURS

545 Fifth Avenue

New York

The NATION
and HARPER'S for only 6 50
$ Value $9

NO WONDER that year after year this combination outsells nearly all others! Aside from the obvious saving of 27%, consider the reputation of both magazines: America's most popular progressive weekly and its most distinguished monthly.

As a reader of The Nation you know you would not suffer the inconvenience of being without it. The Nation discloses the facts behind the news and interprets them from the progressive point of view. It scrutinizes every public development to show you why it is a stride forward or a step backward. It helps you understand thoroughly the headlines of today and prepares you for those of tomorrow.

Scheduled for early publication is a series of three articles on Time, Fortune, and Henry Luce by Dwight Macdonald; two articles on New Jersey's reactionary Governor Hoffman by McAllister Coleman; an article on the Oxford Group Movement by Samuel Duber; and the continuation of the series on the Philippines by James S. Allen.

Harper's Magazine, the perfect monthly complement to The Nation, not only offers its readers factual information and critical interpretation of our headlong modern times but, also, frequently predicts events before they happen.

OTHER BARGAINS The Nation with

Atlantic Monthly	$7.50
Common Sense	7.25
Current History	6.50
New Republic	8.75
Reader's Digest	6.00
Scribner's	6.00

An absorbing article by John Allen Murphy on "Can the Small Business Man Survive?", heads an exciting list of features scheduled for early publication in Harper's, which includes "The Unconquerable Mexican" by Hubert Herring, "Uncle Sam as an Exporter" by Carl Crow, "Pulps and Confessions" by Margaret MacMullen, and "Trailer Camps and Trailer People" by Konrad Bercovici.

Subscriptions to this popular combination, as well as those combinations listed in the box, may be new or renewal and may be mailed to different addresses. Payment may be postponed thirty days. But to make certain you do not overlook these bargains, order at once on the form below!

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Send me one year of the magazines listed below. ☐ I inclose my check for $
OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

MAGAZINES	SEND TO

Letters to the Editors

A Farmer Speaks

Dear Sirs: I am a Virginia farmer and I have just read the article in your issue of March 27 in which Paul W. Ward tells us what we have long suspected. The public-minded work for years to get a law through for the common folks. Then the reactionaries are put in control and they proceed to wreck its administration. The Rural Electrification Administration is another illustration of a now common experience. There's only one solution. Give them the white light of publicity and force public opinion to drive them out of office. Men who accept the private-utility view have no right to hold office and by their daily deeds kill cooperative laws, as in this instance.

As usual The Nation is always first to get these valuable facts to the people. Mr. Ward has certainly performed an invaluable public service for the farmers of America. This one article is worth a year's subscription. Unfortunately I can't afford it, but I know I speak the mind of thousands and thousands of farmers everywhere when I express my great appreciation for Mr. Ward's public service.

ZAN BARTEL
Perth Amboy, N. J., April 1

Hope for Kitty Smith

Dear Sirs: Score One for academic freedom for teachers. As a reader of The Nation I have become liberal in my views, and it makes my blood tingle when I read that teachers have been dismissed for merely trying to live and act like other citizens of the community in which they are teaching. During the past five or six years this community has been undergoing a gradual change, with the result that teachers have come to be regarded as real citizens. In the spring election E. Burr Sherwood, young junior-high instructor, ran for a seat on the city commission. He had a definite platform which stressed most of all the need for a municipal light plant. He not only won a seat on the commission but received the largest number of votes in a field of six candidates—some of them veterans in city politics.

This election and Mr. Sherwood's victory are significant for two reasons. Mr. Sherwood was not called "on the carpet" by his administrators or the school board; the election showed how a community normally very conservative has turned about and is taking a liberal attitude on municipal ownership.

I thought you might be interested in hearing about developments that in one town at least make life more livable.

LOUIS SWANSON

Stambaugh, Mich., April 7

Racial Lines on Shipboard

Dear Sirs: A recent cruise trip to the West Indies aboard the Kungsholm prompts me to relate my experience for the benefit of those of your readers who may object to the anti-Semitic policies of the Swedish American Line.

It is the usual practice of transatlantic liners to allow passengers to choose their own table companions for the duration of a trip. To my astonishment, however, I was given a table number prior to embarkation at the pier of the Swedish American Line. I was soon to discover the reason for such efficiency. My table companions, I found, were exclusively Jewish. A careful study of the dining-room seating plan revealed that similar groupings had been arranged for other Jews on the trip.

The Kungsholm, on its cruises, holds a cocktail hour every evening to which passengers are invited as guests of the liner. In due time I received an invitation. Here again, the cruise hostess carried out the unmistakable policy of the line. As soon as I had introduced myself I was segregated at the table in the lounge which had been set aside for the other representatives of my race.

Upon my return to New York a conference with an official of the Swedish American Line brought scant satisfaction. The man attempted to confuse issues by asking me why I objected to sitting with my own people! I was further informed that the Swedish American Line has a right to establish its policies, to which I replied that passengers as well should have the right to know definitely the policies of a line on which they travel.

I should like to urge a flood of letters to the Swedish American Line protesting against its policy of racial discrimination.

MARTHA K. FEINGOLD

New York, April 8

On They Go

3 of the 6
best-selling novels in America to-day

(reported by the New York Herald Tribune April 11)

In second place

DRUMS ALONG the MOHAWK

By Walter D. Edmonds
$2.50 188th Thousand

In fourth place

WE ARE NOT ALONE

By James Hilton
$2.00 45th Thousand

In sixth place

THE LATE GEORGE APLEY

A Novel in the Form of a Memoir
By John P. Marquand
$2.50 9th Printing

LITTLE,  BROWN

1837 1937

NO LIBERAL can call himself politically or economically well-informed — until he's read "THE
COMMONWEALTH OF INDUSTRY"

by BENJAMIN A. JAVITS

At all Bookshops — $3

HARPER BROTHERS

What Is the National Lawyers' Guild?

Dear Sirs: The issue presented to the American lawyer by the recent organization of the National Lawyers' Guild is a simple one. One hundred and forty thousand lawyers do not now belong to any national bar group. We call upon these lawyers to assume that position of leadership in public life that was once theirs. This is not a struggle between the American Bar Association and the National Lawyers' Guild. It is a clash of principles. The National Lawyers' Guild stands for the child-labor amendment. It stands for the social-security laws, for minimum-wage laws, and for every law to promote human welfare. The opposing group stands against such laws.

The accumulation of distrust and prejudice against the lawyer and the courts has come from the fact that the only articulate group in America has always spoken against the interest of the ordinary citizen. More than 80 per cent of the lawyers are never heard from on issues of public interest. If the lawyer is to retain his place of leadership and power in the community, he must speak as the champion and friend of the less favored but larger groups. That is what the National Lawyers' Guild now undertakes to do on behalf of all who believe in the future of our profession.

JOHN P. DEVANEY,
President, National Lawyers' Guild
Minneapolis, March 15

CONTRIBUTORS

FRANK C. HANIGHEN is a close student of the economic forces which motivate wars. With H. C. Engelbrecht he was coauthor of "Merchants of Death."

IGNAZIO SILONE is the author of "Fontamara" and "Bread and Wine," two novels, revolutionary in theme, of peasant life in Mussolini's Italy.

HENRY LEWIS is the pseudonym of a journalist who has made a special study of the Food and Drug Administration and its problems.

JAMES S. ALLEN recently spent three months in the Philippines collecting the material for his Nation articles and a forthcoming book.

ROSE M. STEIN has covered labor news in the Pittsburgh area for The Nation and the Federated Press.

ROSS PIERCE is the author of a book of poems to be published shortly by the Arcturus Press.

DOROTHY BREWSTER teaches English in Columbia University's extension courses and is coauthor with Angus Burrell of "Dead Reckonings in Fiction" and "Modern Fiction."

WILLIAM TROY, formerly film critic of The Nation, is now a member of the English Department of Bennington College.

MELVILLE J. HERSKOVITS, professor of anthropology at Northwestern University, is the author of "Life in a Haitian Valley."

GEORGE GENZMER is one of the contributing editors of the "Dictionary of American Biography."

GERALD P. NYE is United States Senator from North Dakota. He was head of the Senate committee investigating the sale of munitions and was instrumental in drawing up our present neutrality legislation.

JACQUES BARZUN, instructor in history at Columbia University, will shortly publish a new book, "Race: The Modern Myth."

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN is a member of the Department of Education of Brooklyn College and the author of a life of Samuel Butler.

HARRY LEVIN is a Junior Lowell Fellow at Harvard University.

PHILIP RAHV is one of the editors of the Partisan Review and Anvil, a radical literary journal.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

WHICH WAY YOUTH?

HEAR THE ANSWER AT

8th National Convention
YOUNG COMMUNIST LEAGUE OF AMERICA

SPEAKERS:

• FOSTER
• BROWDER
• GREEN
• FLYNN
• HERNDON,

CHAIRMAN

Admission 25c, 40c, & $1. Entertainment

May 2nd
(SUNDAY)
Evg. at 7:30
MADISON
SQ. GARDEN
10th St. & 8th Av.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket. Sebring, Florida.

Hear the Voice
of the Lincoln Brigade

American Anti-Fascist Fighters
in Madrid

Broadcast Direct from Madrid!

(Arranged by the Friends of the Lincoln Brigade)

Commander of the Brigade
Political Leader of the Brigade John Dos Passos
Father Leopoldo Lobo Joris Ivens
Josephine Herbst Sydney Franklin and others speaking from Spain

and
ELIZABETH GURLEY FLYNN

Speaking for the first time as a Communist Party member

MECCA TEMPLE

133 West 55 Street

Admission 50c and 25c—This ad is good for 20% reduction on price of your ticket.

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 24TH promptly at 8 o'clock

Auspices of the New York State Committee of the Communist Party of America

FOR RENT—FOR SALE

SUNRISE

LAKE BUNGALOW COLONY

New RENTING: Summer Bungalows, furnished, overlooking private bathing beach; 600 ft.; Mr. M. Y. Day shopping; Low Commutation; Free boating, bathing, tennis, handball; Donding, club house.
E. Abrams, Sunrise Lake, Mendham Rd., Morristown, N. J., or 110 Riverside Dr., N. Y.; TR. 7-8357.

Oscawana Lake. New Colonial home for sale. 4 miles north of Westchester. 3 large bedrooms, pine living room, modern kitchen, bath, dining terrace. Sports facilities, golf. Will rent furnished, $600. Another beautiful home, $850. Charles Waters, Maine 4-6669.

STUDIO LOG CABIN, modernized, on hillside overlooking lake. Swimming, boating, fishing, tennis. Golf nearby. Exclusive Jewish community. Private clubhouse. Day camp for children. 2 sleeping porches, 3 bedrooms. Commuting Peekskill. Call South 8-6088.

BEST BUNGALOWS, VALLEY COTTAGE, N. Y. (near Nyack). Young Folks Colony. Pool 50x100, Tennis, Handball, Baseball, Social Hall, large grounds. 45 minutes Bridge. 27 miles West Shore. Tel. Congers 317.

ROOMS WANTED

2 German-Jewish refined professional girls to share apartment or 1-2 rooms Long Island, Westchester, cooking facilities. Box No. 894, c/o The Nation.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 1, 1937

NUMBER 18

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

493

EDITORIALS:

IL DUCE PULLS THE STRINGS

495

BLUEPRINTS FOR AMERICAN FASCISM

496

THE TROTSKY COMMISSION

496

FOOD FOR SPAIN

497

HOW TO PREVENT DEPRESSION

by Paul W. Ward

498

"TIME" AND HENRY LUCE by Dwight Macdonald 500

THE BATTLE OF OSHAWA by Roger Irwin 503

AN IMMEDIATE PROGRAM FOR HOUSING
by Albert Mayer 505

FASCISM MOVES ON RUMANIA
by Henry C. Wolfe 507

ANOTHER WORD ON NEUTRALITY
by Oswald Garrison Villard 508

ELISHA BARES HIS TEETH by Heywood Broun 509

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

MAN AND MULE by LeGarde S. Doughty 510

TO AMERICA: WITH LOVE by Stuart Chase 510

THE NEW YORK STAGE by Joseph Wood Krutch 511

"GLORIED FROM WITHIN" by William Troy 511

DEATH ON AN ISLAND by Philip Blair Rice 512

THE VICTORIAN AGE by Emery Neff 514

AN AMERICAN TRIBUTE by Avrahm Yarmolinsky 515

SHORTER NOTICES 516

LOVE IN CONNECTICUT by Joseph Wood Krutch 517

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin 518

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE MOST SERIOUS ASPECT OF PRESIDENT Roosevelt's new-born passion for economy is the threatened shelving of a number of the most important bills now before Congress. If immediate pressure is not brought by progressive groups throughout the country, there is grave danger that the Wagner housing bill, discussed by Albert Mayer elsewhere in this issue, will be lost. Similarly threatened are the farm-tenancy bill, the national-education bill, and the proposed appropriation of $25,000,000 to continue the Public Health Service's brilliant battle against venereal disease. After years of struggle these measures seemed on the verge of passage. All are of the utmost social importance. A 25 per cent cut in the military budget would go a long way toward providing the necessary funds for these projects. Should this be ruled out, Congress ought to face the necessity of raising taxes. As a country we can ill afford the luxury of low taxes when it means that workers are badly housed, that tenant farmers are denied the minimum essentials of a livelihood, that children are unable to obtain decent schooling, and that the unfortunate victims of venereal disease shall be allowed to die or spread infection for lack of medical care.

★

THE INCREASE IN THE BRITISH INCOME TAX should be a convincing answer to those who have contended that the American rates are unduly burdensome on business. During the coming year a Britisher with a wife and two children who earns $10,000 a year will have to pay an income tax of no less than $1,627.50. An American with the same income and the same obligations would pay only $296. The discrepancy is even greater for those of more moderate incomes. Thus a $4,000 man with the same dependents would pay $312.50 in Britain—more than the $10,000 man in this country—while a similar person earning $4,000 in the United States would be assessed just $12. It is true that for moderate incomes our state tax is frequently higher than the federal tax. In the case of the $4,000 man the state tax would be $21, making a total tax of $33, or just about one-tenth the tax bill of his British cousin. Even more instructive than the increase in the British income levy is the projected reintroduction of the excess-profits tax, which will take up to one-third of the industrial profits attributable to the rearmament program.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC
LIB.

There is no question that the new tax will prove more burdensome than our recently enacted corporation levy. But the British Tories have a way of enacting legislation which puts to shame our so-called New Deal.

★

THE PRESSURE OF BAD LOGIC, OF SHIPPING men pursuing high profits, and of pro-Loyalist Liberals and Laborites has forced the Baldwin Cabinet to reverse its decision. The British navy is now protecting ships that are running the very weak rebel blockade of the northern coast of Spain. Bilbao is getting its food. Its resistance is thereby strengthened. The attackers appear to be approaching the city and unless there are negotiations for a peaceful surrender it is possible that one more Spanish city will be besieged. General Mola, reinforced, according to reports, by regular Italian troops, continues the offensive against the Basque capital on which the rebels have been expending an inordinate amount of energy. The government, with indeterminate success to date, has sought to take advantage of this circumstance by attacking on the Teruel and Madrid fronts. Meanwhile, after a dozen delays, the Non-Intervention Committee's international patrol—not blockade—has finally been instituted. It had not functioned a week before the Valencia government charged that an Italian destroyer on patrol had violated the London committee's rules. This entire system of patrol, so laboriously hatched to bring peace to Spain, may yet become a source of serious trouble. A little provocative act by either Germany or Italy could easily result in an intensification of intervention.

★

WHILE INDECISIVE FIGHTING PROCEEDS ON the battlefields, the Valencia government has demonstrated its enhanced power by reestablishing the civilian government of Madrid and ending the mandate of the junta which took over control of the capital when Franco's siege started on November 6. At the same time the Caballero government is bringing undisciplined political elements and military units under control. Franco, on the other hand, has replied to the recent mutinies and permanent disaffection in his territory by setting up a frankly advertised fascist dictatorship—which Mr. Carney, incidentally, has not yet mentioned in the New York Times. There is to be only one legal party, the fascist Phalangists, but in order to placate the Requettes, extreme Carlist monarchists, a vague promise is thrown out to them that some day maybe a king will rule in Madrid. The people of Spain have proved with their votes and their blood that they want neither a fascist nor a monarchist regime.

★

LABOR IS ASSUREDLY ON THE MARCH—NOT least in the capitalist press. In serried columns shoe workers in Maine, automobile workers in Canada, freight handlers on the New York docks, and agricultural slaves in California present their demands to industry, defile into picket lines, get fired or fired upon, or sign agreements in spite of red scares, injunctions, back-to-work movements, yellow unions, and very special correspondents. To an old newspaperman like Elisha Hanson the very fact that labor takes up so much space these days must seem another attack on the freedom of the press. Item: The Oshawa strike was won. In three resolutions the Oshawa local reaffirmed its allegiance to the C. I. O., gave a vote of confidence to Hugh Thompson and Homer Martin (Premier Hepburn's "foreign agitators"), and spanked the "controlled press" for its attempt to deceive the public and defeat the strike. . . . Item: In Maine, Judge Harry Manser issued a sweeping injunction—in the name of the Wagner Act!—declaring a strike of shoe workers illegal. The judge and the employers have now had second thoughts and conferences are in progress. . . . Item: In California, the latest move to organize agricultural and cannery workers ran into deputy sheriffs and tear-gas bombs at Stockton. No settlement as yet. . . . Item: In the model town of Hershey, Pennsylvania, the chocolate soldiers of the Loyal Workers' Club carried the day in an N. L. R. B. election, defeating the C. I. O. union by a vote of 1,542 to 781. That for Mr. Hanson's sweet tooth.

★

ANGELO HERNDON HAS BEEN SET FREE AND another reactionary state law discredited by the Supreme Court in a five-to-four decision in favor of free speech. Under a Georgia statute going back to Reconstruction days Herndon had been convicted of insurrection and sentenced to eighteen to twenty years on the chain gang for being a member of the Communist Party. This happy decision is a companion piece to the court's invalidation of the Oregon criminal-syndicalism statute in January in the De Jonge case. Let the states look to their laws—especially those which tamper with the Bill of Rights—and they will save themselves both good money and bad publicity.

★

THE ELEPHANT AND THE TIGER SEEM TO BE making a united front at Albany in an attempt to keep the American Labor Party from playing a decisive role in the New York City mayoralty campaign this fall. The six Berg bills constitute an attack upon the spirit as well as the letter of democracy; yet four of them passed both houses of the legislature. One of the bills passed would make it necessary for the American Labor Party, which will probably back LaGuardia in New York City this fall, to name its slate of candidates five weeks before the primary election. The others would require an independent candidate to obtain 56,000 signatures to a petition instead of the present 7,500 and hedge such petitions about so as to make the independent nominations almost impossible. The bills deserve a resounding veto. . . . The bill to abolish the third degree, passed in the Assembly, was duly killed in the Senate by means of another united front composed of the police departments, the district attorneys, Mayor LaGuardia, and Senator McNaboe. . . . The Fischel minimum-wage bill became law—to take the place of the Wald Act which was killed by the Supreme Court last spring. Gone today and here tomorrow. . . . The legislature is now struggling to fill a hole of $20,000,000 in the budget. Republican bills to meet it by an increased inheritance tax, a stock-transfer tax, and a tax on gifts met with ■ sudden shyness on the part of wealthy Republican legislators. And favor has now shifted to Governor Lehman's plan for raising the tax on gasoline to four cents—which will pass the burden on to the ultimate flivver.

★

A REPUBLICAN PRESIDENT'S SON STOOD UP before the D. A. R. in annual convention assembled last week and told them without qualification that they could not get anywhere "by painting red networks of communism across every evening sky." Charles P. Taft, who gave the Daughters this shock, was one of the intimate advisers of Governor Landon in the last campaign and is respected and admired as a civic leader in Cincinnati, his home town. Hence he cannot be whistled down as a "red" or a bolshevik. But he did not stop there. He also informed the Daughters that "the one who shouts communism is always discounted as a fascist at heart and vice-versa." He next denounced the "current efforts to identify pacifism with socialism," a little game in which the D. A. R. has always led the way. "Young people hate war with a deep hatred," Mr. Taft went on, "and they should. They cannot see why 'defense' means protection of foreign trade and foreign investments." Then he told the Daughters a few sound truths about the revolution of which they are so proud—and so ignorant. He explained to them that the leaders of that revolution were "vigorous young men who were not afraid of being called 'subversive' influences," and he reminded them that a lot of the "best people" refused to side with the revolutionists and that Governor Hutchinson must have felt toward Samuel Adams and John Hancock "a good deal as some high automobile officials feel toward sit-down strikers." In short, Mr. Taft did an extremely good job. We wonder, though, if a good time was had by all who heard him.

★

WE AGREE WITH MR. VILLARD THAT OUR participation in another world war would mean the end of democracy in this country; and we feel that this is the strongest argument for preventing such a war. Mr. Villard believes that the neutrality bill guarantees that we will not get into war. We feel, on the contrary, that it offers no real protection to the United States, and that its inconsistency with the principle of collective security greatly increases the likelihood of war abroad. Moreover, any action by the United States at this time declaring a general embargo on war materials would be an open invitation to Hitler to launch an attack, since the latter knows full well the dependence of Britain and France on American supplies. The cash-and-carry policy, on the other hand, would set up precisely the same chain of events as that by which we became involved in the last war. In fact, any action that the United States takes with respect to trade in war time is bound to injure one combatant and aid the other. In the world today there is no safe and easy road to peace. The duty of the realistic pacifist is to choose the course that offers the best chance of strengthening the forces of democracy in Europe on which peace depends.

Il Duce Pulls the Strings

IF Chancellor Schuschnigg entertained any illusion ■ to who was the real ruler of Austria, it must have been rudely shattered by his visit to Venice last week. Schuschnigg has developed a definite program for putting Austria on its own feet. He believes that the restoration of the monarchy would be ■ bulwark against absorption by the Third Reich. He has also toyed with the idea of an agreement with Czecho-Slovakia as a means of escaping Italian and German domination. And yet he apparently hoped in the interval to persuade Mussolini to continue guaranteeing Austrian independence. A few months ago Il Duce would have doubtless been ready enough to support Schuschnigg as an offset to Nazi influence. But fundamental changes have taken place since Mussolini last sent troops to the Brenner Pass, notably the formation of the new international fascist front. In return for Nazi concessions to Italy, ■ yet undisclosed, Mussolini has obviously agreed to support Germany's interests in Central Europe.

As a result Schuschnigg appears to have drawn a complete blank. Although the report that he will accept Nazis in his government may have been exaggerated, there can be no doubt that he was ordered to forget the possibility of Hapsburg restoration and to look to Germany ■ well ■ to Italy for future support. Effective pressure also seems to have been applied to cause him to postpone the projected agreement with Czecho-Slovakia.

The significance of the Austrian conversations, together with the almost endless meetings which are being held between Italian and German officials, can scarcely be overestimated. Following the setback to fascist aspirations in Spain, Hitler and Mussolini appear to have redoubled their efforts in Central Europe. Yugoslavia has already somewhat unwillingly been brought into the German-Italian orbit. A bitter struggle is now being waged in Rumania between the fascist Iron Guard and the democratic elements associated with former Premier Maniu and former Foreign Minister Titulescu. The position of Hungary was never in question. This gives the fascist powers virtually a free hand in Central Europe.

Under the circumstances, the Anglo-French declaration guaranteeing Belgium's independence and reaffirming the non-aggression agreement between the two countries takes on renewed importance. The pro-Nazi element in Belgium received a severe setback a fortnight ago. Thus for the first time since the rise of Hitler we are witnessing the division of Europe into two camps more or less evenly divided in strength. On both sides we may expect feverish jockeying for position in the coming months.

Blueprints for Fascism

HELL is said to be paved with good intentions. An illustration is provided by the various bills introduced into Congress to "take the profits out of war." All these measures contain phraseology which might readily be used for the establishment of a fascist dictatorship in the United States. The most threatening is the Sheppard-Hill bill, which is sponsored by the American Legion and is believed to have Administration support. Contrary to the impression which exists in some circles, the Sheppard-Hill bill does not go so far as to draft civilian labor or to muzzle the press. But neither does it conscript capital or eliminate war profits.

Apart from the provision empowering the President to draft all men between twenty-one and thirty-one for military service immediately on the declaration of war, its dangers are implicit rather than explicit. The President is given widespread control over business by means of licenses, priorities of shipments, price-fixing, and the registration of factory managers. He is also given power "to determine and publicly proclaim from time to time the material resources, industrial organizations, and public services over which government control . . . shall be necessary," and to determine "what classes of public service, real property, or right, or . . . manufacturers or producers . . . shall be required to operate under licenses." These clauses may not be consciously intended to serve as the legal foundation of fascism in this country, but their vagueness and their sweeping character make them admirably suited for just such a purpose. And it is not even necessary to await the outbreak of war to have these provisions invoked. The powers granted by the bill become effective either on the declaration of war or in a "national emergency" proclaimed by Congress.

While the Nye-Maverick bill is in many ways a better measure, it contains similar dangers. For example, it authorizes the registration of any person engaged in the "management or control of any technical, industrial, or manufacturing plant or establishment of any kind whatsoever." This might easily be twisted so as to apply to labor leaders, and would seem to imply complete control over newspaper owners and editors. Even more threatening is a provision authorizing the President to take over a factory in the event of a labor dispute "and operate it under such rules and regulations as he may deem proper . . . to best subserve the interests of the nation in the successful prosecution of war." The Nye-Maverick bill, however, shows no such solicitude for business as does the Sheppard-Hill bill, and is much more drastic in its taxation clauses. Moreover, the Nye bill does not come into effect until Congress declares that the existence of a state of war has created a national emergency.

It may be argued that since some degree of dictatorship is inevitable in time of war it is unrealistic to struggle against measures which are fairly free from anti-labor bias. We know that men will be drafted; why not see to it now that capital shall be penalized as much as possible? With the tax provisions of the bill we have no quarrel. No action that could be taken at the present time is likely to be so conducive to peace as legislation which really threatens the elimination of war profits. But even the fear that a war-time dictatorship is inescapable does not justify Congress in adopting a measure in peace time giving sanction to that dictatorship. At best, the industrial-control clauses in the war-profits bills furnish—in the words of the War Department—a method of helping the country "to pass promptly and smoothly to a war footing." At worst, they may very readily serve the same purpose for a future American dictator, as the Brüning decrees did for Hitler in Germany. But whatever may be said regarding the ineffectiveness of German democracy in the face of Hitlerism, it cannot be said that it provided him with a complete advance blueprint of dictatorship such as is contained in both the Sheppard-Hill and the Nye-Maverick bills.

The Trotsky Commission

THE commission sent to Mexico to examine Leon Trotsky has come home laden with depositions, copies of letters, and verbatim testimony, but minus a member. Final judgment on the commission's findings must await its report, but from a knowledge of its membership and from the day-by-day newspaper stories of the hearings we have gained the inescapable impression that the whole performance so far has been a waste of time, effort, and money.

Leon Trotsky may be innocent or guilty of the crimes he was charged with by defendants and prosecution in the Moscow trials. He has not been tried; so no one knows. He cannot be tried, unless he goes back to Russia and submits to the dubious mercies of Soviet justice or unless he is subjected to extradition proceedings in some country with which the Soviet Union has diplomatic relations. Both courses are utterly unlikely. The first would be an act of suicide; the second would involve a legal struggle on foreign soil for which the Soviet government has shown no inclination. The alternative proposed and put into effect by the Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky was an examination of the available evidence by a subcommittee to be followed by hearings before a larger commission which presumably will hand down a final verdict on Trotsky's guilt. The whole procedure seems to us doomed to futility for the same reasons that the preliminary hearings in Coyoacan were futile.

There is no use pretending that the subcommittee which visited Trotsky had an impartial appearance. Three of its five members were members of the defense committee. One of these, John Dewey, is sufficiently removed from factional political concerns so that his personal detachment may be assumed, but his connection with the committee was a serious liability. Two of the other members, Suzanne LaFollette and Benjamin Stolberg, were known as warm admirers of Trotsky although not followers of his doctrine. Carleton Beals was generally considered free of bias. Otto Ruhle, the fifth member, had a record of long-standing opposition both to the Communist Party and to Trotsky. But the fact that he had been dropped from the party might have inclined him toward a fellow-victim of bureaucratic rule, no matter what their doctrinal differences.

Where a feller least needs a friend is on an impartial commission investigating his record. The Trotsky committee should ruthlessly have eliminated its own members and all friends of Trotsky from the commission. It is true that several Communists were asked to serve and refused; but this might have been expected. Rather than appoint persons who could even be accused of bias the committee should have combed the membership lists of liberal and labor and defense organizations—or even such aloof bodies as the bar associations—to find members who were free from both political and emotional commitments; but the committee failed to do so, and as a result its commission's verdict has been discounted in advance. The impression of bias was, of course, reinforced by the resignation and accusations of Carleton Beals.

Public suspicion is fatal to the defense technique chosen by the Trotsky committee. It is not necessary to accept without question Mr. Beals's charges as reported in the press or to throw doubt on the honesty of the commission's intentions. It is necessary only to emphasize the fact that its findings would have to look—as well as be—impartial in order to contribute anything to the defense of Trotsky or to the illumination of the dark corners in the Moscow trials. The only verdict which would be generally accepted from such a commission would be a verdict of guilt.

Even in the matter of evidence the commission was unlucky. At the start Trotsky revealed that he had few originals of the hundreds of letters by means of which he hopes to prove the innocent nature of his actions in exile. This discovery must have caused consternation among the investigators. They had to accept copies of important documents and take the existence of the originals, for the time being at least, on trust. The news stories were doubtless inadequate, but they gave no indication that the week's inquiry brought out important points which had not been made previously.

What the investigation did bring out, apparently, was documentary support for Trotsky's repeated assertion that he was visited neither by Piatakov nor Romm. These are crucial points, but by themselves are not sufficient, even if proved, to establish Trotsky's innocence, although they would seriously damage the case against him. But they cannot be proved because the evidence cannot be subjected to the scrutiny and attack that would be provided in any ordinary court of law. That, in fact, is the fatal flaw in the whole effort to solve this burning question through the amateur efforts of an unofficial commission, however well-meaning. Even after the final verdict has been rendered we shall still not know whether Trotsky is innocent or guilty. Skeptics who from the first have refused to accept without reservation testimony presented in ex parte proceedings will continue in their present state of uncomfortable agnosticism.

Food for Spain

THE response to The Nation's campaign to raise money among its readers for the purchase of food for noncombatants in Loyalist Spain has been warm, generous, and amazingly widespread; and though the primary purpose of the drive was to relieve suffering among the Spanish women and children in whose name it was launched, we cannot but think that its effect upon those who gave was also important. Every contributor must have experienced a sense of participation in the struggle of a great nation to be free, and a determination to be forever on guard, in his own country, against the dark forces which are attempting to overwhelm the Spanish people.

The following foodstuffs have gone forward—from The Nation's readers to Spanish noncombatants: 294,000 pounds of flour; 75,000 tins of sardines; 88,000 cans of evaporated milk; 24,000 tins of corned beef; and 25 tons of beans. The total amount of money raised was $26,557.67, of which approximately $1,000 was required for expenses in connection with shipping and insurance.

We have received from the Under Secretary of the Ministry of Agriculture of the Spanish government a cabled acknowledgment of our notification that the first shipment of food had been sent. We pass it on to our readers, to whom in reality it is addressed.

We have received the letter announcing the splendid gift which readers of The Nation have sent to the non-combatant population of loyal Republican Spain. In their name I send this expression of profound gratitude not only for the foodstuffs bestowed but for this demonstration of the spiritual cohesion of all those who fight in defense of liberty and justice against fascism which enslaves peoples. A brotherly embrace to all the anti-fascists of the glorious American people.

In Spain our 294,000 pounds of flour will be baked into loaves of bread. To the women and children to whom it will be dispensed The Nation will perhaps mean little. But they will know that it is life-giving anti-fascist bread, just as they know that the bombs that rain upon them are death-dealing fascist bombs.

Because The Nation lacks the facilities to carry on "for the duration of the war" it has brought its campaign to an end. But we wish to impress upon our readers that the Spanish struggle, and the need for bread, continues. We shall be glad to receive further contributions, which will be earmarked for food for noncombatants and turned over to the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy. Meanwhile we wish formally to express our gratitude to those volunteer workers who, by giving so freely of their time and talent, made it possible for us to devote to the purchase of food the impressive proportion of 97 cents out of every dollar raised. In particular we wish to thank Helen Woodward, who headed the drive, and Rebecca Reis, whose devotion to a self-assumed duty was unflagging.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

How to Prevent Depression

Washington, April 25

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT has started quarter-backing down again in a big way and so badly that Congress, exercising its prerogatives as coach, ought to bench him right away. The play he called in his relief and budget message a few days ago was a disgrace to the federal team.

If Roosevelt had been as honest and plain-spoken as his duty to the public requires him to be, that relief message, which somehow avoided any discussion of the relief and unemployment problems, would have read something like this:

"To the Congress of the United States: Last year I started the practice of omitting from my January budget message a request for funds for unemployment relief during the fiscal year beginning July 1. I said I'd ask for relief funds a little later when we could be more certain of what we'd need, and three months later I sent up such a message, asking for $1,500,000,000. It wasn't enough, and I knew it wasn't enough, but the Supreme Court had just knocked out the AAA processing taxes and left us short $1,017,000,000, and so I wanted to go a little light on the relief appropriation for the time being. I hinted in my message that I'd probably be back for more later, and, as you'll remember, in January this year I had to ask you for an additional $790,000,000 to piece out the original $1,500,000,000 until the end of June. At about the same time I sent up my 1938 budget message, again putting off a request for relief funds until I could tell more definitely what was needed. Now the time has come to tell you what we'll need and why.

"We'll need about $4,000,000,000. I don't mean just for relief. I mean for a real attack on the unemployment problem. It's about time we were making such an attack. It's our biggest problem and our basic problem. Until it's solved, we'll get nowhere in this or any other country, and we've just been toying with the thing these last four years. I know I've said over and over again that we aren't going to let anybody starve in this country, and I've boasted that we've made good on that pledge. But you know as well as I do that all we've been doing is to keep several million Americans just above the starvation line. What's more, we've just been keeping them there as a big pool of surplus labor endangering the jobs of many more millions of Americans who, incidentally, haven't been doing so well; we've boosted their average wage to $1,180 a year since 1933 and anybody knows you can't really live on that. Furthermore, the people with jobs won't be doing well at all if we ever pull the plug on the pool of surplus labor and force the millions on relief to compete with them for jobs for whatever pennies are offered.

"In short, we just haven't been getting anywhere. It looks now as if we were going to have about 4,000,000 jobless on our hands year in and year out, and that's being conservative. We had 9,000,000 jobless on our hands at the end of 1936. We hoped to get that figure down to 6,500,000 or 7,000,000 this year, but that would require industry to make jobs for nearly 3,000,000, allowing for about 500,000 youngsters who will be coming of working age and demanding jobs. Just how much chance there is of industry making work for an additional 3,000,000 workers you can judge for yourself, for our figures show that industry in general has learned during the depression how to make four men do the work that five did in 1929, and will soon have three men doing the work of 1929's five.

"Besides, things don't look so good from several other angles. Industry can't hire more people unless it can sell their output, and it can't sell their output unless there are a lot of people waiting with money to pay for it, and under our system, as you know, the workers, who are almost the only customers industry has, never have been able to get enough money to buy back what they produce. During the late boom they were 14 per cent short on the wherewithal, and they made it up through instalment buying—that is, by borrowing against their future wages. These things produced the depression, and these things are worse now than they were eight years ago. I've got figures to show that workers' income a month or so back was only 81.5 per cent as high as in 1929, whereas the cost of living was 87 per cent as high and wholesale prices nearly 91 per cent. Furthermore, and this will surprise you, to keep their heads above water, people are mortgaging their future wages even more heavily than in 1929. The New York Trust Company's April Index notes that instalment credit is already 50 per cent higher than in 1929, and some of the economists have figured out that $12,000,000,000 worth of instalment credit will be needed this year to carry a business volume like that of 1929, when there was between $6,000,000,000 and $7,000,000,000 worth of instalment buying. We've got to realize, too, that all these wage increases workers have been getting don't amount to much right now in view of the price trend, and that they'll amount to even less next fall when the present upward swoop of wholesale prices is transmitted to retail prices. If retail prices rise only 10 per cent $4,000,000,000 will be taken out of consumers' pockets, and that's a lot more than these wage increases you've been reading about.

"At any rate, you can see that there is little chance of our reducing our unemployment rolls much in the next twelve to fourteen months. And that brings us back to the question of what we should do about it. Harry Hopkins and his gang and a lot of other fellows, including the Workers' Alliance, which speaks for those actually on relief, have been after me with a lot of plans. They say the thing to do is look this problem in the face and get it over with before it's too late and we get caught in another big crash. They say we should abolish the means test—that is, stop providing relief jobs only for the destitute—and set up a system for making genuine, useful jobs for every able-bodied man or woman whom industry either doesn't employ or doesn't employ at decent wages. On top of that, they say, we should round out our agricultural program to reduce to a minimum unemployment and destitution in the rural areas; that means, of course, more rural rehabilitation, reforestation, flood-control, and soil-conservation work, including a real attack on the problem of farm tenancy, which must be solved before we can do anything effective in the field of soil conservation. They also think we ought to do something about child labor to reduce to a minimum the pressure of the youngsters on the labor market, and they would have us do something about minimum wages and maximum hours to raise the purchasing power of employed men and women and cause industry to employ more. In addition, they think we ought to amend and broaden the Social Security Act so that it will cover many more millions of workers than it now covers and so that the benefits it provides will become payable practically at once. This would further relieve pressure on the labor market by freeing a lot of our old workers from the necessity of clinging to their jobs. It also would take a lot of them off relief.

All these things put together wouldn't wholly solve our problem, of course. Though they'd go a long way in that direction, we'd still have a lot of persons on relief who, because they are past fifty or have been out of work for from two to five years, will never get jobs again and are by now so broken physically and morally that they're scarcely fit for jobs. We'd have to trust the states and municipalities to take care of them on a direct-relief basis. We've pushed over 1,000,000 relief people on to their hands, more than half of whom belong on WPA jobs if we're to keep our pledge to take care of the employables and let the localities handle the unemployables. About 600,000 of those on local direct-relief rolls are employables. Worse still from our point of view, they're concentrated in a few metropolitan areas that already are busted financially or haven't yet had time to recover from the depression, and therefore can't meet their relief bills.

"We ought to put into effect all those plans that Hopkins and the rest have laid out. If we don't, we'll soon be in a worse mess than the present one. But I've got to break down and confess that I'm not going to recommend any such thing. That would cost, as I've said, about $4,000,000,000 and maybe a lot more. I'm not even going to ask you for enough to keep on doing what we have been doing. I'm going to ask you for $1,500,000,000. That means we'll have to leave WPA wages where they are—at about $800 a year—despite the increase in living costs. It means we can't abolish the means test. It means we've got to stop thinking about doing something about housing, farm tenancy, rural rehabilitation, and the like. It means we've got to take a tuck in our agricultural program and drop our crop insurance and ever-normal granary plans. It also means that we can't help the states and cities, that we can't do anything substantial about federal aid to education, and that we'll just have to let the PWA die a natural death. Of course, letting the PWA die will increase our unemployment problem by several hundred thousand. But that's the least of it. Cutting down our relief appropriation will force us to squeeze from 200,000 to 500,000, and perhaps more, off the WPA rolls.

"I know I said in my January budget message that 'we must continue to spend substantial sums to provide work for those whom industry has not yet absorbed' and that 'this government does not propose next year, any more than during the past four years, to allow American families to starve.' I hope you'll be kind enough not to tax me with those statements. I've already had practically to stop talking to Hopkins; I can hardly face him any more. And I'm so confused I'll have to ask you just to vote me the $1,500,000,000 and let me decide in June the details of how it shall be spent.

"I'm sorry things are that way, but it just can't be helped, as I see it, and I hope you'll see it my way, too. I hope you won't follow the lead of Maury Maverick and his group which wants you to pass the Voorhis bill, which would appropriate $2,500,000,000 instead of the sum I recommend. I hope even more that you won't follow the lead of Boileau and his progressive bloc which is pushing the Workers' Alliance bill for $3,000,000,000. I'd prefer that you trailed along behind Senator Byrnes, who wants to cut my proposal to $1,000,000,000, and I hope there's something in the reports that you will cut it at least to $1,200,000,000. Even if you vote the $1,500,000,000 I recommend, that will give us only $1,820,000,000 for recovery and relief this next year and out of that will have to come over $300,000,000 for things like PWA administration, Boulder canyon, rivers and harbors, highways, and public buildings, so I may have to come back at you again in January and ask for a little more, especially since what we have now probably won't last us until the end of June and we may have to dip into next year's appropriation to finish out the current year. Especially, too, since I probably will have to make another speech about not letting anybody starve, and Hopkins, taking advantage of it, probably will go out and spend money as though I intended to be taken literally. But I'll really try not to come back for more. because I have on my hands what the fiscal boys call a budgetary dilemma.

"You see, we've got to start economizing. We've been spending billions of dollars that we didn't have, that we never earned. We've been borrowing the dough, and now the Treasury and fellows like Marriner Eccles tell me we're getting to the point where we won't be able to borrow any more. That means the banks, the people from whom we borrow the money, don't think we'll be able to pay it back. They say, if we keep on going as we are, we'll have inflation, and that means that the flywheel of our economic machine—prices—will fly to pieces. I know it sounds kind of funny to hear that this big country with all its people, all its machines and resources, and all its energy and talent, can't produce enough things to pay off its debts, especially with all those millions unemployed and ready to work. But that's the shape of things, and it's getting no better. I thought we were going to spend only about $2,250,000,000 more this year than we took in, and now I find that the taxes we've levied are going to net us $604,000,000 less than we expected.

"I don't know just why my plans for balancing the budget have gone to pot. I thought that tax bill we fixed up last year would do the trick. I thought we'd soon fill the till with that corporate-surplus tax. I know darn well that corporate profits are busting all records, and maybe we were too hasty about knocking off the excess-profits tax; it might have been making us rich by now. The Treasury's statisticians insist that their calculations on what we could expect from the 1936 tax bill were sound. It looks as if it was the Treasury's legal division that slipped when they said they'd plugged every loophole in the law before it was passed. But the trouble is we can't do anything about that right now. By about next November the Treasury expects to have found what's wrong with our tax laws and recommend changes. Of course, we might do a little doctoring right now, but it might reverse the business trend and, besides, we've got this court bill on our hands. So the only thing left to do is economize.

"Don't let that frighten you. I don't mean it too literally. For example, I indicated in my January message that we could go as high as $1,537,123,000 for relief, but I'm going to cut that down to $1,500,000,000. On the other hand, I'm going to suggest that, while you're trimming down the relief appropriation, you increase appropriations for other federal activities by $63,546,659, so that our 1938 expenditures, instead of actually being smaller than I suggested in January, will be $30,392,746 larger, despite the drop in income to which I've referred. I want most of the increase for the CCC. That's the agency I set up in 1933 as an emergency affair, saying that, of course, we were not going to allow a situation to continue that necessitated the existence of anything like the CCC. I've changed my mind about that, too. The CCC's to be permanent from now on. The cut we're making in our relief appropriation—and it's a substantial one, 31 per cent below that for the current fiscal year and 41 per cent below that for 1936—will help take care of some of the increase in appropriations for other agencies. And, by the way, we're not cutting the army and navy, except in their non-military branches; we'll go on spending about $1,000,000,000 a year on preparations for war. I'm sure you'll be pleased to know, on the other hand, that we're cutting about $1,000,000 off the appropriation for the department we maintain to keep us out of war. Yes, the State Department has been cut to $16,707,000.

"FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT."

"Time" and Henry Luce

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

IN THE year 1920 Briton Hadden and Henry Robinson Luce were graduated from Yale. Their college careers had been glorious and cooperative. Together they had run the Yale Daily News, together they had become campus "big men." Their classmates voted Hadden "most likely to succeed" and Luce "most brilliant," a judgment which would have been sounder had it been precisely reversed. Two years after graduation they reunited forces and determined to go ahead with a project which they had been talking about ever since they went to Hotchkiss together. Their idea was to publish a magazine summarizing the news of the week. In Luce's words: "We reached the conclusion that most people were not well informed and that something should be done. . . ." To make a start, they raised $86,000 from such people as E. Roland Harriman, H. P. Davison, the late Dwight Morrow, Harvey Firestone, and, above all, various members of the Harkness family. Time first appeared in 1923—a gawky, sketchy, amateurish job, lean for lack of advertising. For five discouraging years Luce and Hadden had an uphill fight. Net profits in 1927 were just $3,860.

But in 1928, for no particular reason, Time began to "click": profits jumped to $126,000. Luce had fairly begun his march to success. In the winter of 1929 Hadden died of a streptococcus infection. Luce marched on. As the national economy contracted, Time, Inc., expanded. (Time, Inc., is the corporation which, among other activities, publishes Time.) Time, Inc., founded Fortune in 1929, went on the air with the March of Time in 1931, bought the Architectural Forum in 1932, began producing the March of Time in the movies in 1935. Last fall Time, Inc., produced Life, a weekly picture magazine which already sells 1,300,000 copies a week. Last year Time, Inc., reported gross income of $12,900,000 and net income of $2,700,000.

This mighty army, conqueror of one rich journalistic province after another, bears on its banners proud boasts: "Factual"—"Objective"—"Impartial"—"Unbiased." In the words of President Luce in the 1936 annual report: "The business of Time, Inc., is the effective communication of information. . . ." Or as Managing Editor Martin of Time put it not long ago in an address before the Audit Bureau of Circulation: "Within the confines of Time's rather rigid editorial formula, the editor's job is to make the reader feel he is enjoying each week a vital, essential service . . . which must always give the sense of having received 15 cents' worth of useful information from a source of known integrity." And so Time, Inc., is an enormous mechanism designed to give the American public the Real Dope, straight from the shoulder, without—in its own words—"windy bias," neither corrupted by radical dogma nor distorted by pressure from interested parties. Like all machines, it is vastly impersonal. Its products bear the name of no individual author, appearing as pronouncements ex cathedra with the whole weight of the organization behind them. The mechanism is unparalleled in journalism. A corps of researchers gather the raw material from newspapers, libraries, interviews, phone calls, learned and technical journals, cables and telegrams from special correspondents all over the world. A corps of writers strain this material clear of all editorial bias and fabricate it into articles, movie and radio scripts, picture captions. A corps of editors, headed by Luce in person, revise the finished product word by word, removing any last lingering odor of partisanship. After such triple-distilling the indescribably pure product is ready for the printer—who presumably wears antiseptic rubber gloves. Not since the Vatican Council of 1870 has the world witnessed such a heroic effort to arrive at the truth through the impersonal collaboration of many minds.*

It is a great, a superhuman conception. That it falls short of perfection is to be understood. But does it achieve a reasonable success? Is the human mind capable of functioning in a vacuum free from social and economic pressures? The answers to such questions become increasingly urgent as the public demonstrates an increasing confidence in Time, Inc., as a source of pure, unadulterated factual information. The 1,300,000 people who buy Life every week are the latest converts. To them add Time's 650,000 buyers. Add Fortune's 140,000 subscribers and the Architectural Forum's 30,000. Add the 8,000,000 people who are estimated to listen weekly to the radio March of Time, which has been repeatedly voted the most popular dramatic program on the air. Add the estimated 20,000,000 who in 9,000 theaters in this country and abroad every month see the newsreel March of Time. This adds up to some 30,120,000 people who are reached and, presumably, affected by the journalistic activities of Time, Inc. There is doubtless considerable duplication here, but on the other hand this calculation doesn't count in the millions of non-buying readers of Luce's magazines. Fortune, for example, once claimed twenty readers per copy, which would give it an audience of 3,000,000.

An organization which puts ideas into 30,000,000 heads is a powerful little gadget to be under the control of a single individual, even the most brilliant member of Yale '20. There can be little question of Luce's personal dominance at Time, Inc. He is the founder, the controlling stockholder, and the chief executive. His holdings of Time, Inc., common stock are estimated at 102,300 shares out of a total of 238,000. (For this and many other data see Wolcott Gibbs's excellent article in the New Yorker for November 28, 1936.) While Hadden was alive, he and Luce alternately acted as editor-in-chief and business manager, swapping jobs at the end of the year—a display of virtuosity they are said to have also practiced on the Yale Daily News. Since Hadden's death, Luce has filled both jobs himself. Nor is this authority merely titular. Luce actively directs editorial policy on all his magazines; on occasion he edits an issue of Time or Fortune; of late months he has taken direct charge of Life; he plans circulation drives and advertising promotion; he keeps a sharp eye on investments, salaries, printing costs, and even office management. Advertising and Selling recently called him "one of our fast-dwindling group of great men" and, to show it meant it, went on: "The poet Goethe (1749-1832) was called the last man of modern times who knew everything about everything. Luce won't die without being regarded as a coholder of that record. Oh, it isn't what men take in that makes greatness. It is what they give out. Goethe's output was gigantic; Luce's is already bigger. . . ." Goethe, one gathers, was quite a fellow, too.

* The Council of 1870, it may be recalled, produced the Doctrine of Papal Infallibility.

Luce's personality is hard to define, not because it is subtle or complex—it is neither—but because it is an uneasy amalgam of two simple, but contradictory, forces. He is the impassioned idealist, impatient of fact and ever conscious of a "mission" to improve his fellow-men ("something should be done"). And he is the practical business man, suspicious of all idealism, pragmatic, lover of brass tacks, hater of "theories." A strong urge to power cements the halves of this split personality. Lacking pragmatism, Luce the idealist might have become a left-wing leader—or, perhaps more likely, an exceptionally earnest Y. M. C. A. secretary. But as a pragmatist he conceives of power in terms of success according to generally accepted standards; in short, as making money. His income for 1936 may be conservatively estimated at $1,200,000.

Luce is the Poor Boy Who Made Good on a scale which might impress even his own Fortune. (In fact, the propriety of running an article on Time, Inc., and Luce was considered by Luce, as editor of Fortune, recently—apparently with an unfavorable decision.) This puts Luce, as a journalist, in a peculiarly vulnerable position so far as honest reporting is concerned. Ever since Luce the poor missionary's son became Luce the member of Skull and Bones—wealthiest, most sacrosanct, and most reactionary of Yale undergraduate societies—his relation to the ruling classes has been "we" and not "they." Every year he becomes more deeply entrenched in the industrial-financial plutocracy. Through such friends as Thomas W. Lamont, H. P. Davison, and the late Dwight Morrow, for example, he has long maintained close relations with the house of Morgan. Indeed, it is hardly any longer a question of Luce's connections with big business. By now Time, Inc., is big business itself, as he pointed out in the 1935 annual report. Naturally, Luce leads the same life as other great industrialists. He belongs to the Union and Racquet clubs, has a box at the Metropolitan, a $100,000 plantation near Charleston, South Carolina, with an air-conditioned manor house and streamlined guest houses, a fifteen-room duplex apartment in Manhattan, and Clare Boothe Brokaw for his wife (second).

These are powerful influences. A more powerful mind might have maintained some measure of independence. But Luce, as he himself is all too eager to admit, is no intellectual. His intelligence is active rather than acute, dynamic but disorganized. His is the simple creed of pragmatism. He worships facts, and has a touching faith that if only enough of them can be somehow amassed, the truth will manifest itself. He is deeply suspicious of all logical or theoretical abstractions and will have none of them—whence he concludes that his thinking is objective. But to achieve objectivity by the pragmatic route requires intellectual discipline and some sophistication. Luce lacks both in a superlative degree. He is the victim of prejudices all the more uncontrolled for being unconscious. If he has stormed the citadels of economic power, he himself has been an easy conquest for their guardians. His defenses against flattery, especially when applied by the rich and powerful, have never been strong. The objectivity which his editorial policy aims at is a superhuman goal, but Luce is no superman. He is, to continue the Nietzschean phrase, human, all too human.

Luce's magazines share their master's split personality. They are at once pragmatic and prejudiced. And, as in Luce, one finds that these qualities operate on different planes. The pragmatism is superficial and therefore apparent. The prejudices are deep-seated and therefore concealed.

As the most casual reader may perceive, the articles in Time and Fortune are ostentatiously devoid of any editorial slant. No opinions are expressed directly. Both sides of controversial issues are presented, labeled as such. Generalizations are usually backed up with a great show of factual data. But the devil driven out the door climbs back down the chimney. Denied any outlet for their normal urge to express opinions, Luce's editors and writers have developed certain indirect methods of editorializing, all the more effective because the reader—and often the author—doesn't realize what is going on. A fact is a fact, but obviously much depends on just which facts are selected to tell the story. This elementary proposition affords great relief to the repressed instincts of the well-disciplined journalists who write for Luce. Nor do they stop there. They have developed remarkable ingenuity in giving a healthy editorial slant to such facts as they select. Their own opinions are put into the mouths of dummies labeled "well-informed critics" or "unbiased observers"—stock characters as firmly established and well-beloved as the non-existent "Peter Matthews" who has always appeared on the roster of Time's editorial staff and who is periodically fired whenever a particularly embarrassing editorial slip calls for a scapegoat. A technique especially dear to Fortune writers is to pose great "problems" which cry out for solution, thus neatly implying there is something screwy in the first place. Time writers make great play with emotionally "loaded" adjectives and verbs. The compression of Time style lends peculiar force to even a single such word if it is dropped in the right place. Until one has tried it, one would not believe how different the same story sounds depending on whether the hero is described as "firm-jawed" or "horse-faced." The same quotation sounds one way if it is "insinuated," another if it is "rapped out," another if it is "bellowed" or "screamed," and so on. This suggests another simple means of indirect editorializing, perhaps most popular of all with Luce's writers. When they are confronted with words and actions which are deficient in motivation, they are usually kind enough to supply the lack out of their heads without troubling their researchers. But space doesn't permit a full review of these techniques. They are as varied as the repressed instincts they relieve.

Luce and his editors are understandably sensitive on the score of objectivity, since their journalistic rationale is largely based on this great premise. Remove it and their magazines sink to the merely human level of such journals as, say, The Nation. Even lower, in fact, since the editorializing isn't open and honest. And so they are quick to point out that if certain articles arouse protest from liberals, certain others draw fire from conservatives. Sometimes (triumph!) the same article will be attacked by both the right and left. If that doesn't prove they're above the class struggle, what does? But this reasoning overlooks the difference in quality between the objections from the left and those from the right. The right object to Luce's journals because they indulge in "personalities," because they make fun of stuffed-shirt dignity, because they are often "sensational" and "in bad taste." In short, conservatives have much the same objections to Luce as they have to Hearst, despite their general approval of the editorial policies of both. The left, on the other hand, are little concerned about such personal pinpricks. What liberals object to is the habitual distortion or suppression of labor and radical news, the constant pooh-pooing of all movements for social progress. This policy will be discussed more fully in later articles. Here it should be noted that there are, of course, many exceptions. Even Hearst can't keep his papers on a 100 per cent anti-social line.

All this is not to imply that Luce and his editors are not reasonably sincere in their protestations of objectivity. Who, after all, is not sincere? Hypocrites are rarer than one supposes. The atrocities which Luce's magazines perpetrate on labor and radical news are simply the result of Luce's mental limitations. Outstanding ("potent") individuals fascinate him: he is as uncritical a hero-worshiper as any small boy who dreams of J. Edgar Hoover and his G-men. Social data bore him. Fascist Italy means anecdotes about Mussolini rather than wages-and-hours statistics. "People just aren't interesting in the mass," he once confessed. "It's only individuals who are exciting." As a pragmatist, furthermore, Luce has an almost oppressive respect for success. Even radicals, once they have achieved power, come in for their share of the twittering excitement with which Luce's journalists salute the successful. Thus Time makes great fun of the U. S. S. R.

but generally treats Stalin with consideration. And thus Time, Inc., oblivious as it is to labor as a social factor, was quite able to understand that by last spring John L. Lewis had become "potent." At once Lewis found himself the center of a journalistic whirlpool. The March of Time got him to speak and pose for its camera men, the embryonic Life's photographers shot him and his office from every coign of vantage, Fortune descended on him for a full-length biography, Time phoned inquiries almost daily. Lewis is reported to have finally inquired whether he was working for the C. I. O. or for Time, Inc.

Luce's mind is distinctly quirky, but such limitations as these aren't just mental quirks. They are evidence of that identification with business-class ideology which has made Luce the force he is in contemporary journalism. The American business man—and the millions of middle-class people who aspire to fill his shoes—is still individualistic enough to believe in heroes. Society as a whole puzzles and vaguely frightens him, and he'd rather not hear any more about it. His most deeply felt value is success. And so he finds Luce's magazines extremely comforting in these complicated times.

Thus in calculating the Lucian objectivity, it is necessary to consider Luce's point of view as the expression of a social class. Once this point of view is taken for granted as the "normal" one, as of course Luce and his editors do, then the Lucian pragmatism becomes entirely objective. In the columns of Time, for example, those who wish to effect social change have for years been labeled "rabble rousers"—a completely detached description if the point from which such persons are surveyed happens to be not far from 23 Wall Street. The Lucian journalists, of course, deny erecting their instruments on any such spot. Indeed, one gets the impression that they draw their angles of vision from somewhere in the neighborhood of Uranus. Their moral indignation over journals which are gross enough to confess to a specific point of view is amusing to witness; almost as funny as the righteous fury with which those earlier apostles of objectivity, the Manchester school of British economists, assailed such prejudiced persons as wanted to curtail the liberty of mill hands to work sixteen hours a day.

[This is the first of three articles by Mr. Macdonald on Time, Inc. The second will appear next week.]

The Battle of Oshawa

BY ROGER IRWIN

IF YOU run an automobile plant and your men strike, you compromise with them, raise their wages, and pass the extra cost right along to the consumer. If you run a gold mine and your men strike, you fight like blazes, because if your costs go up the money comes right out of your own pockets. Your customers have absolute control over prices.

That fact explains the recent strike phenomenon at Oshawa. Ontario is not large in population, and the automotive industry is important to it, but a walkout by 3,700 employees of General Motors of Canada was insufficient cause for an upheaval and an outcry which stole the continent's front pages at a time when more serious labor troubles were in progress nearer home. Perhaps Ontario is so closely associated with such oddities as quintuplets and stork derbies that the American public was ready to expect anything from it, but there must have been social students who wondered what all the fuss was about. The strike was finally settled on terms which had been found acceptable to both sides before the men walked out, but in the two-week interval a Cabinet has been disrupted, war on "Lewis and communism" formally declared by the province's chief executive, and hundreds of men recruited and drilled to combat "labor fascism"—a hitherto unheard of social movement.

The answer is gold. Mining is the biggest Ontario industry, and millionaire ex-prospectors are the biggest force in Ontario capital. Since every plumber and stenographer in the province owns a thousand or so shares of some penny gold stock, there is a singular unanimity between capital and the masses when the prosperity of the northern camps is in question. And for a year Ontario mining men had watched American unionization apprehensively and had heard with anxiety their spies' reports on union interest among their own muckers and skip-men. The very fact of John L. Lewis's primary connection with mining strengthened their conviction that they were, if not next in line, at least well up on the C. I. O. lists. The obvious tactic was a showdown and a defeat of the Lewis organization before ever it established a real foothold in the industry. It is a lot easier to tie up a gold mine, with its tiny surface plant, than it is to tie up a factory.

General Motors and its 3,700 newly organized workers became the pawns in the larger game. Neither side wanted a strike. For the company, it was the busiest season in many years, with Canadian and Empire markets demanding the new models. The employees had no desire to interrupt their comparatively brief annual working period. Difficulties had already been straightened out and production resumed in the parent plants across the border. With pressure applied from powerful quarters the Canadian management went through the motions of refusing to negotiate with the C. I. O. organizer, but its relieved sigh joined that of the workers when the provincial Labor Minister peremptorily told them both to stop their stand-offish foolishness and report to his office so that negotiations might be opened on neutral ground.

There was a long list of demands but only one real point at issue—recognition of the union. David Arnold Croll, as Minister of Labor and chief conciliator, told company executives frankly that if any progress was to be made they would have to sign a union agreement. To the labor side he made it clear that the presence of C. I. O. organizer Hugh Thompson was the chief stumbling-block and that with his removal the company could with dignity treat with its own employees—their national or international associations thereafter to be strictly their own business. The company agreed and the men agreed. Thompson left the field and stayed on the sidelines. The strike vote at Oshawa was postponed during negotiations. Minor points were rapidly eliminated. Any close observer would have laid his ultimate dollar on settlement of the dispute long before it reached strike proportions.

He would have, if he had not gauged the importance of powerful forces already stirring restively in the background—and it is safe to say that at this stage not General Motors nor its employees nor Conciliator Croll figured on mining influence. Had the three parties wakened in time, the chances are that there would have been no strike at Oshawa, no political upheaval, and no deepset fear in the minds of Canadian liberals.

Four days after negotiations began, the Labor Department was able to predict settlement before nightfall. Mitchell Frederick Hepburn, Prime Minister of Ontario, returned that day from a post-Parliament holiday in Miami and demonstrated an immediate interest in the situation. That night the government official on the Oshawa scene reported that an unexplainable monkey-wrench had been tossed into the settlement machine. General Motors was refusing to recognize the local. At midnight the employees voted to strike. Next morning they clocked in, reported at bench or assembly line, walked out of the factory, and commenced peaceful picketing. There had been no suggestion of a sitdown.

In the morning Premier Hepburn mobilized provincial police forces and maneuvered the dispatch of federal "mounties" from Ottawa to Toronto. Scrapping the traditional view of governmental non-partisanship in industrial disputes, he announced that the entire resources of the province would be thrown behind General Motors. Equally these resources would be used to fight "John L. Lewis and foreign agitators." It was the first time within this Canadian memory that Americans had been called foreigners by a Canadian; and spice was added by the fact that Hugh Thompson, the agitator concerned, was a British subject, while General Motors of Canada was admittedly an American-controlled corporation.

Next day a retired colonel of the British regular army, who happened also to be a member of the legislature, was commissioned by the Premier to recruit and drill 500 special officers, drawn largely from jobless university men and ex-soldiers. Mr. Hepburn and the colonel publicly differed on whether they were to be equipped with army pistols as well as batons. Certain it was, however, that some of them would be stationed at the Parliament buildings for emergency duty, while the others would be paid a retainer and left on call at their homes. Further, as chief movie censor, the Prime Minister banned newsreels of the strike. Meanwhile the Oshawa police chief looked over the peaceful picket lines, announced his seventeen constables could handle any unexpected trouble, and appointed strikers as special police to prevent traffic jams. As it turned out, Oshawa rejoiced during the strike in a fifteen-year low in arrests for all causes.

The Toronto Globe and Mail led the press in approval of the Prime Minister's efforts to save Ontario from the foreigner. That important sheet is owned by a mining man and directed by an ex-broker. Most of the other provincial papers fell in line, leaving the Toronto Star, largest Ontario daily, to suggest there was something un-British, something dictatorial in the governmental policy. It gained fresh material when, without asking their views and indeed refusing audience to one of them, Mr. Hepburn dismissed the only two left-wing Ministers in his ten-man Cabinet. He outspokenly felt that they were not in accord with his opposition to "Lewis and communism," as he was by this time putting it. Labor Minister Croll and Attorney General Arthur Roebuck tendered their resignations in two declarations of liberalism that were masterpieces of understatement. Meanwhile, Hepburn himself took charge of strike negotiations, getting nowhere in particular but promoting the cause of labor relations by announcing measures to license all unions and terminate the fifty-year-old practice of transferring funds between United States and Canadian branches of international organizations—which move threatened the A. F. of L. just as much as the C. I. O.

Finally a clearer light was shed on these strange developments by a candid announcement that Lewis and communism were a menace to the northern Ontario mines. Organization in the camps was scarcely under way, but the presidents of two major companies announced they would shut down in the event of an entirely theoretic strike. The plumbers and stenographers wondered about the future of their own speculations, and asked themselves whether Hepburn hadn't been right after all.

Meanwhile General Motors and the strikers finally got the idea. Wires began to tauten and there was a marked diminution of employer-employee antagonism. Both began to perceive that they were being used. Pressure for a settlement increased, there was a notable decrease in the Prime Minister's truculence, and finally peace was signed—on the basis of recognition of the local union, a C. I. O. subsidiary, on precisely the same terms that Croll had proposed two weeks before. Everyone concerned broke into loud huzzas of victory.

At last reports automobile prices have not risen, nor has organization progressed much in the mines. But liberalism is defeated in Ontario, in its unpretentious home on this continent. The two men who added wage legislation to its far-advanced social statutes are gone. Liberalism for the time is defeated, and liberals are heartsick.

[Mr. Irwin was chief secretary to David A. Croll, Minister of Public Welfare, Municipal Affairs, and Labor in the Ontario government. He resigned when Mr. Croll was forced out of the Cabinet as a result of his refusal to support Premier Hepburn's campaign against the C. I. O.]

An Immediate Program for Housing

BY ALBERT MAYER

IN OUTLINING a policy for housing at this moment, one must bear in mind that the possible range within which it will be allowed to operate is terribly constricted. The Wagner-Steagall bill, probably the best obtainable now, provides for only a small amount of housing. It is important to recognize the limits, to push opinion into demanding the most possible within them, to avoid too markedly centrifugal counsels among the proponents of housing. Otherwise we shall be left without action or with only the semblance of it. My purpose in this article is simply to explore what we ought to agree upon and insist upon at the present juncture. Our next job will be to mobilize public opinion in support of a bolder program which we can propose with some belief that we are not merely indulging in fanciful essays.

The vast preponderance of new houses in the next few years will be built by private enterprise. Of the total volume we want to know how much will be public housing, and whether we can insure that it will be for persons of low income, will represent technical and social progress, and will demonstrate the advantages of large-scale community planning.

The public housing initiated as an emergency employment measure after 1933 encountered various difficulties. Housing was no one agency's exclusive business but a minor effort of many agencies. There were delays due to inner uncertainties and to legal obstacles—suits whose disposition has given public housing a somewhat securer basis in law. Costs were excessive for a variety of reasons, among them PWA's over-meticulous specifications and truculent attitude and the use of inefficient relief labor by the Resettlement Administration. But in spite of these difficulties, the exciting fact is that we are finally getting some actual housing, some living communities in place of blueprints, English photographs, and militant articles in radical publications. To see Greenbelt near Washington is a stimulating and heartening experience. People are actually living in some of the PWA groups. Children are actually playing in the playgrounds. Public housing has pointed the way to rational planning and living while private building in the same period has delivered the same old helter-skelter jobs.

In the present housing situation two things stand out—the shortage and the substandard character of living quarters. They are closely related. The shortage, it is stated by some, will amount to 9,000,000 dwellings in the next ten years; other estimates range up to 20,000,000 dwellings. The factors contributing to the shortage are well known: practical cessation of normal new construction for seven years; destruction of buildings by fire, flood, end of life, and by demolition to make way for bridges, highways, and other public improvements; undoubling of families as unemployment is reduced; a higher normal marriage rate consequent on a higher birth rate during the past twenty years. The wide difference in estimates of the shortage is only partly due to the inaccuracy of statistics. Shortage has no absolute physical measure. Shortage in our economy is determined by effective economic demand. With roughly the same number of houses, there is now a shortage where there were vacancies two years ago.

Another factor contributing to the demand for housing is the number of substandard homes. The inhabitants of these are no doubt anxious to have homes with electric lights, bathrooms, and heat, with playgrounds near at hand for the children and parks for themselves. But it must be recognized that even in normal times the wages of most of our population are too low to make this desire an economically effective demand. To the degree that housing subsidies can be obtained to close the gap, this latent demand will become effective.

Thus the shortage is variable—according to decent standards almost limitless—and depends on what can be paid for by one means or another. If only private enterprise builds, the process will be this: Even before prices rise, the construction is for the upper third of the population. As building accelerates, prices of materials rise, houses become more expensive, fewer people can afford them; but the builders keep on building, unconscious of the fact that the market has become more and more restricted. Sales stop, the builders' small capital dependent on rapid turnover is exhausted, mortgagees foreclose, lending and building stop—all this without any relief for the shortage in any group but the top stratum, whose needs actually are oversupplied. Credit continues unavailable until years elapse and enough fires, enough floods, enough new marriages again cause demand from the upper stratum. All building cycles to date have run this course, and neither FHA nor bankers' conferences nor any other agency gives any sign of changing it. Private enterprise alone will never meet even the minimum shortage figure.

If the relatively small amount of public housing that can be expected makes the mistake of being simply a tail to this mad kite, or if it goes off in the various directions suggested by its advocates, it will have no importance. Some housing measure will be enacted in Washington, and housing bills will be passed in some of the states. A compact body of doctrine must be formulated with the aim of shaping those measures and of influencing the policies of their administrators.

What can we obtain from these bills, quantitatively and qualitatively? The Wagner bill now before the Senate provides for a United States Housing Authority, appointed by the President, to assist local public-housing agencies and cooperative and other limited-dividend enterprises to build low-rent housing. To public agencies it may make loans for the project cost, and grant fixed annual subsidies to an annual maximum of $10,000,000, which is supposed to bring rentals to less than $6 per room. Over a four-year period the sum of $1,000,000,000 is placed at its disposal. Union labor at the prevailing wage is to be employed on any project built or financed by the Authority.

The sum provided in the Wagner bill for the four-year period would permit erection of something under 50,000 units a year. Even if this sum were matched by local funds, the whole amount would not provide 10 per cent of the annual requirement. For the localities must devote some part of their funds to acquiring more land than is needed for immediate projects in order to insure cheap and advantageous purchase and a continuing planned program. These figures show the absurdity of the fear that government construction will put private enterprise out of business. Aside from the fact that private enterprise does not build for low rentals, aside from experience in England, where public housing and a private housing boom are occurring simultaneously, the need is so great that it is certain that every dwelling built by anyone will be occupied. The maximum number ever built in this country in any one year is some 600,000, or about 60 per cent of the minimum yearly requirement for the next ten years.

The contention that housing activity should be wholly decentralized and made the subject of state and local rather than national action is fallacious or insincere. We must have national legislation. In the first place, exclusively state or local action means delay because state and local mechanisms are not ready to function on the required scale without federal assistance. Even in New York State, which is farthest advanced in this respect, the bill providing for a $100,000,000 bond issue to be voted on next November would mean at least a year's delay. In the second place, most localities are not yet in a position to raise the necessary funds. Finally, for the present at least, local funds come largely from real-estate taxes, which are in reality sales taxes. In other words, locally raised subsidies are paid for by the consumers themselves. Federal subsidies can tap the graduated income taxes. Of course we must insist on local participation in planning, construction, and operation. Where housing authorities do not exist they must be created. And we must see to it that their members are not just real-estate men but persons who will push for housing. Labor should be represented.

I want now to enumerate a minimum number of items which must be the basis of all sound housing action:

1. Passage of national, state, and local legislation, so that a complete public-housing framework will exist.
2. Appointment of a sympathetic and energetic personnel.
3. Subsidies and interest rates that will permit low-rental housing—about $5 a room. This means that there must be no housing on high-cost slum land and no jacked-up material costs or contractors' profits. The federal government can build in off seasons when prices are lower, thus incidentally leading private industry to make a nearly twelve-month industry out of a six-month seasonal industry, and can use its own labor as a threat against excessive contractors' profits. It can use a variety of alternative materials. Specifically, with the aid of Bureau of Standards tests, it might become a substantial user of prefabricated sections, thus advancing progress and increasing the capacity of the industry. The work must be so organized that high overhead does not destroy the economies accompanying large-scale operations. Standards must be studied and rationalized. While some instances of unnecessarily high standards can be cited, there is greater danger of our being dragooned into thinking that anything a little better is good enough.

4. Any form of rent subsidy must be avoided. This is a form of relief which brings no new construction; in fact it helps to continue the existing substandard pattern.

5. Income taxes, not real-estate taxes or any other form of consumers' taxes, must be the source of the subsidy. Housing based on consumers' taxes takes money from one pocket and puts it into another; available amenities are not increased.

6. Low-rental housing must not be confused with slum clearance. Assumption that the two are identical has raised costs, caused delays and litigation, and created general confusion. Low-rental housing is the primary issue, because it meets the needs of slum people, not of slum land. Aside from its other objections, building on slum land involves demolition and hence accentuates shortage instead of supplementing the supply. Moreover, street and utility patterns in slums are handicaps to rational planning that are difficult to change, and slum land may often be better put to new uses.* Sentimentalists and slum landlords simply must not be heeded.

7. Towns and cities should adopt long-run plans for land use and within them acquire quantities of land for future housing. Otherwise, the individual communities will remain isolated and their existence insecure. A by-product of this is the possibility of planning ahead so that building may be undertaken when costs are low.

8. An educational campaign should be an important function of the new Authority as well as of local bodies.

Here is, heaven knows, a sufficiently modest program, but considering the lack of positive strength and the divided doctrines of the housing movement, it is all that we are likely to be able to put through. To attain this much, we must unite public opinion behind it. Anything less is not worth getting, and the alternative is to acquire more strength among consumers and labor groups and then to seek a more adequate program. On the basis of this program public housing can start to accomplish two objectives: build low-rental communities, urban and suburban; guide our cities and our building industry to a large-scale rational development that will produce better housing at all income levels.

* For a different view of this problem, see the article by Langdon W. Post, chairman of the New York Housing Authority, in The Nation for March 27.
—EDITORS THE NATION.

Fascism Moves on Rumania

BY HENRY C. WOLFE

BEHIND the headlines that blare forth Rumanian court scandals, the activities of Madame Lupescu, and the Iron Guard's outrages, a sinister international political drama is being played. For the green-shirted mercenaries of the anti-Semitic, anti-democratic terrorist organizations are merely tools of ruthless politicians in Berlin and Rome. While boisterous Iron Guardsmen are shouting "Death to Lupescu!" the commotion is being used by Fascist chieftains in Germany and Italy to screen their machinations in Rumania. Hitler cares nothing about who King Carol's favorite may be, or whether Prince Nicholas loses his titles. But he is vitally interested in who controls Rumania's priceless oil reserves, and who is to eat the harvests of Rumania's wheat fields.

Germany's expanding army is highly mechanized. Tanks, planes, tractors, motor cycles—all require gasoline and oil. The Reich has coal but little oil. To convert coal into oil is a costly process. Without oil reserves the Nazi military juggernaut cannot roll across the Reich's "bleeding" frontiers. Indeed, it is doubtful whether Hitler could make war before he has acquired more oil than he has today. Rumania possesses ample oil for Germany's industry and army for decades to come, and the Führer is determined to get control of it.

The German food shortage would be solved if Dr. Schacht could exchange manufactured goods for Rumanian food and raw materials. The greater the Nazi influence in Rumania, the easier will it become for the Reich to force this barter of products.

Inasmuch as Rumania lies on the Reich's road to the Ukraine, Nazi control of this Balkan kingdom would give the German army its most effective base of operations for invasion of the Soviet Union. It is believed that the Reichswehr chiefs would prefer conducting military operations along the Dniester to fighting on the frozen terrain of the Baltic states or in the marshlands of eastern Poland. Furthermore, German hegemony in Rumania would increase the isolation of Czecho-Slovakia, prospective victim of the first move in the Nazi expansion program. And it would help block the passage of Soviet troops on their way to aid their beleaguered Czech allies.

Although not so vitally interested in Rumania as Hitler, Mussolini has his own reasons for supporting the green-, brown-, and blue-shirted fanatics who terrorize the democratic groups in Rumania. In addition to spreading Fascist ideology, the Fascist-Nazi forces in Bucharest are striving to weaken the bonds between the Little Entente nations. Their attacks on Czecho-Slovakia are hardly less virulent than those on the Soviet Union. And the crafty Caesar of the resurrected Roman Empire knows that the easier he makes Hitler's path toward the Ukraine, the less will be the pressure at the Brenner Pass.

Moreover, the Duce has certain personal reasons for supporting the Iron Guard leaders. These condottieri proved very useful to Signor Mussolini last August when they helped cause the fall of Rumania's able Foreign Minister, Nicholas Titulescu. The Rumanian statesman incurred the undying hatred of the Duce when he denounced as "barbarous" the behavior of the Italian journalists who at a meeting of the League of Nations booed the tragic Haile Selassie.

When a Rumanian military court sentences five Jews, two of them women, to ten years' imprisonment for having shouted "Down with fascism!" it is hardly necessary to present further evidence of the progress of reactionary forces in Rumania. But if more proof was needed to demonstrate the solidarity of the Fascist International, it was provided recently by the funeral of the Iron Guard officers, Marin and Motza, who were killed in the Franco ranks in Spain. At their funeral their bodies were followed by a long procession that included the Ministers of Italy, Germany, Portugal, and Japan.

Although Italian agents in Rumania do not stress the anti-Semitic aspects of fascism, German agents stir up pogroms and make anti-Jewish persecution the rallying cry for fanatical youths, ignorant peasants, and small shopkeepers. Last October Vice-Premier Ion Inculetz issued an ordinance forbidding instruction in the Jewish faith in Rumanian schools. Open threats to murder Titulescu by Cuza's and Goga's blue-shirted hoodlums and the green-shirted Iron Guardsmen bear witness to the self-assurance of the terrorists.

Pro-Nazi newspapers published in Bucharest, such as the Tara Noastra and the Porunca Vremii, openly flaunt the Nazi swastika. The headquarters of the so-called National Christian Party, its front plastered with the swastika, is located only a stone's throw from the great Calea Victoriei boulevard and the National Theater, the center of Bucharest. In Transylvania members of the German minority brazenly proclaim their allegiance to National Socialism and the Third Reich. One sees their swastikas in Cluj, Brashov, and other cities.

But it would be misleading not to point out that many Rumanians are unalterably opposed to the Fascist invaders. Former Premier Julius Maniu, Ion Mihalache, president of the National Peasant Party, former Foreign Minister Titulescu, and their followers are waging a courageous struggle against the threat of Fascist dictatorship. They are doing this in the face of repeated threats from the Iron Guard to deal with them as the terrorists dealt with the late Premier Ion Duca, whom they murdered. In spite of the sound and fury of the Iron Guard, Hitler and Mussolini have not yet won their offensive on the Rumanian front.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Another Word on Neutrality

BEFORE these lines reach their readers it may well be that the conference committees of House and Senate will have agreed upon a report on the neutrality bill and that this measure will have been signed by the President. But that does not mean that the fight will be over; already it is planned to put the "cash-and-carry" provision, which is likely to be struck out of the Senate bill, into a new measure. So I wish to take this opportunity to point out what seem to me fallacies in the editorial position of The Nation on this subject, and particularly in Vera Micheles Dean's article, in the February 6 issue, entitled A Challenge to Pacifists.

The chief point at issue is the question whether the United States should or should not pass a law which would cut it off from delivering supplies to the democracies in Europe if they should be attacked by the dictatorships. "Any policy," stated a Nation editorial, "which would arbitrarily cut off all American trade with belligerents in the event of war would react directly to the advantage of Hitler and to the disadvantage of England, France, and the other democratic states which are normally dependent on American supplies." Mrs. Dean went farther: "Pacifists and radicals who prefer the continuance of democratic methods of government to the ruthless techniques of fascism must be prepared to defend their choice. Democracy must not be left unarmed."

Well, I am prepared to accept the challenge. First let me point out that if this policy is to control, the United States will find itself again just where it was in 1914 to 1917. I am one of those who believe that of the several causes of our going to war a tremendously important one was the tying up of our great industrial plants and munitions factories to the Allied military machine, with a resultant rain of gold from the Allies. The same thing would happen again. We should again be told that we were making the world safe for democracy, and if the democracies had their backs to the wall, the argument might be even more effectively used than in 1914-17. And the outcome would be the same. We should be precipitated into the struggle, and the result, even if we did not send a soldier abroad, would be disastrous. If we do get into the next war, it will mean the disappearance of our democracy. The laws now on the statute books and those pending in Congress today guarantee that; neither the editors of The Nation nor Mrs. Dean can deny it.

My next point is: How do they know that we ought to be on the side of the democracies, that the cause of the democracies will be any juster than that of the Allies in 1914-17? Of course their war methods will not be any different. There is nothing to choose between a democracy and an autocracy when they go to war. One murders just as inhumanly as the other. Democracies deprive the individual of the right to decide his own fate, abolish all personal liberties, and lock up or shoot dissenters just as readily as the dictatorships. Morally there was not one thing to choose between the Allies and the Central Powers in the last war. The excuse for England was Belgium, but we know very well now that the compelling reason was the desire of the controlling class in democratic England to smash the German navy and eliminate a dangerous economic competitor. Even Woodrow Wilson admitted that the origins of the war were purely commercial. Now I don't want to see the United States expending American money and, what is vastly more important, American lives, to insure the safety of British democracy of the Baldwin kind, or even the Ramsay MacDonald kind. I don't want to uphold a nation which holds down the natives of India and uses its airplanes to this very hour to bomb any subjugated native people who wish to govern themselves, however badly. The democracy of France looks more hopeful today, thanks to Blum and the People's Front. But even if it were the best democracy ever known I should do everything in my power to prevent the United States from being drawn into another war on the excuse that we must save that democracy. The way to save democracy for us is to keep it intact in the United States, prevent our democracy from turning into a war-time dictatorship, conserve its resources for the benefit not only of our own people but of all peoples after hostilities have ceased. I want the United States to remain a great reservoir of means and strength, especially moral strength, available to put the world on its feet after the next holy war.

Save the democracies? What editor, what Mrs. Dean can know whether the democracies may not be the aggressors for their own selfish ends? Have they forgotten the Crimean War waged by democratic England, the subjugation of Egypt in 1881, the wickedness of the Boer War? I can conceive of a situation arising where my moral judgment would put me on the side of the dictators—I mean as to the ethical merits of the struggle—just as I know that the misconduct of the Allies produced Hitler. Finally, I deny that it is the duty of the United States to sit in judgment, like Jehovah, and then sacrifice its sons for the side that it thinks right on the basis of such little or such biased information as is available in the hysteria and excitement leading up to a war and after the war censorships are clamped down. I know the charges of selfishness and all the rest that are brought against this attitude, but as a pacifist I accept Mrs. Dean's challenge and say I'll never countenance any war, or our selling supplies to one side or the other.

BROUN'S PAGE

Elisha Bares His Teeth

THE American Newspaper Publishers at their convention last week ran up the red flag and thumbed their noses at the Supreme Court of the United States. I have not always been in the first wave of those who rushed forward to castigate all groups engaging in such procedure, but it is curious conduct for newspaper owners. After all, a very large part of their news and editorial effort in the last few months has been devoted to fighting the President's proposals on the ground that they tended to diminish the dignity and impair the prestige of the court.

Of course, newspaper publishers have lived for many years in a little No Man's Land of their own, secure in the belief that while there might be law for others they were immune from any reform whatsoever. Justice Roberts in the majority opinion held that freedom of the press does not protect newspaper proprietors in anti-social conduct. If the Congress enacts legislation protecting workers in their right to organize, there is no reason why this should not apply to editorial workers.

But Elisha Hanson, counsel for the A. N. P. A., has boldly declared that the court was wrong. In an interview given to the press he said in referring to the opinion read by Justice Roberts, "Newspaper publishers flatly disagree with his statements that the newspaper business can be regulated by the government." And Mr. Hanson added that under certain circumstances publishers might prefer to go to jail rather than yield to the majority opinion of the court. In other words, the members of the A. N. P. A. are devoted to preserving our traditional form of government unless at any time it happens to impair their profits. Within the last four years the organized newspaper proprietors of America have defied all three coordinate branches of the government. During the life of the NRA the A. N. P. A., after grudgingly submitting itself to a code, twice threatened to walk out. The argument at that time was that the executive and legislative branches of the government had assumed illegal powers. When the NRA was swept away by Supreme Court decision, there was general editorial rejoicing. The court was the bulwark of human liberty and the protector of the poor proprietor. But now in the Watson case the High Bench has handed down a decision which the publishers do not like, and according to their spokesman they intend to sabotage the Wagner law. Where, then, does authority rest in this republic as far as newspaper owners are concerned? Seemingly they will bow to no will except their own, and the A. N. P. A. constitutes the first admittedly revolutionary cell in America.

If anybody thinks that I am stretching a point, let him listen to the language of Elisha Hanson in a carefully prepared address which he delivered at the convention. Mr. Hanson said:

"In the event that a complaint is filed against any one of you on the ground that you have discharged a news or editorial employee because of his guild activities, it is imperative that you submit evidence to justify your act of discharge on whatever ground it was taken. If you did not discharge the man because of guild activities, you must make a record in which the actual reason for discharging him appears. If, on the other hand, you did discharge a man because of his guild activities, then you must show in the record the nature of those activities and demonstrate their injurious effect on your business."

Now the Wagner Act says specifically that no worker shall be fired because of organization activity. In the Watson case the Supreme Court held that the Congress had the power to pass such a provision. But Mr. Hanson is not prepared to yield. He seems to advise his clients that if organization hurts business—and I suppose a drive for higher wages would definitely constitute a hurt in the eyes of a proprietor—then they may fire one or more of their employees on the simple ground that they do not want to have a union. I hope that at the next convention of the American Newspaper Guild, to be held in St. Louis in June, some delegate will rise and ask the Guild to pledge itself to raise one regiment and offer its services to the President and the Supreme Court and the Congress of the United States in an effort to bring the embattled publishers back into the Union.

One of the obstacles to amity along the economic front is the lack of responsibility in employer associations. It is difficult for trade unions to make terms because employers so often treat agreements as mere scraps of paper. In Jamaica, Long Island, the management suggested that a Guild strike might be settled through an arbitration award of three local ministers. The Guild accepted this offer of the management and left its case wholly in the hands of the three clergymen. Indeed, both sides signed stipulations to abide by the result. But when the award was handed down, the proprietor didn't happen to like it and so he boldly announced that he would reject it.

Has the A. N. P. A. made any effort to discipline this proprietor in order to save the fair name of the publishing fraternity? Why should I ask silly questions? You know it has not. To the best of my recollection there has been no instance of any effort on the part of allied newspaper proprietors to police their own craft and insure fair dealings. And these are the men who write violent editorials about the C. I. O. It is evident now that the newspaper publishers of America may love the Supreme Court, but they have no intention of playing ball with it. Indeed, the only game the publishers are willing to play is that old familiar pastime of heads I win, tails you lose.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

Man and Mule

BY LEGARDE S. DOUGHTY

Behind the plowman's wind-burnt face
There is no compass skilled to trace
The spools of tortuous content
In nine-times-guarded document.
So his forefathers' holy writ
Is left to men more shrewdly fit
To stroke beards and geometrize
Its circles into tangent guise.
His mathematics, day to day,
Is simply add-and-take-away.
He adds the callus of his hand
And strength of shoulder to the land;
And sees far weaker men deduct,
By legal super-usufruct,
All that he makes but half a grain
By muscle, dung, and sun, and rain.
One with the brown-eyed mule, his mate,
He plows the row and plows it straight.
But all the night he frets, and gropes
For clouded stars and hopeless hopes.
The blessed mule, from five to five,
Comes irresponsibly alive;
Behind the auspice of his gate,
Secure, immune, inviolate.

To America: with Love

A FOREIGNER LOOKS AT THE TVA. By Odette Keun.
Longmans, Green and Company. $1.25.

IN A recent issue of The Nation, the editor of the literary section instructed his helots how to write book reviews. I hasten to put these instructions into practice. The master says that a good review, like the doctrine of the Trinity, should be erected upon a three-point support. It should (1) tell objectively what is in the book, (2) describe the manner or style in which the book is written, give something of its quality, and (3) appraise the value or importance of the book. I hereby feed Miss Keun through the mill. If she does not like it, or if the reader does not, I shall of course disclaim all responsibility.

1. The book is short. It is packed with information and can be read in a couple of hours. It tells the history of the TVA, beginning with the dam at Muscle Shoals as a war project in 1916. One catches one's breath as one realizes how slender was the thread which held the whole investment from being handed over to Mr. Ford or the power boys or some other private philanthropist at two cents on the dollar. The man who kept the thread unbroken, whitening his hair for a decade and more, was Senator Norris. When Roosevelt was elected, the Senator's dream came true. This investment, on which the public had spent 150 millions, was turned over to the public for its use and enjoyment, and as a basis for its future prosperity. This seems reasonable, but you would be surprised how difficult it is for the public to get any comfort out of its own property. It seems that comfort is contrary to "due process" or "prudent investment" or "interstate commerce" or some other verbal spook, and the public has to take as many injunctions as an army take trenches to win a battle. (I am afraid I have broken a rule in the last two sentences.)

This compact little book goes on to set the TVA in its geographical and cultural background. The watershed is described and the people who inhabit it. Thus the plan receives physical content. The trouble with most economic plans is that they have no physical content. (There I go again!) It is made abundantly clear, as your reviewer has pointed out in The Nation before, that the TVA is not primarily a scheme to soak the power trust. It is primarily a plan for working with nature in a balanced use of land and water. Cheap electric power is only an important by-product of that use. The calamitous abuse of the soils, forests, and waters of the Tennessee Basin is described with passion and statistics. The passion is the author's; the statistics are official. The mission of the TVA is to turn abuse into use, to save the resources of the valley for the future health and prosperity of the valley. How does the TVA propose to do this? In incisive sections Miss Keun outlines Engineering Works, Flood Control, Erosion Control, Navigation, Power, Forestry, the New Agricultural Pattern, Local Industries. She shows how all these factors are yoked together in one great wheel, and how they are meaningless spokes without the total frame. She explains how the most important matter of all was accomplished—securing the consent of the people of the valley. In the back of the book are two series of photographs, the first showing the abuse of resources and its final result of death and destruction. The second shows the course of balanced use to social survival and comfort. Here is an idea for a dramatic silent movie of great educational importance.

2. Coming to Miss Keun's method and manner, I feel a little freer. Her method is original and charming. She is French, and she is a woman. She exploits both these characteristics to the limit. As a foreigner she can be more objective and more daring in her appraisal than an American can well be; as a woman she can scatter and put to rout more sacred cows of "sound" finance and business enterprise than any mere man can hope to do. If a thing is without sense from the point of view of common human decency, she says so, flatly and belligerently; and if the Supreme Court raises the crucifix in the road, she runs right over it. Observe: "The injunctions not only protect the companies as to their own properties in areas they now serve, but they hinder the people of other areas who own their own power and distribution systems from becoming purchasers of the TVA electricity. It really is unbelievable! . . . These Utilities snatch at everything. I wonder they don't pounce on the milk a kitten sucks from its mother!"

A nice point in this connection is that Miss Keun is the owner of a considerable block of holding-company stock. After burning up the utilities, she turns around and burns up the TVA from the utilities' point of view, but admits that Exhibit B is not so strong as Exhibit A. Then she burns up the capitalists of the Northeast who have sucked dry the South and West. Then she burns up the farmers of the South as a shiftless, ignorant, barbarous breed, showing with justice how European peasants are more civilized because they love and conserve the land. Indeed, by the time she gets through, the whole Republic is in flames. But the book is indited "To America, with whom I have fallen in love," and somehow one believes her. Another curious thing is that, in the midst of all this heat and indignation, the facts and findings are clearly stated and substantially correct. When she lashes out at the crime of soil erosion, she gives the exact figures of the Soil Conservation Service; when she strikes at the lumber barons she gives the careful estimates of destruction prepared by the Forest Service. When she steams up on leaching and soil mining, she describes the all-important nitrogen cycle with scientific rigor.

3. Now for the appraisal. This book is a unique and valuable document on the most interesting social experiment in the United States. The descriptions of the various phases of the TVA show care, study, and fidelity to the facts so far as I know them. I think the author has overstated the case for navigation, but only time can decide this point. Above and beyond the TVA Miss Keun has been reaching for a concrete institution that will satisfy her requirements for a social form which is neither raw, anarchic capitalism nor the totalitarian state. As a good European she has a lively hatred of the latter, and as a decent, kindly human being she loathes both the behavior and the rationalizations of the former. She believes she has found in the TVA something upon which her faith may rest. I believe so too.

STUART CHASE

The New York Stage

ANNALS OF THE NEW YORK STAGE. Volume IX.
By George C. D. Odell. Columbia University Press. $8.75.

THE ninth volume of Professor Odell's tremendous work appears close on the heels of the last preceding one. It covers the record for the years 1870-75 and continues to amaze the reader as a monument of labor and a miracle of completeness. Moreover, as one approaches closer and closer to the present day, the interest increases because of the gradual appearance of names familiar to the present generation. These years were part of the heyday of Clara Morris, Fanny Davenport, and Lotta. But they also include the New York debut of John Drew, whom the Post thought "likely, with perseverance, to make a valuable acquisition," and the rising of one "little Minnie Maddern," of whom the Herald said, "If Minnie continues to progress from her present promise she will become what the American stage is at present sadly deficient of [sic]—a good leading woman." Daly's and Wallack's were the leading theaters. In December, 1870, Daly brought out the first play of Bronson Howard, and the rise of that dramatist, together with the success of such plays as Daly's own adaptation "Divorce," indicated the approach of the day when the mainstay of the theaters would be, not Shakespeare and the old comedies, but contemporary plays.

It is hardly necessary to indicate again Professor Odell's method. "Annals" is precisely the word to describe his work. Here we have a season-by-season—almost a day-by-day—record of what went on in the amusement world of greater New York. Even changes in casts are noted, runs are indicated, and there are significant bits from the comments of the press. There are, besides, more than three hundred photographs of players in the present volume alone, and Professor Odell's definition of "stage" is as inclusive as the Billboard's definition of the "show business." Even the suburbs are not forgotten, and he does not stop with circuses, concerts, or the like. One may, if one cares to, discover that on February 11, 1873, Anna Dickinson (whose questions, according to Professor Odell, "were always interesting because so impossible to answer") was asking a lecture audience in Steinway Hall "What's to Hinder?" or that, on February 25, 1875, a Punch and Judy show exhibited at Temperance Hall, Greenpoint. Most remarkable of all, perhaps, is the extent to which Professor Odell has assimilated this material, the extent to which even individual players are real persons to him. An odd bit of casting astonishes him, and he lives so vividly through each season that his spirits actually rise and fall with the success or failure of various enterprises.

Reviewing one of the earlier volumes I said that it contained more than anyone was ever likely to want to know about the New York stage. To say that is to indicate that the work possesses one of the greatest virtues anything of the kind can possess, since it means that any piece of information which scholar or layman may, for any reason, need will certainly be found. It is inconceivable that the particular job Professor Odell has done should ever be attempted again. But for generations to come his volumes will have to be at the elbow of everyone who writes anything about the history of the stage in America.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

"Gloried from Within"

THE NOTEBOOKS AND PAPERS OF GERARD MANLEY HOPKINS. Edited with Notes and a Preface by Humphry House. Oxford University Press. $8.50.

IT HAS been known that Hopkins's interests included music, architecture, drawing, science, and of course the philosophy and theology that went with his calling. But not until the publication of these journals has it been possible to appreciate how completely all these fields of interest were brought to a synthesis in his thought and feeling. It is now clear that as he believed everything in nature fell into that centripetal order or design which he called "inscape" he intended that everything in his personality should be "to one purpose wrought." If he possessed a sensibility that could only be matched by a Keats or a Wordsworth or a Whitman, he possessed also powers of observation and generalization that might have made him a great figure in the century of experimental science. Hopkins was not a Leonardo, but his mind was motivated by the same passion ersi universale, the same search for a common principle for man and nature. (It is not surprising to find him equally obsessed by the human skeleton—"the bones sleeved in flesh.") It is to make modest claims for these notebooks to say that they might have been written by a Keats with a better-developed intellect or by a Samuel Butler with an infinitively richer sensibility. And this is to say that they are continually taking us to the frontiers of our knowledge both of ourselves and our world.

The early notebooks belong to the eve of Hopkins's conversion to the Catholic church and include a number of hitherto unpublished poetic fragments as well as several undergraduate essays. The impact of the physical world on his senses during this period of spiritual and intellectual crisis may be judged from the following:

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

50,000 GAMMAS

DIVIDE this drop into 50,000 parts. Each part is a gamma— $1/28,329,000$ of an ounce. Yet in such tiny units research chemists find the secrets of long life and efficient operation of electric machinery—of refrigerators and electric clocks, of lamps as small as a grain of wheat, and great turbines that supply electric power to a whole city.

A smear of oil, a chip of metal, a scarcely visible film on a polished surface—these are clues to improved designs. Working with drops on a microscope slide, General Electric scientists are able to detect even as little as $1/1,000,000,000$ ounce of impurity. And so, in the Research Laboratory, in Schenectady, they check and examine, contributing of their skill and experience to the final perfection of the finished machine.

Scientific research requires attention to a thousand details, patience to carry out innumerable experiments, clear understanding of the fundamental principles of nature. And the results of this painstaking research in the world of the very small are longer life and lower cost of operation in the manufactured products that you use.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

Drops of rain hanging on rails, etc. seen with only the lower rim lighted like nails (of fingers). Screws of brooks and twines. Soft chalky look with more shadowy middles of the globes of cloud on a night with a moon faint or concealed. Mealy clouds with a not brilliant moon. Blunt buds of the ash. Pencil buds of the beech. Lobes of the trees. Cups of the eyes, gathering back the lightly hinged eyelids. Bows of the eyelids. Pencil of eyelashes. Juices of the eyeball. Eyelids like leaves, petals, caps, tufted hats, handkerchiefs, sleeves, gloves. . . . Juices of the sunrise. Joints and veins of the same.

The journal proper, begun in 1868 and continued almost up to his death, is made up of close analytical notations of natural phenomena. Some of these are accompanied by drawings, like the one on page 165, with the note: "The curves of the returning wave overlap, the angular space between is smooth but covered with a network of foam, etc." Most of them are instances of "inscape," like the flag flower from bud to bloom: "Each term you can distinguish is beautiful in itself and of course if the whole 'behavior' were gathered up and stalled it would have a beauty of all the higher degree." The design in natural objects is often related to the forms of art: the eyes of opened peacock feathers are likened to "the flowing cusped trefoil" of architectural decoration. Trees and pigeons, "trim and symmetrical and gloried from within," remind him of the lilies in the coat of arms of Eton College. Sometimes, though not often, the religious application is made explicit, as when the strength and grace of the bluebell is compared to "the beauty of the Lord." For Hopkins everything in nature, even the snow swept to one side of a path, assumed an inner pattern which corresponded to that principle of individuation in the human personality for which he found the philosophical explanation in the neglected Duns Scotus. It need hardly be pointed out how perfectly he made this view apply both to the theme and to the structure and style of his later verse. But it might be noted how closely it anticipated, except for the final theological parallel, the direction of the most recent biological research.

Hopkins kept, along with this record of his intellectual observations, another journal that traced his spiritual and psychological development through the same period. But this was either destroyed or has been lost. Part of the loss is compensated by the intensely confessional tone of the Comments on the Spiritual Exercises of St. Ignatius Loyola, which are invaluable to the future study of his poetry. First and last, Hopkins has suffered much from the devotion of his friends; and the present expensive and laboriously edited volume is another instance. It is to be regretted that the Oxford Press did not bring out this material in a form offering fewer obstacles to the general reading public.

WILLIAM TROY

Death on an Island

FROM JORDAN'S DELIGHT. By R. P. Blackmur. Arrow Editions. $2.

THAT the poems in R. P. Blackmur's first collection are well made will not surprise those who have been instructed and delighted by his meticulous critical writings. There may have been less reason to anticipate the freshness of perception, the vigorous music, and the abundance of poetic resources which they display. They are the work of a poet who uses the medium because he has to, and not of a critic who is trying to prove that he can.

The initial assault of the poems consists in an excitement primarily verbal, focusing awareness upon the words rather than through and beyond them: "What yelling, belling cry," "Gull bleat, hawk shriek, mouse and eagle screams," "His great moonface rumridden and windshot," and "Breathes in our ears sea rôle and moan." Other lines, equally stirring in auditory and kinesthetic quality, create an additional dimension through reinforcement of sound by less patent meanings. Consider, for example, "The shiver and shawling, yawing of doom," where the breathless plunging of the line is dominated not only by the suggestion of the undulatory movement of a shawl in the wind but also by the less direct visual analogy of the shredded waves with the shawl's tassels. Likewise, in "The heart throstrling the sweet-tormented brain," "throstrling" is a syncope of several relevant words, including perhaps "throttle," "throb," and "jostle," as well as the noun "throstrle" (in the sense of "thrush").

Such effects easily lend themselves to abuse, but with Mr. Blackmur this happens rarely. Instances of downright preciousness are few, and even these have their compensations, as in this description of the lobsterman clattering out in a row-boat to set his pots:

There comes the day's calthumpian, all afleer,
In his midwaste quotidian King Lear.

A calthumpian, I take it, is one who participates in a callthump, which, so I am pleased to learn from the unabridged dictionary, is an old American word for a boisterous parade or charivari. "Afleer" is exciting in itself, although unsubstantiated elsewhere in the poem. "King Lear," which is grammatically correlative with "calthumpian," is introduced, so far as I can tell, on the ground that the lobsterman is old, lonely, rather queer, an exile, and surrounded by the agitation of the elements (there is also perhaps a tenuous association with Gloucester's cliff). But neither here nor later in the poem is the reference to Lear what Mr. Blackmur likes to call a tautology, namely, an exact equivalent of its object: it seems to be an attempt to charge the incident with more significance than it is fitted to bear, and certainly with more than it bodies forth.

The principal defect of the verse, however, lies in a somewhat different type of disproportion. By itself, each poem appears to be a close exchange and rigid equilibrium between inner tension and outer image. This unity is artfully enhanced by the denseness of the texture and by the organizing bonds of consonance, repetition, and internal rhyme. Yet, in the whole body of the poems the emotion spills over its vessels. The general scheme of the book is the endeavor of the self to maintain its intactness against the weathering by experience. The self is equated with the bleak island off the Maine coast, not altogether ironically named Jordan's Delight, which is the setting of most of the poems. The sea represents all the agencies which seek to change and corrode the self, and these for Blackmur include friends, marriage, men in bread lines, the lure of action, and above all death. The bareness of the island betokens an "insuccorable inward beggary," "a new nothingness"; the self is shrunk to a doorless if not a windowless monad. Such urge to live as it has comes from a kind of aesthetic stoicism, the desire to be "a willed looker-on," in short, a craving for salvation by the word, which is all right as the first tenet in a poet's private ethic, but hardly a capacious matrix for creation.

So narrowed, the self is on the verge of disappearing, and death loses its terrors because it is already here. The poet in his prison does not even think of the key. Death, consequently, is not the villain in a tragedy but a morbid obsession:

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

NEW, ENLARGED EDITION

3 Additional Chapters

THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE

By DR. HELENA WRIGHT, M.B., B.S.

Practicing Gynecologist in London

HUNDREDS of thousands of men and women—both in America and in Europe—have definitely benefited from owning a copy of this explicit, detailed, honest and revealing volume—and today are leading happier lives in consequence. Now, in response to many requests from her readers, Dr. Wright has written three additional chapters: on the menopause ("change of life"), menstruation, and birth control.

"Many married couples . . . lack the right understanding and enjoyment of the sex-act itself. It is to help such people that this book is written. The writer wants to give such definite and practical information that no one after reading it can any longer be ignorant of the nature of the sex-act, or fail to know exactly how it should be performed.

This is the book that Dale Carnegie, in the best-seller "How to Make Friends and Influence People," lists first among the works on this subject.

"This book contains very detailed information about the ways in which the physical intimacies of married life may be successfully and happily managed."—From the Introduction by the Rev. A. Herbert Gray, D.D.

NOTE: On the coupon below list, with THE SEX FACTOR IN MARRIAGE, other important works dealing with this and kindred topics.

FREE OFFER

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to:
THE VANGUARD PRESS, 424 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK

Please send me, in a plain package, the books checked below. I will pay the sum stated plus a few cents delivery charge, when the package arrives. I understand that if the book or books are not entirely satisfactory I may return them within 5 days and the purchase price will be refunded. I agree to assume full responsibility for safeguarding the books from minors or other improper persons.

....The Sex Factor in Marriage (New and Enlarged Edition). By Dr. Helena Wright, M.B., B.S.	$2.00
....Facts and Frauds in Woman's Hygiene: A Medical Guide Against Misleading Claims and Dangerous Products. By Palmer Greenberg	$2.00
....The Sex Education of Children. By Mary Ware Dennett	$1.75
....The Sex Life of the Unmarried Adult. Edited by Ira S. Wile, M.D.	$2.50
....The Hygiene of Marriage: A Detailed Consideration of Sex and Marriage. By Dr. Millard S. Everett	$2.50

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

☐ Check here if you wish to enclose check or money order with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee.)

ON DALE CARNEGIE'S LIST OF 'MUST' BOOKS

CONTENTS

- I. Marriage: A Sexual Relation
- II. The Nature of the Sex-Act
3. The Sex Organs of Men and Women
4. Difficulties
5. The Perfect Sex-Act
6. Other Practical Issues
7. Menstruation
8. Menopause ("Change of Life")
9. Birth Control

DIAGRAMS

The Male Sex Organs;
The Female Sex Organs—
Working Parts: The Female Sex Organs—Sensation-providing Parts.

THE THEATRE GUILD presents
Maxwell Anderson's new play

THE MASQUE OF KINGS

with
HENRY HULL DUDLEY DIGGES
PAULINE FREDERICK
MAJESTIC THEATRE, 44th St., W. of B'way. Mats.
Thurs. & Sat., 2.40 Evgs. 8:40. 494 seats $1.10

STUDIO PARTY FOR SPAIN

Auspices: Lawyer's Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy

Speaker: ARTHUR VASNIT

American Aviator who served 6 months in Spain.

And Entertainment from the New York Stage.

REFRESHMENTS

DANCING

MAY 1st, 9 P.M. Admission 75c ALMA REED'S STUDIO
724 Fifth Avenue

VISIT

SOVIET RUSSIA

WITH

JOSHUA KUNITZ

For the fourth season Joshua Kunitz will share his first-hand knowledge of Soviet life with a group of American travelers. Here is a chance to meet people and get behind the scenes. Sailing July 3, you travel eight weeks, spending a full month in the U. S. S. R. Inclusive Rate. . . . $543

Other trips to Europe from $297
To Russia from $394

Or you may travel on your own

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

JOHN L. SPIVAK
57 Day Tour $689

BROADUS MITCHELL
49 Day Tour $573

LANGSTON HUGHES
60 Day Tour $499

Do you know why these are the three most talked of travel opportunities?

EDUTRAVEL, Inc.

An Institute for Educational Travel
55 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK, N. Y.
Telephone GRamercy 7-3284-3285

Write, call or phone
—and mention The Nation.

Going Away?

To assure regular delivery of The Nation, subscribers are requested to give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Report your change of address to the Circulation Department, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

I think not of a living thing—
My wife my dog and most myself—
But that I think of it as dead.

The accompanying despair seems trivial, even sentimental, because it does not show its cause; unless, indeed, the wilful unreason of this whole conception of the self be taken as the cause. If this is the intention, these poems appear as a highly articulate expression of a fundamental inarticulate-ness.

PHILIP BLAIR RICE

The Victorian Age

VICTORIAN ENGLAND: THE PORTRAIT OF AN AGE.

By G. M. Young. Oxford University Press. $3.

JUST a century ago it became possible to know accurately the habits and resources of a nation. That this abundance of light should fall upon the first of industrial societies was an accident of inestimable advantage for those concerned with the present and future of civilization. From 1835 onward were published the investigations of the British Parliament, which, beginning with factory labor and sanitation, gradually threw light into almost every crack and cranny of the social structure. And what these Blue Books fail to reveal is sure to be found somewhere in the socially conscious Victorian literature. But the very fulness of the sources of knowledge was initially a handicap to the historian. The perspective of time, the sifting and evaluating of plethoric materials by such variously equipped pioneers as Halévy, Clapham, the Webbs, the Hammonds, Cazamian, and Kenneth Clark, cooperative enterprises such as the two-volume "Early Victorian England" of which Mr. Young was editor, were pre-requisite to Mr. Young's venture to compress into 287 pages the portrait of the Victorian Age. Only those who have spent years among his sources can appreciate the triumph of his achievement. He has the late Lytton Strachey's gift of brilliant and urbane summary with far more conscientious and disciplined allegiance to fact; a clause or phrase conveys with deceptive ease the essence of some specialized study. A mind curious, disinterested, ironic, and many-sided has drawn upon politics, economics, science, literature, and art to achieve what Mr. Young defines as the final and dominant object of historical study: "the origin, content, and articulation of that objective mind which controls the thinking and doing of an age and race."

The history of a culture woven of so many strands defies the compass of a review, but from the extraordinarily rich fabric one may detach a strand, the economic. The beginning of Victoria's reign finds a ruling class steeped in the traditions of agricultural feudalism faced with the problem of controlling the bewildering novelty of an industrialism astonishingly potent for evil as for good. The menaces to the national welfare from involuntary unemployment, slums, sweated labor, and threats of revolution oblige a modification of the philosophy dominant among the comfortable classes "that Christian responsibility was a duty everywhere except in economic life, and that strength and vigor, the control of nature by science, of events by prudence, are good things everywhere except in the hands of the state." The turning points Mr. Young finds in the Factory Act of 1847 and the Public Health Act of 1848. The establishment of the administrative efficiency of representative government provides a rise in the general standard of living in the mid-century, which encourages movements for the introduction among the industrial and commercial classes of the amenities of living. But England does not long maintain the initial advantages she gained from being the cradle of the industrial and commercial revolutions. The quickening of communications draws her from "splendid isolation" into the cross-currents of the world; her industry is outstripped by organized German technology, her scientific agriculture by the broader lands of America. The partly democratized ruling classes fail to meet these challenges because of their contempt for the intellect and their exclusiveness, which precludes understanding of the psychology of other races. On the occasion of Victoria's death in 1901 the London Times predicts with astonishing clairvoyance the dangers ahead. Writing in the melancholy autumn of 1936, Mr. Young confesses that he has described "the waning of a great civilization."

To the American reader this remarkable book suggests arresting analogies. The United States is now psychologically and culturally in the earlier part of the period Mr. Young describes. England had a national child-labor law in 1833; her urban population outnumbered the agricultural by 1851; Parliament recognized in 1865 the right of collective bargaining. Bentham's phrase "judge-made law" and the formation of a "Private Enterprise Society" have a familiar ring. Will America, even if her industry becomes regulated by the federal government, follow England in an inevitable Spenglerian downward curve? is a reader's final question.

EMERY NEFF

An American Tribute

CENTENNIAL ESSAYS FOR PUSHKIN. Edited by Samuel H. Cross and Ernest J. Simmons. Harvard University Press. $2.50.

THE papers which make up this scholarly symposium are chiefly exercises in exegesis and appreciation, and add nothing to the known facts. With the exception of Mrs. Radin's sensitive, though somewhat unintegrated, essay on "Eugene Onegin" and Professor Coleman's well-informed study on the contacts between Pushkin and his equally illustrious Polish contemporary, Mickiewicz, the essays deal with broad aspects of the subject. One finds here a biographical sketch of the poet; an authoritative and acute analysis, by George V. Vernadsky, of Pushkin's political philosophy, a topic which a good deal of recent commentary has only served to obscure; an admirable consideration, by Michael Karpovich, of the poet as a historian; a rather sophomoric survey of his prose writings; a competent discussion of his interest in folklore, by Victor de Gérard. Alexander Kaun offers a somewhat rambling survey of Pushkin's foreign indebtedness. The title of his essay, Pushkin's Sense of Measure, misleads one into thinking that he is dealing with what Professor Noyes so aptly calls the Russian's curiosa felicitas. Indeed, it is to George Rapall Noyes that we owe the most important essay in the book and one which is a genuine contribution to criticism. This attempt to ascertain Pushkin's place in world literature is marked by admirable discernment. While aware that the future must decide whether Pushkin is destined to remain the local figure that he has been until now, the author is inclined to deny the claim that he has the universality of a Shakespeare or the caliber of a Tolstoy. The final paper, by Professor Cross, offers a glimpse of the critical battles raging around the poet in Russia but fails to come to grips with the problem of what he signifies to this generation of his countrymen.

The volume contains also Robert Hillyer's translation of

What's happening to England?

Here's Hilaire Belloc's
answer!

THIS DYNAMIC book is a piercing analysis of the gradually changing pattern of British society and institutions today, by the noted author and parliamentarian who has seen many of his former prophecies come true with depressing accuracy. His concise study—and its startling conclusions—clearly reveals why English policy vacillates while the rest of the world takes sides in today's vital issues. 91 pages, $1.25.

AN ESSAY ON THE NATURE OF Contemporary England

At all bookstores, or from
SHEED & WARD, 63 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

OF REAL VALUE TO EVERYONE INTERESTED IN SOCIAL SECURITY LEGISLATION

SOCIAL SECURITY

By Maxwell S. Stewart

THIS BOOK tells the story of Social Security in the United States, showing what the Federal Security Act has to offer Americans and comparing its somewhat limited provisions with social insurance programs of other leading industrial countries.

Attention is given those issues which are likely to occupy public attention in the next five years. And an important concluding section demonstrates how adequate social security legislation offers the long sought key to economic stability. The author is Associate Editor of The Nation and has studied social insurance at first hand in various European countries. $3.00

W. W. NORTON & CO., 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Pushkin's celebrated but far from flawless lyric, A Monument, and of Lermontov's elegy on the poet's death. In the past, all too often Pushkin was traduced by amateur versifiers. One is glad to note that the task of Englishing him is at last being taken up by people of his own profession.

AVRAHM YARMOLINSKY

Shorter Notices

ANGELS IN UNDRRESS. By Mark Benney. Random House. $2.50.

It is rather a pity that Mr. Benney's English publisher went to so much trouble to guarantee the authenticity of Mr. Benney's life story. Whether this London childhood among prostitutes, con-men, and criminals really happened or not; whether Mr. Benney, under another name, actually served a sentence for burglary in Borstal prison and another at Chelmsford are all pretty irrelevant. If it is a true story, then Mr. Benney's extraordinary literacy after a hit-or-miss common-school education is something to wonder at; his knowledge, at the age of thirteen or so, of Sèvres bowls, Bühl cabinets, and Louis Quatorze bureaux is even more strange. It might be better to forget the truth and admire the fiction. For Mr. Benney is a capital writer; his portraits of men and women are excellent; his prisons, whether he ever saw the inside of them or not, are tangible prisons, the more so because there is little of the ordinary violence that fictional prisons usually have. And the awkward attempts of a criminal to arrive at an understanding of life are touching and even profound. If, as seems unlikely, every word of this book were true, it would not be a better book than it now is. "Angels in Undress" is a work of art; which is to say that it is more true, as it is more ordered, more confined, and more elevated, than life.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

THE GOLDEN FLEECE OF CALIFORNIA. By Edgar Lee Masters. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.

Mr. Masters has set out once again to combine his enthusiasm for a classic motif with his knowledge of the American setting, this time in a narrative poem. His Argonauts are a group of Forty-niners headed for California gold, and he has tried to concoct out of their experience an adventure story with a moral. But in spite of the exciting subject matter, the story fails of interest because the poetry does. The verse is slovenly, wavering between labored attempts at dignity and informal chatter, and the many opportunities for drama and tension are entirely missed. Instead of contributing reality the details remain prosy and commonplace; the phrasing is continually twisted into clumsy inversions; and the verse proceeds at an uninspired dog trot which is frequently broken by Mr. Masters's fondness for question-and-answer narration. When he pauses to speculate on the moral, he interrupts the story without giving it any more depth. The connection with the Golden Fleece legend is too crudely handled to be significant.

BURROUGHS MITCHELL

ESCAPE TO THE TROPICS. By Desmond Holdridge. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The title of this book admirably describes it. Desmond and Bet Holdridge, a young couple who decided to amplify their honeymoon with a still further quest for adventure, shook the grime of our metropolitan area and sailed southward. They were fortunate in hearing about the island of St. John, most virginal of the American Virgin Islands—though lying less than a mile across Pillsbury Sound from St. Thomas, whose capital, Charlotte Amalie, has been a port-of-call for centuries for the ships of the seven seas. St. John is a sparsely inhabited island—almost a Robinson Crusoe island. On it no wheel turns. One travels afoot or on horseback on jungle-shaded trails up the steep hills and down into deep valleys. The island is fringed with exquisite white beaches, and the sheltered waters are ultramarine, cobalt, and indigo over the varying depths of coral. The "lonely and lovely" beach at French Bay, back of which nestled "The Shoebox" where the Desmonds lived, was theirs exclusively "for months on end." In this region, where the trade winds unceasingly rustle the cocoanut palms, the author felt a keener "sense of out-of-the-worldness" than in the Amazonian jungles. "Escape" to a tropical isle has been the ultimate yearning of millions of people who weary of the clatter of our machine civilization. The Holdridges really did it! They were able to live comfortably on between sixty and seventy dollars a month. And the island of St. John still offers the same opportunities to those who love the undefiled oases of a shrinking world.

ERNEST GRUENING

AE'S LETTERS TO MINANLABAIN. The Macmillan Company. $2.

Between 1930 and 1935 AE, the Irish poet, wrote frequently to Mr. and Mrs. Kingsley Porter. Their home was Glenveagh Castle, Ireland, the nearest post office was Minanlábáin—hence the title of this book. AE was very close to the Porters, and they in turn loved him. Mrs. Porter's delightful account of AE's visits to them introduces the book. AE's letters are warm, very human documents. Obviously he was well aware at this time of the economic crisis in England, Ireland, and America. Obviously, too, he kept a keen eye on Irish politics and literature and read with interest many American books. He was writing during this period his own book "Avatars." He comments on Edmund Wilson's "Axel's Castle" favorably, remarking that Joyce "gets away from life in the effort to get into it." He reads Wyndham Lewis and finds "The Apes of God" lacking in humanity. He speaks of Lady Gregory's death. He talks humorously of the Irish Academy of Letters and its members. He enjoys reading Van Wyck Brooks on Emerson and remarks that Emerson's life had little outward excitement. He thinks "Russia will be all right in twenty-five years when the younger generation of Communists begins to fill up the spiritual vacancy that nature abhors," and adds that the English have not imagination to find a way out, are too decent for bloodshed. He reads Eliot's criticism and finds it sound but dry save for the essay on Dante. He sends the Porters his new poems. Altogether these letters make AE seem much less the pure mystic and much more flesh and blood.

EDA LOU WALTON

PHINEAS FLETCHER, MAN OF LETTERS, SCIENCE, AND DIVINITY. By Abram Barnett Langdale. Columbia University Press. $3.

More and more the byways of seventeenth-century literature and thought attract the attention of scholars and critics; increasingly, substantial and illuminating special studies have made the learned stumbling of Grosart and the pioneer appreciations of Gosse seem products of a remote and primitive day. Mr. Langdale gives striking evidence that all the massie ore of the Jacobean and Caroline deposit has not yet been transmuted into critical gold. Phineas Fletcher is, and always was, a minor poet; but this study of his career and accomplishment is genuinely significant. It integrates the several earlier studies of Fletcher, adds a substantial quantity of new material, and corrects opinions widely though erroneously held. No effort is made by the author to build his subject to unjustifiable importance, but throughout the book Fletcher emerges from the dusk of incomplete understanding, and at the end he becomes truly significant. The volume bulges with new information. Its main value, however, lies in the author's exact statement of the relation between Fletcher and Spenser, and in his masterly analysis of Fletcher's knowledge of the new science and his use of that knowledge as background for "The Purple Island." The only serious omission in the book is the lack of a study of the influence of Fletcher on Milton as wise and thorough as the analysis of that of Spenser on Fletcher.

DONALD A. ROBERTS

KING JOHN. By William Shakespeare. Edited by John Dover Wilson. The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

With this volume Mr. Wilson's edition of Shakespeare, which up until "Hamlet" three years ago was his and Sir Arthur Quiller-Couch's, takes a plunge into the histories. Mr. Wilson's editing is as usual of great originality and interest, and his criticism is that of a man blessed with both imagination and sense. Those who in the past have watched him with horror among the texts of Shakespeare will be relieved to hear that he has not tried to establish a new relation between the play under scrutiny and the older "Troublesome Reign of King John." They might have feared, for instance, that he would assign the latter to the category of "bad" quartos and so maintain the thesis of its degeneracy from Shakespeare's manuscript. He is for once conventional, however, in that he assumes without serious question Shakespeare's dependence on the "Troublesome Reign"; though his study of the rewriting is shrewder than such studies usually are because he knows more about poetry than most editors do. Meanwhile the rest of the histories, not to speak of the rest of the tragedies, are awaited with eagerness by all admirers of Mr. Wilson's work. It has taken just sixteen years for sixteen volumes to appear, and there are perhaps twenty-one to come. May life be long at the University of Edinburgh, where one hopes that Mr. Wilson has nothing to do but edit Shakespeare.

MARK VAN DOREN

Love in Connecticut

ANY readers who may have missed the drama column during the last few weeks do not really know what they have been missing. The plays that bloom in the spring are usually somewhat less welcome than the flowers of the same season, and this year nearly all of them have been skunk-cabbages. I should probably not refer to the painful subject at all were it not for the fact that one little crocus called "Penny Wise" poked its head shyly above ground at the Morosco Theater, and deserves encouragement. The scene is a philandering playwright's summer home in Connecticut and the atmosphere is strictly vernal. Two of the playwright's ex-loves try to explain to a prospective third just how it is that plans to confess all to his flibbertigibbet wife and to run off to Brittany always come to naught, but she has to learn for herself. The play is concerned with the process of her learning, and though it might be paced a bit more briskly, it is neat as well as funny. Kenneth MacKenna is the philanderer and Linda Watkins the wife. There is another very pleasant performance by Irene Purcell as one of the exes.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by

C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch. M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

Illustrations by Robert L. Dickinson, M.D., F.A.C.S.—Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital.

Illustrated with
Correct Anatomical Diagrams
Fully Explained

A 3-WAY-GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing
Woman's Hygiene

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Aquelescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via the Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sex Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

* The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views.
The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 971-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me a plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 and a few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded. I am over 21 years old.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

"From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men knows how to perform the sexual act correctly."

RECORDS

Read the Record

—give your own verdict—

There is no excuse now for anyone who can read to speak vaguely about the trial of the members of the anti-Soviet Trotskyite Center in Moscow. The 580-page verbatim report of the proceedings is now available in English. Here those who doubt and those who don't will find everything they can possibly want to know. Here is the complete testimony, drawn from the seventeen defendants in seven days of open court sessions, continuing for eight hours a day. Read it through and decide for yourself whether the accused were given a fair trial, whether their confessions were obtained by terror, trickery, truth drugs, or cold hard facts. Get the book FREE with a 6-month subscription to New Masses, that relentless weekly which insists on giving you a backstage view of history in the making, let the props fall where they may. Don't lose a minute—send $2.50 and the coupon TODAY!

VERBATIM REPORT OF THE Moscow Trial
FREE with a 6-mos. subscription to
NEW MASSES

NEW MASSES, 31 East 27th Street, New York City

I enclose $2.50, for which please send me New Masses for 6 months, and a FREE copy of the Verbatim Report of the Moscow Trial in accordance with your Special Offer.

Name
Address
City State
Occupation (N)

COLUMBIA'S new set of Beethoven's Eroica Symphony (six records, $9) is as great a disappointment as its Beethoven Ninth a year ago; and for the same reasons. In each case there was urgent need of a good new set; in each case such a result was promised by the participation of Weingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic; and in each case the promise was defeated by bad recording. I know what the orchestra sounds like; and the superb quality of its strings and brass can be heard in the "Rosenkavalier" set of four or five years back. In the Eroica the tone is coarse, the balance is bad (a series of repeated notes by the horn in an inner voice, at one point, is more prominent than the melody in the woodwinds), and the performance is enveloped in the noise of the worst reverberation I have heard on records thus far. I went back to the Mengelberg set of the Eroica (Victor) and found it excellent in these respects; it lacks only the volume and richness of present-day orchestral recording, and its bass is a little weak. The bass is even weaker in the Schillings version (Columbia and Decca), which I recall as offering the best performance of the work. As for Koussevitzky's (Victor), I like neither the performance nor the recording.

Columbia's new set of Beethoven's Eighth (three records, $5), also made by Weingartner and the Vienna Philharmonic, has something of the same coarseness of tone and noisiness; and if you must have the latest thing in recording with this marvelous symphony, the new Victor set (three records, $6.50) is to be preferred for its excellent reproduction of the beautiful playing of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky. But the old Columbia set offers astonishingly good reproduction of a performance by Weingartner and the old Royal (London) Philharmonic which, in its justness of pace and feeling, its buoyancy and spirit, is superior not only to Koussevitzky's but to Weingartner's present performance. Boult's version (Victor) is pedestrian.

Columbia has issued another work of Beethoven that is even shorter, but wonderful in its own way—the Piano Sonata Opus 90 (two records, $3). Egon Petri's performance of the first movement does not achieve the dramatic power and depth of Schnabel's, and his playing in the lovely second movement is flawed slightly by a sentimentality of which Schnabel's is completely free; but it is nevertheless the performance of an excellent musician, and excellently recorded. I have not been able to compare it with Kempff's on Polydor.

In Debussy's Sonata No. 3 for violin and piano we have his idiom and style carried to a high point of refinement and subtlety, but with content refined away to almost nothing. The performance by Alfred Dubois and Marcel Maas and the recording are very good (Columbia: two records, $3).

Columbia might have better sets of Beethoven symphonies to sell if it used Beecham for them instead of employing his talents in a succession of things like Bizet's "L'Arlésienne" Suite No. 2 (one record, $1.50) and groups of pieces by Händel under the titles "The Gods Go A-Begging" and "The Origin of Design" (one record, $1.50). Performances and recording are good. On another Columbia single ($1) are a number of small pieces by Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach, played on the harpsichord by Yella Pessel, which I find dull.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editor

Ewin L. Davis for the Defense

Dear Sirs: My attention has been called to an article by Paul W. Ward which appeared in The Nation of February 27, in the concluding paragraph of which a grave injustice is done my brothers and me as well as the Federal Trade Commission.

The Ward article refers to an article by Edward R. Keyes in a recent issue of Advertising and Selling, and, drawing some wholly unjustified deductions therefrom, concludes:

He offers a series of cease-and-desist orders which the commission has handed down against fraudulent medicinal advertisements, and then from the files of the Nashville Tennessean, a daily paper, he takes current advertisements in which the same companies against which the commission's orders were issued two and three years ago are making the same fraudulent claims. Mr. Keyes does not explain why he used the Nashville Tennessean. Could it be because it is owned by Paul M. Davis, who is not only a brother of Roosevelt's ambassador-at-large, Norman H. Davis, but also a brother of Ewin L. Davis, who is chairman of the Federal Trade Commission lobbied so vigorously last year to keep advertising control in the commission's hands?

Paul M. Davis never owned the Nashville Tennessean nor any stock therein, nor had nor exercised any control whatever over the Nashville Tennessean, at the time any of the advertisements in question appeared or either the Keyes or the Ward article was published.

The Nashville Tennessean was placed in receivership four years ago under a general creditors' bill by order of the United States District Court and has been in complete charge of the receiver appointed by the court ever since. Finally, creditors petitioned the court to sell the paper for the benefit of creditors, and after a time the court entered an order directing the sale of the property at public auction on January 7, 1937. Paul M. Davis as agent was the highest bidder, and it was announced that the paper was sold to him subject to approval of the court. Under a rule of the court, anybody had the right to raise the bid within a period of twenty days. The sale was not confirmed to Mr. Davis until March 4, 1937. As stated, he had no voice whatever in the management or control of the paper prior thereto.

The animus back of the grossly misrepresentative and unfair Keyes article is indicated by the further fact that advertisements similar to those in question appeared in a large number of other newspapers and periodicals throughout the country.

A statement of the true facts would show that the Keyes article and the Ward article, in so far as it relates to the Federal Trade Commission, were based upon false premises and contain unjustified conclusions and false implications.

EWIN L. DAVIS

Washington, March 11

Cross-Examination by Ward

Dear Sirs: Mr. Davis in his letter commits one big and one little injustice. He does me a little injustice in suggesting I implied anything so elementary as that the few pennies accruing from the publication of quack nostrum advertisements would move his wealthy brother to bring pressure on him and the Federal Trade Commission to let those pennies keep rolling in.

He does himself a big injustice in asserting that his brother was not a major owner of the Nashville Tennessean at the time the advertisements in question were published last fall. I have before me an official statement by Jesse H. Jones, as chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which notes under date of October 31, 1935, that the RFC had some time before that date sold $250,000 worth of the Nashville Tennessean's bonds to Mr. Paul Davis as president of the American National Bank, Nashville, and that this brought the bank's total holdings to $460,000 out of the $750,000 in bonds outstanding, the bank having previously owned $210,000 worth. The paper, Mr. Jones's statement notes, was even then in receivership. The bonds were its senior security, secured by a first mortgage on the property. The man who owned a majority of the bonds was virtual owner of the paper. The majority interest was held by Mr. Davis's bank, and I think Mr. Davis himself would not consider it mere flattery to say that he is the American National Bank.

I think that settles the point as to who owned the Nashville Tennessean at the time the advertisements mentioned by Mr. Keyes appeared in its columns.

In The Limelight

HERE'S TO CRIME

By Courtney
Ryley Cooper

$2.75 6th Printing

Read Chapter Fourteen —and learn why these ghastly sex crimes continue to fill the daily papers.

The Making Of The Constitution

By Charles Warren

New Edition $3.75

Most of the arguments
you read or hear on both sides of the question are based on Charles
Warren's three books.
The other two are
"The Supreme Court in United States History,"
2 volumes $10.00,
"Congress, The Constitution and The Supreme Court," $3.50.

LITTLE, BROWN

1837 1937

Classified Advertisements

62c a line

(3 lines minimum)

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street

New York City

COrtlandt 7-3330

But in case Mr. Ewin Davis wants to press the point farther, I am prepared to point out that all but one of those advertisements have appeared one or more times in the Nashville Tennessean since March 4 last, the date when Mr. Ewin Davis admits his brother Paul officially became the paper's proprietor. My examination of the Nashville Tennessean's current files also brought to light many equally offensive advertisements which Mr. Keyes might have mentioned.

Mr. Davis is disingenuous when he states that similar advertisements appeared in newspapers and periodicals throughout the country. The assertion is quantitatively but not qualitatively true. The advertisements in question and the others I found in current issues of the Nashville Tennessean are certainly to be found in a great many publications, but I venture to think they are the same publications that responded affirmatively to the letters sent out in 1935 by William P. Jacobs, of Jacobs' Religious Lists and the Institute of Medicine Manufacturers, urging "our business friends" to get after the newspapers and make them fight the Tugwell bill and fight, in particular, to keep control of advertising in the Federal Trade Commission. They definitely are not advertisements acceptable to such papers as the New York Times or the St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

And since Mr. Davis has brought up the matter so protestantly, I should also like to note a few other products of the research to which he has impelled me. I should like to note that among the directors or advisory board members of Mr. Paul Davis's bank are Bolling Warner, J. M. Gray, and F. M. Bass. Men of the same names and Tennessee addresses are active figures in the patent-medicine industry. One heads the Warner Drug Company, manufacturer of Renfrew Salts for gout and rheumatism. Another is the manufacturer of Gray's Ointment, the erstwhile cancer cure which occupies a prominent position in the Food and Drug Administration's Chamber of Horrors. Attorney Bass has represented patent-medicine companies, including the manufacturer of Gray's Ointment, in proceedings before federal agencies. It also is worth noting that, according to Poor's "Register," Mr. Paul Davis is a director and, I am told, a principal owner of the Welch Grape Juice Company, and I doubt that even his brother believes that the advertising claims the FTC permits this company to make for its product as a reducing agent could be repeated with impunity on its bottle labels, which are subject to Food and Drug Administration control.

It seems to me that Mr. Davis, instead of framing the protest he has written, would have done better to attempt to explain why FTC control of advertising has been a flop; why the worst frauds in the food-and-drug racket are fighting to keep advertising control vested in the FTC; and why, when Mr.

Jacobs urged his dependents and constituents to write letters to Congressmen to that same end, he urged that copies be sent to Mr. Ewin Davis, who was then FTC chairman.

Finally, I want to thank Mr. Davis for having compelled me to inquire much more deeply into FTC affairs, for it has awakened me to the complete and incredible incompetence of the FTC's advertising-control section. I hope to set down the evidence thereof in the near future. It will suffice here to say that I am now prepared to believe that the men who pass upon drug advertising for the FTC are Peruna addicts who think the remedy for tonsillitis is an old sock wrapped snugly about the neck.

PAUL W. WARD

Washington, April 17

Correction

[In our issue of February 13 we erroneously stated that Agnes Smedley had served as secretary to Mrs. Sun Yat-sen. We are informed by Mrs. Sun that Miss Smedley is not and never was her secretary.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for subscriber's change of address.

FOR RENT

SUNRISE

LAKE BUNGALOW COLONY

Now RENTING: Summer Bungalows, furnished overlooking private bathing beach; 800 ft.; Hr. N. Y. Easy shopping; Low Commutation; Free boating bathing, tennis, handball; Dancing, club house.

E. Abrams, Sunrise Lake, Mendham Rd., Morristown, N. J., or 110 Riverside Dr., N. Y.; TR. 7-5557.

FOR SALE

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value

G. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515-M

Beautiful, renovated house, electrically equipped throughout. Pine living room. Swimming, tennis; progressive school for children. Stonybrook, Westport, Conn. Call Halifax 5-3618.

FOR RENT—FOR SALE

Oscawana Lake. New Colonial home for sale. 4 miles north of Westchester. 3 large bedrooms, pine living room, modern kitchen, bath, dining terrace. Sports facilities, golf. Will rent furnished, $600. Another beautiful home, $850. Charles Waters, Maine 4-6663.

SUMMER PLACE WANTED

Few girls, high type, desire interesting summer place, good swimming, commuting, non-sectarian, price reasonable. Box No. 896, c/o The Nation.

ROOM WANTED

Gentleman of refinement desires furnished room, private bath, river view, between West 72-96th St., quiet surroundings. Box No. 899, c/o The Nation.

Gentleman. Large cheerful room (furnished or unfurnished), garage, possibly breakfast. Pelham Bay Park section. Box No. 901, c/o The Nation.

HOUSE WANTED

Secluded furnished house in Westchester County, 3 bedrooms, view, 1 hour or less commuting Grand Central, adults, to rent June to October, not over $300. References. Write details. Box 900, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Couple driving to MEXICO about June 4 want 1, 2 people share expenses. Month-6 wk. trip. Box No. 897, c/o The Nation.

Experienced house manager for music school settlement. Vacancy calls for cultured and socially conscious personality. Box No. 898, c/o The Nation.

Wanted to Lease by a Nation subscriber a well-bred Boxer bitch. Excellent facilities, good care. Not a breeder. Mrs. J. P. Taugher, Leonard St., Agawam, Mass.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket. Sebring, Florida.

POSITIONS WANTED

Young lady, 22, college graduate with Teacher's certificate, as traveling companion or tutor. Specialized training in French, Spanish, English. Attractive, cooperative. References exchanged. Write Box No. 890, c/o The Nation.

German student wants summer position. Chief fields: sociology and political science. Knowledge of sports, travel; talented personality. Box No. 893, c/o The Nation.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets

Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUr. 2-4221.

DO YOU WANT—

A house in England—an apartment—a room—an office—a ranch—a secretary—a piano—a lecturer—a tutor—a telescope—a grandfather's clock—a bicycle.—

All of these have appeared in our Classified columns.

Call the Advertising Department, Cortlandt 7-3330 by Friday, so your advertisement may be in the next week's issue.

RATES: 62 cents a line of 6 words
Minimum 3 lines

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 8, 1937

NUMBER 19

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

521

EDITORIALS:

BILBAO AND THE WORLD'S CONSCIENCE

523

ARE WE SAFE FROM WAR?

524

THE MARKET RECESSION

525

ROOSEVELT II AND THE TRUSTS

by Paul W. Ward

526

"FORTUNE" MAGAZINE by Dwight Macdonald

527

WITH THE INTERNATIONAL BRIGADE by R. P.

531

BLOODY HARLAN by Frederick R. Barkley

532

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

534

PENNIES FROM HEAVEN by Heywood Broun

535

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

OUR ACTORS AND THE CRITICS by Mary McCarthy

536

THE STEEL INDUSTRY by Dwight Macdonald

538

AMERICA THE BEAUTIFUL—FOR FICTION

by Caroline Smith

539

THE SUNPAPERS by Oswald Garrison Villard

540

STEP BY STEP by Mark Van Doren

542

DRAMA: THE TAMING OF A SHREW

by Joseph Wood Krutch

543

FILMS: ON HORROR'S HEAD by Mark Van Doren

545

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

MAY DAY IN EUROPE RAN A GAUNTLET OF guns. In Spain the day of working-class solidarity was filled with the roar of actual civil war as one segment of the world proletariat fought for its very life. In Moscow the Red Square and the sky overhead were black with machines for war against fascism, built with millions of Soviet rubles that might have gone into a higher standard of living. All over France, with the echo of Spain's struggle in their ears, hundreds of thousands of workers marched with impressive calm and orderliness: in the past year the French working class, in the face of great danger, has acquired a new sense of its responsibility and a new access of determination to keep the enemy back. In Berlin Hitler made a travesty of the day by turning it into a fascist festival. In Poland the celebration was not peaceful even though "several thousand" Communists had been arrested beforehand. Fascists distributed anti-Jewish leaflets and threw bombs at the Socialist parades. They succeeded in killing a five-year-old Jewish boy in the arms of his mother and in wounding several other persons.

★

IN AMERICA THE GUNS SEEMED FARTHER away—though the Spanish war marched in the parades—and May Day, which was first celebrated as a working-class holiday in this country, took on a new significance in the light of the great union victories in automobiles and steel. New York put on its largest and most orderly parade, and in the industrial towns the day must have seemed brighter for the thousands of new union buttons flashing in the sun. For the first time, perhaps, many an American worker consciously joined the procession of international labor. May Day, 1937, demonstrated that the morale and solidarity of those workers of the world who are still free stand at a high level. But that happy reflection must be tempered by the solemn realization that during the next years they will be called upon—perhaps before another May Day—to face crises which will test every ounce of their unity and strength.

★

MEMBERS OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE of the United States obviously live in a sort of Noah's Ark stranded on high ground to which floods never rise; they also wear blinders over their eyes and cotton in their ears, and they never read the newspapers—if one is to judge by the resolutions passed at their most recent conclave in Washington. Their most cutting words were of course, reserved for the Wagner Labor Relations Act, which they consider unfair to organized business. They want the act amended in as many ways as possible in order to secure what they call "industrial peace." The chamber would curtail the right of picketing, prohibit federal, state, and municipal employees from striking, insist on the registration of employees' organizations that negotiate labor agreements, and in other ways make labor "responsible." Needless to say, it denounced the President's judiciary program and opposed the Walsh-Healey Act. It is against the corporate tax (to the death). A few notes of reality invaded the ark, notably that provided by Dr. Henry C. Metcalf, who told the audience that collective bargaining "has become absolutely essential in a modern industrial state." Mr. Metcalf even went so far as to say that Henry Ford has miscalculated. He escaped unharmed. Meanwhile there is every indication that the Chamber of Commerce will continue to steer its course not according to any new-fangled compass but by its own very dead reckoning.

★

THE CRUSHING DEFEAT OF THE HAYASHI Cabinet in last week's elections threatens to plunge Japan into its most serious political crisis of modern times. Of the 466 deputies elected, only 11 have committed themselves to support of the government. The two major parties—the Minseito and Seiyukai—are almost evenly divided, while the Social Mass Party, Japan's version of the Popular Front, more than doubled its representation and comes close to holding the balance of power between the major parties. Premier Hayashi has intimated that he will not accept the verdict of the majority but will again dissolve Parliament. But with an overwhelming proportion of the population as well as of the Diet against him, it is hard to see how this would alter the situation unless he plans a coup d'état. The overwhelming size of the majority against the Cabinet rules out the traditional methods of bribery and intimidation. Thus after a series of compromise Cabinets running back over five years, it looks as if the final showdown between military and civil rule could not much longer be postponed.

★

WITH THE PUBLICATION OF THE NEW IRISH constitution, De Valera's long struggle for complete independence from Britain enters its final stage. The constitution itself does little more than register formally a divorce which has long existed in fact. In abolishing the office of Governor-General last year, the Free State actually severed the last tie with Great Britain as far as domestic affairs are concerned. The present document would cut Ireland adrift in international affairs as well, although it leaves the way open for an alliance for purposes of defense. Most striking of the changes in the structure of the government is the creation of the office of president, for which Mr. De Valera himself is doubtless headed. As in France, the president will be the titular head of the government, but the actual power will rest in the hands of a cabinet responsible to the legislature. But in addition he will appoint the judiciary and exercise authority as head of the army without responsibility to the government. Although provision is made for the inclusion of northern Ireland in the new republic Eire, there is little chance that De Valera will court British displeasure by pushing this point at present.

★

THE BEST NEWS THAT HAS COME OUT OF Puerto Rico in months is the signing of a bill legalizing the distribution of birth-control information. The adoption of the measure followed a long and bitter struggle in which the Catholic church led the opposition. The new law is a triumph for the intelligence and humanity of the island legislature and will be an invaluable help to the groups that are struggling against almost hopeless odds to improve the dismal social life of the island. But no experienced social worker or government official will expect important immediate results. The church has ancient and effective weapons at hand with which to resist the spread of birth-control knowledge; and the ignorance and desperate poverty of the population will be its chief aids. Only the first round of this fight has been won. But it is a very important round.

★

THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF TEACHERS IS busy harvesting its spring crop of academic-freedom cases. Troubles in the colleges mature at the season when appointments are made and contracts terminated. We have already commented on the dismissal of the two economics instructors at Harvard, Alan R. Sweazy and J. Raymond Walsh; a full discussion of the educational implications of that case will appear next week. Meanwhile other academic plums have dropped. The dismissal of Henry Klein from Brooklyn College, New York, has been taken up actively by the federation, while its special committee on academic freedom has just issued a full report on the dismissal of Jerome Davis from the Yale Divinity School. The report is based on an eight months' survey of the case, including a study of the regulations governing appointments, promotions, and tenure at Yale, an analysis of the evidence, interviews with Professor Davis's colleagues and students, and an examination of his correspondence with the university. On the basis of this study the committee has arrived at certain unanimous conclusions which are worth summarizing: (1) the budgetary explanation of Professor Davis's dismissal offered by the Yale administration has no validity; (2) the contention that his scholarship and teaching ability are inferior is not supported by the testimony of students, former students, and his colleagues; (3) the Yale Corporation, not the permanent faculty of the Divinity School, is directly responsible for dropping him; (4) his dismissal represents a clear violation of academic freedom; (5) the procedure followed by the administration abrogated the recognized principles of tenure; (6) "... Professor Davis should be restored to his post in accordance with the recommendation for reappointment voted by the Divinity School permanent faculty." We understand that a student demonstration is planned to coincide with a meeting of the Yale Corporation this coming Saturday. We hope its protest penetrates the walls of the meeting place and serves at least to trouble the collective conscience of that autocratic body.

★

YALE MAY NOT ALWAYS RESPECT ACADEMIC freedom and worth within its own walls, but it has taken the right position in declining the invitation of Göttingen University to send a delegate to that institution's 200th anniversary celebration. So has Princeton and so has Oxford. Harvard has blundered again as it did when Heidelberg's 550th anniversary took place last summer; its action is the more amazing in view of President Conant's fine stand in declining money from Hanfstaengl and stressing the note of academic freedom throughout the recent tercentenary celebration. If ever there was a case for a boycott, here is one. Not only has half the Göttingen faculty left or been dropped since Hitler came in, but it is announced that the Göttingen celebration will put National Socialism "to the front." The National Socialist student leader has recently declared that "the German universities have only one enemy—the so-called free student. This is the type of student against whom we have declared open war." That student's offense is of course that he dares to profess other beliefs than those of National Socialism. Oxford's rejection is the more striking because it had tentatively accepted the Göttingen invitation. But when the vice-chancellor warned the university authorities that acceptance would be interpreted everywhere as approval of the suppression of free scholarship by the Nazis, the Hebdomal Council rescinded its action. Only tiny Durham, of all the English universities, has accepted the Göttingen invitation.

★

GOVERNOR LEHMAN VETOED THE BERG BILLS in vigorous terms just two hours after we went to press last week. The wonder still remains that the New York State legislature could have passed by a large majority a set of bills which would have made it practically impossible for an independent candidate to present himself for election. Obviously such legislators should be watched.

★

AT THE HEIGHT OF HIS POWER AS EDITOR of Collier's Weekly during the administrations of President Theodore Roosevelt and President Taft, Norman Hapgood exercised great public influence. A man of real ability and the finest character, without selfish ambitions, he soon found himself, an Eastern journalist, with a tremendous Middle Western following. But he could not take that with him when he went to Harper's Weekly, or make use of the great opportunity to place that journal in the forefront of the fight for liberty and progress; it went the sad way of so many historic publications. Perhaps as a journalist he lacked the warm appeal and ready humor that won him a host of personal friends. Perhaps his judicial and severely analytical mind prevented him from indorsing without qualification the cause of the under-dog toward which his sympathies inclined him. Whatever the cause, Norman Hapgood never repeated the success of his earlier years. His career, distinguished though it was, failed to measure up to his unusual capacities, and his friends will mourn his death doubly for that reason.

Bilbao and the World's Conscience

THE just indignation aroused in many quarters by the methodical bombing and extermination of the population of Guernica, the ancient Basque capital, and the horror provoked by the daily murderous shelling of civilian Madrid are not enough. The districts suffering from these atrocities must be helped quickly and generously. And the phenomenon must be analyzed. Absolutely nothing was gained by Franco through the premeditated annihilation of the peaceful citizens of Guernica. He may have thought back in October or November that bombing Madrid would undermine the morale of its inhabitants and force the Loyalists to surrender the city. That has not happened and cannot happen now. This slaughter, both in the Basque land and in Madrid, is altogether useless. American Catholics who uphold the bloody hands of Franco have much to explain and atone for. But Franco has nothing to explain. Those bombings explain more than any statements would. They announce that he has no intention of governing Spain with the consent of the governed. No Basques, no Madrilenos, no decent-thinking Spaniards will forget or forgive Franco's pointless wholesale cruelties. He must know this, but he does not care.

There has been pressure on the Loyalist government to retaliate for the bombardment of Madrid by bombing Salamanca or Seville or some other large rebel city. The Loyalist army could easily do this. It is not difficult to drop bombs on the immense target offered by a city—and then run. Yet despite the provocation, the Caballero airmen do not attack civilians. The secret of the struggle in Spain is hidden in this distinction between Franco's actions and the government's. The Popular Front leaders expect to rule all of Spain, and they have no desire to create unnecessary rancor and hatred of themselves. They feel that the people are their people. To Franco it does not matter. If he dominates at all, it will have to be with the aid of foreign bayonets or an unprecedented white terror, which will simply consist in massacring the masses.

The impression gains ground that Franco cannot win the civil war. He may register victories on the secondary Basque front, but even here the last shot has not been fired. After all, Franco was within a street-car ride of the center of Madrid on November 6, but he has not taken the capital yet. The rebels do not appear to have sufficient forces to triumph on the battlefield. There are those who argue that the government, too, lacks the strength to become master of the entire country. Talk of conciliation and mediation is accordingly heard once more; but between the Fascists, who have murdered thousands of women and children, who have imported Moors and Italians and Germans to save Spain for medievalism and poverty—between them and the progressive-minded parties of the Popular Front there can be no truce and no peace. If non-intervention is even a half-reality, time favors the Loyalists. They have the industries, the money, and one asset which Franco can never hope to possess—the enthusiastic support of the people—whereas the rebels have only what Germany and Italy are willing to give them.

There are indications that the two Fascist powers are not as optimistic about their Spanish experiment as they once were. The reason probably is that they are too weak. There are three outstanding facts in European politics today. The first and most important is the gradual undermining of the economic and social strength of Germany and Italy. The second is the evolution of Anglo-French relations into what seems to be another military entente. The third is the tremendous increase in the Soviet Union's armed might. All these circumstances diminish Hitler's and Mussolini's ability to strike. Now is the time to make it completely impossible for them to strike. Those who regard this as "war mongering" are simply being stupid. Germany, Italy, and Japan constitute the dangers to world peace. France and England, to be sure, are also imperialist countries. Their hands are not clean. They have robbed and plundered. But they are sated now, they want no more territories, they are more democratic than Germany and Italy and Japan, and they are therefore in a different category. If this bloc of peace-wanting countries were sufficiently solid and bold, the Fascist nations would not be able to raise a mailed fist. We do not want war. But the way to avoid it is to warn the potential war-makers in advance that the rest of the world will not tolerate further aggression. Such firmness would mean peace.

That this policy represents realism is proved by Spain. If Germany and Italy thought they could get away with it, they would not even pretend to honor non-intervention obligations. They would march in full force and smash Spanish democracy. But they cannot. Their arm is too short. It would be well to serve notice that against the united democratic world's determined will their arm will always be too short.

The danger is that Germany and Italy, fearing that this is perhaps the last phase of democratic vacillation, will take advantage of it to launch an adventure less difficult than Spain. In these days Czecho-Slovakia looks terribly isolated. What Mussolini said to Schuschnigg in Venice, following as it did the weakening of the Little Entente through the Yugoslav-Italian treaty, must have made even President Benes less optimistic. Now Colonel Beck, the Polish Foreign Minister, who has a pet scheme to divide Slovakia between the Poles and Magyars, is seeking to draw Rumania away from Czecho-Slovakia. Thanks to the new gigantic fortifications on the Rhine, France would have difficulty in rushing to the aid of Czecho-Slovakia. Russia would have to jump over the barrier of Rumania and could at best send only airplanes. The rape of Czecho-Slovakia may therefore seem an attractive prospect to Hitler unless England and France muster enough courage to order the Fascists to keep the peace.

Are We Safe from War?

WITH the signing of the Neutrality Act and the reporting out of the war-profits bill, Administration forces made substantial progress last week toward completing the program which is supposed to keep the United States out of war. Just how either of these bills is supposed to aid in achieving this objective is not clear. The Neutrality Act as finally adopted by the House and Senate is a far cry from either the mandatory law desired by our isolationists or the flexible measure advocated by those who support the idea of collective security. As it stands it does little more than place in the hands of the President the final choice of the side we shall support in the next war. There is, it is true, a mandatory embargo on arms, ammunition, and implements of war. But our trade in articles of this sort was relatively not great even during the World War. No steps have been taken to stop trade in copper, scrap-iron, cotton, oil, or other commodities which are indispensable for the carrying on of modern warfare. The most that the President can do is to forbid American ships to carry such articles, and to insist that the "title" to the shipments be shifted to some foreign company.

In its final form the "cash-and-carry" provision was made discretionary with the President. Thus it lies with the Chief Executive to decide after the outbreak of war whether we shall attempt to send goods to both sides and run the risk of having American ships sunk, or limit our trade to the nation which happens to control the seas. This, it scarcely needs to be pointed out, is the very opposite of true neutrality. In the event of any war the President is called upon at the very outset to decide which side the United States wishes to favor; and that decision will probably in the long run determine the side on which the United States may be expected to fight. To be specific: in a war between Great Britain and Germany the President will have to decide whether he wishes to attempt to run a British blockade of German ports and accept the risk of a war with Britain or to trade exclusively with Great Britain under the cash-and-carry provision. There is not even a suggestion that the President should be guided in making this decision by any form of collective judgment as to which nation was the aggressor and which the aggrieved.

Certain minor threats to American peace have undoubtedly been eliminated. Americans are prohibited from riding on ships belonging to belligerent nations; the arming of American merchantmen is forbidden; and it has been made unlawful for foreign warships to use American ports as a base of supplies in time of war. But the primary economic forces which operated in 1917 remain unfettered. The provision forbidding loans has been retained, but the President is given authority to permit "ordinary commercial credits and short-term obligations." No one, so far as we know, has suggested how loans are to be prevented once these credits reach substantial proportions.

Like the Neutrality Act, the war-profits bill as reported out of committee is dissimilar in many ways from the original bill. Some provisions of the Sheppard-Hill bill permitting the drafting of labor and management in time of war have been deleted, but others scarcely less dangerous, giving the President general licensing power, remain. The tax provision which would have allowed corporations to earn 5 per cent more than in the three years immediately preceding the declaration of war has been struck out and another inserted which calls for the absorption of all surplus profits after allowing "a fair normal return to labor, management, and invested capital." On the face of it this appears to be a desirable change, but the whole question of "a fair, normal return," which is the crux of the problem, is left to the interpretation of future Congresses. Even in its revised form the bill is a dangerous one. It still provides for immediate conscription of citizens for military service, and contains an implied threat of dictatorship. It must be defeated at all costs.

The Market Recession

FOR a few days toward the end of April it seemed as if the scenes of October, 1929, might be reenacted. Prices had been falling for weeks—from March 6 to April 28 the New York Times Index of stock prices declined from 142.12 to 126.76—but most of that loss occurred within the last week of the month. What caused the decline? Does it herald a slump in business activity or, as the financial pages of the newspapers tell us, should we dismiss it as a mere reaction from over-speculation?

Business conditions in general are extremely satisfactory. The Federal Reserve Board's index of industrial production for April has been estimated at 118 as compared with the 1929 average of 119. With the exception of December, 1936, this is the highest point reached since the beginning of the depression. It is estimated that the steel output for April will come close to or exceed the all-time record set in May, 1929. Business profits for the first quarter of 1937 are running nearly 50 per cent higher than in the corresponding period of last year, with those in the steel industry far above this level. Combined earnings of the three largest steel corporations for the past three months were $42,751,185 as compared with $6,142,646 in the same quarter of 1936, a gain of 600 per cent! Employment in the manufacturing industries in March was approximately 1,600,000 higher than in March, 1936, and pay rolls were larger than at any time since the depression.

Since business reports remain excellent, it is evident that we shall have to look elsewhere for the cause of the stock-market decline. Two sets of influences appear to be at work, one domestic and the other international. Primary among these is the growing belief that the government intends to check inflation by various restrictive measures. The present recession really started with the announcement of higher reserve requirements for the member banks of the Federal Reserve system. It has received its greatest impetus from the series of warnings which the President has issued against price increases and speculation. Added to these have been the deflationary implications of the President's intention to slash the budget by 10 or 15 per cent and to hold relief expenditures to a maximum of $1,500,000,000.

These domestic influences have been reinforced by a worldwide drop in commodity prices caused, apparently, by the lessening of the danger of immediate war in Europe. As in the case of our stock market, the recent sharp increase in the world price for copper, scrap-iron, and wheat was largely speculative in character. Although the armament race continues unabated, removal of the threat of immediate hostilities has brought prices to a more normal level. Our markets have also felt some repercussions of the proposed excess-profits tax in Great Britain which contributed to the sudden break in British prices.

As matters stand at present, the decline in prices should not be viewed as cause for alarm but as a healthy reaction from over-speculation. Another possibility remains, however. The decline in prices itself might induce a new deflationary cycle. Panic, like boom psychology, is contagious. Already there are reports of cancelation of orders by various wholesalers in anticipation of still lower prices. The probability is that this will not go very far as long as employment and wages are sustained at their present levels. But if certain producers get panicky and curtail production, a recession is not out of the question.

Wall Street is instinctively right, moreover, in doubting whether business activity can be sustained if the government attempts to balance the budget through heavy economies—especially in relief. During the last six years the tendency to oversave on the part of the wealthier groups in the community has been counterbalanced by heavy government expenditures based on borrowed funds. Should these expenditures be cut at a time when the income of the wealthier groups is expanded by abnormal business profits, serious effects might be felt throughout the economic system. Mass buying power would be curtailed, and the prospects for capital investment reduced. Already the present recovery movement has extended over a longer period than any previous one in history. Whether a slump of transitory or far-reaching character develops from the stock-market recession depends, in the last analysis, on the ability of the government, through increased taxes or otherwise, to maintain relief standards without threatening its own fiscal stability.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Roosevelt II and the Trusts

Washington, May 2

THE Roosevelt Administration has suddenly begun to emerge from that early New Deal phase when it confused monopoly with monogamy. Until a few days ago it had always behaved as if it thought the actual wedding of large corporate interests was essential to the birth of monopolistic practices in restraint of trade. If a hundred or a thousand small enterprises banded together in an agreement to boost prices and maintain them at a unified though artificial level, to control production to the same profit-seeking ends, and otherwise to restrict the competitive forces which are supposed to be the things that make a capitalist economy work, that was merely the fulfilment of the New Deal's definition of "fair competition," and as such the agreement was embodied in an NRA code bearing the President's approval.

Chief among the events of the last few days signaling a change of view in the Administration was the President's letter to Garner halting Congressional action on the Miller-Tydings bill. This bill was being pressed by organizations representing thousands of little retailers. Their objective was governmental enforcement of a device for assuring them a 50 per cent mark-up on all branded or trade-marked goods. Not until the zero hour did the White House awake to the fact that the bill was a serious threat to its hopes of reforming current price trends and so preventing a recurrence of the 1929 crash and attendant horrors; the Treasury had been quicker to respond, filing a protest based on its fears that the bill would boost liquor prices, with a consequent reduction in consumption and, hence, in federal liquor-tax revenues.

The President's action with respect to the Tydings-Miller bill was only one symbol of a change in the Administration's point of view. The letter to Garner was preceded by the filing of a Justice Department suit to dissolve Andy Mellon's Aluminum Company of America. It was followed by publication of a letter that the Attorney General had sent to the President reporting on his department's investigation of pricing practices in the steel industry and urging the establishment of a commission for a complete reconsideration of public policy with respect to monopoly and related aspects of our economy. The President indicated rather emphatically that he intends to promote a redrafting of the anti-trust laws, and the Department of Justice followed through by letting it be known that what is in contemplation is so broad in scope that no attempt at new legislation can be attempted at this session of Congress. Both the White House and the Justice Department managed to pin on the courts the blame for the present non-enforcement of anti-trust laws.

And both had more than a little warrant for fixing the blame as they did.

The Supreme Court's responsibility for the NRA, which, while it lived, was the chief protector of monopolistic practices, seems to have escaped general notice. Ever since the Sherman Act was passed forty-seven years ago, the Supreme Court had been floundering in its complicated mazes. As early as 1895, in the sugar-trust case, the court laid down a definition of interstate commerce that has plagued the nation ever since and that, incidentally, knocked the stuffing out of the Sherman Act. It is not necessary, however, to go back that far. One need merely go back to the hardwood-trade-association case in December, 1921, and the linseed-oil case in June, 1923, in which the Supreme Court, shifting sail, banned joint selling, price-fixing, division of markets, production control, distribution boycotts, and sundry other beloved practices and principles of trade associations, only to reverse itself again and smile upon these practices in the maple-flooring and cement cases, decided in June, 1925. Promptly upon the rendering of these last two decisions the federal government began the active fostering of trade agreements in line with them, and it stuck to that course until 1929, when the Justice Department suddenly launched court attacks on eight different trade associations, involving the woolen, sugar-refining, asphalt-roofing, and corn-products industries, among others.

Five of these came to trial prior to 1932, with the government winning all five, the Supreme Court once more having shifted sail; and the Federal Trade Commission by the end of the Hoover Administration was engaged in a frantic pruning of the trade-practice codes which it had approved in the light of earlier Supreme Court decisions. This code pruning, coupled with the ravages of the depression, had set the United States Chamber of Commerce and kindred groups clamoring for legislation to legalize all manner of mercantile and industrial plots against the public interest, and once more the Supreme Court came to their rescue. In March, 1933, just as Roosevelt took office, the Supreme Court laid the egg from which the Blue Eagle was hatched a few months later. In the Appalachian-coal case it held that it was entirely lawful and constitutional for the supposedly competing owners of a sick industry to get together and form an agency through which they would sell their entire output. It mattered little that the court's approval was qualified to the effect that these things were permissible in a sick industry, for all industry in March, 1933, was sick or at least able to affect a convincing pallor if required. Out of it all came the NRA, which redefined the anti-trust laws so beautifully in the interest of the profit grabbers that they were quite willing for the time being to see a few wobbly labor provisions tacked on to the recovery law.

When the NRA came into being, efforts to enforce the Sherman and Clayton acts were brought to an automatic halt. And when the Attorney General wrote his letter to the President a few days ago, reporting on the outcome of his investigation of steel-pricing practices, he was obliged to note that the Federal Trade Commission holds that the mere fact that the steel industry has kept alive the trade-practice section of its old NRA code is evidence enough that it is violating the anti-trust laws. He did not mention that, with that old code and the President's stamp of approval upon it to wave in the faces of a jury, the steel industry is safe from successful prosecution—at least until the anti-trust laws have been redrawn.

Under those laws many an attempt to bust a trust has been made, but no trust has ever been busted. Neither the courts nor the executive branch of government need take all the blame. Congress deserves its share, for Congress has kept the appropriation of the Justice Department's anti-trust division down to $435,000 a year, and only half of that sum has been available for Sherman and Clayton Act investigations and prosecutions. How puny a sum that half, or $217,500, is may be determined from the fact that it costs $100,000 or more to prosecute a major anti-trust case. Incidentally, the White House declined a few months ago to honor the Justice Department's request for a few thousand dollars to set up the economic-research staff so badly needed by its anti-trust division, and Congress has just seconded the White House's refusal. The refusal merely underscores the suddenness of the Administration's change of view. It is hardly to be questioned that the President's intentions, when he made the Attorney General's letter public, went little beyond a desire to throw an immediate scare into the price boosters—but I have reason to believe that the Attorney General was speaking in complete good faith when he called for a reconsideration of public policy with respect to monopolies. Two things lend a particular credibility to his call for anti-trust-law reform. One is his very evident doubt that action can be taken in time or that effective action can be taken at all under a capitalist economy. The other is his patent realization that to restore free competition and give capitalism one more chance to prove its capacity for working according to the theory of its defenders involves something much broader than a restatement of the anti-trust laws; it means a complete overhauling of private property rights, a sweeping revision of our tariff and taxation systems, reformation of our patent laws, an intensive currying and revision of the insurance companies, and the probable obliteration of investment trusts and holding companies, plus court reform and at least a sufficient degree of public ownership in basic industries to force competition upon the reluctant parasites of capitalism.

"Fortune" Magazine

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

I
THE commonest opinion about Fortune, current alike in Wall Street and Union Square, is that there is some improper connection between advertising and articles. Executives have been known to refuse information to Fortune researchers on the ground that their advertising budget wouldn't permit an article just then. (The refusal is usually put with regret rather than with indignation.) The tone of many articles might lead one to suspect the worst. But it can be flatly stated that such suspicions are not justified. Any attempt at direct pressure through advertising usually enrages the management so much that they stand firmer than ever. The Matson liner Malolo, for example, was once referred to in Fortune by her nickname among travelers, "Maloler the Roller." This was retained despite enormous pressure from the Matson Line—a display of virtue which is said to have cost Time, Inc., some $50,000. So far as the cruder forms of pressure are concerned, the editorial integrity of Fortune is of the highest order. But Luce and his editors are extremely vulnerable to influence of a subtler type—a tactful word from a great banker, a friendly lunch with a publicity man. It is a question of seduction rather than prostitution.

During its eight years of existence Fortune has been a social phenomenon as bristling with contradictions as the capitalist system for which it speaks. In the class war, whose existence it does not officially recognize, its forces have deployed with magnificent impartiality on both sides of the barricades. Damned for liberalism by reactionaries and for conservatism by liberals, charged with blackmail by corporations whose sensibilities it has injured and with venality by Wall Street cynics, Fortune drives madly ahead on its mysterious course, all sails set and the steering gear out of order.

As a journalistic inspiration, Fortune ranks little below Time. At once shrewd and grandiose, the concept was a magazine to chronicle the world's mightiest industrial civilization. The idea of dramatizing big business seems obvious now—as does the Time idea—but in 1928 no one had thought of it. Luce correctly visioned great tracts of virgin territory waiting to be exploited. "The greatest journalistic assignment in history!" cried the "promotion" booklets. As the idea was worked out—behind doors lettered "Time, Inc., Experimental Dept."—at the height of the 1928-29 bull market, it looked better and better. There was never any question as to the tone of the new magazine. The very name was redolent of success, fragrant with money. The make-up, designed by a specialist in high-class advertising layouts, was, and is, as pompous, tasteless, and conservative as any banking mausoleum.

Then came October, 1929. Before the dust had settled, in those first chaotic months of disaster, Fortune presented Vol. 1, No. 1 to the world. A more dramatically inopportune moment could hardly have been contrived. But Luce persisted. And, wonderfully, the new magazine made its way. Advertising and circulation mounted steadily, and before the depression was half over Fortune was making money. Journalistically and commercially, its success has been complete.

Editorially, however, the depression developed in Fortune a bad case of schizophrenia. As things got worse and worse, the simple faith of the founders became increasingly inadequate. And so, although Fortune continued to run the success stories and the wide-eyed business romances it was founded to promulgate, gradually another note crept into its de luxe pages. A note of questioning, of criticism, however qualified, of reality, however muffled. The remarkable effect of the impact of the depression on Fortune's subject matter can be demonstrated statistically. Only 22 per cent of the 121 articles printed in 1930 dealt with non-business subjects. In 1931, 34 per cent were non-business; in 1932, 47 per cent; in 1933, 41 per cent; in 1934, 57 per cent; in 1935, 44 per cent; in 1936, 55 per cent. Up to October, 1931, Fortune ran 156 stories about business and industry to 48 on non-business topics. At the end of 1931 the depression finally penetrated the consciousness of the editors of Fortune. As though a dam had suddenly broken, a spate of articles on politics, government, and society in general inundated the magazine. For the last quarter of 1931 business articles were outnumbered 13 to 17. It was all very different from what the founders had planned.

The years 1932-36 might be called the NEP period in Fortune's history, when it was necessary, in order to exist, to retreat temporarily from capitalism. As the depression lifted, Luce began a drive to get back on the original track. He began reminding his writers that Fortune was, after all, a business magazine. It is too early to be sure, but there are signs that Fortune, along with the business class it serves, is venturing out of its cyclone cellar. It may be significant that for the last six months the proportion of non-business articles has been reduced to 40 per cent, the lowest since 1931. But before Fortune gets back to right-wing normalcy, Luce may have a fight on his hands. Some of the Nepmen won't take kindly to liquidation.

Fortune was pushed leftward during the depression to some extent because Luce was journalist enough to see that the New Deal was news and that big business, temporarily, wasn't. But the shift was mostly engineered by the writers, whose job compelled them to find out what really went on behind the façade of American capitalism. Their discoveries, whatever their political views originally, made them increasingly left-wing. This showed in their articles, although Fortune has never allowed the full extent of their disaffection to appear. But no amount of editing—and there were some heroic efforts—could completely eradicate the critical taint. The warfare between editors and writing staff has been continuous ever since 1932.

Whatever the result of the present struggle, the ruling powers at Fortune will fall on one or the other horn of a dilemma. If the writers prevail, a remote possibility, the already wide chasm between the magazine for which the advertising department solicits business and the magazine which the editorial department actually produces will yawn even more formidably. On the other hand, a victory for Luce might well be Pyrrhic, in that he might find himself with a magazine and no one to write for it. In spite of the high salaries it offers, Fortune has had great difficulty in developing a staff of writers. Various expedients have been used: established writers have been taken on at high salaries, cubs have been tried out at low salaries. But the mortality rate among new writers has always been high. For years Fortune has depended on five or six veterans to get out the magazine. What is required is literary ability plus some competence in handling masses of factual data. Writers with this combination of skills are likely to be liberals or worse. (Fortune's most recent accessions are John Chamberlain and James Rorty.) Indeed, it seems almost impossible to find a reactionary with the right stuff in him. Furthermore, Archibald MacLeish, the most valuable member of the writing staff, is also the leader of the liberal forces. If Henry Luce breaks with his present staff, he may be hard put to it to build up another. Catching young talent fresh out of college is one solution, but only a temporary one. Fortune breeds liberals, perhaps through the workings of the dialectical principle.

II

Sometimes one wonders if it makes much difference whether the liberals win out at Fortune or not. The results of their struggles to date seem hardly worth the effort. Luce and his friends, after all, own the magazine. And this is still a capitalistic society.

In 1930 Fortune published a eulogy of Albert H. Wiggin, in 1931 of Samuel Insull, Jr. In 1933 the present J. P. Morgan, whom only Fortune takes seriously, was the subject of a tenderly respectful biography. In March, 1934, the Van Sweringens were whitewashed (and their critics rebuked) in some 15,000 words. The most gruesome of the many skeletons in Fortune's closet is probably the amazing article on Pittsburgh (December, 1930) from the hand of Luce himself. "Pittsburgh," Luce pronounces, "is a gentle city." (The Mellons are gentle, too—for example, R. B. Mellon's whimsical remark, which Luce doesn't quote: "You couldn't run a coal mine without machine-guns.") As for living conditions, Luce reports: "Windows of Pittsburgh houses are washed once a week—by the maid, not by some window-cleaning concern."

The point about articles like this is not that they are printed—accidents will happen—but that they are accepted by the editors of Fortune as perfectly normal, factual, objective articles. The most blatant right-wing propaganda passes without challenge from the ever-watchful editors, but the mildest sort of criticism must justify itself with mountains of data, and even then is likely to be censored as "editorializing"—a capital crime at Fortune when committed by anyone but Luce. Like the rest of Luce's magazines, Fortune proclaims a middle-of-the-road editorial policy. But it has the Lucian conception of neutrality. Thus in October, 1936, there were three political tracts signed by Tugwell, Vandenberg, and E. T. Weir respectively. This two-to-one weighting toward the right was necessary, the managing editor explained in conversation, in order to "counterbalance" articles about Lewis and the C. I. O. in the same issue. These articles were by staff members, hence under editorial control and, presumably, objective. Thus Fortune must have felt that a neutral treatment of the C. I. O. was actually a concession to the left. When this was pointed out, the editor shifted his ground to an equally illuminating explanation: Vandenberg was the balancing factor, since he occupied a position politically midway between Weir and Tugwell. It is a touching picture: Fortune and Vandenberg walking arm in arm down the middle of the road.

It is significant that Fortune's approach to industry is technological rather than sociological. The details of machines, the technicalities of a balance sheet—these interest the editors of Fortune. How a corporation makes money is the point, not how it functions as a social organism. Thus in writing of the building of the Queen Mary, Fortune had so much to say about turbines that there was no space left for some remarkable (and disturbing) data which its British correspondent had collected on the social condition of the British workers who had been taken off the dole to build a luxury liner. It is exceptional to find a Fortune corporation story giving any appreciable space to labor relations. Companies with such sensationally malodorous labor records as National Steel, Republic Steel, and the Aluminum Company of America have been chronicled in copious detail with scarcely a glance at their labor policies. Machines and balance sheets are not only more "exciting" (a favorite word at Fortune) than social data, but they are also less likely to explode when handled.

Even Fortune's liberal gestures, on closer inspection, turn out to be not so bold after all. To slip over a liberal point it is often necessary to throw up a smoke screen of confusion. The recent article on England's foreign policy is definitely anti-fascist but also definitely muddled and superficial. A more penetrating analysis would probably have been sabotaged by the editors. It is sometimes possible to suggest the right conclusions in Fortune, but only for the wrong reasons.

The editors of Fortune live in a constant state of delighted alarm, like a small boy with a pea-shooter in church. The shrewder industrialists, stung, say genially, "Boys will be boys!" The stuffed shirts get really angry. But they might save themselves the trouble. The du Ponts were indignant when Fortune devoted a series of articles to them. They refused all cooperation, complained bitterly of being muckraked. Yet when these fearful articles appeared, they turned out to be at the worst a trifle gossipy. At best, they went so far in protecting the du Ponts' feelings as to arrive at this remarkable syllogism: (1) the du Ponts completely control Delaware politics. (2) "Nobody denies that Delaware politics stink." (3) "Many people believe the du Pont influence is the best in the state. . . . The family has generally stood for decent political rule." (4) "Possibly their ideals are higher than their practices." The outside observer might well have wondered what all the shooting was for.

Perhaps the most famous liberal gesture Fortune ever made was its article on munitions makers (March, 1934). Of its 10,000 words, 9,650 were devoted to the sins of European merchants of death, while 350 words told all that Fortune cared to print about their American colleagues. The du Ponts, by the way, got 15 words. In criticizing overseas capitalists, who advertise not, neither do they subscribe, Fortune's courage is leonine. In the number devoted to Japan last summer, its editors minced no words in describing the degradation and exploitation of the Japanese masses. But although Fortune has published four or five long articles on cotton-growing in the South, it has dwelt little on the exploitation of our own share-croppers. Last year, largely as the result of internal liberal pressure, a Fortune writer and photographer spent two months getting pictures and data on the share-croppers. Apparently, they found out too much. The article was written, but it never appeared. But last March Fortune did take notice of a Southern cotton plantation: the Delta and Pine, biggest in the country, which last year showed an operating profit of $518,000. Delta and Pine is Big and Successful. Hence Fortune finds it irresistible. The share-cropper is neither, and so is easily resisted. Lately Fortune has been surveying in detail typical working-class families. The idea is excellent, but Fortune's weakness for success leads to some odd selections as "typical" families. Fortune's typical Midwest farmer owned a farm worth $100,000 and made a net income of $4,000 in 1934. The typical white-collar worker got $58 a week. And it now appears that Fortune's typical automobile worker has recently got into trouble with the C. I. O. and is accused of being a stool pigeon.

One of the many sad things about being a liberal on Fortune is that one comes to realize that one's victories merely enable Fortune to establish a credit for editorial independence which may be drawn against later to justify some piece of right-wing propagandizing. Last year, for instance, I wrote some articles for Fortune on the United States Steel Corporation. The first was highly critical of the corporation as a profit-making enterprise. The corporation, naturally, objected. And the editor in charge, naturally, was for "toning down" or simply omitting whatever they objected to. It was a question, not of any left-wing doctrine, but of the most elementary kind of respect for factual data. After many conferences and lengthy memoranda, the fight was finally won, but with the important qualification that no harsh word be uttered about the corporation's present management. All the criticism was to be deposited reverently at the door of Judge Gary, dead since 1927 and so an ideal scapegoat. The corporation was restive throughout the series, but it waited until the final article to make its grand putsch. This article was boorish enough to charge Mr. Taylor's management with the responsibility for the sad condition of the corporation. This was going too far. Thomas W. Lamont, of J. P. Morgan and Company, went to work on the editors of Fortune. He scored a diplomatic victory which must have amazed even so seasoned a strategist as Mr. Lamont. Not only was an abbreviated and emasculated version of the article printed, but an objective (hence unflattering) biography of Mr. Taylor was excised completely and replaced by a full-throated burst of lyrical eulogy which the editor in charge took care to write himself. Since the preceding articles had been critical, most readers probably concluded that the Taylor management must be doing a fine job indeed to rate such praise. Nor was this the end. In the current issue of Fortune is a chatty little piece called It Happened in Steel, in which the recent C. I. O. settlement is credited solely to Taylor's statesman-like vision. The article, which is long on enthusiasm and short on facts, is built around a document composed by Mr. Taylor last summer, which Fortune calls simply "The Myron Taylor Formula for Industrial Peace." In one hundred ill-chosen words this says the steel corporation will bargain collectively with its employees but will not grant the closed shop. This, declares Fortune in italics, is "A Milestone in Industrial Relations." On the basis of this great state paper plus some backstairs gossip, Fortune builds up Myron Taylor as a great, in fact, the great industrial statesman of our day. Some people think that because the steel corporation, General Motors, and General Electric, all Morgan companies, simultaneously capitulated to the C. I. O., the House of Morgan may have played a part in bringing about the settlement. This idea Fortune repudiates, a little too emphatically perhaps, as "the most unrealistic rumor of them all." All things are possible, of course, and the article, in spite of internal evidence, may have some basis in fact. But is it "unrealistic" to detect here once again the fine Italian hand of Mr. Lamont of the House of Morgan? To put it vulgarly, did Mr. Lamont possibly sell Mr. Luce's editors another bill of goods?

Conservatives may applaud the censorship exercised on their behalf by the management at Fortune, but they are shortsighted if they think the matter stops there. Not only Fortune's quality as an interpreter of social forces, but its quality in general is involved. Luce and some of his editors believe that Fortune is more than a way to make money. They talk of it as a molder of public opinion, even as a valuable source for future historians. Lately I have thumbed through the hundreds of pounds of printed matter which Fortune has produced in its seven years of existence. I doubt if historians will be able to separate much wheat from the chaff. When a social system is decaying, it becomes increasingly difficult to do good work, whether in journalism, medicine, science, or art, within its boundaries. If the articles in Fortune are written in a slick, inflated, cheaply melodramatic style, if their brilliance has the glossy shine of a new Buick, if their logic is the verbal agility of the advertising copy-writer—the germ of the disease is a commercial philosophy which regards money-making as the prime end of man.

Luce, who once sat on the board of Paramount, has always been fascinated by Hollywood. And there is more than a touch of Hollywood about Fortune, and the rest of Time, Inc. There is the same reckless squandering of money and talent, with the same lack of results. The wonder about Fortune's articles is not that most of them are bad but that some of them are fairly good. For they are written under the same commercialized conditions that Hollywood finds so effective for the mass production of tripe. Adequate time is rarely allowed for research. Lengthy treatises on the most complex subjects are slapped together in a month or six weeks. And a great deal of such time as there is goes to waste because of the Hollywoodian inefficiency of Luce and his editors, who postpone all decisions until after the last moment and chronically fail to make monthly deadlines. The most efficient male in the place is a poet. Once the article is somehow written, it is pulled apart by several editors—usually of a lower grade of intelligence than the writer—rewritten here and touched up there. Sentences are deleted, paragraphs wrenched from their place and stuck bodily in some incongruous section, where they perch like cows stranded on barn roofs by a passing tornado. By the time it is over, the article is a shambles, bleeding internally at a dozen points where vital organs have been excised by the editorial scalpel. The better it was as first written, the more it suffers from being thus dismembered and reassembled. The assembly-belt method works better with automobiles than with journalism.

In its eight years Fortune has performed some useful services. The Fortune Survey is of real value, and the liberals have put over such excellent articles as the exposé of Hoover's relief policy in 1932 and last year's articles on the Twin Cities and Chicago politics. For all its circumspection the munitions article helped launch the Nye committee. But it is depressing to think what Fortune might have been. Granting that it would have to take the present social system as given, it still might have achieved some real measure of dignity, independence, and honesty. With the great news-gathering facilities of Time, Inc., at its disposal, with a staff of trained researchers and of writers skilled in condensing and popularizing data, Fortune might have played a serious part in interpreting our business civilization. Liberals and conservatives alike might have looked to it with respect, if not enthusiasm. But Fortune has merged itself into the capitalistic system so completely and with such enthusiastic abandon that it cannot analyze the system's workings. It is almost as vulgar and stupid as the industrialists of whom it stands in such awe. To expect more is perhaps naive. But certain English journals—the Manchester Guardian and the Economist, for example—have been able to take capitalism for granted and still comment on it intelligently. That Fortune has been unable to reach their level is a depressing evidence of the backwardness of our ruling business class.

[This is the second of three articles on Time, Inc. The third will appear in two weeks.]

With the International Brigade

[The following letter was written to a friend in America by a twenty-year-old member of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade, fighting with the government forces in Spain.]

DEAR —: In the first place, I can't give you any news. The boys here often wish that they could get a copy of the New York Times or the Daily Worker. Then they could get some news, even if inaccurate. I don't think anyone knows less about what's happening in a war than the soldier in it. If we see a Fascist bomber crash in front of us we know about it; if it crashes over the hill we either hear nothing about it, or we hear that the rebels attacked but were beaten back with terrific losses, and one of their tanks exploded. So I'll only tell you what I saw, and what men from the front have told me, and my own impressions.

Speaking of airplanes crashing, there's nothing more exciting than lying on the ground and watching a really good dog fight in the air. On our way here we went through a good bombing. We had just got out to eat at a little town when someone heard an airplane droning. Approaching us, low on the horizon, were three big dots marshaled by tiny specks. In half a minute they were three distant monoplanes, German bombers, surrounded by pursuit ships. In another thirty seconds they were the most terrifying things I have ever seen, three low, black, immense bombers directly overhead, dropping neat white packages which looked like ant's eggs. Curiously enough, every damn one of those packages was falling at me.

The mothers were herding their little children into doorways. Really a man can be cut just as deeply by flying metal as a child can; but these children with silky hair looked so defenseless and soft that I thought more of them than of myself. A few minutes later, when I was digging and pulling around debris, I recognized a little girl I had seen playing near us.

There were three of us in the ditch, one in front of me and one behind. They started discussing the war situation, with a local emphasis. "Look, they're dropping leaflets!" yelled one of them. He was a good soldier, but this was his first airplane raid. "Hell," said the other, "they look like bombs to me." Just then there was an earthquake and the trench started spinning like a roulette wheel. That was the first bomb. About the time I had cleared my head the next one dropped. If the first had been close, the next was almost on top of us. This gave rise to the thought: where would the third one be? It was close enough to send bricks whizzing above our heads, and our ears rang for hours, but still it missed us.

Suddenly there was a drone from another direction, and tiny planes with red wings flashed from a great blue cloud like lightning. There was a rattling like the little whirring noise-makers children use on Halloween. The sky was terrifically confused. Little red planes were climbing, swooping, following little white planes or being followed by them.

The last two of the three bombers turned around with a sweep and started back. What happened to them I don't know. As they turned they dropped their bombs, all at once, but they were rushed and missed the town. One of them destroyed an olive grove, while the other prepared a dry hillside for cultivation. The first bomber dived down the valley at a terrible speed with a red-winged pursuit plane clinging behind it. I turned away for a second to watch the fighters above me stitching the sky, and when I turned back there was only a cloud of smoke from a hillside.

Then came the job of pulling wrecked houses to pieces to find the bodies, crushed out of shape but still alive. I won't go into that. The bombs had not injured any of the soldiers in town, but they had done a good deal of damage near the market. I saw over a dozen civilians, chiefly children, carried away from a house where they had been gathered. The United Socialist Youth (J. S. U.) is pushing plans to "make each village a fort" by having shock brigades build bomb-proof dugouts.

I meant to spend less time on the air raid and more on the state of the nation. What impresses one immediately is the complete, unbroken solidarity of all the workers and peasants in wanting the war won and the whole former state of affairs overturned. If one happens to whistle the "International" while going down the street, two or three people going the other way start singing it on the spot, and one can hear their voices going into the distance. The children are loaded with badges and with pictures of Largo Caballero, La Passiónaria, and Pablo Iglesias, and will give the People's Front salute—clenched fist to shoulder—on the slightest provocation. For that matter the greeting used by everyone is Salud, with the clenched fist. I went to a fountain yesterday to get a drink. An old woman with a great pottery jug was there before me, but when she saw my International Brigade badge she wouldn't consider filling her jug before I had drunk. They catch us and read us letters—in Spanish, an unknown language—from their sons at the front, dose us with oranges, bread, and too much vino tinto, and when they turn us loose ask us to look up their brothers in Montevideo, Uruguay, when we return home. In fact, they are even more cordial to us than to their own boys, for we have come from a distant, almost mythical country to fight against the fascists and the landlords and the foreigners who send the bombing planes over their houses.

And we seem to be beating them. From everything I have seen we are forcing them back step by desperate step. Nobody any more considers the chance of their taking Madrid. A cockney expressed it to me like this: "So General Mola had to stop the advance on Madrid."

For why? 'Cause he had to wait for his white horse, so he could ride into Madrid in style. But while he was waiting, the Internationals came in, and the Anarchists from Barcelona and the Socialists from Asturias and the Communists from Guadarama, and Mola's white horse turned out to be a bloody white elephant."

News has been coming from Guadalajara which might mean that the war will be pretty short. But long or short there seems very little doubt about whose victory it will be.

Mobilize every possible group to give aid to Spain. Material aid is needed—the Non-Intervention Committee has given us plenty of moral aid. The Spaniards treat the Non-Intervention Committee with respect but suspicion. A friend of mine going to the front said to me: "I've got a rifle here. Now I'm just an average shot, but I put more faith in that rifle than I do in every damn non-intervention pact between here and Tahiti."

So get the boys busy mobilizing help and sentiment. This fight in Spain is extremely important for the future of the world. Those of us whose future is going to be connected with that of the world for any length of time should see that it's important to our future too.

Fraternally yours, R. P.

Bloody Harlan

BY FREDERICK R. BARKLEY

THE bull-necked high sheriff of Harlan County, Kentucky, lifted his cold, heavy-lidded eyes to the chairman of the Senate Civil Liberties Committee with an air of hurt surprise. "Does the Senator feel it is a crime for a man to make money?" he asked. "Does the Senator want the whole United States on the relief rolls?"

The money in question was the $102,000 which Theodore Middleton had just admitted he had made and invested in the three years and four months since he quit a policeman's job, at $150 a month, to become chief of "Bloody" Harlan County's law-enforcement agencies, at $3,925 a year. Of course, the sheriff had had $1,000 in the bank and a small rented dairy farm at the start, back in January, 1934, but that hardly explained the extent of his accumulations.

The La Follette committee, however, had just finished hearing two weeks of testimony which explained pretty well the sheriff's sudden prosperity. Here are its high lights: Middleton was elected with the indorsement of the United Mine Workers on his promise to "clean up the county." The NRA was in operation and the U. M. W., banking on Section 7-a, was again trying to organize. One of the high sheriff's first acts was to induce half a dozen of the largest operators to indorse his $160,000 performance bond. This saved him about $600 a year. Next he and Morris Saylor, the new county judge, became partners with the county's largest mine operator in the store in which this operator's workers had to spend their wage scrip. The store paid dividends of 170 per cent a year, $2,400 a year to each partner. The sheriff and judge also opened the only wholesale liquor store in the county; no one else could get a liquor permit without their approval. A 400-acre dairy farm, stock in four coal companies, a downtown Harlan business block, a dairy plant, and a fat block of "big board" securities were ultimately added to the sheriff's assets.

But his real business was enforcing the law. For this purpose, the committee brought out, he has appointed so far a total of 379 deputies, 104 of whom have lengthy criminal records including mayhem and murder. A few of these deputies, usually two-gun men, are paid out of the sheriff's funds—one of them said he had to "kick back" almost half his salary—but the rest are paid by individual operators or the Harlan County Operators' Association. "Old Ben" Unthank, now missing, the association's pet operative, received monthly expenses up to $2,300 in addition to his salary, and "no questions asked" about how he spent it.

The county prosecutor, Daniel Boone Smith, is also on coal-company pay rolls as a "labor adviser," and has from time to time obliged by dismissing charges against company-paid deputies—in one case because the complainant, a shooting victim, would "never be able to appear in court." Smith's predecessor, Elmon Middleton, a cousin of the sheriff's, who really tried to enforce the law, was blown up with dynamite in the heart of Harlan town.

More light was thrown on the Harlan County political and official set-up when it was brought out that the president of the Operators' Association is head of the Democratic County Committee and its secretary-treasurer is chief of the Republican County Committee. Under this set-up some 65,000 people—the bulk of the employables being native American coal miners—have lived for the past three years in a state of terror.

The technique of Harlan's operator-dominated political machine is as simple as it is brutal. It has two main objectives—to keep out of the county any outside U. M. W. organizers and to drive out or beat into subservience any residents who show signs of resistance to the encompassing tyranny. Some big mines, notably one United States Steel subsidiary, maintain their own armed thugs to police their company-owned towns and expel strangers without charge or warrant, but most of them depend on the sheriff's forces. Alone among coal-mining counties, Harlan is still unorganized.

From a long line of witnesses the committee has heard the sickening story of the last three years.

When sturdy seventy-two-year-old Lawrence Dwyer took charge of the organizing campaign under the NRA, the Harlan killers even went out of the county to get him. A charge of dynamite set off just outside his room in a little hotel in the adjoining county blew him up against the ceiling. But bearing a charmed life—"I've been shot at by Ben Unthank's road killers so often I've lost count"—he escaped unscathed. R. C. Tackett, brought from prison to testify, admitted that he was one of three men hired by Unthank to kill Dwyer, and in consequence Ted Creech, burly, loose-lipped mine superintendent, threatened him in the Senate corridor with ten more years in jail when he returned to Harlan.

By 1934 some of the mines had been organized. James Westmoreland of Harlan, a clean-cut young union agent, sought to investigate charges of discrimination against union miners at the Cornett-Lewis mine, where the men had struck. When he arrived at the mine, he saw fifteen or more deputy sheriffs routing miners out of company houses and driving them into the mine at the point of the gun. He was told that Unthank and two other deputies had kidnapped John Smith, the union checkweighman, taken him out of the county, and beaten him up, warning him not to return on pain of death. The next morning Westmoreland found Smith, badly hurt, limping home, took him to the prosecutor and the sheriff, and asked for warrants against his assailants. The sheriff refused action, asserting that Westmoreland was "on the spot," too, and had better leave the county. The prosecutor, Elmon Middleton, pleaded with Westmoreland to drop the matter lest he be killed. On leaving the courthouse, Westmoreland testified, he was pointed out by the mine manager to a man who immediately slugged him with a blackjack and was only prevented from killing him by the arrival of city police. When Westmoreland brought charges against his assailant, they were disregarded by the grand jury and he himself was indicted for false swearing. When he summoned the prosecutor as a witness of the assault, the case was dismissed. Later Westmoreland's sister-in-law, a Berea College student, visited him and his wife in Lynch, a United States Steel mine town, where he was working. A company policeman ordered her to leave town within twelve hours or he would take her out. No offense was charged, he said. Soon afterward Westmoreland decided he had better leave the county.

Marshall Musick, a local lay preacher and union mine worker, was arrested on charges of criminal syndicalism, which were later dismissed. Next came a night shooting into his house in which his young son was killed. "As bad a crime as ever happened in Harlan County," said one of Middleton's deputies, who seemed confident it was a deputy job and who quit soon afterward because he "couldn't stand the way things were being done." "It was all because of the labor situation," he concluded.

"Harlan County is really a pretty good place to live," said R. E. Lawson, Cornett-Lewis mine manager, replying to Westmoreland's and Musick's testimony. "Of course, it's unfortunate that this one company store makes 170 per cent profit; ours makes only 18 to 21 per cent." Mr. Lawson also admitted that in his company town the company owns and operates the jail, the post office, all the houses, and the only public meeting place. "Our men just didn't seem to want the union," he explained, after telling of conducting a "secret ballot" on the issue with the workers required to sign their names. Westmoreland agreed that the union had folded up after Musick was jailed, the checkweighman run out of the county, he himself assaulted and jailed for "false swearing," and the striking workers prevented from leaving their houses for food or water and driven into the mines by armed guards.

Outside U. M. W. organizers, who in 1934 and 1935 came repeatedly into the county, received slightly different but no less menacing treatment. Their stories followed a uniform pattern. Before they arrived, they usually sent letters to the local officials promising peaceful organizing efforts as guaranteed by NRA's Section 7-a, later by the Wagner Act, and asking for protection. Invariably they were met by two-gun deputies, who "pushed us around in the hotel lobbies, stepped on our heels when we went out in the street, shifted their guns to the front of their belts when they saw us," as L. T. Arnett, an organizer, testified. If the organizers failed to flee at once, more violent tactics came into play. On one occasion, early in 1935, twenty-three local and outside unionists were jailed for three days without charges and held without permission to get bond. Later they were charged with vagrancy, and finally released with what they took to be good advice to get out. Trying it again with a more sturdy and determined group, the U. M. W. men found themselves besieged by more than thirty armed deputies in Harlan's leading hotel, and were warned by the hotel manager and city officials not to leave their rooms even to eat. In the end they had to call on Governor Laffoon, who provided a detachment of the National Guard to escort them out of the county.

Three times in 1935 the union organizers made new attempts of the same nature and each time they had to flee for their lives. All attempts to get protection from county or town officials brought veiled or open warnings to get out and stay out.

Nineteen thirty-six was peaceful; the Middleton regime had done its work well. But when late in the year Westmoreland got a $1,500 verdict for false arrest against the sheriff in federal court, the unionists thought another chance to organize might have come. Again the U. M. W. organizers entered the county. This time, it was testified, their rooms in the Harlan Hotel were drenched with tear gas at 3:30 a. m. and the sixty guests of the county's leading hostelry were driven into the street weeping and coughing. Almost simultaneously two of the organizers' cars were dynamited in the street before the hotel. At daybreak the organizers fled under protection of an escort sent by the sheriff of adjoining Bell County.

Today the organizers are in Harlan County again, encouraged by the Supreme Court validation of the Wagner Act and helped by the impact of the Senate hearings on the high sheriff. Incidentally, the sheriff never told where he got the money to make his $100,000 worth of recent investments. To do so, he said, might tend to incriminate him and put him in danger of a suit by the federal income-tax authorities.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

WHATEVER else may be said about the President's Supreme Court proposal, it has become a red herring drawn across the trail which leads toward efficient legislation and administration. It is disheartening to look at the situation in Washington. We are in for a fight on the court bill which may run well into the summer, and the executive orders for cutting down expenditures are likely not only to head off adequate appropriations for relief but to sidetrack other important and necessary bills. Three years ago I wrote an article in The Nation pointing out that the President's whole program needed coordination and efficiency. It seems to me that the need is far greater today than three years ago. Since that time many of the President's ablest administrators, many of the exceptionally fine group of young men and women who flocked to Washington to be of service to the New Deal, largely because of their enthusiasm for it, have left the government service for one reason or another. One cannot go to Washington without feeling the loose ends in every department. And in case after case the situation leads straight back to the White House.

One of the President's most intimate friends said the other day that his greatest weakness was his inability to remove inefficient people whom he had appointed to office, especially if they were in his immediate neighborhood. But it seems to me that that is only one phase of his administrative failure. He cannot sit down and wreak himself upon an administrative situation. I know he is the most overburdened man in the world and I should be the last to grudge him vacations, but when I read of his going off just now to fish in Florida waters my heart sinks because of the grave situation of the legislative program, yes, of the government and the people. Everywhere there is confusion and uncertainty. For once I am beginning to feel some sympathy for the big business men of the country whose stock complaint is that they could get ahead if only the government would either let them alone or tell them what it proposes to do with them. Instead, we have the continual Rooseveltian compromises, the delayed decisions, the failure to think things through and to grapple with the problems of the hour.

As an example let me remind my readers of the situation in the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is an extremely unhappy one. The conflict of authority and policy between Arthur Morgan and David Lilienthal was fully ventilated in the press before Christmas, and it was stated that the President had decided in favor of Lilienthal. But the President did not decide for Lilienthal, and at the beginning of May the deadlock has not been broken. A commission has been appointed to look over the technical side of things and make recommendations, but the President has not acted promptly and fearlessly and removed one man or the other. Yet the impasse must be profoundly affecting the morale of the forces engaged in this gigantic undertaking. Last fall we were told that one solution was to be the creation of a group of similar TVA authorities. Today it is announced that what is now under consideration is a TVA to cover the whole country.

I need not dwell upon the tremendously vital question of adequate relief appropriations, because Paul Ward covered that in a masterly fashion in last week's Nation. The President says we cannot cut the army and navy budget, which will again run up to a billion dollars—with a warning from the House Military Affairs Committee that it will have to be much larger next year. Yet army and navy officers are pointing out that the budget is unduly swollen, that it is not producing an efficient army and navy, that we have no coordinated defense plan. The President is not even moved by the fact that Major General Johnson Hagood has put his military reputation behind the statement that our coast defenses are "a pile of junk." We are going to continue to appropriate money to keep that pile of junk up. Mr. Roosevelt is not interested in the opportunity to save at least $250,000,000.

The Puerto Rican situation is extremely dangerous, and it has not been improved but made worse by the President's letter to the new Puerto Rican Commissioner of Education ordering increased instruction in English in the public schools there. We are continuing our absurd policy of obliging the Soviet government by purchasing at $35 an ounce all the gold it is digging out of the Ural Mountains, and then proceeding to rebury that gold in a hole in the ground in Kentucky. The President refuses his consent to the taking of a real census of the unemployed and says that we know well enough how many there are. We know nothing of the kind. We do know that there are far more unemployed than can possibly be cared for by the $1,500,000,000 for which the President has asked. But there is no relation between this appeal for funds from Congress and the actual need; the warning of governors and mayors that they cannot take over the burden without bankruptcy is unheeded.

Meanwhile it seems true that, thanks in part to the court bill, the grip of the President on Congress is weaker than at any previous time during his Presidency. He is steadily losing support. Under the surface things are simmering. The Harrisons and Robinsons are giving him outward support, but at heart they feel hardly less outraged than Glass, while the progressive group steadily loses hope, for which again the President is to blame.

BROUN'S PAGE

Pennies from Heaven

THERE is no optimist in the world like a man with a revenue bill. According to his rosy dream one need only tap the surface of the rock and water will flow forth as it did at the behest of Moses. Some persons in the New York State legislature and out of it are now dangling before the voters large promises that all financial problems can be solved by the simple expedient of having the government go into the book-making business. It is quite true that a number of states in this country have legalized pari-mutuel betting, and it does yield revenue. Moreover, it is an easy tax to collect. But I think it may be well for the voters of New York to think a long time before they decide to follow the pattern of Florida, Rhode Island, and Maryland.

It is safe to say that the amount of money which will be raised is likely to prove disappointing. Some of the advocates of this system are giving out estimates that as much as twenty million dollars might be taken in by the state of New York as its share of the gambling profits. There is nothing in the experience of other states to indicate that any such sum is possible.

One of the favorite arguments to support the rosy dream is the fact that "little Rhode Island" takes in something more than a million in the course of the season. But while Rhode Island may be little, the Narragansett track happens to be one of the largest in the country, and its patronage is drawn from very thickly settled neighborhoods which lie all about.

Florida perhaps is the most successful practitioner in the matter of cutting in on the betting melon. But Florida is fortunate in being able to collect its racing tax very largely from non-residents. The city of Miami is a playground and a lure for play boys. Although I have my serious side, I hope, Miami gets me at least once a season, and without regret I pay my share of the state's burdens. Undoubtedly there are school buildings in Florida which have been shingled by my efforts to pick a hundred-to-one shot. And if my luck continues to go its usual way when I am on vacation, I have no doubt that I will eventually build a hospital for ailing crackers.

All this is fair enough, and as long as newspaper columnists and contributors to The Nation are grossly overpaid there is no great harm in having them put something back into the kitty. But if I lived right across the road from a mutuel track throughout the year, I am afraid that the association might be punishing. I have no moral scruples against gambling, and if I had they would be futile, because the instinct is deep-rooted in most people. As in the case of liquor there is probably logic in saying that it is better for the government to regulate those things which it cannot prohibit. But in regulating gambling a state should try to temper the wind to the shorn lamb and channel the breeze in the direction of the woolly one.

Mutuel betting moves precisely in the opposite direction. It goes after the sucker money. If it were true that the state of New York could raise twenty million dollars in revenue as its share of race-track profits, it would be a grievous thing. That would mean that a vast number of people in the community had bankrupted themselves because the state had made wagering so easy. Let it be remembered that revenue through mutuel machines will come almost entirely out of the pockets of people in the lower brackets. While it may be true that horse racing is the sport of kings, the two-dollar ticket is the plaything for the most part of those who can ill afford the price.

In Rhode Island the mutuel system puts a very heavy burden on mill workers and all low-salaried employees. This is the testimony of shopkeepers, savings banks, and all institutions which have contact with the small earners in the community. Let it be noted that mutuel betting discourages the wagering of large plungers. Since the odds paid upon each horse depend upon the proportionate amount bet upon each entry, it is mathematically true that the gambler who steps out heavily is actually betting against himself and reducing the prize which he will get if his horse happens to win.

As a matter of fact, the money wagered at the track probably represents only a small fraction of the total amount which is bet. A vast industry of illegal betting through hand books and over the telephone has grown up. There is no feasible way of taxing this vast flow. And it will be increased rather than diminished if New York establishes mutuel betting. I think the sensible way would be to legalize bookmaking and then charge a thumping big fee for a license to operate. This could not possibly bring in the vast but shadowy sums suggested by the proponents of mutuel betting. If a hundred bookmakers each paid a license fee of ten thousand dollars, let us say, that would only yield a million. The mutuel system might yield approximately three times as much. But I think the state would pay a heavy price for its extra two million dollars in terms of relief and other measures to aid the indigent.

There ought to be a high admission price to race tracks. Under the mutuel system the owners of a track can afford to let people in for almost nothing since once they get them inside the gambling fever will seize them. I'm not at all sure that it might not even be good commercial business to pay patrons five cents a head to come in and learn the ropes of losing money. Gambling cannot be legislated out of existence, but I am very much against the government of New York State standing at the gate and shilling for customers.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

OUR ACTORS AND THE CRITICS

BY MARY MCCARTHY

ANY normally stage-struck American citizen is vicariously familiar with the actor's habit of sitting up for his notices after an opening night. In movies, plays, and smooth-paper magazine romances the actor—or more often the actress—is customarily rewarded for his vigil by notices which make it clear to him that he has become overnight the toast of Broadway. Fortunately for the drama of such moments, realism does not too much obtrude itself, and the exact content of the reviews is left to the imagination of the audience. It is true that actors, because of an unwarranted but hardy perennial optimism, do sit up for their notices. First comes Bide Dudley on the radio, then the Times appears, then the News and the Mirror, and, at last, by five o'clock, the whole sheaf of morning papers. But the reading of these reviews, laudatory and damning alike, can be guaranteed to turn any theatrical revel into a wake. The actors have waited up to learn (a) whether their play will be a financial success, and (b) what exact effects their performances created. The critics can usually supply the answer to (a), but so, within a week, can the man in the box office. It is (b) that the actors most desperately need, (b) that the mandatory "You were wonderful, darling," of backstage etiquette forbids their getting from their fellow-players, (b) that they most urgently ask of the critics. In reply they are told that So-and-So "gave a forthright characterization," that such-and-such a character was "well sketched" or "serviceably played," that this one acted "with conviction" and that one "pleasantly" or "with spirit and charm," that these were "of considerable assistance" and those were "believable," that the star was "affecting" or "deft" or "heart-warming" and was "ably assisted" by his supporting cast.

For years these marrowless bones of criticism have daily been tossed to the theatrical profession by the reviewers who serve it. It is not surprising therefore that the more spirited actors are positively malevolent toward the dramatic critics, while even the kindest players can only regard them with sad tolerance. Most actors, for example, will tell you that a stage hand or a ticket scalper is a better critic of acting than a reviewer, and they will maintain, in spite of some evidence to the contrary, that it is impossible for a player doing a large role to get a bad notice. One of New York's most talented producers will insist that the dramatic critics are incapable of distinguishing manuscript from acting, let alone acting from direction, and that "the sum total of their knowledge and equipment is so small as to be a phenomenon of nature." The one accusation that professional theater people will refrain from hurling at the drama reviewer is that of venality; it is generally assumed that he is honest.

The truth is, nevertheless, that dramatic criticism in America is at least purblind to acting. That this should be so is not really surprising when one considers the history and character of the theater in America. For some years, and up to very recently, there was very little interest in acting in America. While the French, Italian, and Russian publics have been responsive to acting, and the English public to the personalities of actors, the American public has been interested primarily in manuscript, and to a lesser extent in personalities. The American critic has been conditioned by the American theater to focus his eyes on the play and to ignore the performance. The theater, however, has very recently undergone a transformation. Two important things have happened to it. In the first place, the movies have drained the theater of the actors whose stock in trade is the exploitation of personality; much more successfully than the theater ever could, the movies are catering to an enormous audience which will pay for the pleasure of "getting to know" a celebrity. To the theater are left the actors who are devoid of personality and the actors who feel that the exploitation of it is scarcely a desirable life work. Both of these types of players must work at the job of acting, at the job of projecting a conception of a role—the first because they have nothing else to offer an audience, the second because they find the work interesting. In the second place, a new generation of actors has lately arisen the oldest member of which is now probably thirty-five, a generation which throughout its adolescence worshiped Shaw and O'Neill and O'Casey, which revered the Provincetown and the New Playwrights' Theater, which was attracted to the theater not for its conventional glamor but for the high seriousness of the ideas and ideals which some of its playwrights were expressing. Members of this generation brought with them cultural backgrounds immensely superior to anything the American theater had ever known, and they brought also a determination to take acting seriously, to learn its science, and to interpret life and plays through its medium. These two forces, the movies acting as a drain, and the colleges and little theaters as a feeder, combined to alter profoundly the theater's own view of itself and its function. The transformation is not yet complete, but it is in process, and its practical effects are already noticeable. The standard of acting is rising. Acting is not, by any means, uniformly good, but it is consistently more interesting, because more thoughtful and ambitious, than it has ever been in America before.

"A great book, a great study; careful, fair, charged with the long view. . . . I unhesitatingly acclaim the new Middletown as better than the first; more exciting, acute, and profound."

—STUART CHASE, N. Y. HERALD TRIBUNE

MIDDLETOWN, that highly original inquiry into American life, is joined by a book even more valuable, one which shows what great changes have come to this typical American city and its people during the ten chaotic years of boom and depression. "A document of even greater importance than its predecessor—a magnificent piece of work."

—R. L. Duffus, N. Y. Times

by Robert S. and Helen Merrell Lynd MIDDLETOWN in TRANSITION

2nd large printing. 622 pages, $5.00

A big book of FACTS about the Soviet Union

After ten years Albert Rhys Williams has completed a book which amasses all the facts (including the most recent data) about the Soviet way of life; which sets them down with concise, fascinating brevity; which covers every aspect of the Soviet Union; which succeeds in giving an entirely comprehensive picture of the U.S.S.R. John Strachey says: "It will be absolutely indispensable to everyone who is interested in the Soviet Union. There is a richness, a feel of first-hand contact with the material which makes every page delightful reading."

Just out. 554 pages, $3.00

Albert Rhys Williams'

THE SOVIETS

HARCOURT, BRACE AND COMPANY, 383 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK

The theater has changed, but the critics have remained the same. To persons in and around the theater it has for some time been apparent that critical opinions of acting were grotesquely out of step with professional opinions; but the critics seem unaware of this. If, for instance, you will ask actors to name the two worst performances of this year, the chances are that they will mention Lionel Hogarth's Duke of York in "King Richard II," which is played in the manner of Chic Sale, and Malcolm Keen's Claudius in the Gielgud "Hamlet," which was played in the manner of Laurel of Laurel and Hardy. If you will then examine the reviews you will find that Mr. Keen's acting was harshly treated only by Richard Watts ("supremely negative") and John Anderson ("pedestrian"), while Variety's critic sat on the fence ("a mite too stuffy, but . . ."), and Brooks Atkinson ("physically and mentally alive"), Arthur Pollock ("a good live king"), Burns Mantle, John Mason Brown, and Richard Lockridge of the Mirror applauded it, the rest remaining silent. As to Mr. Hogarth's work, Mr. Atkinson ("shrewd and knowing performance"), Mr. Mantle ("amusing"), Miss Waldorf of the Post ("had his moments"), Mr. Coleman, Mr. Pollock, and Variety's critic spoke well of it; Mr. Anderson ("Lionel Hogarth, after a somewhat jittery beginning, quieted down toward the end") was noncommittal; and Mr. Lockridge took a lonely and not very defiant stand ("Mr. Hogarth seemed to me to make York too much of the fussy comic, but probably that's all right . . .").

In the same way, the two actresses who are perhaps closest to the hearts of the dramatic critics are rated as negligible by the majority of their fellow-players. Katharine Cornell, whom Mr. Atkinson calls "our queen of tragedy," is considered by a great number of professionals no actress at all, but an ambitious, unimaginative, mediocre young woman whose fortune it is to own a face that is an exotic mask in which the playgoer can read what he wishes to find. Again, Lynn Fontanne's talents are completely worn out (and this is no secret in the theater), yet no critic has noticed it. On the other hand, Ruth Gordon's abilities were, up to this year's production of "The Country Wife," seriously underrated by the critics, while in the theatrical offices she has for years been held to be one of our most expert actresses.

Now, of course, it is conceivable that the actors are wrong about acting and the critics right. Such a view, however, would only be tenable if the critics had shown themselves capable of precise definition of the qualities which seem to them good in the actors they praise, if they had been able to state where and in what manner a performance achieved its effects. As a matter of fact, only Stark Young has made any serious attempts at this kind of exactitude; the rest of the critics have habitually contented themselves with their frayed strings of vague but approbatory adjectives—"brilliant," "sincere," "moving," and the like. That these adjectives are not always adequate a few of the critics have lately shown an uneasy awareness. When Robert Benchley, for instance, writes of Miss Cornell in "The Wingless Victory," it is in the confessional spirit:

It may sound silly to say, but Miss Cornell has improved in her acting. I can't go into it any further than that and I don't want you to ask me what I mean, but she has definitely done something to her voice to give it authority. Not that it didn't have authority before but it has more now.

On Maurice Evans's Richard II, Richard Watts takes a more defiant but basically quite as nervous a stand. "If he isn't the finest actor to be found on the English-speaking stage," he ventures, "then he will have to do until one comes along."

[This is the first of two articles by Miss McCarthy on actors and critics. The second will appear next week.]

BOOKS

The Steel Industry

THE ECONOMICS OF THE IRON AND STEEL INDUSTRY. By Carroll R. Daugherty, Melvin G. de Chazeau, and Samuel S. Stratton. McGraw-Hill Book Company. Two Volumes. $12.

THESE volumes present the result of a two-year fact-finding expedition into some difficult economic terrain: the price and labor policies of the steel industry. Considering the paucity of available data and the determination of the industry that significant data shall remain scarce, the expedition was remarkably successful. And considering that the study was financed chiefly by the Falk Foundation, whose vice-president is E. T. Weir of The National Steel Corporation, and by the Mellon-dominated University of Pittsburgh, the authors' analysis is extraordinarily realistic and objective. The book is nearly 1,200 pages long and contains 333 tables and charts. Never before has the steel industry—or perhaps any other American industry—been treated in such rich detail. Unfortunately, the scope is limited. The original conception was a study of the iron and steel industry under the NRA. When the Supreme Court made away with the NRA, the scope of the study was somewhat broadened. One regrets that the broadening was not greater. The book is almost entirely restricted to the period since 1929. One would exchange most of the interminably minute analysis of the steel code—now of largely academic interest—for a longer perspective in time. There is too much heaping up of facts and too little social and historical interpretation of them.

Almost half the book is occupied by Dr. Daugherty's intelligent and sympathetic treatment of labor—wages, hours, working conditions, collective bargaining. Most of the remainder is devoted to Dr. de Chazeau's exhaustive analysis of the industry's complex basing-point price system.

From the social point of view the most important factual material is presented by Dr. Daugherty. Some of his major findings may be briefly indicated. (1) In 1929 the steel industry paid lower hourly wages than other comparable industries. (Weekly earnings, because of longer hours and high rates of operation, were slightly higher.) (2) Contrary to popular impression, the twelve-hour day was not abolished in 1924. Between 1922 and 1929 the percentage of men working seven days a week actually increased. In 1933, before the NRA came to the rescue, almost one-fourth of the steel workers worked seven days every week (or every two or three weeks), and 5 per cent worked twelve hours a day. (3) In 1929 the average steel worker earned $1,620. For that year a "minimum health-and-decency budget" for a family of four was $1,720, a "comfort budget" was $2,580. In the year immediately preceding the NRA average earnings fell to $560—as against a minimum budget of $1,200. (4) The steel worker lives in the shadow of an appalling insecurity. In 1929 only four out of eleven comparable industries showed greater fluctuations in monthly production than steel. None showed so drastic a decline during the depression. Unemployment among iron and steel workers rose from 8 per cent in 1929 to 48 per cent before the NRA.

The industry, then, is exploiting its workers in order to pile up huge profits for its stockholders? Not at all. Dr. Stratton shows that even in the 1924-29 boom period, the steel industry earned only 6.37 per cent on its capitalization, which is well below the average for other industries. Thus the steel industry, as presented in these volumes, is a depressing spectacle from almost any point of view. Its workers are ill paid and tyrannically treated, its consumers suffer from a non-competitive pricing system, its stockholders get a poor return on their money. About the only people who benefit from its workings are the high-priced executives who are largely responsible for the whole mess. What solutions have the authors to offer? Their recommendations are drastic. Dr. Daugherty finds the industry's labor policies "autocratic . . . paternalistic . . . frequently harsh and repressive"; he finds that the company unions introduced during NRA were merely a device to forestall unionization; and he therefore recommends: "First, steel workers should be organized. . . . Second, the logic of the industry's operations is such that vertical rather than craft organization is called for. . . . Third, collective bargaining should be on a national basis and not on a plant basis. . . ." The C. I. O. is not mentioned, but it and it alone fits these specifications.

Dr. de Chazeau reaches the conclusion that because of the high and inflexible overhead costs which characterize the steel industry, any move toward "free competition" would speedily precipitate cutthroat competition. Therefore some form of artificial price system which makes for stability and discourages price cutting is necessary. So far the steelmasters agree as ardently as the Federal Trade Commission disagrees. But Dr. de Chazeau is rash enough to press on to the logical end of his reasoning and to suggest that, free competition being out of the question, "a fair price for steel and the elimination of preventable social waste can be assured under private ownership only if some form of social control can be made effective." This control, he specifies, can take the form of governmental regulation, government competition, or outright socialization. Until more data is available, it is not possible to say which of these alternatives would be best. The most persistent note sounded all through these 1,200 pages, by the way, is the complaint of insufficient data. Up to now the steelmasters have successfully concealed even the most elementary facts bearing on their industry. The authors of this book, therefore, recommend that "a federal impartial and non-political fact-finding commission be established" to gather data on the basis of which it can recommend to Congress "effective public policy" for dealing with the steel industry. Perhaps the most valuable point about this book is that it indicates in detail just what information must still be pried loose from the industry to make up the blueprints for social control.

The one thing the authors are sure won't work is "industrial self-government" as practiced under the NRA, whereby the administration of the steel code was handed over to the American Iron and Steel Institute. Throughout the entire life of the NRA the institute was concerned only with maintaining prices. It showed not the slightest sensitivity to the economic "rights" of labor and the consumer. Nor did it use its vast powers to attempt a solution of any of the fearful problems that overhang the industry. "Of broad social and economic considerations in the action of the Code Authority, no evidence is discernible." The industry muffed its chance to set its own house in order. In fact, it scarcely kept up with the dusting.

Something must be said about the needlessly heavy prose style in this book. As a technique for imparting information, it seems to me highly inefficient. It is long-winded, difficult to follow, and damnably dull. One finds one's self reading over and over the same sentence, lulled by its all-too-familiar cadences. The meaning is smothered in endless qualifications and petty distinctions, which often seem to be inserted by a sort of automatic mental reflex. The inhabitants of the academic world have for too long used a patois readily intelligible only to one another. With some effort the lay reader whose ear is habituated to this barbarous dialect can penetrate its woolly vagueness to the kernel of meaning. But why should not scholars, whose medium is, after all, the written word, be required to achieve a reasonable competence in the use of words? This is not to urge "popularization" in the sense of a chatty, oversimplified style. But surely there is no inherent conflict between sound scholarship and decent prose.

DWIGHT MACDONALD

America the Beautiful—for Fiction

THE LAURELS ARE CUT DOWN. By Archie Binns. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.50.

BUCKSKIN BREECHES. By Phil Stong. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

THE THREE-HEADED ANGEL. By Roark Bradford. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

PEOPLE ON THE EARTH. By Edwin Corle. Random House. $2.

SINCE Americans have always taken so much for granted it is hardly likely that many American novelists sit down and count their blessings before beginning an American novel. Yet consider their opportunities. In the space of a hundred years a continent has been opened up to them. A thousand miles of prairie, on which the flowery grass had been waving for centuries, has been broken to the plow; the primeval forests have fallen, not only to the ax but to the swifter fire; the aboriginal people have been herded into out-of-the-way corners; and the machine age, the power and speed of industrialism, the complexity of steel and rubber and oil and coal, which had half-heartedly been hugging the Atlantic seaboard, have spread to the opposite ocean in a sweep of change unparalleled in the history of the world. The comparable beginnings of Europe are lost in time. The development of America lies just beyond the recollections of men and women alive today.

Each in his own way, the novelists whose books are cited above must have acknowledged something of this. Mr. Binns takes Puget Sound and the clearing of the Northwest; Mr. Stong's prairie schooner goes to Iowa; Mr. Bradford peoples

BREAD AND WINE

By Ignazio Silone

"Loving knowledge of the Italian people and a passionate love of freedom are here most happily blended."—Thomas Mann. "Magnificent. Its publication marks a red-letter day in the year's literary story."—Herschel Brickell. "Powerful artistry, warmth of feeling, humor and honesty."—New Republic. A Story Press Book. $2.50

THE MIRACLE OF ENGLAND

By André Maurois

The pageant of England's history from the earliest time "is surveyed and illuminated."—N. Y. Times Book Review. "With delightful felicity he tells the miraculous story of England's rise to power."—N. Y. Sun. Illustrated. $3.75

THEY CAME LIKE SWALLOWS

By William Maxwell

Christopher Morley, Book-of-the-Month Club News says: "With subtle power Mr. Maxwell has made his family group so actual that they do not cease at the end of the book. The story is told with such acute and winning freshness that one will scarcely realize until afterward how sure is the writer's touch." Dual Book-of-the-Month for May. $2.00

MIDNIGHT ON THE DESERT

By J. B. Priestley

"Priestley's new book should win him many new readers and friends. It is one of the most engaging, most companionable books of the current season. It is suggestively thoughtful about many things worth thinking about."—N. Y. Times Book Review. $3.00

TRUMPET OF JUBILEE

By Ludwig Lewisohn

"A bigger, more ambitious, more exciting novel than 'The Island Within'."—N. Y. Times Book Review. "Some of the finest prose Mr. Lewisohn has ever written."—N. Y. World Telegram. $2.50

PIPE ALL HANDS

By H. M. Tomlinson

Frank Swinnerton says: "This novel will take its place immediately among classic tales of adventure at sea. It is an extraordinarily fine, plain, simple narrative which rises in moments of crisis to grandeur." $2.50

Best Sellers

INSIDE EUROPE

By John Gunther • $3.50

MAN, THE UNKNOWN

By Alexis Carrel • $3.50

HARPER & BROTHERS

the Mississippi on the Kentucky side; and Mr. Corle's Navajo Indians are obliged to reckon with the white man's civilization on the mesas of Arizona and in the raw cities of New Mexico. Because the theme of pioneering is inevitably romantic, colorful, and filled with drama, all these books are interesting. And their authors, being above the average level of American novelists, are able to manipulate their various backgrounds in a significant manner. Mr. Bradford and Mr. Stong have perhaps done the least with their material. They have shown the lusty frontier civilization with humor and freshness; their people are alive if sometimes not entirely thought through; it should not be a disparagement to say that both books ought to make fine motion pictures.

Mr. Corle has done something more. His Navajo boy who is faced with the problem of living in another civilization than the one that is traditional to him exemplifies in his own person not only the question of white man versus red, or more largely of conqueror versus conquered, but the problem of America itself. This is the Stone Age meeting the Age of Steel; the Stone Age must disappear, but how? Mr. Corle has clothed this situation with credible flesh and blood. Moreover, he has made the ancient Indian civilization, so dirty and unhygienic and uninstructed, so at the mercy of terrifying superstition, seem very soft and lovely. Perhaps the white man lost something, too, when stone was abandoned for steel.

Of the four books Mr. Binns's is easily the most important. Not only does he write lovingly of the Northwestern forests and of the staunch first settlers there, but he includes a portion of the World War in his book which is new to war fiction. Since the two brothers who are his main characters came from the Pacific coast, they went not to France when they enlisted, but to Japan and Siberia. Mr. Binns tells the story of the bloody and mindless Allied intervention in Russia, the long months spent guarding ammunition trains, the rifles that went through to Kolchak, who was more Czarist than the Czar, the peasants butchered by Cossacks, the devious Japanese, the British and Czechs pledged to neutrality like the Americans and, unlike the Americans, not observing their pledge. And when the American soldiers at long last came home, all they got for their pains was to be investigated by the Department of Justice. It was thought they must be Bolsheviks.

Perhaps Mr. Binns is not writing fiction at all. There is a good deal of uncomfortable truth in his book. But through it all he maintains an ideal of America that is extremely moving. And this is fiction in the best sense: a manipulation of men and events to make a pattern, to create a world—in this case the raw, new, bewildered, short-sighted, brave world we call the United States.

CAROLINE SMITH

The Sunpapers

THE SUNPAPERS OF BALTIMORE, 1837-1937. By Gerald W. Johnson, Frank R. Kent, H. L. Mencken, and Hamilton Owens. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.75.

THIS volume properly celebrates the one-hundredth anniversary of the Baltimore Sun—not of the Evening Sun, which is only twenty-seven years old, whose history is none the less included, since it is the lively and worthy offspring of the original "Sunpaper." Whatever their limitations—and these are very few—they are today in the front rank of American journalism, surpassed by none in the intelligence of their editing, their political courage and independence, their interest in European affairs, their clean and decent presentation of the news, and the literary quality of their editorial pages. Like the New York Times, they prove that honest and responsible dailies can be made to pay. Indeed, the Baltimore Sun has served their city and state so long and well that they are as much an institution as the Baltimore Washington Monument, or Fort McHenry, or the City Hall.

The volume itself has been prepared with excellent taste and due modesty and so is worthy of the staff, which constitutes a journalistic group unsurpassed in ability and knowledge. Naturally it is largely a survey of the history of Baltimore and Maryland. The weaknesses of the Sun during its earlier years are as clearly set forth as its extraordinary achievements in reporting the Mexican War—often it beat the United States government in getting news from the front—and its sad predicament in the Civil War. Baltimore was then truly ■ No Man's Land. Its sons were in both armies. It was garrisoned by federal troops and regarded with great suspicion by the Washington government. Its trade with the South, upon which its wealth and prosperity were founded, was destroyed overnight. Its officials and its journalists were frequently jailed. It was generally anathema in the North, and for its sins had for a short time Major General Benjamin F. Butler as its dictator—a cruel and unusual punishment indeed. Under the circumstances there was nothing for the Sun, with its Southern sympathies, to do but to "shut up" and voluntarily yield its editorial freedom. It was then still under the leadership of its founder, Arunah S. Abell, ■ remarkable man, also one of the founders of the Philadelphia Public Ledger, who was able to keep the Sun appearing without interruption in the face of daily military or governmental scrutiny or censorship. Mr. Abell is correctly described in this book as "a man of few illusions and fewer prejudices, he is no leader of forlorn hopes, no snatcher of victory from the jaws of defeat, but a prudent, eminently reasonable individual, completely unspectacular."

The other outstanding figures in the history of the "Sunpapers" are treated with similar discrimination. The spectacular rise and fall of Charles H. Grasty is recounted, and the great services rendered by the Black family are set forth. Since the Abell family passed out of the picture as the dominating force, the owners have been wise enough to give complete freedom of utterance to the editors, who have nobly upheld the liberal tradition in America, often whimsically, humorously, or sarcastically, but always effectively. Not the least of their services has been their giving a free forum to such men as Henry L. Mencken and Frank R. Kent. The "Sunpapers" had the courage in the last Presidential campaign to refuse to choose either of the two evils which, they felt, were confronting the Republic. Even when it was supporting Mr. Roosevelt, the morning Sun allowed Mr. Kent complete latitude in attacking daily the head of the New Deal and his policies.

It was, of course, impossible to set forth in this volume all the great services these papers have rendered to their community, their state, and their country. How they repeatedly cleaned up political gangs and smashed political machines in Maryland is recorded, but there should have been a greater tribute than appears to the magnificent stand taken by the Sun against lynching, even to the extent of severely attacking Governor Albert C. Ritchie, whom it otherwise upheld and greatly admired. I think that a statement about the present ownership of the two papers would also have been extremely useful just now. One misses, too, a survey of the Sun's attitude toward the World War. The fine exposé by Frank

His LATEST Book on the Sexual Life
Crystallizes the Findings of a Lifetime
A Manual for Students and for the General Reader
COMPLETE IN ONE VOLUME—389 PAGES

PARTIAL CONTENTS

The Nature of the Sexual Impulse; Physical Factors; Mental Factors

The Sexual Zones

The Sexual Impulse in Youth

Masturbation

Frigidity; Frequency of; Nature of; Factors in; Treatment of Impotence; Frequency of; Nature of; Temporary; Psycho: Neurasthenic; Treatment of

First Intercourse

Secondary Sexual Characters

The "Under-sexed"; the "Over-sexed"

Sexual Abnormalities

Sexual Irregularities

Exhibitionism

The Sexual Criminal

Analysis of Courtship

Woman's Change of Life; Adjustments; Advantages; Effect on Sexual Desire

The Dangerous Age in Men; Symptoms; Physical and Psychic Aspects

Carl Van Doren says: "The best one-volume treatment of ■ in the English language."

Sadism and Masochism

Cruelty and Pain in Relation to ■

Homosexuality: Background and Prevalence; Types and ■

Homosexuality: Temporary; Pseudo-; in Youth; in Later Life; in Normal Persons

Hermaphroditism

Sexual Abstinence

Sex Intercourse and Health

Divorce

Monogamy; Polygamy

The Nature of Birth Control

The Question of Abortion

Frequency of Coitus

The Nation says: "There is probably no better introduction to contemporary knowledge and contemporary theories about the physiology, psychology and hygiene of sex."

The Sexual Athlete;

Satyrism; Nymphomania

Jealousy

Married Love

Psychoanalytic Concepts of ■

Pre-marital Knowledge and Experience

Modesty; Nudism

Childbirth: Sex Life during Pregnancy; Immediately after

Sexual Feeling in Women

■ Practice in Marriage Methods and Technique of Coitus

Sexual Pleasure and Conception

Positions in Coitus

Sex Life and Nervous Disorders

Sexual Difficulties

Freud's "Unconscious";

"Libido"

Dreams; Their Significance

Sex Life of Unmarried

Adults

Sexual Fetishes and Symbols

The Art of Love

Sexual Adjustments

Sex Happiness

Age and the Sexual Impulse

The Sexual Impulse and Love

Love Rights of Women; of Men

The Choice of a Mate

Ethetics of Coitus

Expression and Repression

Substitutes for Sex

Treatment of Sexual Complaints

Medical and Legal Treatment of Abnormal Gratification

Nature and Habits of the Invert; Medical and Legal Treatment of

Bisexual Attraction: Intersexuality

Eonism (Identification with opposite sex)

The Marriage Relationship

The Power of the Sexual Urge

Sexual Maladjustments in Marriage

Wide Range of the ■ Impulse

Relationship of Sex to Happiness in Marriage

Chastity; the Primitive Attitude; the Attitude Today

The Treatment of Sexual Anesthesia in Women

Bertrand Russell says: "Few books on ■ be so confidently recommended as this truly admirable volume."

Restriction of Sex Activity

How the Physician May Help

Main Channels of Sex

Procedure

Factors in Erotic Personality

Sex as ■ Instinct ■

Sex as an Appetite ■

Preparation for Marriage

Fertility and Sterility

Glossary of Sexual Terms

Index

Science News Letter

■ "Not alone the psychological, but also the biological and medical aspects of marriage, love, and the sexual impulse ■ discussed, and ■ light is given ■ or ■ universal problems."

Journal of Nervous and Mental ■ says: "Some of the finest and, in ■ respects, the most advanced findings in this field."

Birth Control Review

says: "Sums up the phenomenon of sex psychology in their normal relation to life, ■ that the ■ person may get sufficient information to serve both in life and in conversation."

AUTHORIZED

$300

POSTPAID

6TH PRINTING

389
PAGES

FREE OFFER

SEND NO MONEY

MAIL THIS COUPON

Mail this coupon to your bookseller or to Emerson Books, Inc., Dept. 980-N, 251 West 19th St., New York City

Send ■ a copy of Havelock Ellis' Psychology of Sex for free examination. I will deposit $3.00 and a few cents delivery charge when the book arrives. Full purchase price to be refunded if returned within 5 days I am over 21 years old.

Name.....

Address.....

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $3 thus saving delivery charge. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

Two Articles on Spain

Soon after the first shot was fired in the civil war, Edward Hunter went to Spain for Hearst's International News Service. In his article Covering Spain for Hearst, he reveals the manner in which dispatches were distorted between the time they were wired and the time they appeared in American newspapers using the International News Service.

According to his own statement, General Franco is prepared to execute two million Spaniards to establish his rule. George Seldes has tapped Spanish government sources and journalists returned from rebel territory to show in an article to appear soon under the title Franco's Death List that Franco's threat is being carried out in systematic massacres of labor-union members and sympathizers in every town the rebels capture.

Harvard Passes the Ball

At Harvard the ball has been passed from Economics Department to dean to president and back again in an effort to minimize the potential value to the university of its two most popular economics teachers, Dr. J. Raymond Walsh and Dr. Alan R. Sweezy. R. K. Lamb analyzes the situation for Nation readers and shows why the dismissal of two liberal instructors is no mere tempest in a teacup but actually illuminates the dilemma of most American universities.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I enclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

5-8-37

Kent of what was really happening in Paris when the alleged peace was being made is set forth in detail, for it was a splendid journalistic achievement. So was the magnificent reporting of the Washington Conference for the Limitation of Naval Armaments, to which the Sun invited journalists and experts from England, France, and Japan; this proceeding marked its latter-day rebirth.

One piece of genuine unfairness and misrepresentation of history appears in the account of the famous attack upon the Sixth Massachusetts Volunteer Militia on April 19, 1861, on its transit through Baltimore. The volunteers are described as a regiment of 1,700 regulars who ran away disgracefully from the mob and were rescued by Mayor Brown armed with an umbrella. The truth is that a small battalion of the Sixth, comprising only 220 men, raw and untrained militia, some of whom had only been in uniform for three days, was attacked by a mob of thousands of men and women and fought its way across the city, at times at the double-quick. The rest of the 700 Massachusetts men got through unscathed. The mob inflicted a loss upon the battalion of nearly one-fifth of their number, four dead and thirty-six wounded. That they held together under such circumstances and, in accordance with their colonel's orders, did not fire volleys indiscriminately, is a tribute to their courage and steadfastness, for the situation would have tried the best-disciplined regulars in the world. Mr. Johnson, the author of this part of the narrative, thinks not only that they were ridiculous—"comic"—but that they should have killed many more Baltimoreans!

But all in all here is a narrative of which journalists may well be proud—one that should be carefully preserved for future generations if only as an offset to the yellow journalism of today and its limitless sins.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Step by Step

THE OUTWARD ROOM. By Millen Brand. Simon and Schuster. $1.25.

THIS novel probably has merit as a study of insanity and its cure. The heroine is first seen in an asylum; she escapes from the asylum and finds her way to New York; in New York she becomes well through living with a man who at the end must have her sympathy in a loss—the death of a brother—like that one which had unhinged her own mind seven years before. For all I know, Mr. Brand has prepared his "case" carefully and has gone wrong at few if any points. But it does not matter, since for his purposes he has done something of greater importance. He has written a good novel; so good a novel, indeed, that I can suspect it as a case history. Case histories are never interesting in exactly this way—never as close to the imagination, and never as moving. Their particular fascination comes from the fact that they do not touch us personally, just as their claim on our attention depends on our belief that they are true reports of people we do not know. If we knew the people we should not be as cool as we are, or—sometimes—amused. The irrelevances acted or spoken would shock us as we watched and heard. In fiction there can perhaps be no such thing as insanity, for it would be unendurable. There can be something that looks like it, as there is in "King Lear"; but there must be no absolute irrelevances. And so there are none in Mr. Brand's novel, from whose heroine we are never divided by that moat of unintelligibility which makes case histories at once so dry and so terrible.

"The Outward Room" is a distinguished love story whose heroine could be lonely, misunderstood, or anonymous rather than insane. What matters is that she begins to live with the workingman named John, and that everything which happens between them is of the deepest and clearest interest. Mr. Brand has told his story in the simplest way. Harriet is never out of our sight from the first page to the last, nor is there any staggering of time; a single year of Harriet's life is chronicled step by step; one thing comes after another, and is adequately attended to before the next thing follows. There are, of course, other ways to succeed with a story, and perhaps the major sort of success calls for more people, more scenes, and more cross-purposes. In the linear way he has chosen, however, Mr. Brand has succeeded; the sign being that again and again some apparently unimportant detail assumes without warning enough importance to overwhelm a reader who until then had known merely that he wished to watch everything as it happened from the safe distance of his chair.

The first of these moments arrived for me on page 138, when Harriet and John had finished their first supper in John's room and a paragraph began: "They ate and afterwards she washed the dishes; it was the first work she had done since she left the hospital." Now that is a matter-of-fact sentence; but in the life of a fugitive woman who has been starving both for food and for human company, and whose life, whether we knew it or not, we have been sharing for 137 pages, it announces an epoch. So with Harriet's resolution the next morning to scrub the apartment; so with her disclosure to John that she is insane; so with the time they stand together on the street and listen to a Hungarian love song; so with the evening when she hands him her first pay envelope; and so—never indeed more so—when in the store he asks her what she wants in addition to a dress and she says a pocket-book. There is nothing in these situations except what Mr. Brand has put there previously. But he has put a great deal there without ever having called our attention to what he was doing as he walked so sympathetically and intelligently in step with his heroine. Of such is the kingdom of story-telling.

MARK VAN DOREN

DRAMA

The Taming of a Shrew

THE story of Tobias and his angel and his dog was never a part of the Hebrew canon. It was—my learning comes straight out of the encyclopedia—taken in by the Catholic church only to be chucked out again by the Protestants, and I presume that it made theologians uncomfortable for the same reason that it has always appealed to artists: for the reason, that is to say, that it suggests the "Arabian Nights" almost as much as it suggests the temper of the prophets. Ewald, Westcott, and Kohut—if you want to know who they are please use your own encyclopedia—agree that it was composed during the Persian period, and it contains the only complimentary, or at least the only uninsulting, reference to a dog in the entire Bible. Nor is all this as irrelevant as it may at first sight seem to the fact that James Bridie—the Scotch physician who wrote "A Sleeping Clergyman" and

★ YALE ★

Just Published

The DREYFUS CASE

By the Man,
ALFRED DREYFUS
and His Son,
PIERRE DREYFUS

Translated and Edited by Donald C. McKay

Few people know the incredible story of the Dreyfus Affair. When Alfred Dreyfus died just two years ago he left a manuscript in which he describes in detail the dramatic developments of the case that centered around him. His son has added to the story and has included much valuable material and many letters of the family and from prominent figures of the time. A most significant book. Illustrated. $3.75

At all bookstores

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS, New Haven, Conn.

★ ★

THEY SAY*

"There is no more Child Labor!"—BUT CHILD WORKERS IN AMERICA

by Katharine D. Lumpkin
Director of Research, Industrial Studies, Smith College

and Dorothy W. Douglas Assistant Professor of Economics and Sociology, Smith College

blasts this canard into limbo with irrefutable facts gathered during twelve years of intensive research. What Katherine Mayo did for Mother India, Lumpkin and Douglas have done for the "forgotten children" of our industrial and agricultural slums. For instance:

No less than half a million children under fifteen work for wages as low as 3 to 5 cents an hour for from 10 to 14 hours a day! No less than a million children under fifteen slave on farms for no wages at all—except the pitiful stipend their parents receive for family labor! These inhuman practices not only irreparably damage them for productive labor when they reach stunted maturity, but are the basis of many of our industrial and agricultural difficulties. Illustrated $3.50

And senators, businessmen, educators, churchmen say "there is no more child labor!" Let them read the actual case histories which this book presents and spread the information. Once it is aroused, a great democracy like ours will no longer tolerate the barbarous practices authors expose.

At all booksellers

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & CO., 116 E. 16th St., New York

VACATION TOURS TO EUROPE
and Soviet

RUSSIA

Conducted or Independent

Including COPENHAGEN, STOCKHOLM, HELSINGFORS or PALESTINE, EGYPT and on return trip visit WARSAW, VIENNA (Salzburg Festival), DALMATIA, VENICE, BERN and PARIS (Exposition).

Special Arrangements for Teachers

Consult us about your travel plans

—Our service is FREE—

Ask for literature.

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 Union Sq., N.Y. ALgonquin 4-1500

R MEDICAL TOUR
For Physicians and Dentists
July 3, 1937
Conducted by
DR. EDWARD COHEN
and DR. D. M. ROLLET

WHY DID

John D. Rockefeller, Jr.

WRITE TO JIM FARLEY?

See if you can answer this question after reading the remarkable article, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma", by Louis Wallis in The Christian Century, reprinted free for you.

Here is the dilemma: Business recovery must go much further; else the New Deal fails.—But if recovery DOES go on, it will inevitably drive up land prices, and inflate ground rents, and lead to another period of land speculation, which will produce another economic slump. Most "frozen paper" in banks is based on inflated land values.

Two remarkable articles by Louis Wallis, "President Roosevelt's Dilemma" and "The Economic Problem,"—both reprinted from The Christian Century—will be forwarded to you free by sending your name clearly written on a postal card to

Dept. C

WILLETT, CLARK & CO.,

440 South Dearborn Street

Chicago, Illinois

Going Away?

To assure regular delivery of The Nation, subscribers are requested to give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Report your change of address to the Circulation Department, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

adapted "Storm Over Patsy"—has made a play out of it which the Studio Theater of the Federal Theater Project has put on at the old Provincetown in MacDougall Street. It is not irrelevant because it helps explain the fact that the play and the production alike are gay and witty and charming—three qualities which even the publishers of the "Bible Designed to Be Read as Living Literature" did not think of mentioning in connection with the Holy Scriptures, though they did go so far as to say that the Book of Kings was "more exciting even than 'Anthony Adverse' or 'Gone with the Wind.'"

Readers who are not familiar with the story as told in the Apocrypha may know it as transmogrified by Stella Benson in her delightful tale "The Far Away Bride"; and suffice it here to say that it tells how the foolish son of a good old blind man goes on a journey and returns to restore the sight as well as to reestablish the fortunes of his father after having—with the aid of a guardian angel—made a man of himself by struggling with a monstrous fish and winning a bride whom it was first necessary to free from the clutches of Asmodey, a demon who had completely spoiled her disposition. Obviously, the story is not uneventful, and Mr. Bridie has solved what may appear almost insuperable difficulties by turning it all into a sort of sophisticated fairy tale told with artful artlessness and made the vehicle of a very touching as well as very funny commentary on human nature. The necessary and yet dangerous business of making the thing real by the introduction of significant anachronisms he has handled with admirable discretion. Somehow they always result in humanization rather than in burlesque, and they leave untouched a genuine naivete to which one can no more condescend than one could condescend to the naivete of "The Little Clay Cart" as it was performed years ago at the Neighborhood Playhouse. Besides, there are stretches of dialogue—like that between Sara and the Archangel—which are superbly wise as well as witty. The author has, to be sure, the advantage of dealing with the story of virtue rewarded, which is probably the most thoroughly engaging story in the world.

Ellen Van Volkenburg, who directed the production, and Samuel Leve, who designed the settings, have both done wonders in turning the limitations of the tiny Provincetown stage into an advantage, for they have made them contribute to the make-believe atmosphere which surrounds the whole thing; and I can only say that "Tobias and the Angel" was to me as thoroughly delightful as anything I have seen this year. Even the acting seemed just what it ought to be. I suppose it is not really very good; probably it is amateurish and unpolished. But I like it. And for these last remarks may Mary McCarthy (whose article in this week's issue please see) forgive me!

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

P. S. Admission is free, though you are supposed to telephone or write for tickets. If, as the play suggests, virtue is really rewarded, they will be in great demand.

Before you make plans for the Summer consult Page 548 and the Classified Page of this issue of The Nation.

FILMS

On Horror's Head

THE knife edge between the ridiculous and the horrible is so thin that if a director cannot walk it a critic certainly cannot. At least that will serve as my excuse for being unable to say why it is that audiences at "Love from a Stranger" (United Artists) laugh throughout the closing ten minutes rather than shudder or hold their breaths. I think I should not have been disposed to laugh myself when the murderer of three wives (Basil Rathbone) started to move on the fourth (Ann Harding) with writhing fingers and a series of truly awful grimaces. But the audience did, and I am told that all audiences do; and so I cannot but conclude that there is something the matter with the picture—with Basil Rathbone, probably, though it could be Rowland Lee, the director, or even Ann Harding. I suspect it is Mr. Rathbone, who is more than a competent actor but who in this instance looks his part too well. Or rather he does not look his part well enough, content as he obviously is to look like a thousand other villains of melodrama rather than the particular insane one, Gerald Lovell, whom he was engaged to create in the present instance.

"Marked Woman" (Warner Brothers), with Bette Davis as a night-club girl who under provocation squeals on the clip-joint racket and sends its big shot to prison for life, is horrible in a somewhat surprising way, and the fact should be noted. The custom in such pictures is to save our feelings at the end by showing that the girl was really not scratched at all and that the young assistant district attorney has arms long enough to reach around her. Not only does this A. D. A. keep his hands to himself; the girl is knocked down and carved up—at the trial a large and convincing cross disfigures a formerly pretty cheek—and the last shot of all is far from reassuring. For as the girl walks away from court with the three friends who have supported her testimony, and who like her henceforth will have no careers, the gray possibility lingers in any spectator's mind that the sacrifice has been not only interesting but final, not to say fatal. "Marked Woman," therefore, is genuinely harrowing, and not to be recommended for the entertainment of those who prefer to enjoy their crime. I do not know how edifying it is on any grounds, though I am sure that it is somehow praiseworthy.

"The Wave," a Mexican picture at the Filmarte, comes with an acclaim which unfortunately is rather shrill—"great," "magnificent," "ranks with the ten great films of all time and all countries," etc. Greatness is not as easy as that to recognize in advance, even by George Seldes, Waldo Frank, Clifford Odets, Joseph Freeman, and Archibald MacLeish; and the plain fact is that "The Wave" moves with a more than desirable slowness. Carlos Chavez and Paul Strand wanted to avoid the snappiness of Hollywood in their story of a rising among the fishermen of Vera Cruz, and it was right to insist everywhere upon a naturalness in the native actors and an absence everywhere of manipulated melodrama; but sluggishness is no better than snap, and drama is by no means improper in a revolutionary narrative. The photography is very convincing and beautiful, the young father at his son's grave is moving, the faces by and large are wonderful, and the strike is to be sympathized with. But let us say that "The Wave" is one of the hundred best.

MARK VAN DOREN

SEE RUSSIA with EXPERTS

Travel Seminar led by Anna Louise Strong, just back from fifteen years in U.S.S.R. Special program, services, and travel facilities. Inclusive rate..... $895
 Public Health Survey led by John A. Kingsbury, co-author of "Red Medicine." Program arranged by Commissariat of Public Health. Comfortable travel. Inclusive rate..... $797
 Sixth Annual Tour led by Julien Bryan, roving reporter for "March of Time." The great centres and ten days in Caucasian villages. Inclusive rate..... $694
 Third Annual Travel Collective led by Joshua Kunitz, journalist in Moscow since 1935. Inclusive rate..... $543

Twenty other unusual trips in Europe and Soviet Russia. Also independent itineraries in Russia.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor
 8 West 40th Street New York
 Cooperating with Intourist

What happened at the

TROTSKY HEARING IN MEXICO?

Hear a Full Report by Members of the Preliminary Commission of Inquiry

SPEAKERS: JOHN DEWEY

Chairman of the Commission

JOHN FINERTY

Counsel to the Commission
 Attorney to Mooney, Sacco-Vanzetti

BENJAMIN STOLBERG

SUZANNE LA FOLLETTE

Chairman:

WILLIAM H. KILPATRICK

Teachers College, Columbia University

SUNDAY

MAY 9TH

8 P. M.

Mecca Temple

130 West 56th St.

Tickets—50c and 25c

American Committee for the Defense of Leon Trotsky
 Phone GRamercy 7-6012 Room 1435, 22 E. 17th St., New York

SPAIN SPEAKS to Social Workers

MAY 10 our answer must be clear!

MONDAY—8 P. M.

A. W. A. BALLROOM

361 W. 57th St.

WALTER W. PETTIT, Presiding

HELEN M. HARRIS

EDUARD C. LINDEMAN

DR. ERNST P. BOAS

HARALD H. LUND

SAMUEL J. RODMAN

Foreign Correspondent, just returned from Madrid

DR. ERNESTINA GONZALES-FLEISCHMAN

Director, Library, Madrid School of Fine Arts

Auspices of

SOCIAL WORKERS COMMITTEE of the MEDICAL BUREAU TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY

130 E. 22 • Room 600 • N. Y. C. • MUrray Hill 4-5301

Admission at door, 50 cents

JACK LONDON—King of Story Tellers A Literary Genius of the Working Class

Now—A Library of 10 of His Superb
Novels

YOURS—ALMOST A GIFT

3583
Breathless Pages
Uniform Blue
Bindings
Titles in Gold

JACK LONDON

A Special
Daily Worker
Offer

Tales of Swift Action

Hailed by millions as a literary titan, the very strength and power of Jack London's works soon caused publishers to let the most "dangerous" ones lapse—that is, go out of print. London was America's first modern revolutionary writer who with his passion for truth and social justice combined a rare, magnificent genius for telling a swift moving story.

With flaming anger and burning words, London laid bare the devastating effect upon workers of slum life and sweatshops. In rich prose, he told tales of manhood wrecked on hell-ships under brutal captains. In "The Call of the Wild," in "Smoke-Bellevue," in "White Fang," he wrote glowingly, dramatically of primitive battles of man and dog in the ice-locked North during the famous Klondike gold rush.

In "The Iron Heel," one of the classics of revolutionary literature he envisaged the terror that would come with fascism. In "Martin Eden" he shattered illusions of capitalist "culture."

Now in the Daily Worker offer you have the chance to get his 10 best works practically as a gift. Send in the coupon today.

THE DAILY WORKER IS AMERICA'S

MOST PROGRESSIVE NEWSPAPER

How You Can Get the Library

Get the Daily Worker on the newsstand. Clip and save the London Library coupon appearing every day in the Daily Worker until you have 14, of which at least seven must be consecutively numbered.

On presentation of the coupons, together with only 87 cents, you'll receive the first two volumes (or they will be mailed to you if you add 13 cents for postage and packing). Then, when you have saved another 14 coupons, you get another two volumes, at the same nominal cost, until you own the set.

Jack London Library

RESERVATION COUPON

Daily Worker Presentation Offer

Daily Worker,
35 East 12th Street,
New York, N. Y.

I accept your presentation offer of the Jack London Library in 10 handsome volumes. Please reserve a set for me which I will obtain in accordance with your rules as soon as I have saved the necessary coupons from the Daily Worker.

Name

Address

Letters to the Editors

Broadcasts from Berlin

Dear Sirs: I am glad to learn from the letter of J. Maguire in The Nation of April 17 that Madrid broadcasts three times a week in order to present its side of the conflict raging in Spain. These broadcasts will be an antidote to the programs sent out by the powerful JDB station (25 meters) in Berlin nightly at about ten-fifteen. The news from Berlin is colored and malignant in the best Hitlerite fashion. The Loyalists are called Bolsheviks and the rebels are misnamed Loyalists. The announcer quotes copiously from the Giornale d'Italia, Tribuna, and other reactionary foreign sources.

After this service there comes a letter-radio exchange. Persons who have sent letters are thanked and congratulated personally by name—even by address. The announcements are in either German or English, sometimes in Spanish for the edification of our South American friends. Is there any way by which the ravings of Hitler can be drowned out in these parts? It would be a meritorious public service to accomplish this feat.

JUDAH TIKTIN

New York, April 30

Maude Royden on Colonies

Dear Sirs: Having failed to see your issue of February 20 until recently, I am only now able to answer the attack made on me by Mr. Oswald Garrison Villard. I call Mr. Villard's article an "attack" because it is so astonishing a misrepresentation of all that I said in America that I can scarcely believe that Mr. Villard actually heard me speak. That he was on the same platform with me once I vividly remember, but I think that my "charm," to which he so gracefully alludes, must have soothed him into a deep sleep.

In referring to my plea that the root cause of the desire on the part of any nation to embark on war again would be found in suffering (individuals, I said, might desire war for other reasons, but the mass of the people never), Mr. Villard commented: "The suggestion is to take away some swag from those who have improperly acquired it, usually by rapine and wholesale murder, and to give it to somebody else. Those who support this proposal seldom speak of the populations which are thus to be handed over, or ask whether the natives wish to be ruled by this country or that. They are just so many cattle to be bandied about as the white man sees fit."

It will hardly be believed that what I actually said was that we British could not offer to give back her colonies to Germany since it was not right to speak of "giving" human beings about from one to another as though they were so much livestock. My own proposal was that we British should offer to allow some impartial authority to find out the wishes of the people concerned, whether they wished to be governed by a mandate from Great Britain or from Germany or to be free to govern themselves. I pointed out that Germany would infallibly reply that if we wished to apply this principle to what used to be her colonies, we should also apply it to those which are and have been our colonies. I said that we ought to be willing to do this and that we might very well begin with India.

If I really had said what Mr. Villard represents me as saying, it would have been infinitely better if I had never come to America at all.

A. MAUDE ROYDEN

Sevenoaks, Kent, England, April 8

Dear Sirs: I need offer no defense against Miss Royden's charge; nobody ever slumbered when she spoke. Miss Royden, when I heard her, did not go into the details of her views as to colonies, which, as stated here, are unexceptionable. Had she done so I should never have used her remark as a text for a little sermon against those who regard colonies as pieces of land with no regard to their populations. If I misunderstood her words I apologize unreservedly. Of course no "attack" was intended.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

New York, April 28

An Apology to Mr. Ickes

Dear Sirs: After the publication of my article Chicago Is Broke, in The Nation of February 13, Mr. Harold L. Ickes wrote me that he regarded the following statement as an "evident slur" on him: "But when the election comes along, everybody is for Roosevelt and Roosevelt is for everybody, and Ickes sees the light and comes through with an Outer Drive Bridge. . . ." I hereby tender Mr. Ickes an apology for any possible misinterpretation of my statement either by him or by The Nation's readers. I defer to no man in my admiration of Mr. Ickes and of his thirty years' war for civic reform in Chicago.

The New Deal, however, has transformed more than one reformer into a practical, or Roosevelt-Farley, idealist. I recall that in 1933 Mr. Ickes withheld a grant from the Roosevelt-Kelly-Nash Chicago Sanitary District until that municipality cleaned house and fired from 200 to 250 pay-rollers. Two and a half years later Mr. Ickes assumed no such moral authority when he bailed out the Roosevelt-Kelly-Nash Chicago Park District with $2,000,000 to resume construction of the Outer Drive Bridge. Without Mr. Ickes's grant the Roosevelt-Kelly-Nash machine might have had to explain, just before the 1936 election, why $6,700,000 of the $9,630,000 which Chicago had voted six years before to finance the bridge had been used as a revolving fund to meet padded pay rolls and to pay the principal and interest on previous bond issues. When I said that Mr. Ickes "saw the light," I meant that he was at last convinced that his function as Public Works Administrator was to put men to work even if he made votes for the Roosevelt-Kelly-Nash machine.

Chicago, April 29 MILTON S. MAYER

For a National Congress of American Writers

Dear Sirs: Today in America there are signs of a literary revival that may resemble or surpass that of the period from 1912 to 1916. Those of us who remember the hopeful activity of those years can also remember how it was cut short by the war. And we can see that the promise of the 1930's is threatened in a still more definite fashion.

In our own country fascism is still afraid to wear a uniform. Against it there has been an impressive rallying of the forces that favor democracy. American labor—the strongest of these forces—is organizing itself for what is really the first time. And this rebirth of the American labor movement is connected with the new stirrings in literature—not as cause and effect, but rather as two parallel manifestations of the same progressive forces.

The growth of the labor movement is being and will be resisted. Fascism will be encouraged and financed as an effective means of "keeping labor in its place." Even war will be used. And under a fascist regime literature will fare no better than labor; that is one of the reasons why we are issuing invitations to a national congress of American writers. We hope to see the establishment of a national organization of American writers, and we suggest that the aims of such an organization should be, first, to provide a center for the cultural activities of American writers and a link between writers now separated by age or place of residence; second, to help in raising cultural standards by the discussion of literary problems; third, to arrange lectures and conferences and issue a magazine; fourth, to maintain friendly relations with the writers of other countries by contact with their organizations and also by encouraging the translation of important works; fifth, to defend the political and social institutions that make for peace—and specifically to defend the democratic rights to education and freedom of thought and expression; sixth, to effect an alliance for cultural defense between American writers and all progressive forces in the nation.

FOR RENT

Charming 4 room log-cabin-type House in picturesque part of Catskills—Fronting on Stream. All modern improvements—gas and electricity—huge log-burning fire-place. Fully equipped bathroom and kitchen. Bathing facilities. $300 for season—June 1 to Oct. 1—110 miles from New York. Redler, 136 West 21 Street—CHelsea 3-5955.

Harrison, Maine. 350 miles. Island camp; 12 acres, sandy beach, gas, plumbing. Six rooms, bath. Accommodates 8. $300 season. Shongut, Mohegan Lake, N. Y.

SUMMER COTTAGE FOR RENT: Five rooms, electricity, water, brook, 300-acre farm, 115 miles from city. $200. To rent to family with young children. ST. 9-7711. MILVY, 25 East 10th St.

Something different in a bungalow; three rooms, sleeping porch, modern; children's counselor available; forty acres beautiful grounds; $250 season; 50 miles N. Y. C. CanAl 6-1840.

FOR SALE

IDEAL RETREAT IN WESTPORT, CONN. Unusually attractive studio bungalow—6 rooms of rare charm on picturesque river—easy commutation—swimming pool, tennis court on property—golf—salt water beaches—riding academies nearby—Call WIsconsin 7-4149 for appointment.

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value
G. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2518-M

RANCH FOR SALE

Picturesque Montana Ranch, 105 acres naturally sub-irrigated alfalfa meadow, 1015 acres pastures, well fenced, low price. Aged couple retiring. Box No. 902, c/o The Nation.

We invite writers of professional standing who agree generally with our aims to take part in a National Writers' Congress to be held in New York City June 4, 5, and 6, 1937. Writers who are interested in the congress may secure further information by writing to the League of American Writers at 125 East Twenty-fourth Street.

NEWTON ARVIN, VAN WYCK BROOKS, ERSKINE CALDWELL, MALCOLM COWLEY, PAUL DE KRUIF, WALDO FRANK, LANGSTON HUGHES, JAMES WELDON JOHNSON, JOHN HOWARD LAWSON, ROBERT MORSS LOVETT, ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, CLAUDE MCKAY, VINCENT SHEEAN, UPTON SINCLAIR, GEORGE SOULE, DONALD OGDEN STEWART, GENEVIEVE TAGGARD, JEAN STARR UNTERMAYER, CARL VAN DOREN, ELLA WINTER, LEWIS MUMFORD

New York, April 21

Books for Workers

Dear Sirs: A number of Pittsburgh educators, labor leaders, and professional people have established several workers' schools in the industrial towns around Pittsburgh. What we particularly need now is a traveling library for these communities. We need books on labor problems, labor history, labor and the law, proletarian novels, plays, and poetry.

Books or money for books may be sent to Workers' Schools in Western Pennsylvania, 206 Stanwix Street, Pittsburgh.

ROSE M. STEIN, Secretary
Pittsburgh, Pa., April 30

CONTRIBUTORS

DWIGHT MACDONALD was a member of the editorial staff of Fortune from March, 1929, until June, 1936.

FREDERICK R. BARKLEY is on the Washington staff of the Baltimore Evening Sun.

MARY MCCARTHY in collaboration with Margaret Marshall wrote a series of articles on the literary critics which was published in The Nation in the fall of 1935.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

BOOK

Six Poems from the Russian

A. S. PUSHKIN Y. M. LERMONTOV
Ruslan and Ludmilla Izrael Bay
Poltava Lithuanian Maid
Caucasian Captive The Daemon

Pushkin: What is Poetic Inspiration:

Some claim I smeared here my own portrait
Like Hyron, who of pride was poet.
As though it is impossible for us to write
Poems about no one else
About no other one but ourselves.

I will mark in passing: all the poets
Of the dreams of love are friends
And often charming objects
Appear in our dreams by chance
The secret images survive
And by the sacred lyre are brought again to life
Thus carefree, I did create
The images of the mountain maid
And of the prisoner-maid of Belgrade
(From Eugene Onegin)

Illustrations by Herbert Fouts, 317 pp. $2

Send only checks or money orders through mail

JACOB KRUP, Publisher and Editor

145 East 23rd Street New York, N. Y.

Watch May 22—Press comments describing the book

ROOM WANTED

Gentleman wants comfortable room in high class apartment with private Jewish family. Broadway section between 90-120th St. Box No. 903, c/o The Nation.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

Classified Advertisements

62c a line

(3 lines minimum)

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street New York City
COrtlandt 7-3330

FOR RENT—FOR SALE

WESTPORT, Conn. For rent—charming large house; modern improvements, tennis, swimming, children's camp on grounds. Also bungalow for rent or sale. Call WAtkins 9-3045.

APARTMENT FOR RENT

237 Henry Street. 2 rooms and small kitchen. all improvements, $34 up. (East Broadway Station 8th Ave.)

APARTMENT TO SUB-LET

13 Charles St. June, July, August, $200. 3 unusually light, large rooms with kitchen and bath. 4 exposures. Completely furnished. Tel. CHelsea 3-7764.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

2 room furnished apartment, airy, sunny and charming; downtown. To share with girl. WAlker 5-9735 between 6-7.

WANTED

Woman and child desire to rent or share small cottage or shack on location affording combination of seashore and country, 1 hour New York. Box No. 904, c/o The Nation.

APARTMENT—EXCHANGE

Race Relations Researchers! Rare documents available this summer if you exchange New York apartment near Columbia for white professor's home in Atlanta Negro district. Box No. 905, c/o The Nation.

ROOMS FOR RENT

Why live within four walls? Enjoy sociable, interesting atmosphere. River breezes. $4.50-$8.50. 301 West 108th St. ACademy 4-8722

Kay's Inn, Highland Mills, N. Y. Renting rooms for season, $75 per room and up. Sports. Call GRamercy 7-6429 between 4 and 7 P. M.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 15, 1937

NUMBER 20

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

549

EDITORIALS:

UPRISING IN CATALONIA

552

WHO SHOULD PAY TAXES?

552

RELIEF FOR FRANCO

553

WASHINGTON WEEKLY by Paul W. Ward

554

GENERAL FRANCO'S DEATH LIST

by George Seldes

555

DON'T SELL OUT PROSPERITY

by Jerry Voorhis and Maury Maverick

557

HOFFMAN OF NEW JERSEY by McAlister Coleman

559

HARVARD STARVES THE SOCIAL SCIENCES

by Robert Keen Lamb

561

IT HAPPENED ONE NIGHT by Morrie Ryskind

563

ISSUES AND MEN by Oswald Garrison Villard

564

BROUN'S PAGE

565

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE ACTORS AND THE CRITICS by Mary McCarthy

566

THE ANATOMY OF ACCOMMODATION

by George Herzog

567

THE CALIPH'S TOWER by Maxwell Geismar

568

END OF A SAGA by Stanley Young

568

"A CHARTRES OF HIS OWN" by Eda Lou Walton

570

SOUTH TEXAS PRIMITIVE by Ben Belitt

571

DOG EAT DOG by Dorothy Brewster

572

DRAMA: MISS MCCARTHY AND THE CRITICS

by Joseph Wood Krutch

573

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

574

The Shape of Things

★

BY THE TIME THESE LINES APPEAR GEORGE VI will have become King of England in good standing, and another generation of royal respectability set properly on its way. But we shall always think of it as the Coronation of Stanley Baldwin. It is, so to speak, his crowning achievement—preceded by an uncrowning achievement that condemned Edward VIII to a normal and, we hope, happy private life, and put Mrs. Simpson and America in their places. That Stanley Baldwin should have been the key figure in all this is quite inevitable. By his very lack of the qualities which make men great—imagination, boldness, flexibility, and brilliance—he has achieved his place in English history along with many another mediocre man who also muddled through. His speech at the time of Edward's abdication was a remarkable expression of the provincial self-assurance which keeps the Empire going and rouses more volatile peoples to self-defeating frenzy. His appeal for labor peace on the eve of the coronation was cut from the same cloth. He begged "the handful of men with whom rests peace or war to give the best present to the country that could be given at this moment"—industrial peace; he was appealing mainly to miners who were refusing to join a company union and to London bus-drivers who contend that their work is so hard that seven and one-half hours should be called a day. He could stand pat through all the emotional stress and strain of the Simpson affair because a romantic attachment for an attractive American was quite outside his—and Mrs. Baldwin's—view of life. Having never driven a London bus, he could remind these British workmen of the contribution they were expected to make to the costly spectacle of the coronation.

★

THERE ARE SIGNS, OF COURSE, THAT THE Baldwin line, like the British monarchy, is losing its prestige. The romantic château in France plays second fiddle to the spectacle in London only because the Duke of Windsor and the American woman are making a valiant fight to keep the press at bay. The London bus-drivers, as we go to press, remain unmoved by pleas for peace and the miners also are obdurate. Perhaps they have had more time than usual to study the figures in the budget of the royal family, in which £6,000 is set down as a separate allowance for Princess Elizabeth—to be increased to £25,000 when she becomes twenty-one; and the Spanish war has also had its

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

effect on the working-class mind. In other quarters, however, normality prevails and will probably continue at least until Mr. Baldwin goes to a well-earned rest in the House of Lords. Behind the glittering façade of the coronation the world's diplomats away from home are engaging in a good old-fashioned spree of unofficial horse-trading, and, even more important, the representatives of the Empire are "cementing bonds" in more than the sentimental sense. Meanwhile Italy is indulging in one of those petulant gestures against the British above referred to. The coronation is being boycotted in the Italian press because Mussolini does not like the way Great Britain is treating his own attempts, first in Ethiopia and now in Spain, to copy the early British imperial model. So far the lack of British news in Rome has gone practically unnoticed in London.

★

THE SIGNING OF THE WORLD SUGAR PACT

by the representatives of twenty-two governments is a most significant step in the direction of international planning. No attempt is made to control sugar production directly except in Great Britain, but quotas are set for each of the exporting countries which are to be maintained for a five-year period. While the pact merely perpetuates the principles of the Chadbourne plan of 1931, the countries covered by it produce 90 per cent of the world's sugar, whereas the countries participating in the earlier agreement produced only 25 per cent. Moreover, the agreement contains a provision for a permanent international council which may make uniform changes in the quotas in accordance with shifts in market conditions. The first test of the new pact has already arisen in connection with the Louisiana cane-growers' demand that they be given a greatly enlarged quota in the sugar-control bill pending before Congress. Since this demand could only be met at the expense of Cuba, to grant it would leave that unhappy island with some 200,000 tons of excess sugar on its hands, more than 20 per cent of its quota under the new agreement. Incidentally, the Louisiana proposal would add about $350,000,000 to the annual sugar bill of the American consumer.

★

WITH AN EFFICIENCY WHICH MUST HAVE aroused Hitler's envy, the unconstitutional National Security Tribunal of Brazil has convicted Luiz Carlos Prestes and Harry Ewart of the "crime" of seeking to perpetuate constitutional government in that country. Prestes, the leader of the popular democratic movement against the Vargas dictatorship, was sentenced to sixteen years and eight months in prison, and Ewart, a German anti-Nazi exile, received a sentence of thirteen years. The "trials" were conducted in secret, without even the presence of the defendants, in a room heavily guarded by police armed with machine-guns and tear gas. The lawyer assigned to defend Prestes made a public statement before the trial asserting his client's guilt, while the presiding judge declared: "It is not necessary, in order to condemn the extremists, to submit proofs. The judges will decide according to their own opinions." David Levinson, an American attorney who was retained by friends of Prestes to handle his case, was not allowed to see the prisoner and was finally driven out of Brazil lest he expose the unconstitutional practices of the special tribunal. Although no appeal from decisions of the National Security Tribunal is permitted under the law which Vargas pushed through the Brazilian legislature, it is not too late to make the Brazilian government acquainted with the judgment of progressive opinion throughout the world.

★

NO ONE CAN HAVE READ WITHOUT EMOTION the story of the loss of the Hindenburg, especially as it was illustrated by the most extraordinary photographs ever taken of a major calamity—it was as if the exploding airship waited to pose for the cameras ready on the ground. That this happened to a German dirigible makes it all the more regrettable, for German efforts in lighter-than-air navigation have deserved the best of results—and apparently had achieved them in many successful crossings of both the South and North Atlantic. But the risk will always be there, even if hereafter airships use only the helium that costs so much and is practically an American monopoly. For the Los Angeles broke in two without a trace of fire, and the R-101 came to its horrible end by striking a hill, after which it went up in flames. That the Hindenburg's disaster occurred when the hard voyage was over and the ship apparently safe added profoundly to the tragedy, especially as relatives of those who died, on hand to welcome, witnessed the horror they were powerless to ward off. Whether transoceanic navigation of this kind can be made to pay hereafter is open to grave question. But one thing this disaster should prevent—the voting of any more money for dirigibles for our navy. The time for that has gone.

★

AMID EMPTY BEER BOTTLES, APPLE CORES, old bills, and the sound of senatorial snores, the New York legislature drew to a close as the sun was rising last Sunday morning. True to his self-imposed tradition of enlivening the last hours by making a spectacle of himself, Senator McNaboe denounced the state campaign against syphilis on the ground that "the innocence of little children" would be corrupted by the use of the word—evidently a worse fate than having their health corrupted by the disease itself. In the lower house Republican Assemblyman Hamilton attacked the bill to establish a state labor-relations board. His colleagues on both sides of the aisle gave him a five-minute ovation for what the Speaker described as "the most brilliant speech I have ever heard," and then promptly voted for the bill 100 to 41. These examples are some indication of the sincere and serious manner in which our legislators go about the business of government. As for the record of the four months' session, it was only under unwearying pressure from the Governor that the legislature passed his social-security and relief programs and the minimum-wage law for women and children. To restore their sense of independence the legislators then killed the child-labor amendment and the teachers'-oath repeal and passed the noxious Berg election bills, which would now be law but for the Governor's veto.

★

FRANCO HAS LEARNED MANY THINGS FROM his Fascist mentors, but he has not yet learned to lie on the grand scale to which Mussolini and Hitler have accustomed us. Franco is still a stumbling, unconvincing liar. When the German airmen bombed Guernica, killed 800 Basque Catholic civilians, and burned a large part of the city, the whole non-Fascist world reacted against the atrocity. Franco's spokesman accordingly announced that Guernica could not have been bombed because on that day it rained and no rebel planes took the air; the destruction had been caused by ravaging Basque Anarchists. But evidence accumulated. The Fascists then said that Guernica had, to be sure, been bombed for a few hours but that no incendiary bombs were used. Yet even correspondents who visited Guernica under the auspices of Franco's press department reported the effects of incendiary bombs. Finally Ambassador von Ribbentrop gave the show away by insisting before the Non-Intervention Committee—in answer to protests against the horror—that unfortified cities must occasionally be bombed. But the German press still denies that Guernica was attacked from the air. It acts in accordance with the idea enunciated by Hitler in "Mein Kampf" as a "very correct principle" that "the broad masses of a nation . . . become the victim of a big lie much more easily than of a small one because they themselves occasionally lie in small matters but would be too ashamed to tell big lies." The trouble is that to carry out such a rule, one must have an expert lie-coordinator like Goebbels. That is now one of Franco's greatest needs.

★

HARVARD AND COLUMBIA HAVE NOW BOTH explicitly declined the invitation to send delegates to the 200th anniversary celebration of Göttingen University. Internal pressure undoubtedly forced them to take this welcome stand. Harvard, in particular, tried desperately to sidestep the issue, and we have it on excellent authority that it refused only after President Conant was overruled by the Harvard Corporation. The letter to Göttingen was signed by Jerome D. Greene, secretary of the corporation, and not by Conant. But neither in this letter nor in Columbia's message to Göttingen did the American universities openly state the reason for their refusal. President Butler implied it when he spoke of the "freedom of thought" and "absence of race and religious prejudice and persecution" of the "old Germany" and hoped for their return. Harvard rested with a vague reference to "these troubled times." The German public will doubtless read only the praise of Göttingen's past and the hopes for its future contained in the letters. But the American public will note progress. For it was just a year ago that both Harvard and Columbia sent representatives to the Heidelberg celebration.

THE MEMBERS OF THE JUNIOR LEAGUE Association resemble the lilies of the field in that they toil not neither do they spin. But it has become fashionable to justify one's existence—especially if it is upper-middle-class, female, and a bit boring—and the woods are full of smartly dressed young women tracking sociological game. It was inevitable, of course, that they should encounter Issues, and the Junior Leaguers are even now about to consider, in convention assembled, how to dispose of the thorny issue of birth control. Here is one field in which they might really be useful. By helping to spread the knowledge and encourage the use of birth control they might lighten the burden of women less fortunate than themselves. Instead, there is a strong possibility that the convention will amend the by-laws so as to prevent individual leagues from taking part in any community enterprise pertaining to birth control, though, presumably, members may continue to do their bit as individuals. The amendment was suggested out of deference to the Roman Catholic members of the association. There is no suggestion, of course, that the members of the Junior League will deny themselves the privilege of limiting their families. That would cut down the time they would have to spend going to meetings to vote on amendments forbidding their organization to promote the intelligent use of birth control by those to whom it might mean economic and physical health!

★

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT HAS OFFICIALLY asked Congress to make permanent the Civilian Conservation Corps with a personnel of 300,000 young men and war veterans, 10,000 Indians, and 5,000 youths in our territorial and insular possessions. It should be permanent—at least for the duration of unemployment—for it is indubitably one of the best of the relief agencies set up under the New Deal. But we sincerely hope that Congress will not vote the authority asked without stipulating that the CCC be separated from the War Department. It belongs in the Department of the Interior. As we understand it, the army was called in because of the needed haste in organization and because Congress thought that savings could be made by using regular-army and marine-corps officers not otherwise employed. But the bulk of the officers on duty at the camps now are reserve officers who, if they need jobs, could be given the same appointments under the Interior Department. Another important reason why the CCC should be taken from the army is that the army has deliberately sought to censor the reading matter sent to the camps, banning, for example, the publication called Champion of Youth because General A. J. Bowley believes that the publication has contained "propaganda intended to promote disloyalty." This has brought a vigorous protest from the publication in question, the American Youth Congress, the American Student Union, the Youth Protective Committee, and other organizations, and the Commissioner of Education has properly denounced another publication which editorially incited to violence against the editors of the Champion of Youth.

Uprising in Catalonia

QUIET has been reestablished in Catalonia. Last week Anarchist irreconcilables supported by the P.O.U.M. staged a little civil war within the Spanish civil war by attacking the Loyalist government. Several hundred were killed and several hundred wounded in the fighting. The dissidents could not have done a better job in Franco's behalf had Hitler and Mussolini paid them.

A strong wing of the Anarchist movement cooperates with the Valencia government and is represented in the Caballero Popular Front Cabinet by four ministers. But a not-negligible fraction of the Anarchists has refused to cooperate. In Catalonia they had piled up huge armaments consisting not merely of rifles but of hand-grenades, machine-guns, cannons, and tanks. Under their influence Catalonia printed its own currency, expropriated large sums from the Bank of Spain, and ignored or interfered with the customs regulations of the federal government. The factories in Barcelona, many of them operated by autonomous workers' committees, have contributed little to the munitions supply. Agrarian collectivization in Catalonia has been forced by the Anarchists in many cases against the armed resistance of the peasants. Anarchist units on the front voted democratically on whether they would obey orders and fight. Frequently their decision was in the negative. Certain Anarchist regiments have become so demoralized that the government has been forced to withdraw them to the rear.

Ever since November, as the Valencia government's hand has grown stronger, it has more and more interfered with the acts of the intransigent Anarchist elements. Things came to a head in Catalonia. There the dissident Anarchists and the P.O.U.M.—including its Trotskyist wing—had created the utmost tension because of their efforts to force collectivization and because many arms shipments sent by Valencia to the Aragon front found their way into private supply depots in Barcelona. Valencia, accordingly, issued an order that all military equipment should either be forwarded to the front or surrendered. The two groups balked and took to the barricades.

The suppression of the rising was accomplished by force but also by an impressive appeal to the fighting workers by leaders of various left factions, including several Anarchist leaders in Barcelona. Juan Garcia Oliver, Anarchist Minister of Justice in the Valencia government, came to Barcelona and delivered a passionate radio address urging both sides to stop fighting each other and join in the common defense of the republic. The uprising has already had one wholesome effect. It has forced a new unity in Catalonia itself and has drawn that aggressively independent province more directly under the authority of the central government. Without the unity represented in the Popular Front, the Loyalists must lose. All degrees and forms of social control must be made subordinate to the successful defense of the republic. What good are farm collectives if Franco wins?

Who Should Pay Taxes?

EACH week that passes makes it increasingly clear that the federal budget cannot be balanced without a substantial increase in taxation. Despite talk of a 10 to 15 per cent horizontal cut in expenditures, not much is likely to be achieved in the direction of economy. Many of the regular government departments are already understaffed and overburdened with work, and their activities could not be reduced without a serious loss to the country as a whole. The House showed that it was little disposed to curtail military expenditures when it passed the record $416,000,000 appropriation for the War Department without economizing by a single penny. If a cut is to be made in the budget estimates, it is almost certain to be in the field of relief. But even here the danger is not so much that the tories will succeed in reducing the amount below the $1,500,000,000 proposed by the President as that the economy agitation will prevent the increase which—as Congressmen Voorhis and Maverick point out elsewhere in this issue—is desperately needed.

Meanwhile, there are a number of bills, such as the Wagner housing bill, the farm-tenancy bill, and the appropriation for the Public Health Service, which ought not to be sidetracked. It is almost a foregone conclusion that government expenditures will run several hundred million dollars higher than the President's estimate, and between half a billion and a billion above probable revenues. Sooner or later this gap will have to be closed by increased taxation; the only questions are when the action should be taken and what group should foot the bill.

While the primary aim of a tax is to raise money, the yield is not the only thing to be considered. Some of the most productive forms of taxation, such as the sales tax and the pay-roll levy, are undesirable because of their complexity or because they fall almost exclusively on the groups which are least able to bear the burden. Others, such as the excess-profits tax, may, if badly drafted, impede legitimate business activity or unduly discourage savings. Customs duties and excise taxes not only fall primarily on the masses but have the further fault of being easily concealed.

Income, inheritance, and gift levies, and the corporation tax are left us as the most promising sources of new revenue. Just how much additional money could be obtained from these sources without injury to the national economy is, of course, difficult to estimate. The limit of tax capacity depends not only on the manner in which the money is obtained but also on the way in which it is spent. If the tax money is utilized to supply the community with essential goods and services, the tax capacity will obviously be much higher than if the money is used on armaments or to curtail production, as under the AAA. Not much additional revenue can be derived from the income tax merely by increasing the surtax on high incomes. The American tax rates on incomes of over $100,000 are nearly as high as the British, and, as indicated in the recent Raskob investigation, so high that they encourage evasion. But on incomes between the broad middle brackets—from $4,000 to $75,000—the American rates tend to be much lower than those of other countries. The Twentieth Century Fund recently estimated that if the surtax on incomes in this range were stepped up to between 10 and 75 per cent it would be possible to increase revenues, on the basis of 1928 incomes, by nearly two and a half billion dollars. An additional sum, running up to nearly a billion dollars, could be obtained through an increase in the estate tax.

Although all the revenue that would conceivably be needed in peace time could be obtained from these two sources, many tax experts have also recommended a reduction in present income-tax exemptions on the ground that it is desirable to make a much larger section of the population "tax conscious." At present less than 5 per cent of our adult population pays income taxes. If the exemptions were reduced from $2,500 for married couples, $1,000 for single persons, and $400 for children to $1,000, $500, and $200 respectively, nearly half the adults in the country would be compelled to share in this levy. Naturally this would lead to a substantial increase in revenues, though it would be partially offset by a tremendous increase in the cost of collection.

Faced with a choice between a reduction in the income-tax exemption and any of the regressive taxes enumerated above, we should of course favor the change in the income levy. But since $2,500 is close to the minimum on which it is possible to support a family in comfort and decency, a reduction in the exemption seems socially unjustifiable except, possibly, in a national emergency. It is not necessary for revenue purposes. In 1929 no less than half the national income went to the 12½ per cent of the population earning $4,000 or more. A large proportion of the government's expenditures are devoted either to maintaining a system under which such incomes are possible, or to an even more direct protection of property. Is there any sound reason why well-to-do Americans should not be willing to pay at least as much for the privilege of living in this country as Britishers do for living in theirs?

Relief for Franco

MICHAEL WILLIAMS, editor of the Catholic magazine the Commonweal, chose an appropriate moment to issue a Spanish Relief Number, in which he charged that the American press had been unfair to the rebels. The smoking ruins of Guernica had scarcely cooled; the British and French governments were preparing to evacuate from Bilbao—against the protests of Franco—thousands of Spanish Catholic women and children to save them from the fate that befell the innocents of the "sacred city." And now Mr. Williams has joined forces with the American Committee for Spanish Relief in what appears to be a new drive to arouse sympathy for the rebel cause. Mr. Williams has become general secretary of this committee, whose name is suspiciously similar to that of the North American Committee and whose treasurer is Ogden H. Hammond, fascist sympathizer and former Ambassador to Spain. Together with the Commonweal and the Calvert Associates, this committee is sponsoring a meeting to be held at Madison Square Garden at which "the truth about Spain" (including Guernica?) will be revealed and a drive begun for $500,000 for "non-partisan," "non-political" relief in insurgent territory.

Since Mr. Williams's Open Letter to Leaders of the American Press seems to presage an intensive pro-Franco campaign in this country, the main thesis of his attack upon the regime which the United States still recognizes as the legally constituted government of Spain is worth examining. Mr. Williams obviously gagged at supporting unreservedly Franco and fascism. He must needs find a formula—and it is the same old formula. Franco's rebellion, he says, broke out just ahead of the "mass-massacre revolution carefully planned by the reds." His authority? "The Salamanca government claims to possess evidence of this plot. . . . This evidence has satisfied many careful European correspondents, military men, and observers who visited Salamanca. . . ." No names are given. "It is confirmed by an American witness of unimpeachable experience and integrity as a journalist, whom I hold in reserve." Surely the only reason for holding such a witness in reserve at such a time on such an issue is that his name might turn out to be William P. Carney.

"Perhaps," admits Mr. Williams, "this evidence is not conclusive. Possibly it may be faked. . . . We can remember Mr. Hearst's fake Mexican 'documents' . . . and the Zinoviev letter." He does not mention the Reichstag fire. But Mr. Williams, far from being disturbed by his own doubts, calls upon the American press to prove that his thesis is not correct! Meanwhile he makes it clear that he does not intend to wait for the verdict. After struggling through heavy editorial seas he has dropped anchor in the harbor of the committee, whose treasurer has no qualms. "I, personally, as everybody knows," says Ogden Hammond, "am in favor of General Francisco Franco."

That is just the trouble with the American Committee, which professes to be non-partisan. Mr. Hammond, according to his own admission, has been raising money for Franco. Basil Harris, its chairman, was a sponsor of the Hilaire Belloc meeting at Carnegie Hall at which $5,000 was raised for Franco. Another associate is former Spanish Ambassador Cárdenas, who has been accused by Senator Nye of participating in pro-fascist espionage in the United States.

On another page of this issue an experienced journalist whose name we do not "hold in reserve" pretty well demonstrates that it is Franco who is planning—and carrying out—"mass massacre" of Spaniards. There can be no objection to truly non-partisan projects for the relief of noncombatants in both loyalist and insurgent territory. The American Friends' Service Committee is sponsoring such a project and is thoroughly trustworthy. But any "non-partisan," "non-political" campaign that is coupled with such pro-Franco propaganda as Mr. Williams and Mr. Hammond are dispensing should be denied support by every American worthy of the name.

WASHINGTON WEEKLY

BY PAUL W. WARD

Washington, May 9
DID you know that your government, which through the Post Office Department, the Food and Drug Administration, and the SEC attempts to keep you out of the clutches of various types of knaves and thieves, also maintains an agency engaged in standardizing and licensing fraud? Let me introduce the Federal Trade Commission and then go on to tell you something of what has become of this agency which Woodrow Wilson wished upon the nation in 1914.

The particular section of the FTC that is engaged in standardizing and licensing fraud is its Special Board of Investigation, established in 1929. The board is made up of three commission attorneys under the direction of E. J. Adams; Ewin L. Davis, a Roosevelt appointee and former Democratic Congressman from Tennessee, is the commissioner who has supervision of its operations. His colleagues on the commission are concerned with other matters. The present chairman, William A. Ayres, a Roosevelt appointee and former Democratic Congressman from Kansas, has charge of the commission's administrative division. Charles H. March, a Minnesota lawyer and Republican politician appointed to the commission by Coolidge, has charge of the chief examiner's division. Garland S. Ferguson, Jr., a North Carolina lawyer and Democrat appointed by Coolidge and reappointed by Roosevelt, has charge of the chief trial examiner's division and the trade-practice agreements section. Robert E. Freer, a Cincinnati lawyer and Republican formerly with the Interstate Commerce Commission and later with the Federal Coordinator of Transportation, has charge of the economic division. A Roosevelt appointee, he appears to be the only commissioner of genuine competence. Davis, one of the least competent, has charge not only of the Special Board of Investigation but also of another key unit, the chief counsel's division.

It is fair to skip over all the other divisions and concentrate attention on the Special Board of Investigation. The spirit of the whole commission is admirably illustrated in the operations of the Special Board, and it is the nerve center of the commission's fight to see that any new food-and-drug legislation contains a provision reserving control of advertising to the commission and keeping it away from the Food and Drug Administration.

The help the FTC has extended to flimflam artists is of two sorts—formal and informal. The informal type comprises the maintenance of a kind of tipster service for the latter-day medicine men. Other federal agencies, proceeding against these quacks, find when they come to grips with them that their own and the public's foes have been forewarned and prepared for the combat. The quacks show a strange familiarity with the details of the case which the government agency has built up against them, and are prepared to obfuscate, if not meet, each point in it. Then, there are the testimonials. In an astonishing number of cases nostrum makers pluck out of their files and slap down before the examiners testimonials received from one or more of the men to whom the FTC has intrusted the job of checking up on just such "cures."

The prize case, it seems to me, is the one involving Daggett and Ramsdell's cold cream. This unguent is supposed to contain colloidal gold, and this, in turn, is supposed to make it superior to any other cold cream. You might surmise that claims of that sort would interest the Special Board of Investigation. They did, but not in the way you'd expect. On the morning of May 28, 1936, virtually all the top chemists and physiologists in the government departments were invited to a meeting sponsored by the Special Board of Investigation, there to hear a Dr. F. S. Macy lecture on colloidal chemistry. It turned out to be a lecture on the wonderful properties of colloidal gold when used in face creams. I am assured by some of the scientists who attended that Dr. Macy was able to tell them a great many things about colloidal chemistry that they did not know—and do not know today. It seems, according to a transcript of Dr. Macy's address, that colloidal gold has a remarkable relationship to feminine beauty; its molecules burrow right down into the skin and dig and dig. They dig up all the dirt under the skin and deposit it on the surface where it can be wiped right off. But before hoisting a bit of dirt up to the epidermis they carefully wipe all the little germs off it. Dr. Macy didn't put it quite that way, of course; he said colloidal gold had no "germicidal" effect. He was quite careful about it, too. If it had a germicidal effect, or claimed to have, the cold creams containing it might be subject to regulation by the Food and Drug Administration. Dr. Macy's clients preferred to stay with their hosts, the Special Board of Investigation, whose chief, Mr. Adams, gave the doctor an effusive introduction in the course of which he not only said that Dr. Macy "is reported to be better acquainted with the subject of colloids in medicine than anyone else in this country," but that Dr. Macy had "anticipated the discovery of insulin by about three years." The Mr. Adams who uttered these phrases is the gent, dear public, whom the FTC has placed in charge of passing on the scientific claims of nostrum makers.

The formal type of aid given to quacks is no less interesting, for it is in this branch of its work that the commission gets right down to the business of licensing fraud. The feat is performed by summoning the manufacturer of some nostrum before the Special Board of Investigation, letting his witch doctors pour into the ears of the examiners a flood of mumbo-jumbo in justification of his advertising claims, and then entering into what is called a stipulation but in reality is license for the quack to go on duping the public. In these stipulations the advertiser in most cases does not promise to cease claiming that his bread pills will cure stomach ulcers; he merely promises to be more careful, more subtly insinuating, in the way he words his claims. The FTC, in turn, suggests the words and phrases he thereafter may use without fear of prosecution. And should the gentleman at some later date be dragged into court on a fraud charge, he has ready to hand a potent defense in this stipulation.

When the Post Office Department's fraud division a few years ago moved against Vreeland's Hair Herbs, which represented itself as a cure for baldness, it found the manufacturer equipped with one of these FTC stipulations which permitted him to go on making his claims if he took care to insert a note that his product worked if the hair roots were not dead. Last month the FTC issued to H. Will Elders a permit to go on representing his "Filled Prescription for Women" as a treatment for sterility provided that he limited his representations to "cases of sterility due to functional weaknesses." Others have been licensed to advertise cures for rheumatism due to "uric acid" and cures for stomach ulcers due to "hyperacidity."

It is important to note that the existence of these stipulations hampers the other federal agencies. The Post Office Department's very efficient and conscientious fraud-order division often encounters difficulties in obtaining copies of FTC stipulations involving shysters against whom it is proceeding. Mr. Adams and his colleagues take the position that these stipulations are secret arrangements between the FTC and the permit recipients. Their stand is the more amazing because of the fact that their right to issue these stipulations is far from unquestionable; in fact it actually has been questioned by the Supreme Court in a decision written by Justice Sutherland and handed down against the FTC in May, 1931. This was a case in which the makers of Marmola tablets, a reducing compound, after being driven out of the mail-order business by the Post Office, began under the name of the Raladam Company to sell the same tablets through retail stores aided by national advertising. The FTC entered the picture at this point and went after the Raladam Company, seeking to censor its advertising not on the ground that its claims were a fraud upon the consumer but on the ground that they represented unfair competition with other nostrum manufacturers operating in interstate commerce. Justice Sutherland, denying the FTC jurisdiction, opined that Congress never had intended to set up the FTC for the purpose of "preserving the business of one knave from the unfair competition of another."

General Franco's Death List

BY GEORGE SELDES

Madrid, by mail, uncensored

TEN days after he started his rebellion General Francisco Franco told a representative of the London News Chronicle that he would shoot every other Spaniard if necessary in order to attain his goal. At the time of the massacre of the workmen of Badajoz, Lieutenant Colonel Yague gave a statement to the official German press bureau in which he said: "The reason we are progressing so slowly with the conquest of Spain is that we have to clean out the red elements." Over the official Seville radio, General Queipo de Llano made the following declarations during August, 1936:

August 12. The Marxists are raging beasts; we, however, are gentlemen [caballeros].

August 18. I wish to announce that I have taken as hostages a large number of relatives of the Madrid criminals, who will be held responsible with their lives for our friends in the capital.

August 19. We will continue our work until the end, until there is not a Marxist left in Spain.

American journalists who have returned from Franco's territory say that the Fascists actually intend to murder all those labor elements whom they call Marxist. By this definition at least 2,000,000 Spaniards are eligible for death at Franco's hands.

Sensational as these statements appear, they cannot be dismissed as propaganda designed to weaken the morale of the government and of the unions which support it. Instead, the record of Franco's troops in every city and village they have taken, from Badajoz to Malaga, bears out the threats. The capture of every town has been followed by the slaughter of the intelligent workers as distinguished from the unorganized and illiterate peasants.

The deliberate killing in 1934 of 5,000 Asturian miners by the same generals now fighting the working people of Spain turns out to have been a dress rehearsal for a campaign which has for one of its objectives the elimination of one whole stratum of society. Of the 1,000,000 men estimated to have given their lives in the present civil war, 500,000 are said to have been victims of massacre. No one will ever know how many persons were killed in the first days of the uprising. But it is a fact that the government has been on the defensive, that it has not moved into new territories, and that therefore it cannot be accused of such atrocities as the Fascists have committed all along their march. The government, it is true, has had to fight Fascists at home. An American journalist in Valencia claims to have seen the execution of several batches of Fascists. But I know from actual experience that there are Fascists actively working for Franco in Madrid and in Valencia—some of them are foreign journalists—who are entitled by all the rules of espionage and treason in war time to face a firing squad. The government has fought active Fascist enemies within its ranks. It does not arrest, try, and execute inactive pro-Fascists. On the other hand I have absolute proof that the Fascists have shot at sight persons who wore working-men's overalls, and have condemned men to death for no other reason than membership in a labor union.

Ever since the massacre of Badajoz all labor-union members as well as leaders, in fact all persons who by word or deed have ever supported the republic, have left any town or city before the enemy captured it; nevertheless there are official records from Franco's side of mass arrests and executions of those left behind. The reason a British warship put into Malaga was not to felicitate the Italians who had captured the seaport, as the pro-Fascist British press reported, but to set up a moral barrier against a repetition of the usual massacre of workingmen by Franco's troops.

Three days before the fall of Malaga, Cecil Murray, son of Professor Gilbert Murray, noted scholar and leading member of the British Friends of Spanish Democracy, returned from the seaport with alarming reports. He was sure the Fascists would enter and murder civilians as well as thousands of militiamen and trade-union and syndicate members. However, he had been assured by British consular officials that a British warship would be on hand for its moral effect, and that British marines would be landed if necessary to prevent the massacre.

The government forces were able to withdraw from Malaga—only 200 militiamen were trapped—and as the world knows, almost the entire able-bodied population took to the road rather than face Franco's terror. The bombing of this unarmed procession of refugees by Italian airplanes—they were also shelled by rebel and Italian warships—is another proved atrocity whose full horror cannot be described. But it is a fact that every labor leader, everyone active in any union as well as everyone in uniform, knew he would be murdered and therefore fled. Those left behind were women, children, old men, and a minority of the population which had no political affiliations and therefore no fear of being arrested by Franco. In addition there was, of course, the secret pro-Fascist group, including the leading American and British citizens, whose financial interests had been injured by the nationalization of property. The next day reports from the rebel side mentioned between 5,000 and 8,000 as the number of persons arrested and held for trial for "treason." British journalists believe that these thousands would have been executed at once if the British warships had not appeared in the harbor.

Franco's readiness to kill 2,000,000 persons if necessary to make Spain safe for fascism was quite visible in every town on the way to Malaga. The following reports come from journalists on the Franco side:

Marbella was taken by Italian infantry supported by two ships, the rebel España and the Italian "volunteer" Giovanni di Varazzano. The brave warships shelled the defenseless civilians. The government troops, 4,000 men and boys, many without any training, retired at nightfall, and many thousand Italian troops under Italian officers, plus the Phalangistas, or the original Spanish Fascist legion of the days before the war, rode into town in trucks. That night the work of "restoring Spain to the Spaniards," the Franco-Moorish slogan, began in the streets of Marbella and was witnessed by those journalists on Franco's side who were able to make their way into the town ahead of the official journalistic caravan.

The Phalangistas divided into squads and went from house to house in every street. They knocked on doors and demanded a voluntary gift of 1,000 pesetas for the glory of the "national" arms. Their object in asking was twofold: the gift would not only help the war chest but prove that the donor was rich and therefore a likely Fascist. "Gifts" of 500 pesetas were accepted, but with bad humor, and those who gave even 300 or 400 pesetas were not arrested. But those who could not give money, those who honestly pleaded poverty, men and women alike, were immediately denounced as "Marxists," segregated, thrown violently into trucks, and taken away. There is no clear proof as yet that these 900 workingmen and women of Marbella have been murdered. But they have disappeared, "and will never be seen or heard of again," according to a journalist who was there.

The next morning the Fascists found that some 200 republican militiamen—volunteers who had been civilians only a few weeks before—had been cut off from the main body. They had been fighting twenty hours, were exhausted and surrounded but still fighting when the Fascists told them their lives would be spared and they would be treated as prisoners of war if they stopped. They surrendered on the understanding that they would be delivered to the headquarters of the Italian motorized column at Antequera.

The Italian soldiers, it must be stated, treated the 200 prisoners decently. They gave them bread and cigarettes; they even bound the wounds of many and told them they were brave opponents. Shortly afterward, two officers, a Spanish Fascist and an Italian Fascist, inspected the prisoners. They then went to the Italian command and asked that the militiamen be surrendered to them because they were not prisoners of war. "They are not soldiers. They are not dressed in uniform." (Of the million men who have volunteered for the Spanish Republic, of the tens of thousands who are in the trenches, not one whom I have seen or heard of has a complete uniform. The reader must not forget that Franco took nine-tenths of the army with him, that it is the people who compose the republican army, and that the people wear their working clothes.) The Italian command refused to deliver the prisoners. The Spanish rebel officer left in a rage, then returned with official documents with purple hand-stamps, which the Italians could not refuse to honor.

The journalists were not permitted entrance to the "trial." The 200 militiamen were accused of being "civilian spies" and ordered shot. The trial lasted from 8:10 a. m. to 8:20. The journalists heard the machine-gun shooting begin at exactly 8:20. Two guns were used. At 8:24 there was silence. The 200 soldiers were dead. Does the reader consider this an atrocity or an act of war?

The number of workmen massacred by the Fascists in the first days of the rebellion is estimated at 50,000. Again I quote no pro-government reports, but pro-rebel journalists or journals. Thus Wormser and Maurel of the pro-Franco Paris Soir, who were in Seville on July 20, declare that the order was given to "clean up the workers' section with hand grenades and knives. . . . By order of General Queipo de Llano all houses in the workmen's sections of Triana had to keep open doors and windows, through which the men were dragged to prison. The next morning 150 were shot; the third day a similar hecatomb. . . ."

In Granada a bridge expert connected with the New York Herald Tribune reported the systematic execution of workingmen. The total killed there is now placed at 5,000 in a report of the Madrid Law College, whose president is Eduardo Ortega y Gasset. Gerald Grosvenor reported from Majorca to the London News Chronicle that the Italian and Spanish Fascist officers began the reign of terror there by executing 1,500 workingmen.

The list can be continued until the number of dead runs into the hundreds of thousands. Even if exaggerations and false reports are taken into consideration, two things are evident: (1) the Fascists deliberately murder all labor-union men and cover their atrocities by appealing to the Christian world to sanction their action against "reds"; (2) Franco is well started on his campaign to slaughter the 2,000,000.

Don't Sell Out Prosperity

BY JERRY VOORHIS AND MAURY MAVERICK

Washington, D. C., May 4

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S message asking that relief be cut to a billion and a half broke like a thunderclap over Congress. In comparison with the preceding year's outlay on WPA, PWA, and Resettlement, it meant a drastic cut.

Immediately it set the birds of spending flying high and low. A group of Congressmen sometimes referred to as the "liberal bloc" said the amount should be two and a half billion, since there are still over eight million unemployed. This figure, on the basis of past expenditures, seems about right. Other suggestions went as high as four billion dollars. But many persons said the President wanted far too much. Some of the low fliers said a half-billion more should be lopped off, leaving a billion. Some even said relief should be eliminated altogether. At any rate, the economy drums are beating and roaring, and the cut-to-the-bone boys are admittedly way out in front.

So what? If an armistice were declared and the thing discussed calmly, everyone would have to admit that nobody knows with any great accuracy what amount ought to be appropriated. But there is no armistice; and the economy boys, if you ask them, say, "If the money gives out, we can get a deficiency appropriation." Shut your eyes, and wait and see.

But why not look reality in the face for once? There is only one sensible course. There should be a permanent department of government—call it Social Welfare or Government Works, or what you will, just so it's permanent—that would function as a national building agency. There should also be a comprehensive unemployment survey, and not just one, but a system that would provide a running record day by day. Until we have such a system we are boxing in the dark with the ghost of unemployment.

We know that several million of the persons now unemployed will remain unemployed for years to come —barring, of course, some fundamental change in our economic system. Hence, whatever Congress does with regard to the unemployed is going to determine the permanent lot in life of several million families. Even viewing the problem as a temporary one, if the present plan of reduction goes through, the amount appropriated will still be entirely insufficient. The WPA has done a good job in meeting an emergency situation, but for the long run, for the permanent policies of the future, we have done practically nothing at all. For that we need a faith, a philosophy, and definite information.

Everybody should know that if America increased by 10 per cent its available fertile soils, the number of its decent habitable homes, the quantity of its preserved food, the capacity of its power plants to develop electric energy, the acreage of its forests, the effectiveness of its educational and cultural facilities—everybody should know that if this happened America would be richer by approximately 10 per cent than it was before. But some of us still have the ridiculous idea that we shall go broke by increasing the national wealth, or by hiring people to build up the national wealth.

We know that no nation on earth has ever maintained itself as a strong and vigorous people if it condemned any considerable number of its people to become an outcast group. Yet we are in danger of doing this very thing today. And we know also that no modern nation has escaped the necessity of facing in some way—honest or dishonest—the problem of its unemployed. Japan has dealt with it by cutting wages to the point where it could undersell the world. Britain has adopted a general dole. Hitler has put his unemployed into compulsory work camps where they get no wages at all. Mussolini has carried on two wars to prevent people from discovering they were unemployed. Russia has gone Communist—or something. In America we have got to decide now whether we are going to face this problem and solve it or whether we are just going to wish the unemployed had gone back to work—and bring on another depression by cutting off their buying power.

A constructive approach to this problem assumes that the nation will require that the work done by the unemployed on a government program shall be of such character as to yield a dollar's value for every dollar spent. We need, in other words, to knock in the head the idea that the rest of the nation is supporting the unemployed, and to arrange the program so that the unemployed will be clearly supporting themselves and adding to the sum total of national well-being.

We must face, in this picture, the problem of the very young and of those over forty-five. Men over forty-five must be given the opportunity to earn a living and not thrown on the human junk pile. Also, the requirements that one must be "on relief" in order to get work on government projects must be eliminated altogether. It has destroyed morale and prevented the hiring of many of the best workmen among the unemployed, those who, though out of jobs, have managed to stay off relief.

Necessary work should be done. Flood control. Our soils; they are washing and blowing away. Our homes; we need new homes by the tens of thousands, by the hundreds of thousands. And since the TVA has opened our eyes to what cheap electricity will do in raising the standard of living of the people, let us have more TVA's. We need to take surplus crops from our farmers and process them, so that we can preserve the health of the children, at least, of families on relief. We need to plant trees to preserve our watersheds. We need many thousand more school teachers in our schools—not away from them—and better school buildings. And these are jobs that private industry cannot do. We must conceive it as a national duty to guarantee the unemployed the right to work and earn a living; and as a national right to use the labor and the capacities of the unemployed in accomplishing necessary national tasks.

People say, "Feed 'em, it's cheaper." But the answer is that all the permanently necessary things can be accomplished by able-bodied men doing self-respecting work. And as for "feedin' 'em," that is about as sensible as if a rich farmer had his workers lie around and do nothing at half-wages instead of having them make a crop for him at full wages.

As we have said, there should be a permanent department of the government to handle the situation. All public works should be cleared through this department. The public-works program should be run like any other business. People should be hired who can do the job well—and strictly on condition that there is no private job available for them. The program should, of course, be expanded only to the extent that it puts to work the people that private industry can't use. When private industry actually begins to hire them, government work should be cut down. Moreover, men and women should be able to leave government jobs to take temporary private employment without giving up their right to get back on a public-works job after the private work has ended.

Wages should be worked out on the basis of security of annual income. This is even more important than the payment of prevailing hourly wages. People's standards of living are determined not by what they make in an hour but by what they make in a year.

But now we hear the curbstone economist speaking: "Well, now, aren't you forgetting that the unemployed are a burden on society? Aren't you overlooking the fact that if one man does some work there will be that much less work for someone else to do? It's so expensive to put our unemployed people to work. Good Lord! we have to balance the budget. We have to save money. This thing can't go on. It's got to stop sometime!"

No, we haven't forgotten. And further, we believe America's greatest and most tragic mistake has been its fixed idea that just as soon as we get started producing and consuming a little more than we did before, it's got to stop. True, "we've had depressions before!" Indeed yes. It's our all-American bad habit.

In the past few years the government has borrowed much of its own credit from people who didn't have it. The banks' total assets amounted to seven billion dollars. The United States government "borrowed" eighteen billion from the banks by the sale of bonds! Worse yet, the bonds sold to effect this borrowing were tax-exempt. Then we took the credit which these banks advanced and hired unemployed people to add to the wealth of America. But before we got the wealth we had given away title to it to the people who bought the bonds, and we had even promised not to tax that amount of wealth at all!

Cockeyed? Of course. What we should have done was to extend the credit of our government directly so long as, and on condition that, those in charge of our public-works program faithfully saw to it that for every dollar of credit advanced, a dollar's worth of new wealth should come into existence, or a dollar's worth of new valuable service. And so long as such an expansion of credit was matched by a corresponding increase in production, no inflation could result.

The price America must pay for maintaining a system of free economic enterprise is the cost of security for those whom industry will not, and perhaps cannot, employ. We have introduced a bill asking for $2,520,000,000 for the next year and the employment of 3,000,000 people—about one out of every two and one-half or three of the unemployed. A revision of our taxes could, in our opinion, raise this amount and keep the budget in balance. We believe many projects, such as housing, power development, flood control, and the like, can be made self-liquidating—at least in part.

No budget is or ever will be balanced unless it includes an adequate appropriation to enable able-bodied unemployed people to work and earn a living and make their contribution to a new and better nation. Economy is right. Thrift is right. But if every unemployed man were put to work at something necessary to the national welfare, we should be practicing better economy and thrift than by letting men go hungry and the country go to waste. Why throw a half-million able-bodied Americans back into the soup lines?

Hoffman of New Jersey

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

I. How to Become a Governor

The sitdown strike is a symbol of communism which I suppose is all right if you want communism. I don't. The sitdown strike has as its basic principle a deliberate disregard for what we have always regarded as hallowed property rights, and it is inevitably followed by contempt for honorable judicial procedure.—Statement of the Honorable Harold G. Hoffman, Governor of New Jersey, in a letter to Mrs. Leonard H. Robbins, president of the League of Women Voters of New Jersey.

IN ADDITION to its diversity of natural scenery, New Jersey has a bewildering variety of social, economic, and political views. Talk with the Manhattan-minded commuters of the northern counties, the industrial workers in the sprawling little towns behind the Palisades, the isolated farmers in the center of the state, the citizens of Camden, a Philadelphia workshop, and you realize how the conflicting interests of these groups divide the state. The bitter years of the depression have served only to intensify the arrogance of the wealthy and the resentment of the under-privileged. The leaders in both camps have now come out into the open with their challenges. John L. Lewis and his Committee for Industrial Organization appeal to the hard-driven workers to form mass unions against the solid front of Jersey bosses. The bosses fling back the challenge through their dependable spokesman Harold Giles Hoffman, who threatens to use "the entire resources of the state" against the C. I. O.

About the first of this year the more progressive forces in New Jersey labor began a series of informal meetings looking toward some sort of alliance with the onrushing forces of the C. I. O. Governor Hoffman paid little attention to them. He had troubles of his own with a legislature in which the lower house was Democratic and in which political enemies of his own party—Senator Lester Clee, for example—were playing important roles. He had too the amazing sequel to the Bruno Hauptmann case, the trials of the kidnappers of Paul Wendel, to worry about. Then one day he came upon a circular which was being distributed among workers in the wire and steel works at Trenton, headed "The President Wants You to Join." The circular described the functions of the National Labor Relations Board and said that the workers at General Electric had joined the United Electrical and Radio Workers, a C. I. O. affiliate. Hoffman promptly blew up and issued his now famous statement on labor organizations. Among other things he said: "A labor union has no more right to take possession of a factory than a band of gangsters has to take possession of a bank. . . . The avoidance of bloodshed is of course desirable but not at the expense of surrender to, or compromise with, or toleration of those guilty of such criminal acts." Front-page appearances of this statement were enough to weld the loosely held forces of a number of diversified unions into the North Jersey Council for Industrial Organization. Thanks to Hoffman's fist-shaking the C. I. O. had definitely arrived in Jersey.

The head of the council is hard-working Julius Emspak of the United Electrical and Radio Workers' Union. He was born in Schenectady, New York, thirty-two years ago, when the Socialists were strong in that city. Between jobs as a tool-maker he studied at Union College and Brown University and received an A. B. degree. The other officers are also in their early thirties. The vice-chairman is Murray Baron, an experienced organizer among the leather workers; the secretary is John Marchiondo of the United Rubber Workers. This new generation of Jersey laborites has none of the defeatist psychology of the veterans of the Paterson and Passaic strikes.

As soon as the council opened its Newark headquarters, it poured representatives of steel, automobile, and textile workers, of workers in the oil refineries and the utilities, of the rubber workers. Craft unionists came too, agreeing to pool their forces with the C. I. O. Vincent J. Murphy, secretary of the New Jersey Federation of Labor, said of Hoffman's warning: "A statement of this kind from any official in high public office must be construed as an attack upon all efforts to organize labor. We in New Jersey have always struggled to organize workers, and we are not going to be divided by any issue of this kind." The more Hoffman fulminated against the C. I. O. before Rotary clubs and over the radio, the more membership cards were signed, until finally it was suggested that the Governor be sent a testimonial from the council for his help in organization.

I first heard Harold Hoffman's name mentioned as a potential gubernatorial candidate five years ago on a mechanized farm near Princeton. A group of us representing utility consumers, on a trip to the legislature at Trenton, had stopped off to watch a herd of cows being milked by electricity. The cows came from their stables down a runway into a streamlined building, in the center of which was a huge revolving platform. As each cow emerged from the runway, she stepped briskly on the platform, thrust her head under a yoke, and was washed down and milked. And all was done with such amazing speed and efficiency that by the time the platform had swung the full circle, she was ready to depart through the exit runway, with her milk swishing in glass containers above her docile head.

It must have been the sight of these robotized animals, the rapidity with which the milk was extracted from their patient udders, that reminded us of the status of the average New Jersey voter, for presently we were all talking state politics. One of the party then said that he and other Young Republicans—official title for the left wing of the G. O. P.—were working for the nomination of Harold Hoffman, at that time a member of Congress and Motor Vehicle Commissioner of New Jersey. Hoffman, he said, would make a swell governor. He was young and energetic and had a fine war record. He had served the state well on the Military Affairs Committee of the House and was popular in the Motor Vehicle office. As New Jersey was then governed by the Honorable A. Harry Moore, Jersey City Democrat, with whom we had had dealings, we murmured politely that any change might be acceptable and let the matter drop. It seemed hardly possible that Frank Hague, boss of Jersey City, with his solid Democratic phalanxes in populous Hudson County, would let the governorship fall into the hands of the Republicans. We reckoned, however, without our Hoffman.

The square-rigged "Boy Captain," as he likes to be called, had, it seemed, an exceptionally pliable spring-board from which to make his sensational leap into the governor's chair. With the possible exception of Michigan, New Jersey is the most auto-conscious of our states. The chief topic of conversation wherever Jersey men gather is the motor vehicle. Moreover, one of the important industries of the Garden State is its highway business—road-houses, filling stations, dog-stands, clameries. On every concrete route that traverses Jersey, light-blue-coated state troopers whizz down upon the luckless drivers of cars carrying foreign license plates. At the center of all this automotive activity is the Trenton office of the Motor Vehicle Commissioner. There the largest department of the state government, with its agents in every community, handles more than $30,000,000 of public funds a year. And there Harold Hoffman found the lubrication for his political machine.

The happy official family at the Commissioner's office was often cheered by lunch and stag parties at which celebrities from radio and screen would entertain, donating their services, so they said, through sheer admiration for the colorful personality of the Boy Captain. There was a great deal of hand-pumping and back-slapping and singing of "He's a jolly good fellow." Beaming, the chief would rise amid the cigar smoke to congratulate his loyal subalterns on the fine jobs they did. Before long he was in demand as speaker before Lions, Moose, Elks, and other fraternal organizations. Four or five nights a week, throughout New Jersey and neighboring states, the voice of Hoffman could be heard enunciating the principles of stalwart Republicanism, with just enough youthful enthusiasm to persuade the Old Guard that here was the long-sought-for new leader who could rally the shaken forces of the state's G. O. P.

Quietly such Republican wheel-horses as Bernard L. Lamb, E. Donald Sterner, and George C. Warren, all of whom now have their rewards in the shape of state jobs, were building up Hoffman for Governor. Lamb got 3,000 signatures of influential party members in Bergen County to put the Commissioner's name on the 1934 primary lists. A few hours before the dead line for filing petitions there was a rush of leaders into the Commissioner's office. While the others pressed Hoffman to put up his name, Senator Emerson L. Richards, who thought he had the nomination in the bag, protested loudly that there had been an agreement that if Hoffman were returned as Motor Vehicle Commissioner he would not run for the governorship. Hoffman had been returned. What about that agreement? Grinning happily, Hoffman signed the petition and walked away with the nomination.

Then the Boy Captain began whirlwinding around the state to sell himself to the voters. He had for his opponent his predecessor in the Motor Vehicle office, Judge William Dill of Paterson, who, although an old friend of Frank Hague's, was a man of some principle. Judge Dill, however, was a poor in-fighter and preserved a certain dignified reticence during the campaign, in contrast to the candor with which Hoffman took the voters into the secret places of his heart.

Hoffman's chief campaign document was a pamphlet entitled "New Jersey's Favorite Son." This was a description of the life and activities of Harold Giles Hoffman from his birth in South Amboy on February 7, 1896, to the present. The first chapter was captioned simply A Genius Is Born. It described the birth of the genius in the delighted home of the Superintendent of the Raritan Railroad and his years at the public schools of his birthplace, until at the age of fourteen Harold became a "journalist." In this capacity he contributed neighborhood items to the Perth Amboy Evening News.

At the outbreak of the war, the pamphlet went on, the young man enlisted as a private in the Third New Jersey Infantry, went overseas with the Twenty-ninth Division, and after a rapid rise through the ranks was made a captain of the Headquarters Company of the 114th Infantry. Returning from the war, he was at once elected secretary-treasurer of the South Amboy Trust Company. Nowadays he refers to himself either as a journalist or as "a small-town banker."

Public life soon claimed him, and he left the bank to be elected a member of the state legislature and then mayor of his native town. Under the heading A Fighter Aroused, there is the story of how Hoffman fought the municipal water works in South Amboy. Then he became secretary to Governor Morgan F. Larson, was sent twice to Congress, and while still a Congressman, was made Motor Vehicle Commissioner.

The most engaging part of the pamphlet was a description of the candidate's home life. Under the heading The Happy Hoffman Family, voters in all parts of the state read about the "three charming little daughters in the Hoffman household." Their names, ages, and talents were dwelt upon in fond phrases. The section ended with the following tribute to Mrs. Hoffman: "Commissioner Hoffman doesn't think much of his wife's bridge but he is proud of her culinary accomplishments, and he is happiest, it is said, when he brings home friends, usually unannounced, to sample some of Mrs. Hoffman's famous dishes, with 'no speeches.' "

Against the sweetness and light of such publicity and the robustness of the Commissioner's campaigning, the dignified Dill, sticking closely to the Democratic platform, could make little headway. He had to trust to the popularity of Roosevelt and the efforts of Hague to elect him. And he trusted in vain. For while Governor Moore was elected United States Senator by a plurality of 231,488 votes on the Democratic ticket, Dill was defeated by Hoffman by a vote of 12,344. It was close running, but the Republican papers the country over rejoiced in this rare victory, and Hoffman's name was on G. O. P. lips as likely Presidential timber.

[Part II of this article will be printed next week.]

Harvard Starves the Social Sciences

BY ROBERT KEEN LAMB

ONCE more Harvard has fumbled the ball. Once more the university, in its dismissal of two liberal economics instructors, has exasperated its friends and delighted its critics by a clumsy substitution of one impracticable subterfuge for another. The ball has been passed from Economics Department to dean to president and back again in an effort to minimize the potential value to the university of its two most popular economics teachers, the only men in the department who have publicly shown sympathy for the labor movement. For once, the real reason for the university's awkwardness in its public relations is clear even to those on the outside. Harvard is trying to conceal from itself as well as from the public the disturbing fact that it is refusing the social sciences a chance to develop.

The responsibility falls first on President Conant. It is an open secret that he is not sympathetic with the social sciences in the university and is out of patience with the self-appointed advisers who have undertaken to steer him through the intricacies of current opinion in the field. He has recently deplored in public the tendency of the undergraduates to demand instruction in the social sciences instead of in philosophy and the classics.

The irony of this situation is likely to escape all but the most cynical. Harvard chooses an outstanding young scientist as its president, and the forward elements in American life acclaim him. Almost at once he sets about the task of immunizing the rest of the university against the dangerous students of society in their midst. In the sciences he is at home, and feels himself competent to form a judgment; in the arts he is resigned to taking advice from those who are acknowledged pundits. It is only in the social sciences that he faces a dilemma. His confusion as a scientist confronting a pseudo-science is increased by his newly acquired tenderness as the responsible head of one of the largest capitalist institutions in the country. Harvard nurses an investment of more than $125,000,000. The natural bias of Mr. Conant's fellow-members of the Harvard Corporation is that of five corporation lawyers and a fashionable physician. They regard themselves as "trustees" for the university's benefactors, committed to keeping costs, and therefore wages, down and avoiding "unfavorable" publicity.

Appointing men to fill the posts of permanent tenure in the departments of the social sciences is consequently President Conant's recurrent nightmare. He made an announcement some two years ago which reflected his despair: for an indefinite period of time the budgets in the departments of history, government, economics, and sociology were to be "frozen." For the departments' purposes of instruction and adornment, the present personnel must suffice. Thanks to the rule giving permanent tenure to all of the status of associate professor and above, the overcrowded ranks of older professors cannot be thinned. But promotions must be given to as few men as possible, and retirements for age must be made summarily to free the larger salaries for other university uses. At the very moment when the largest number of Harvard undergraduates on record are demanding instruction in the social sciences, the university is limiting its offerings in these subjects. This is the policy of "the student be damned."

No doubt Harvard's president considers himself a liberal. He has, indeed, signed several verbal blank checks saying, "Here at Harvard we regard it as essential that all sides of the controversies in the social sciences be represented." His checks have come back. He is engaged at this moment in getting rid of the only two members of the social-science departments whose views have aroused the clamor of the vested interests. No others among those enjoying permanent tenure in these departments have caused him any discomfort.

It is as if Harvard had said, "Since truth is attainable only in the narrow field of pure science, and all the rest is opinion, let the university economize on the budgets of the social-science departments, and increase the good-will of those through whose generosity it has grown and flourished." This is the nature of the crisis at Harvard.

As to the need for economizing: Harvard competes with other universities through the prestige of its scholars. Buying scholars outside costs money, just as does buying big-league baseball stars. And the worst of it is that by the time a university discovers that its star hurler of ideas has a glass arm, it has guaranteed him permanency of tenure for the years which remain to him; he will receive full salary until the age of sixty-seven and a pension thereafter. Economies, therefore, are most easily attainable in the lower ranks, by the methods well known in industry. The entire time of a young scholar is regarded as "bought and paid for" when the man is hired. Outside activities are looked upon as self-indulgence on company time. The younger teachers live under a special form of "speed-up" and "stretch-out."

To the charge of speed-up Harvard may retort that it is attempting to work out a satisfactory compromise by subsidizing the most promising young scholars and labeling them Junior Fellows, or prizemen; as for the rest, they are drones and must take the consequences. It is precisely in choosing these prize students in the social sciences, however, that the policy breaks down. The Senior Fellows, who choose the Junior Fellows, have been hard put to find criteria of choice in the social sciences, and appointments have been significantly few.

The president of the university has the discernment to realize that in the field of social studies the ordinary criteria of scientific judgment do not prevail and that personal bias affects judgment. Yet, instead of carrying out his promise that all sides shall be represented, he forbids his social-science departments to grow, deprives them of financial nourishment, and leaves them in the hands of scholars who will never grow younger in ideas or years. In fact, it was hardly necessary for the administration to freeze the membership of the Economics Department. It is engaged in freezing itself. The events of the last several years have revealed the capacity of its staff to abandon one liberal cause after another.

This process is made the more inexorable by a Harvard device known as Visiting Committees, appointed by the Board of Overseers to keep an eye on the several departments. Examining only that one which visits the Department of Economics, we find that it is made up of the following: from the board itself, the chairman, Walter Lippmann, and Albert F. Bigelow, a Boston attorney; and from a picked group of alumni, Winthrop Aldrich, chairman of the board of the Chase National Bank, George F. Baker, Jr., chairman of the board of the First National Bank of New York, Barklie M. Henry, a New York banker, Christian A. Herter, an assistant of Herbert Hoover's when he was Secretary of Commerce, George O. May, of the firm of Price, Waterhouse, leading accountants, Charles M. Storey, a Boston attorney, Richard Whitney, formerly president of the New York Stock Exchange (his brother, George Whitney, of the firm of J. P. Morgan and Company, is a member of the Harvard Board of Overseers), and Orrin G. Wood, Boston investment banker of the firm of Estabrook and Company. Small wonder that the entire faculty of the Department of Economics is dedicated to a scholarly refusal to come to conclusions on any and all of the leading questions of modern economic life! Small wonder also that the activities of the two liberal instructors should have seemed unbecoming in men preparing for a "scholarly" career.

These two young liberals, Dr. J. Raymond Walsh and Dr. Alan R. Sweezy, some two years ago felt that the most effective way in which teachers of collegiate rank could further the cause of free speech in Massachusetts, in the face of the new teachers'-oath law, was to organize a union of college teachers. In order to aid the public-school teachers in their fight against political discrimination they believed the union should affiliate with the labor movement, and thus obtain for the teaching profession the solid support of the workers of the commonwealth. In return for this support, which they did not expect college teachers would ever have to invoke, they proposed to lend their interested membership to the labor movement and to develop in the university community a better understanding of the needs of the working classes.

On these terms over 125 members of the teaching and research staffs of Harvard and M. I. T. (the majority from Harvard) were enrolled. The two original founders of the union, being most aware of the problems which led to its organization, were most often in demand when the school teachers and workers of Massachusetts needed help; and the attention of the Harvard authorities was thereby attracted to them. Overnight, the promise of these two young economists, so frequently extolled by their department, was called in question.

An examination of the activities of some of the older members of the Economics Department reveals that activity of a public sort is not in itself held blameworthy, since one member is permitted to hold a high position in the Federal Reserve system while being carried as a full-time member of the faculty, and another has given time to advising the Agricultural Administration. It is open sympathy with labor which seems to be questionable.

Harvard has apparently moved a long way to the right since the days of the Laski Lampoon. Laski had to support a textile strike and the strike of the Boston policemen before he came under the ban of the university. And even then he was not dismissed but merely eased out. Now the formation of a teachers' union in the Yard to acquaint the faculty with the problems of the working classes causes the authorities such acute discomfort that the organizers are dismissed. Outstanding young economists, acknowledged—at least privately—to be brilliant teachers and demonstrated by the university's scholarship award to be promising scholars, need also the qualification of discretion if they wish promotion. University presidents, deans, and department chairmen cannot afford sleepless nights if they are to do their best administering. Universities need a continuous flow of funds from benefactors.

The reader will now understand why the dismissal of two liberal economics instructors at Harvard is no mere tempest in a teacup. The incident illuminates the dilemma of the American university. "Our heart's in the right place, but our head is also screwed on tight," seems to be the motto of university presidents in the year 1937. We "feel" liberal, but we act tough toward liberals because we don't see how we can afford to act otherwise.

No one is asking Harvard to take Moscow gold and thumb its nose at the Wall Street bankers who now help administer its finances. But the university is being asked to face, publicly, the full implications of these dismissals and to say whether it is any longer interested in retaining its ancient distinction as a liberal institution.

It Happened One Night

BY MORRIE RYSKIND

Hollywood, May 10, by Wire

WELL, the impossible has happened. At long last the motion-picture producers have granted the screen actors a closed shop, and Hollywood today has an Equity of its own. Jubilant actors are celebrating in the Hollywood Brown Derby and at the bar, too. It seems impossible when you remember that not so long ago Frank Gillmore came out to Hollywood to get a closed shop and was practically driven out of town. It seemed impossible even as late as four yesterday afternoon. But between four and eight something happened that brought a whole succession of events to a climax. This has been no static canvas. It is a moving picture with more action in it than a Western. As with most motion pictures, too, it is a little difficult to follow the plot. It is hard to tell the hero from the villain. By putting some chronological sequence in it I hope to make it a little clearer to you.

April 4. In New York the producers sign an agreement with the powerful A. F. of L. affiliate, the International Alliance of Stage Theatrical Employees, but the actors' demand for recognition is refused.

Friday, April 30. The Federated Motion Picture Crafts, an association composed mainly of painters, make-up men, and scenic artists, goes out on strike with only one demand—a closed shop. Nobody is excited because only a few studio employees know what the F. M. P. C. is. It turns out to be another A. F. of L. affiliate that is having jurisdictional differences with the I. A. T. S. E. The latter announces that it will not support the strike.

Saturday, May 1. The first bit of excitement. The Screen Actors' Guild is to meet Sunday, and the news comes that the actors may vote to line up with the F. M. P. C. If they do, it looks like a quick victory.

Sunday, May 2. The actors vote for the closed shop, but delay action on lining up with the strikers until the producers have met to consider the Guild demands.

Monday, May 3. The F. M. P. C. pickets are at the gates, but they are quiet and orderly and pressing no one. But the I. A. T. S. E. is issuing what are called "B cards" to men who can take the places of the strikers. In effect, one A. F. of L. group is scabbing the other.

Tuesday, May 4. The actors' representatives meet with the producers. The closed shop is still the bone of contention.

Wednesday, May 5. The Los Angeles Central Labor Council tries for a settlement by which the F. M. P. C. is to go back to work while negotiations are on. The producers are willing to yield on wages and hours, but the F. M. P. C. refuses to negotiate without the guaranty of the closed shop. A telegram from William Green to the strikers points out that the A. F. of L. did not order the strike and consequently the A. F. of L. cannot do anything, though Green promises to look into things. The same day the C. I. O., without asking for any commitments, wires that it will support the strike by picketing theaters showing the films of the nine major studios.

Thursday, May 6. The pickets are beginning to grumble at the actors, feeling that they have been used as a football. But the actors come through with a contribution of $500 to the strike fund, certainly a definite gesture. And Thursday the actors again meet with the producers. My report is that the producers agree to practically all the demands, even going so far as to offer an eighty-to-twenty closed shop. Their argument against the full closed shop is that some twenty-five of the more famous Hollywood stars do not belong to the Guild. Immediately the Guild board goes after these stars. The work, my informant tells me, was amazingly well done: Garbo, Dietrich, Harlow, and a score of others who have kept out of Guild activities from the beginning are signed up.

Friday, May 7. On orders from Washington, Edward A. Fitzgerald, the local conciliator for the Department of Labor, moves into the picture as mediator. International President L. P. Lindelof of the Painters' Union wires district councils throughout the United States to picket theaters showing films of the strike-affected studios. Joe Schenck, well liked by the actors, issues a statement virtually promising them all their demands. But William Green is still saying nothing.

Saturday, May 8. In an amazing victory of the rank and file over the executive committee, the Los Angeles Central Labor Council votes support of the F. M. P. C. strike, condemns the I. A. T. S. E. as strike-breakers, and puts the nine strike-beset studios on the unfair list. Aubrey Blair, business agent for the actors, threatens the producers with a strike unless the closed shop is granted before the actors' meeting Sunday night.

Sunday, May 9. And here I've got to go into minutes and hours: 12 noon. Pickets are in front of all Los Angeles picture theaters. Business is not good. . . . 1 p. m. Mediator Edward A. Fitzgerald predicts peace in forty-eight hours. He seems to think the producers are disorganized. They could not get enough for a meeting last night. . . . 2 p. m. A triumphant informant calls me to say that the night meeting will show 100 per cent for the closed shop and the strike. . . . 4 p. m. The actors' executive board meets. An unhappy informant calls me to say the actors will again grant the producers more time. The best he expects is a sixty-to-forty shop. And here's where something happened. The I. A. T. S. E. suddenly confronted the producers and demanded the closed shop for the actors. Otherwise, no motion-picture projection man would show a picture in any theater in the country. The producers, all but Warners and United Artists, rushed to sign a statement guaranteeing a closed shop. 8 p. m. The actors meet for their jubilee. . . . 8:45 p. m. The F. M. P. C. pickets are stunned. Tomorrow, unless an agreement is signed, they go back to their picketing.

Monday, May 10. At eight-thirty victorious actors march through picket lines on their way to the studio. And on those pickets lines are longshoremen, some of whom helped the actors to win their fight for a closed shop by refusing to load ships on which non-Guild members were working.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

THE attribution of false motives is, I suppose, next to the calling of names to discredit antagonists, the oldest of debating tricks. So I am not surprised to find that the publication called Soviet Russia Today has tried to persuade its readers that because I have denounced the last political murders in Moscow I am deliberately playing the game of the Trotskyites. These were the words to which this publication objected:

I am certain of one thing and that is that if the Japanese and the Germans do carry out their scheme to attack the Soviets in their holy war to make the world safe from bolshevism, Mr. Stalin will not be able to count upon the sympathy and moral aid of a multitude of liberals whose support he has now done away with by blood and treachery.

It appears that I, "an old liberal . . . honored in the struggle for human freedom in America," have thus "confessed," and that I have thus invited "Hitler and the Japanese generals to attack the Soviet people." This, Soviet Russia adds, "is as incredible as the confessions of Piatakov and Radek."

How utterly absurd this all is! I must not tell the truth as I see it, I must not make a plain statement of fact, because if I do I may incite Hitler and the Japanese militarists to attack Russia. Well, this is just the trick so often resorted to by the wicked capitalists, especially in war time. We were told in 1898-1900 that we must not criticize our government in its warring upon the Filipinos because that would arouse the latter to renewed efforts to defeat American aggression and we should thereby become responsible for the deaths of a lot of American soldiers. Similarly during the World War we who opposed German aggression in Belgium and in France were told that we could not also criticize the wrongdoings of the Allies because our words would be reprinted in Berlin and steel the Huns to take more of the Allied trenches. Your Simon-pure defender of the Soviets also tolerates no criticism whatever. We who abhor bloodshed, whether in Germany, in India, in Italy, or in our own country, are guilty of a horrible crime if we dare to insinuate that Stalin the mighty has murdered. That is just as much of a sin as it would be to write an article in Germany questioning that Hitler is God (not Father Divine!) and that his judgments are infallible.

These Communists remind me of some of the ardent admirers of Theodore Roosevelt in the heyday of his popularity. They too took the attitude that he could do no wrong, and if you proved to them that he had been guilty of absolutely unethical acts, they would flatly say, as one prominent man did: "Well, if he was, then that was the right thing to do. He may lie, but it is for the good of the country, and as for me, I would be ready to let him wipe his shoes upon me if he wished." One runs across similar abnegations of judgment in certain followers of Franklin Roosevelt. All of which, of course, makes against reason and sanity, against the solution of problems by calm consideration and detached, unbiased decisions. Instead, we are to call names, attribute false motives, and blacken men's characters.

This last is what has happened to the members of the commission which went to Mexico to hear Leon Trotsky's case against Stalin. Now that may have been a wise move, or it may have been the contrary. But in the ridicule and abuse that has been heaped upon the group headed by John Dewey I find something reminiscent of the storm of denunciation that burst over the pacifists of 1917. The personal vilification that one expects at the hands of Communists is, of course, there. Benjamin Stolberg, a journalist of character and distinction, to whom The Nation has been glad to open its columns, becomes in the Daily Worker, a man of "unsavory career," a "stool-pigeon journalist and professional Trotskyite." John Dewey is a "tragic dupe of evil forces"—he, the possessor of one of the greatest minds in America. Suzanne La Follette is another unsavory journalist, "a bitter and hysterical opponent of the People's Front in France and Spain as a result of her Trotskyite connection." She is also a puppet of Benjamin Stolberg's. Otto Rühle gets off a little better, but he is the author of a "fantastically distorted life of Karl Marx" (what a horrible crime!) and the father-in-law of a man expelled from the Communist Party. Execution is plainly too good for him; boiling in oil would be preferable.

Now I am neither for Trotsky nor for Stalin. I am interested only in the social and human side of the Russian experiment. When I see that checked if not blasted, when I see the changed attitude in Russia with respect to militarism, marriage, and birth control, when I read of those judicial murders, I am going to express my profound regret at these reactionary happenings whomever it may encourage or discourage. If my motives must be impugned as have been those of the Trotsky Commission in Mexico—I, for one, believe their motives to have been of the best; we should have the truth as to the Russian controversy—all right. I have faced that sort of misrepresentation a few hundred times before this. I am even willing to admit, if it will give Soviet Russia any happiness, that I once sought to call upon Trotsky when I, a journalist, was traveling in Turkey. But as he happened to be ill in bed I did not see him and so did not receive the pot of gold which I understand he gives to everyone who enters his presence.

BROUN'S PAGE

The Boys in the Higher Brackets

THE editorial writers and the paragraphers are having a lot of fun with the strike in Hollywood. At the moment this is written the Screen Actors' Guild has not come to a definite decision, and the newspapers are fond of printing pictures of $300,000 stars and asking what on earth they can possibly be asking for.

But the issue in California is not a trivial one, and there is a good deal more to it than meets the unseeing eye. As in the case of the Screen Writers' Guild, there is a great deal of public misconception. Not every scenario writer is showered with gold, and there are actors on the lots who make a very meager living. But wholly apart from the question of salary, it is important for the artists and intellectuals of America to choose their side.

The actors and writers of Hollywood face the same problem which newspapermen have begun to solve. Before organization began, no publisher would have thought of calling a reporter an intellectual or an artist, or even a professional for that matter. These words were chiefly taken down from the shelf to befuddle us. I have never had so many compliments on my early work as a columnist as I have received since I became an officer of the American Newspaper Guild. But the soothing quality of the oil is mitigated by a certain grittiness. I am praised only for what I did in some dim yesterday or might have performed at some future date if I had not become a "walking delegate." Quite recently a famous publicist assured me, "You could have become the greatest humorist in America. That's your last and you should have stuck to it. Of course you've thrown all that over the fence by now on account of going haywire about labor."

That started quite an argument. I took the affirmative side in the debate on, "Resolved, that Heywood Broun never was very funny." In answer to the charge that I used to be good and had since slipped materially, I admitted that it might be true. But I added mildly that out of all the thousands of columns I had written the only ones which anybody seemed to remember were a couple about Sacco and Vanzetti. They were not funny.

But even if the earnest advocate of my blasted potentialities had succeeded in convincing me that I might have stood with Ade, Bugs Baer, and George Sokolsky, I think I would have been a fool not to realize that my self-interest lay in joining up with my fellow-craftsmen in a trade union. Even from a short-range point of view the highly paid "artist" or "intellectual" ought to be able to realize that his house of prosperity is built upon the sand. The very fact that he commands a high salary makes his opportunities of employment limited. He is subject to the whim and caprice of a small group of owners. I can think of a great many columnists, for instance, who quite candidly must say to themselves, "If Mr. X is through with me when this contract is done, where do I go from here?"

And in Hollywood there is at least a tacit black list which may bar some of the most talented writers from their occupation. It is well enough to say that the artist who has something which the public, or some portion of it, wants need never worry about the wolf at the door. That is a good deal less than true, for actors cannot play in vacant lots and newspapermen will not get very far in running off their own stuff on a mimeograph machine. The path to the public is through a bottle neck, and that narrow pass is guarded by a little group of Spartans who are determined to let none go through save those who agree with their philosophy.

Of course a trade-union organization cannot assure jobs to all its members, and still less has it any function to offer some sort of protection to the higher-bracket boys. That is, it cannot do these things in a material way except in the sense that it may offer certain brakes on the way down for the star who slips and stumbles. That half of the slide is extremely slippery, and the overpaid feature writer who says, "What can a union do for me?" may live to rejoice that minima have been established for copy readers and rewrite men through organization.

But I would not have the responsibility of the artist and the intellectual rest wholly on a short-range self-interest, although there are worse motives than that. Any person with a modicum of imagination ought to be able to see his place in the scheme of things entire. If he sees himself as a lone wolf, I feel that his talent must be of a constricted sort.

The screen actor in particular ought to know that while a Warner or a Selznick may sign his weekly pay check, the film magnate is merely a surrogate for the general public. The interests of the star lie in pleasing the mass rather than the man in the counting-room. The player who does his acting for the boss, or the newspaperman whose main objective is to please the editor, will soon find that he has an audience of one and presently an enraptured public of none at all.

I hope that the men and women of Hollywood will throw in their lot with the striking technicians. I cannot think that there has ever existed any genius so great that it entitled a man to scab. I haven't ever had it directly from William Shakespeare, but he seems to have lived in close amity with his fellow-workers in the Globe Theater, and I doubt very much whether he would have gone through a picket line. And if by any chance I am fooled in his commonalty with the members of his craft and he would have been willing to betray them, they might, I think, quite justifiably have boycotted "Hamlet" and hailed the dramatist by a shorter word than bard.

HEYWOOD BROUN
BUSH INGRAM
PUBLIC
LIB

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE ACTORS AND THE CRITICS

BY MARY McCARTHY

II

THIS past theatrical season of revivals—four productions of Shakespeare, two of Ibsen, one of Marlowe, and one of Wycherley—has been the undoing of the drama critics. When there is a new play on which discussion can center, the critic can parry the whole question of acting with a few kindly meant clichés, or he can simply ignore it, as Joseph Wood Krutch does. When it comes to "Hamlet," though, a reviewer just cannot go on telling the story of the play or discussing what he knows of its literary values. He is obliged to say something about the acting. Robert Benchley tried to beat a bold retreat: he refused to review Leslie Howard's "Hamlet," and he did not mention Nazimova herself in her production of "Hedda Gabler." Such escapism was, however, not generally practiced. With the production of Gielgud's "Hamlet" the critics began to talk about acting, and the result was Babel.

At once it became apparent that there was something fundamentally wrong with the critics' perceptive powers. In order to judge a work of art, in this case an actor's performance, one must first be able to apprehend it. Yet the reviews of the Gielgud "Hamlet" gave the impression that the reviewers had been to see different plays. There was the case of Claudius, already mentioned. He obviously could not be "stuffy" and "good and live" at the same time. Which was he? Whether it is better for the king to be stuffy or good and live is a question which cannot be discussed until the previous question has been answered. In the same fashion, no two reviewers seemed able to agree on what Gielgud himself was playing. He was generally admired, but for the most discrepant and mutually incompatible reasons. One critic found his Hamlet "not passionate but brooding and neurotic"; to another he was all fire, "fiercely laying waste the hearts he had challenged with the flame." One critic considered his thoughtfulness his most distinguished quality; another complained that Hamlet's intellect was hardly suggested. Some critics felt that the poetry sang on his lips; others suspected that he scanted sound for sense. The critics, on the whole, showed great capacity for enthusiasm, but none for observation or descriptive writing.

The arrival of Leslie Howard in his "Hamlet" did nothing to clear these muddled critical heads. They were able to agree that Mr. Howard was not very good, but they differed seriously as to what exactly he was like, and as to how his interpretation of the character differed from Mr. Gielgud's. Theatrical people took the two "Hamlets" more calmly than the critics. They observed that both productions were bad, and for different reasons.

John Gielgud distorted "Hamlet," pulled it awry to fit his bizarre, biting, hysterical style of acting; Leslie Howard rearranged a scene or two, but let the structure of Shakespeare's "Hamlet" stand, only to find himself personally inadequate to fill it.

The critical multiplicity of experience was most clearly demonstrated this year at Nazimova's production of "Hedda Gabler." There were three schools of thought as to what Nazimova had been playing. The first was the "cobra" school, which held that Nazimova's Hedda had been "hateful," "unpleasant," a kind of high-class Theda Bara villainess. Here are two samples of this school: "This [Hedda] is the most fascinating, the most plainly depraved, the most wantonly devilish"; and "It is a Hedda stepped in wanton evilness; a Hedda which in spirit at least comes much nearer the requirements of the text than did such a languid Hedda as Miss Le Gallienne's."

Then there was the school which believed that Hedda had been played for comedy. "Anything went last evening that provoked a laugh . . . Mme Nazimova, Harry Ellerbe, and McKay Morris had a gay time of it, creating chuckles where tears are supposed to gush." "Sly, guiltful, prettily togged out as this latest Hedda is, I think Nazimova plays her often too coyly, too lightly, too much for light chuckles, and comedy squeals. I miss the sculptured agony the lady used to boast about." The last school had the impression that Hedda had been played "tenderly." There was also a minor disagreement as to whether . . . there was something happening every other minute" on the stage, "something physical," or whether the play was "slow and pedestrian." Naturally, the critics, divided as to what went on at "Hedda Gabler," were also divided as to its merits.

At Walter Huston's "Othello" there was greater unanimity of perception than was manifested elsewhere this season. To the few persons who saw that production what is surprising is not that the critics understood the obtrusive characterization which Brian Aherne was projecting at them, but that, having become aware of it, they did not recognize its implications and thereupon condemn it. Here was a showy, romantic, and obvious piece of acting, an Iago who was a kind of handsome, leering, swashbuckling Puck, an Iago who kept the audience in stitches throughout the production. Mr. Aherne's Iago was, in a real sense, the mischief maker of the piece, an abominable and impertinent exhibition; yet this performance drew rhapsodies from the critics, who reserved all their blame for the unfortunate Mr. Huston, whose faults were at least merely negative. Alone and unaided

Mr. Aherne turned Shakespeare's tragedy into a French farce; yet only Mr. Pollock caught a glimpse of the truth when he qualified his approval of Mr. Aherne's acting by saying: "And yet Mr. Aherne seems a rather fancy Iago, an Iago too well schooled, an Iago to win the hearts of the ladies."

Acting is admittedly of all the arts the most difficult to apprehend. The critic studying a piece of acting is really dealing with four things: life, literature, and the musical and pictorial arts—life in the personality of the actor, literature in his role, and music and the pictorial arts in his projection of the role. For a first-rate critic of acting, a knowledge of these four branches of human experience is essential. It is no wonder that first-rate criticism of acting is rare. Yet it has existed, and does exist. In Shaw's "Dramatic Opinions and Essays" there is fine criticism; his comparison of Duse and Bernhardt is a classic of dramatic criticism. In Stanislavsky's "An Actor Prepares," a recent publication, a whole aesthetic of acting is laid out. In England today some passable dramatic criticism is being written. One has only to compare the English reviews of Maurice Evans's performance of "Richard II," at the Old Vic, with the American reviews of the same performance to realize how shockingly backward, how myopic, American criticism is. The American reviewers had the sense to be enthusiastic, but that enthusiasm was expressed, ■ usual, in a welter of adjectives. What identified Mr. Evans's performance, what set it off from all other interpretations of Richard, was the fact that Mr. Evans was playing, not tragedy, but an actor who is playing tragedy. This was apparent at first glance to the English critics; but only one American critic called attention to it.

The essence of the art of acting, as of any other art, is its design. The critic of acting must understand, first, the actor's role, second, the actor's role in relation to the play as a whole, and, third, the design the actor has chosen to convey his own view of his role. It is impossible to imagine an art critic's having the temerity to pass judgments on painting without a knowledge of composition. Yet the dramatic critic, ignorant even of the existence of theatrical forms and patterns, daily passes judgments on theatrical performances. It is absurd to expect the New York reviewers to write theatrical criticism as good as Shaw's. It is not unreasonable to demand that they write at least as intelligently as their English colleagues, that they display at least as much knowledge of the principles of the medium they confront as their fellows in art, music, and literature. It is not unreasonable for actors to insist that their work receive clear-eyed appraisal, or for audiences to require that a complex art be illuminated for them. The New York dramatic critics today are both frightened and lazy. A season of revivals has revealed their incompetence to deal with acting; it is now their duty to face that incompetence and to remedy it. This late in the life of the American theater the American drama critic must go back to school to learn something of the technique and standards of the profession which gives him his livelihood.

[Part I of this article appeared last week.]

BOOKS

The Anatomy of Accommodation

LIFE IN A HAITIAN VALLEY. By Melville J. Herskovits. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

PURE culture is as much a fiction as pure race. Diverse strains enter into the making of both. At one extreme, groups may achieve a relative degree of homogeneity, if left sufficiently in isolation. At the other are groups in whose make-up at least the most important strands can still be distinguished with comparative ease; and Haiti is of this type. In such a case the anthropologist may speak of acculturation: the process of conflict and compromise not merely between two words, ideas, values, or customs, but between two cultural traditions, two sets of institutions and practices. It is ■ study in acculturation, or historical dynamics, as well ■ picture of the Haitian native, that we have in Professor Herskovits's book.

Africa is still too remote for the American tourist trade and the tourist-explorer. Haiti has been a convenient substitute. Accordingly we have had foisted on us a popular mythology teeming with zombies, mysterious rites, and voodooism, shot through with sexual and neurotic excess. Actually the Haitian native, as Dr. Herskovits depicts him, is essentially ■ peasant. His life has, of course, more spectacular features than are found in rustic Scandinavia or the Balkans; modes of West African life have survived in his cultural heritage to an amazing extent.

Dr. Herskovits has shown, in this book and elsewhere, that the majority of the Negro slaves imported into the New World came from West Africa, including the Congo and Angola. African gods are still known by name in Haiti, and still revered. They are, in Haiti also, the top figures of ■ pantheon whose rank and file are family gods and the spirits of the dead. The fields are worked by cooperative combines, as in West Africa, and the Catholic church has not succeeded in stamping out polygamy. The inventory of material objects, foods, techniques reflects more the European civilization brought in by the French landowners, and the language is Creole, ■ corruption of French. But much of the substance of what passes in this idiom is African—stories, proverbs, songs. There is also the peculiar type of African verbal sophistication, in descriptions and distinctions far from "primitive": "The song-leader is a journalist, and every song-leader is a Judas." Pauvres are those who happen to be poor, malheureux those who always will be, since they have no luck. A gros nègre is ■ man endowed with wealth and position; a grand nègre one with spiritual, religious power.

In a treatment rich with interesting detail and as readable as it is solid, Dr. Herskovits proceeds from ■ discussion of the cultural ancestry of the Haitian to a description of his daily life, and ends with an extended account of Haitian religion. His first-hand knowledge of Negro culture in West Africa and South America lends added weight to his detail and cogency to his interpretation. Voodooism, he contends, is part and parcel of the normal behavior of the average person in the region he has studied. It can hardly be termed neurotic, since it is a system of beliefs and practices conventionalized and generally accepted in the community.

Life in a Haitian valley seems to demonstrate how little a society requires the inner logic that an outsider is apt to impute to it. Officially, the Haitian is a worshiper in the Catholic church, which demands monogamy of him. Actually, polygamy is common, and people believe in gods and spirits as well as in God and his saints. All of which the church most emphatically does not favor. Dr. Herskovits feels that the result is a psychological conflict, a "socialized ambivalence," to which is due a "living on the nerves," an emotional instability. Yet he shows with convincing detail how much Catholic ceremonial has been incorporated into the rituals and how neatly things have become compartmented. As a devotee told him: "The loa [African gods] are not the things of the priest." Throughout the picture there are of course contradictions of logic in the life of the natives. But the main impression seems to be one of accommodation rather than of emotional conflict. The double aspect of clash and compromise threaded through a colorful texture is one of the reasons why this book is bound to prove as interesting and rewarding for the layman as for the anthropologist.

GEORGE HERZOG

The Caliph's Tower

BECKFORD. By Guy Chapman. Charles Scribner's Sons. $4.

"THERE will I build my Tower," William Beckford wrote to Lady Craven in 1790, "and deposit my books and writings and brood over them. . . ." The talented but volatile author of "Vathek" had justification for this melancholy utterance. Though his youth had been blessed by all that great wealth and noble family could offer him in an age rich with diversions, he had spent these last six years in exile and ostracism; and now, at thirty, he was living in a past which at times may have seemed, like his Gothic abbey at Fonthill, quite uninhabitable. His friends and social position fallen away, his wife dead, his English mistress dying, his "amiable child" taken from him, and his book stolen by the sycophantic Henley, Beckford thus begins to build his retreat—his luxurious Tower which, like Vathek's, might carry him away from mankind and bring him closer to the stars.

Mr. Chapman's scholarly examination of this somewhat turbulent career performs a valuable service. The facts about Beckford have been published slowly and with some understandable reluctance. Lewis Melville, the pioneer in this field, chose to omit almost all mention of Beckford's triangular relationship with Louisa Beckford and William Courtenay, which was a dominating influence in Beckford's life and almost certainly the psychological background of "Vathek." The publication of Dr. Oliver's study in 1932 confirmed Paul Elmer More's uneasy speculations about some sort of double or triple passion in Beckford's history; and Mr. Chapman's "Beckford" adds the conclusive details to this story. This study, however, is not the final word on Beckford, principally because it suffers, as do all three of these biographies, from a repletion of documentation with an insufficiency of interpretation. Mr. Chapman does not attempt to explain many aspects of Beckford's motivation, he does not add very much to previous critical appraisals of Beckford's writings, nor does he realize the full significance of Beckford's status in the romantic and symbolist traditions. But he does offer a thorough and intelligent factual account of Beckford's life and, perhaps most important, an illuminating and colorful history of Beckford's friends and associates, of the manners and morals of certain sections of late eighteenth-century society: the English landed aristocracy against whom Beckford rebelled; Geneva with Voltaire, Jean Huber, and Mlle Necker; the Venice of 1780 with Beckford's Contessa Giustiniana d'Orsini-Rosenberg and her Count Benincasa; Paris, on the eve of the revolution, with its mesmerism and anglomanie.

And if, despite the tragic elements of Beckford's life, it is difficult to feel much sympathy for him, the fault lies with Beckford as much as with his biographer. Without worldly obligations and without a sense of obligation, surrounded in his expensive "romantic ruin" by his expensive Reynoldses and Romneys, his precious stones, rare books, and Italian musicians, Beckford seems hardly more immediate to us than those "black, yellow, and mezzotint" Jamaican slaves on whom his fortune rests, and perhaps hardly more free. It is as a symbol rather than a person that Beckford will live, for this Eastern potentate, dwelling so luxuriously in the midst of revolutions, sums up one full cycle of the romantic movement: in his youth, the Faustian quest for infinite and strange experience, and in his age, as he refurbishes and even fabricates his accounts of his dead mistresses, foretelling the fate of his symbolist heirs, all the Count Axels, the Des Esseintes. Is it not almost too true that Beckford's famed Gothic tower, for the completion of which James Wyatt transferred some five hundred workmen from the palace of George III, was no more than finished before it toppled into ruins?

MAXWELL GEISMAR

End of a Saga

THE RING IS CLOSED. By Knut Hamsun. Coward-McCann. $2.50.

THE publishers hint that this is Knut Hamsun's last novel. If so—as far as ultimate views are concerned—it leaves him looking at the world with much the same bewilderment and indecision voiced in "Hunger" almost half a century ago. Only now his voice seems less shrill, his manner more objective, his bewilderment more impressive, coming, as it does, at a time when a less vigorous mentality might well pose as oracle and sage.

There is no character in his novels less oracular, none more adrift and confused, more restless and rootless, more uncertain of his rightful place in organized society than Abel Brodersen in "The Ring Is Closed." It is as if, through him, the author's own days of far-wandering as longshoreman, coal-trimmer, street-car conductor, and aimless adventurer in half the countries of the world were relived. Thus Abel, when his friends in the little Norwegian coastal town put aside the common adventures of childhood and apprentice themselves to solid trades and solemn professions, ships off around the world. This conventional revolt is the familiar reaction of Hamsun's earlier heroes. The fools, the ne'er-do-wells, the vagrants have always enjoyed his utter sympathy. The irrational impulses of Glahn in "Pan," the irresponsible melancholy of Nagel in "Mysteries," the fantastic delirium of the hero in "Hunger"—all are again represented in part in Abel's uncompromising but confessedly puzzling personality.

If there is any one idea to which Abel holds fast, it is a kind of hazy, romantic belief in the restorative power of nature. As he drifts from port to port, from job to job, from a sawmill in Canada to utter vagrancy in Texas, the single time he finds anything approaching contentment is when he drinks up the sunshine of the tropics and lives completely within the present. This idea of spiritual contentment gained through greater intimacy with nature runs consistently through

WHICH MAKES OF TRAILERS AND WASHING MACHINES

ARE *Best Buys?*Avoid Mistakes
Before You Buy

Technical Experts Now Give You the Names of Good Products and of Poor
Ones . . . and Help You to Save Substantial Sums on Your Purchases

What makes of trailers show the best engineering construction? Which are rated as "Best Buys" on basis of quality and price? What effect does towing a trailer have on the durability of the towing car? On the gasoline mileage? On the driving habits of the driver? What are the advantages and disadvantages of trailers in terms of living comfort? What legal restrictions do some states impose on the use of trailers?

What three models of washing machines, out of ten models tested by engineers, were rated as "Best Buys"? What three models as "Not Acceptable"? Which model had the greatest washing effectiveness? Which one was dropped out of a durability test after three gears had failed?

What is the nature and what are the causes of constipation? What are the best means of avoiding and treating it? Which laxatives are effective and which are not? Which may be taken safely . . . and which may not?

What are the best methods and materials to use in protecting your clothes from moths? Will any of the advertised moth preventives really protect your clothes? What product advertised as a moth preventive was described as " . . . worthless for the control of moths" by the U. S. Food & Drug Administration?

The Answers

to this and similar questions are given in reports and articles in the current issue of Consumers Union Reports, the monthly publication which goes to members of Consumers Union of United States and which rates products, by brand name, as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable."

In addition to the reports on trailers (which rates 33 models), washing machines and moth preventives, and the article on constipation, this issue also contains ratings of garden insecticides, and of other products. The article on constipation in this issue is the first of a series on this subject. Prepared by a physician, these articles define the nature and causes of this ailment and the methods of treatment for it. The merits and demerits of widely-advertised laxatives will be discussed in detail.

Consumers Union Reports

is not just a magazine, nor is Consumers Union of United States a commercial organization. Established on a strictly non-profit, membership basis, Consumers Union is set up to provide nearly 40,000 members with accurate, technical information on the things they buy. Each month, in the 32-page Consumers Union Reports, members of Consumers Union receive unbiased, usable information to guide them in their daily buying—information that is based on laboratory analyses, technical tests, and actual trials of the products reported upon. These tests are carried out by staff technicians or by Consumers Union's group of consultants in leading university, government and private laboratories throughout the country. The reports of these technicians are written in clear, understandable form and rate products in terms of brand names, as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Information is also given on the labor conditions under which many products are made. Properly used, the information contained in Consumers Union Reports can save the average family $100 or more in the course of a year.

The coupon below is your invitation to become a member of this unique and rapidly growing organization. The membership fee is $3.00 a year. ($1 for an abridged edition covering only the less expensive products.) It brings you (1) 12 issues of Consumers Union Reports; (2) a 240-page yearly Buying Guide (the 1937 edition of which has just been distributed to members), and (3) a vote in the control of the organization. Mail this coupon today. Your membership can begin with any of the issues listed at the right.

YOU CAN BEGIN WITH ANY OF THESE ISSUES

(please check the month with which you wish to begin)

- ☐ SEPT.—Shoes, Tires, Whiskies, Women's Coats
- ☐ OCT.—Gins, Electric Razors, Dentifrices, Anti-freeze Solutions
- ☐ NOV.—Radios, Toasters, Wines, Winter Oils, Children's Shoes
- ☐ DEC.—Vacuum Cleaners, Fountain Pens, Electric Irons, Blankets, Nose Drops
- ☐ JAN.—FEB.—Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Shaving Creams, Children's Undergarments
- ☐ MAR.—1937 Autos, Face Powders, Sheets, Flour, Canned Foods
- ☐ APR.—Radio Sets, Gardening, Autos, Shirts, Cold Creams, Aminopyrine
- ☐ MAY.—Trailers, Washing Machines, Constipation, Moth Preventives, Garden Insecticides

MAIL THIS APPLICATION

With Your Membership—
A 240-PAGE HANDBOOK

containing ratings of over a thousand products by brand — "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable" . . . including:

Automobiles—New	Electric Shavers	Men's, Women's and
Automobiles—Used	Flour	Children's Shoes
—years and models	Fountain Pens	Soaps
apt to be good buys	Gasolines	Shaving Soaps and
Blankets—Wool	Hair Dyes	Creams
Bread	Hosiery	Electric Toasters
Canned Fruits and	Children's Clothing	Tooth Pastes and Vegetables	Men's Suits, Shirts	Powders
Cereals	and Socks	Tires
Cold and Headache	Liavors and Wines	Tomato Juice
Remedies	Motor Oil	Vacuum
Cosmetics	Mechanical	Cleaners
Drugs	Refrigerators	Vegetable Seeds
	—and many other products

Get this BUYING GUIDE by mailing coupon NOW!

To: CONSUMERS UNION of UNITED STATES, Inc.
55 Vandam Street, New York City, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

- ☐ $3 for 1 year's membership, $2.50 of which is for a year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports.
- ☐ $1 for 1 year's membership, 50c of which is for a year's subscription to the limited edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note: Reports on higher-priced products are not in this edition.)

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Signature

Address

City and State N-5

Tours to the SOVIET UNION

Last call! . . . Register now!

Specialists in Travel to the Soviet Union since 1930

FIFTH RUSSIAN SEMINAR

Leader, Jerome Davis, Yale University

Trip includes Scandinavia, Leningrad, Moscow, Volga, Caucasus, Crimea, and Ukraine. 53 Days. Price $645 with third class ocean passage.

RUSSIAN SURVEY TOUR

Leader, Tredwell Smith, Dalton School

Trip includes Leningrad, Moscow, Volga, Caucasus, Armenia, Crimea, Rumania, Hungary, and Austria. 60 Days. Price $595 with third class ocean passage.

TOUR OF THE COOPERATIVES AND PLANNED SOCIETIES

Leader, Roy V. Peel, New York University

Trip includes Britain, Scandinavia, Leningrad, Moscow, Poland, Austria, Germany, Switzerland, and France. 68 Days. Price $845 with third class ocean passage.

SOVIET ART TOUR

Leader, Alfred G. Pelikan, Milwaukee Art Institute

Trip includes Britain, Scandinavia, Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Poland, Germany, and France. 47 Days. Price $535 with third class ocean passage.

NORTHERN COUNTRIES TOUR

Leader, Carl A. Norman, Ohio State University

Trip includes Britain, Scandinavia, Leningrad, Moscow, Poland, Germany, Switzerland, and France. 54 Days. Price $795 with third class ocean passage.

MODERN ARCHITECTURE TOUR

Leader, Hugh S. Morrison, Dartmouth College

Trip includes Britain, Scandinavia, Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Germany, Netherlands, and Paris. 57 Days. Price $550 with third class ocean passage.

SOVIET LAND CRUISE and MOSCOW THEATRE FESTIVAL

Leader, Samuel H. Cross, Harvard University

Trip includes Leningrad, Moscow, Crimea, and Ukraine. 56 Days. Price $865 with tourist class ocean passage.

Send for details

Bureau of University Travel
54 BOYD STREET
NEWTON, MASS.

all of Hamsun's work. It is encountered at its finest force in "Growth of the Soil," in which Isak, the peasant, faces nature with superlative courage and works against elemental forces for a lifetime to emerge into a kind of becalmed, classic tranquillity which the average modern man has no opportunity to find.

In the present work, however, although Abel considers mistily an alliance with nature, he appears to feel a more urgent necessity for adjusting himself to the normal pattern of everyday life. He is torn between a desire to be accepted by the village and a wayward notion to thumb his nose at it. Finally, all his efforts to be conventional are unsuccessful—particularly when he tries to recapture his childhood love for the troll, Olga; and, again, when he tosses away the prized captaincy of the Sparrow. His defense mechanism in the end operates in such a way that he begins to consider his lack of will with pride, almost as a kind of "special faculty" for living as contrasted with all the complex and misdirected striving of the average wage-earner. Consequently he lolls out into the world again, a sardonic vagrant, completely and happily intent upon resuming his waywardness.

As usual, Hamsun's principle of composition gains its effects through an intimate scrutiny of fragments rather than through massive dramatic scenes. Out of the scrappiest details this plotless novel builds to a kind of monumental form that approximates the early Thomas Mann. Yet here the form seems to have in it more of impressive bulk than of genuine content. Actually, with the exception of a rather blurred plea for a dubious brand of waifish individualism, no positive idea emerges from this objective writing. What does emerge are some brilliant portraits of village types—figures that glimmer through the novel with Hamsun's old fire and genius behind them. Yet they are figures written in with such an exceptional disregard for the urgent need for an interpretation of the individual's psychological problem in the light of his general social and economic environment as to make the contemporary reader impatient.

STANLEY YOUNG

"A Chartres of His Own"

BIOGRAPHY OF TRAMAN. By Winfield Townley Scott. Covici-Friede. $2.

THIS book of poems and H. Phelps Putnam's "Trinc," published in 1927, should be compared. Both are studies in the coming of age of intellectual youth; but Phelps Putnam, born in 1894, was one of the "lost generation" and Scott is of the next generation. Putnam's is the older disillusionment which pointed to an escape through drink and mysticism. Scott apparently regards drink only as a means of heightening the emotional and intellectual problems of youth. Further, he definitely rejects religion.

Traman, the protagonist of these lyrics and dramatic monologues, is the type of sensitive, poetic youth today. Other characters take into account the scientific-minded student and the philosopher. Scott's problem is to portray the poetic mind discarding certain beliefs, accepting certain values, attempting self-integration. Naturally he has read—and makes free use of lines resembling theirs—Eliot, Aiken, Joyce, Hopkins, and other poets; these poets are the literature of his imagination. But he does not merely imitate. In general, his imagery is appropriate to the dramatic state of the emotions or mind projected; it is fresh and his own. Traman's is the city world where the "nightingales are dead in Union Square," the world of science and of economic struggle. Here the poet indulges his young dreams, examines the nature of his learning and his heredity, and tries to spell from alphabets of stone new poems. His poems, however, remain half of the old world, half of the new, as does he himself.

The "Biography of Traman" is skilfully written. Scott knows his poetic medium. He tends always to dramatize and to objectify all intricate personal emotions. In him is the promise, certainly, of very interesting poetry. He has technique, wit, sensibility, nor is he unaware that the process of poetic integration must be hurried since the world in which he lives is warned of new alarms, new struggles. Here, however, is no propagandist, but a young poet writing down very sensitively and successfully what he knows. He is, as he says, building of his own body and mind "a Chartres of his own."

EDA LOU WALTON

South Texas Primitive

NOON WINE. By Katherine Anne Porter. Schuman's: Detroit. $5.

MISS PORTER'S short stories, in the past, have singularly resisted summation. In the sense that Katherine Mansfield so defined Chekhov's "The Steppe" they have been stories without beginning or end, units of narrative energy in which the author has merely "touched one point with his pen (—) and then another point: inclosed something which had, as it were, been there forever." "Noon Wine," however—which Schuman's of Detroit, with regrettable frugality, has limited to 250 de luxe copies—is concerned less with "inclosure" than with situation, the integers of which are combined according to a pattern of the author's making and with little or no attempt on her part to set up channels of communication between her private responses and the materials of the story proper. The scene is a small dairy farm in south Texas, which, at the story's opening, escapes financial disaster by a fortunate intuition which prompts the proprietor, Mr. Thompson, to give employment to an immigrant Swede from the wheat belt of North Dakota. We learn little concerning the stranger's identity until the story is well under way: like Mr. Thompson, we are inclined to accept the fact of his "Scandahoovian" origin in explanation of his mysterious reticences and fondness for playing melancholy airs on the mouth organ. Yet events are destined to move almost too rapidly for our comfort. The handyman is discovered to be an escaped homicidal maniac, precipitates a murder and a suicide, and is last seen "running all stooped over through the orchard, running like a man with dogs after him."

Apparently Miss Porter has preferred to approach her theme in terms of the village "primitive" rather than a study in psychopathic regeneration—in terms, that is to say, of violence, pathos, and the terror which attaches itself to large issues resolved by gestures so simple and sudden that they forfeit their ethical contexts. To this end she has distributed her materials in a loose narrative sequence reminiscent of "Maria Concepcion" and invested them with an effect of gangling artlessness, a procedure actually involving the watchful exercise of every skill at her command. One questions, however, whether a sensibility as exquisitely functional as Miss Porter's may cast out pride by a simple act of will, in spite of excellent intentions and the employment of scrupulous intelligence. Miss Porter's simplicities, in the last analysis, are stratagems, and the story's impact, for all its incidental rewards, is muted by its rigors.

BEN BELITT

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

These offerings by America's oldest Mail-Order Book House save you up to 75% of their regular retail prices. Each book is brand-new in condition, stock-perfect, a permanent addition to your library. In many cases the quantities on hand are the last remaining stocks. All orders promptly filled and covered by our 53-year-old MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE.

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. THE SEXUAL LIFE OF SAVAGES. With over 90 photographic illustrations from Dr. Malinowski's unrivaled collection. An account of courtship, marriage and family life among the natives of Trobriand Islands, British New Guinea—with a preface by HAVE-LOCK ELLIS. Complete in 1 volume. ($10.00) $1.49
2. THE EPIC OF AMERICA. By James Truslow Adams. "The best single volume on American history in existence. Illustrated with wood cuts." 98c

3. The Most Famous Frescoes of DIEGO RIVERA THE FOREMOST FRESCO PAINTER of MODERN TIMES

Twelve beautifully printed natural-color prints on art paper. Suitable for framing. The finest collection of reproductions in existence and truly representative of Diego Rivera's most famous frescoes. Size of reproductions, 9x12 inches. The first reproductions of the famous frescoes of Rivera were distributed by the Museum of Modern Art of New York at FROM $5.00 to $8.00 FOR EACH PRINT. After they had been on the market for two years, the price was reduced to $7.50 for the set of 12 reproductions.

AN EXTRAORDINARY BARGAIN—
Our price, the full set of 12 reproductions. 98c

4. THE THEATRE. 3,000 Years of the Theatre. By Sheldon Cheney. Profusely illustrated with 204 interesting illustrations. 558 pages. "A thoroughly readable, well-documented and beautifully illustrated history of man's whole adventure in the theatre."—Outlook. Chautauqua Edition. ($10.00) 98c

5. MASTERS IN ART SERIES: Goya; Holbein's Drawings; Giotto; Watteau; Vermeer; Turner; Tintoretto; Ruisdael; Rossetti; Raeburn; Nattier; Murillo; Metsu; Mantegna; Donatello; Lippi; Jan Steen; Chirlandajo; Francia; Duccio; de Hooch; David; Chardin; Watts. 24 long-out-of-print, paper-covered books in the famous MASTERS IN ART series. 7 1/8" x 10". Containing 240 beautiful full-page plates. Any 6 books, ppd. 88c. The 24 books, ppd. $2.98

6. MARK TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation as it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) $1.58

7. A HISTORY OF CHINESE ART—From Ancient Times to the Present Day. 153 illustrations, including 80 in full-page color. ($10.00) $3.98

8. WRITE IT RIGHT. By Ambrose Bierce. A little blacklist of literary faults, by America's foremost master of style. Useful, witty. Interesting to those who like to write and think precisely. $1.00

9. FUNDAMENTALS OF MUSICAL ART. By Edward Dickinson, Litt. D., Editor-in-Chief. Introduces reader to the immense range and wealth of musical knowledge. Complete in 20 vols. ($40.00.) The 20 volume set $6.95

10. SINS OF AMERICA. As exposed by the Police Gazette. With 206 hilarious woodcut illustrations and an introduction by Thomas Beer. Drama, extravagances, scandals, tragedies—our national portrait in the 70's and 80's. Size, 9 1/4" x 12". ($5.00) $1.49

11. BEHIND THE SCENES WITH THE KAISER. "The World-Astounding Exposé." The true story of the Kaiser as he lived, loved, played and warred (1888-1922). By the Baroness von Larisch of the Imperial Household. ($5.00) 98c

12. BEVERIDGE'S LINCOLN. In 4 illustrated volumes. Abraham Lincoln, 1809-1858. By Albert J. Beveridge. Boxed. "The author has traced to its source every fact, incident, tradition or statement bearing on the life of Lincoln." ($20.00) The 4 volume set, only $3.98

13. DON QUIXOTE, by Cervantes. Profusely illustrated with over 400 drawings by the famous Gustave Doré. ($12.50) $1.98

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

N-18

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13 14
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 282-N, just off press!

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

Just Published!

FROM LENIN TO STALIN

by Victor Serge

THIS is a brief history of the Russian Revolution from the overthrow of the Czar in 1917 to the Moscow Trials of 1936. The arrival of Lenin, the Bolshevik's seizure of power under the leadership of Lenin and Trotsky, the Civil War, the founding of the Third International, the rise of Stalin and the struggle with the opposition reaching a climax in the recent Trials, are depicted vividly and dramatically.

116 pages Illustrated 50c

Why did they "CONFESS?"

A Study of the Radek-Piatkov Trial • 10c

PIONEER PUBLISHERS
100 FIFTH AVE., N. Y. C.

TWENTY years ago Claude Kitchen had the courage to tell the House of Representatives: "It takes neither moral nor physical courage to declare a war for others to fight. . . . Half the civilized world is now a slaughter-house for human beings. This nation is the last hope of peace on earth, good will toward men. . . . Whatever be the future, whatever be the rewards or penalties of this nation's step, I shall always believe that we could and ought to have kept out of this war."

To-day, while the press is full of reminders of the hysteria of that moment and of portents of another similar moment, it is fitting that the story of this lonely, brave man should be told in full for the first time.

CLAUDE KITCHIN and the WILSON WAR POLICIES

By Alex Mathews Arnett

$3.00

LITTLE,

BROWN

1837

1937

Dog Eat Dog

I CAN GET IT FOR YOU WHOLESALE. By Jerome Weidman. Simon and Schuster. $2.

TO LET a rascal tell his own story, all unconscious of his rascality, is one of the more difficult fictional patterns. Difficult, for one thing, because the reader may miss the point. Thackeray, afraid we might not recognize his Barry Lyndon for the wretch he was, slipped a warning and a moral into a footnote: "From these curious confessions it would appear that Mr. Lyndon maltreated his wife in every possible way. . . . But let the reader look around and ask himself, Do not as many rogues succeed in life as honest men?" And so on in the best Thackeray manner. That manner is out of date, and Mr. Weidman leaves his tale unmoralized, thereby running the risk of having Harry Bogen admired as the hero of a success story. For he does achieve a brilliant success according to his desires and standards, and these are unquestionably those of an acquisitive society in some of its jungle reaches. "Two years ago I was just another poor slob from the Bronx," Harry exults at the very end of the book, "and tonight I'm going to sleep with an actress." And this actress was a prize that fell only to the highest bidder.

In those two years covered by the novel Harry began by provoking and then selling out a strike of shipping clerks in the cloak-and-suit industry and ended, for the time being, by pulling off a highly profitable bankruptcy. The narrative—carried forward almost entirely by dialogue that is lively, hard-boiled, and probably richly authentic—is absorbing, although one keeps wishing it weren't, and longing to wipe Harry and the whole garment industry off the map. Harry's amiable side, a little overstressed, comes out in his relationship with his mother, who would, if she could, have saved him for honest kosher family life in the Bronx with Ruthie Rivkin. She fails, and even Harry feels a little uneasy and puzzled when she tries to make him see how he has changed: "There used to be a time when you had to come home at night. You said you had to come home and sit by the table and eat blintzes and stretch your legs out and get a rest where nobody is going to jump on you from the back, like you said. You said—I remember even the words—you said you had to come home because here it's not—you said it yourself—here it's not dog eat dog. . . . You're hard now. You don't need a rest any more. Now it's all right by you if it's dog eat dog all the time." Harry shakes his head and wonders what had wound Ma up.

In an interesting note about the writing of the book, which is his first novel, Mr. Weidman says that the boys he grew up with on the lower East Side were a pretty decent bunch. But when he began to run into some of them later in business, they had changed quite a bit—like Harry. "Where had they got that thin-lipped shrewdness?" What had turned them into these sharp little wise guys and made them so positive that they knew what they were doing and were doing it right? So he decided to put one of them down on canvas, and thus discover, perhaps, what it was that he had learned in ten years that had proved so much stronger a coloring agent than the things he'd been taught—about honesty and success. And his Harry Bogen proved so articulate that Mr. Weidman has enlarged his original plans for a portrait to a mural, of which this book, "I Can Get It for You Wholesale," is the first panel.

DOROTHY BREWSTER

DRAMA

Miss McCarthy and the Critics

IN THIS issue we print the second and last of Mary McCarthy's articles on the New York critics and the art of acting. Like those on book reviewers which she wrote some time ago with Margaret Marshall, they are, in all conscience, slashing enough; and since I myself am referred to in this series as I was in the last, it may be of some interest if I indicate my reaction to what Miss McCarthy has to say about me and my fellows.

From certain of the specific judgments I dissent sharply. I do not, for example, think that Miss Lynn Fontanne has used up her talents, for she still seems to me to give highly satisfactory, sometimes brilliant performances. Neither, though Miss Cornell is not my favorite actress, do I believe that her popularity is full accounted for by Miss McCarthy. But it is not possible to respond with a simple "yes" or "no" to certain of her other opinions, although I do think that her method often tempts one to remark that to set her own opinion against another opinion and then to laugh scornfully does not necessarily prove that she is right.

Nevertheless, I think it true that both I myself and many of my colleagues treat plays more analytically than we do performances, and there are several reasons why this should be true. For one thing the drama of the last generation has been remarkable for the extent to which it has introduced novel subject matter and points of view which invited elaborate discussion. At the same time it was also true that acting—at least if we believe the old-timers—was rather less distinguished than it had formerly been, and there was, therefore, good reason for concentrating on the plays: they were simply more interesting. For another thing, as Miss McCarthy herself mentions, it was difficult for a critic to learn much about acting, since he only very rarely had an opportunity to see a part acted by more than one person. The result was that, having no basis for comparison, we found it difficult to know whether or not a given actor was getting out of a part all that it was possible to get. Where artistic creation is concerned, one cannot, after all, tell what the possibilities of any situation are until they have been exploited by some artist. The overworked adjective "adequate" may not convey very much, but perhaps it often conveyed all we could be expected to know—namely, that the actor in question realized the obvious possibilities of the part. Whether or not genius might be able to discover more is a question not to be answered until genius has tried.

If the increased popularity of revivals noticed during this season is really the beginning of a new interest in the reinterpretation of standard plays, then perhaps we shall learn more about acting and have more to say. The fact will, however, still remain that the critic on a daily or a weekly paper writes for the average playgoer rather than for the actor or the student of acting, and the average playgoer will probably continue to be more interested in the total effect of a production than in technical analysis of the extent to which the actor and the author have contributed to it.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

[Next week, "Neutrality for the United States," by Edwin Borchard and William Potter Lage, will be reviewed by Stephen Raushenbush.]

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by

C. B. S. Evans, M.D., F.A.M.A., Member White House Conference, Committee on Maternal Care, Washington—Introduction by R. W. Holmes, M.D., F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch. M., M.B., Specializing Obstetrician, Gynecologist and Sexologist, London, England.

Illustrations by Robert L. Dickinson, M.D., F.A.C.S.—Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital.

Illustrated with
Correct Anatomical Diagrams
Fully Explained

A 3-WAY-GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing
Woman's Hygiene

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clammy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in Sex

The Unsatisfied Wife

Effect of Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Aquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via Special Language of Sex
Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of Sexual Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."
—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."
—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that a physician may safely suggest."
—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."
—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View • Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View • Male Sex Organs, Front View • Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views
The Internal Sex Organs • The External Sex Organs • Female Sex Organs, Front View • Entrance to
(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., Dept. 993-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 and a few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 14 days and purchase price will be refunded. I am over 21 years old.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

"From a very large clinical experience I have come to the conclusion that probably not one in five men know how to perform the sexual act correctly."

COMMEMORATION OF THE BURNING OF THE BOOKS

In honor of the German writers whose works were burned by the Nazis on May 10th, 1933

ANTI NAZI MEETING

THURSDAY, MAY 20th, 8 P.M.

MECCA TEMPLE

133 West 55th Street, N. Y. C.

*Against Nazi destruction of culture!
Against Nazi race hatred, persecution and terror!
Against Nazi war plans and intervention in Spain!*

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD—Editor, "The Nation"
PROF. JULIUS LIPS—Hon. Pres., German American League for Culture

MARTIN HALL—Secret correspondent on Reichstag Fire Trial to foreign newspapers

REV. HERMAN F. REISSIG—North American Committee to Aid
Spanish Democracy

QUINCY HOWE
VITO MARCANTONIO
GERHART SEGER
JAMES WATERMAN WISE
S. JOHN BLOCK, Chairman

ADMISSION: 30c, 49c, $1.00

(Tickets also in advance from offices below)

Auspices: American Committee for Anti-Nazi Literature, 63 Fifth Avenue, N. Y.

German American League for Culture, 1476
Broadway, N. Y.

League of American Writers

German Writers Guild

Artists Union

American Student Union

A Survey of PUBLIC HEALTH In the SOVIET UNION

under leadership of

JOHN A. KINGSBURY

Co-author of "Red Medicine"

On invitation from the U.S.S.R. Commissariat of Public Health, a group of American public health officers, physicians and nurses will have opportunity this summer to study public health and socialized medicine in the world's only planned society.

Sailing from New York July 10. Nine weeks of travel. Rate with Tourist steamship passage and comfortable travel abroad. Membership limited. $797

Other group tours in Europe and Russia—some at low cost.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

DECORATION DAY WEEK END

May 28 to 31 . . . 3 Days—$16.00

($6.50 day . . . slightly higher for deluxe cabins)

CAMP TAMIMENT

TAMIMENT—PENNSYLVANIA

New York Office: 7 East 15th St.—ALgonquin 4-3441

Philadelphia: 1240 Widener Bldg.—Rittenhouse 3394

RECORDS

THE vagaries in the handling of subscription releases continue. H. M. V.'s Bach Society, which was formed to record for subscribers the forty-eight Preludes and Fugues of Bach's Well-Tempered Clavichord, has reached its fourth volume; and without issuing the earlier volumes Victor offers this one under its own label. There are seven records ($14), on which Preludes and Fugues 11 to 19 of Book II are played by Edwin Fischer. Bach, in some instances, proceeded by setting problems, conditions, and limitations for the exercise of his technical skill; and it is to this procedure that we owe the sonatas for solo violin and for solo 'cello, the Art of Fugue, the Well-Tempered Clavichord. In this last work, as in the others, the results are sometimes only interesting or impressive as demonstrations of the technical skill, and sometimes they are, in addition, as profoundly moving as anything Bach wrote; and both categories are represented in the fourth volume of the Bach Society. Fischer's performances are excellent in conception, style, feeling; but often the playing is blurred and occasionally things are not heard at all, either because he did not play them clearly, or they were not recorded clearly, or the pressing is poor. I mention this last possibility because the surface noise is unusually great; and it may be true only of some pressings.

Victor also has issued Bach's Italian Concerto in a performance on the harpsichord by Wanda Landowska (two records, $4). This version is more exciting than Musicraft's recording of Ralph Kirkpatrick's performance: for one thing, in its sheer magnificence of sound, which is accounted for by the fact that Landowska uses a deeper-toned and more resonant harpsichord (of modern manufacture, I believe), and the fact that this difference is emphasized by the higher volume level of the recording; and for another thing, in the dynamic quality of Landowska's style of performance. It is, however, a style that at times, in the first and third movements, strikes me as exaggeratedly and theatrically dynamic; and it tortures the beautiful slow movement in a way that I dislike intensely. The Kirkpatrick version may be pallid by comparison; but its sound of the harpsichord seems to me the more authentic, and its performance of the second movement I find ideal.

On two records ($4) Victor has issued a Mass for the Dead, sung by the Choral Society of the University of Pennsylvania under the direction of Dr. Harl McDonald. The accompanying notes explain that this is one of the works from the library of the school of music in the Benedictine monastery of Montserrat, Catalonia, that became available to the world only with the revolution of 1931. We hear it now sung by a mixed chorus, and somewhat altered by this change in vocal color and by the necessary redistribution of parts from what it sounded like originally, when it was sung by a chorus of men and boys in a church, somewhere around 1600. But what we hear is a very beautiful piece of music.

I have found B. C. N. needles excellent for the old Decca records that I discussed a few weeks ago. They reduce the noise; which improves the quality of the music, and permits one to step up the volume if necessary. And they do not lose any of the music, because what they would lose on the new records is not recorded on these old ones.

B. H. HAGGIN

Letters to the Editor

Collective Action by Secret Diplomacy

Dear Sirs: To those who are urging the participation of the American government in collective action, may I express my suspicion that it is already a participant in collective action—with the British Foreign Office and the American hierarchy of the Roman church. I for one can find no other explanation of its failure to extend to the recognized government of Spain the rights guaranteed by international law to all recognized governments, or of its failure to register an indignant protest against the massacre of Spanish civilians, women, and children by mercenary invaders.

The great disadvantage that all peace lovers work under is their utter ignorance of the diplomatic machinations of the government. To bring these machinations into the light is the great task peace lovers should set themselves. Only after popular control of our diplomatic service is assured, will it be safe to urge collective action. FRANK D. SLOCUM
New York, May 3

Edward Page Gaston Holds Back the Revolution

Dear Sirs: Yesterday by chance there fell into my hands a letter that was written to a young "captain" in the R. O. T. C. in our local high school. I send a copy herewith. It deserves to be given wide publicity for the benefit of those who think "it can't happen here."

MAUDE C. LOWER

Phoenix, Ariz., May 4

PATRIOT GUARD OF AMERICA

Dear Captain: Will you help us to fight communism? As I am a member of a leading military-reserve organization, I appeal for your help as a reservist for our Patriot Guard. We actively fight the communism now sweeping the United States through illegal labor disturbances and other destructive actions.

As President-emeritus Lowell of Harvard said recently, "Armed insurrection—defiance of law, order, and duly elected authority—is spreading like wildfire." Three million Communists and their sympathizers are estimated to be now operating here. Communist-labor and other demagogues, with gangs of terrorists and racketeers, are rapidly getting a stranglehold upon us.

Our loyal citizens are weak because unorganized. Our enemies are strong because organized. They are driving straight for their ultimate objective—seizing the government by force if necessary. A paralyzing national strike and revolution are inevitable if this continues. I went through the Moscow-financed general strike in England in 1926, when my family had a part in breaking down that short-lived revolutionary effort.

Our Patriot Guard is a staunch friend of genuine workers and legitimate labor unions. It stands for a square deal between capital and labor, with compulsory settlement of all industrial disputes by conciliation and arbitration. A Congressional bill is in preparation prohibiting all strikes and lockouts hereafter. We aim to outlaw the Communist Party and other disloyalties by forcing through the necessary federal legislation.

We ask your help as a reservist by filling in the enlistment blank inclosed. Would you consider accepting command of the Patriot Guard in your district; or can you suggest someone? A roster of our officials will be ready shortly, but the personnel of the Patriot Guard is confidential, aside from myself, for obvious reasons. Dun-Bradstreet and other Washington agencies have my personal statement on file. If you are outside Washington, and have a representative here, I would be pleased to show official documents, etc.

Please read this letter at your next reserve chapter or other meeting, and report with names of other enlisters; also please secure notice of the general movement in the press, if possible.

Yours for fighting patriotism,

EDWARD PAGE GASTON, (Captain, Reserve)

National Commander, Patriot Guard
Washington, April 6

Not Interested in the C.M.T.C.

Dear Sirs: May I answer in your pages a recent form letter which I, a high-school principal, received from Major John H. Rodman, C. M. T. C. Officer, Fort Omaha, Nebraska?

My dear Major Rodman: You write that "for the first time in several years it has become necessary to recruit intensively for the Citizens' Military Training Camps." Frankly, that is delightful news. I only hope this condition is general throughout the country. I have been inclined to be skeptical over our youth peace movements; I had feared that when the war drums beat again, our youngsters would succumb to the propaganda of pseudo-patriotism. But your letter gives me new hope. Did you notice by the way that only a few days after your letter went out some 1,000,000 college students joined in a protest against war and militarism?

You say that some years ago high-school principals were requested to furnish your office with names and addresses of young men eligible for the training camps. I just can't recall the incident. If I did receive such a request I must have pitched it into the basket—as most principals will pitch this one.

I note that "the minimum age limit is seventeen years by the end of the calendar year." That really means sixteen years, doesn't it, though your way of stating it sounds better. But don't you think that, however you state it, it's a rather tender age at which to begin administering military instruction?

In conclusion, I wish formally to decline to act as one of your recruiting officers, even in an unofficial capacity. And I don't think the children would be interested in your C. M. T. C. literature.

BRYAN FULKS

Hot Springs, Ark., May 5

Write Your Congressmen!

Dear Sirs: H. J. Resolution 260, introduced in the House by Representative John E. Rankin, and a similar measure introduced in the Senate by Senator George W. Norris, provide for an investigation of the recent activities of the private power companies in fighting municipal ownership and public projects and blocking the expansion and improvement of such undertakings. The investigation is to be made by the Federal Trade Commission and an appropriation of $150,000 is to be provided. The bill has been approved by the Bureau of the Budget and will have hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce within a few weeks.

It is extremely important that this measure should carry. Some of the recent methods of the power companies have been more ingenious, subtle, and desperate than ever. In preparation for the hearings Congressman Rankin has asked us to get for him all possible statements of facts, affidavits, and so forth, bearing upon this subject. Please send them as promptly as possible to Congressman John E. Rankin, House Office Building, Washington, D. C. Write your Congressman and Senators urging them to support the measures.

CARL D. THOMPSON, Director,
Public Ownership

Chicago, April 27 League of America

Repealing Repression

Dear Sir: Thank you for your editorial in your May 1 issue on the decision of the United States Supreme Court in the Herndon case. Your comment, "Let the states look to their laws—especially those which tamper with the Bill of Rights—and they will save themselves both good money and bad publicity," is especially to the point.

There is a nation-wide movement for the repeal of all state laws against insurrection, criminal syndicalism, etc. The International Labor Defense took the case of Dirk de Jonge, charged in Oregon with criminal syndicalism, to the United States Supreme Court and won it. The decision in that case did not, however, invalidate the law. Immediately after this victory, therefore, the I. L. D. undertook a campaign for the law's repeal in Oregon, had a repeal measure introduced, and secured its passage. In the neighboring state of Washington, at the same time, the Commonwealth Federation, encouraged by the victory in the De Jong case, initiated a similar legislative campaign and won. In California, where eight persons are in prison or on parole under sentences on criminal-syndicalism charges, favorable legislative action is a not remote possibility.

A repeal bill was defeated in Montana, but the fight will break into the open again when the legislature reconvenes. Repeal bills have been introduced in Indiana, Ohio, Minnesota, Michigan, and Illinois. As soon as the Herndon decision was known, the Illinois Senate Judiciary Committee hastily wrote a favorable report on the criminal-syndicalism repealer bill which the I. L. D. had had introduced.

LOUIS COLMAN

International Labor Defense
New York, May 3

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

SUMMER—FOR RENT

June, July, August and September, farm house at East Millstone, N. J. 40 miles from Hudson Tunnel, good railroad commuting to Bound Brook, New Brunswick. 1770 Colonial remodeled house; 5 bedrooms, 2 baths, living room, dining room, kitchen, pantry; 2 car garage, electric stove, icebox. House on canal; canoe. Property abuts river. Swimming pool. Property being farmed. Price $500 for 4 months. Further details telephone, Gross, CAL. 5-1582.

Harrison, Maine. 350 miles. Island camp; 12 acres, sandy beach, gas, plumbing. Six rooms, bath. Accommodates 8. $300 season. Shogut, Mohegan Lake, N. Y.

Large 3 room cottage, sleeping porch, gas, electricity, shower, concrete swimming pool, tennis, 3 miles from Peekskill. Call evenings —Lorraine 7-7224.

Oscawana Lake—shore house, garage, boat, completely furnished 6 rooms and livable attic (2 rooms) radio, piano, gas, electricity, telephone, artesian water, screened porch. $600 for season. Phone Circle 7-0830.

Solid stonehouse, 10 large furnished rooms, all cross ventilated, beautiful garden, near Bronxville station. June 1 to Oct. 1—$700. MUr. 2-3757.

House, 8 rooms with or without studio, 2 baths, all modern conveniences, 6 acres at Croton-on-Hudson. $500 and $600, Summer season. William Gropper, Mt. Airy Road, Croton-on-Hudson. Croton 3619.

Bungalow, 7 rooms, 3 baths, 2 car garage, all modern conveniences. Fully equipped. 25 acres woodland. 1 mile from Bethlehem, White Mountains, N. H. Tel. WOrth 2-0537.

Furnished summer house, 3 rooms and large sleeping porch. Wooded lot. Beach privileges. Mohegan Colony. CH. 3-8835.

FOR RENT—FURNISHED

Studio or apartment; unusually artistic surroundings; Steinway; Radio; library; spacious; sunny; centrally located; reasonable; references exchanged. SUs. 7-9880.

ROOMS WANTED

Young couple desire room, kitchenette, week ends, country, near lake, near N. Y. Reasonable. Write details, No. 906, c/o The Nation. Furnished room with Bath, preferably in Conn., commuting distance N. Y. Near station and Sound. Light kitchen privileges. Responsible person. Write details, Box No. 907, c/o The Nation.

FOR SALE

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value
C. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515-W

29 acres, 15 miles So. Sacramento; 18 acres prunes, 30 fig trees, Dip plant, 4 room house, barn, garage, chicken house, fenced. A lovely place at Sacramento $4500—$1000 down, balance, 25 months. R. LaPosea, P. O. Box 415, Oakland, Calif. or Commodore Hotel.

Laconia, New Hampshire, overnight trip. 100 acres, hillside, pine woods, fields, with fine view of mountains and lakes; charming old house, 11 rooms, bath, completely furnished; piped water. Sell reasonable. Enquire Kohn, 100 E. 42nd St., N. Y. C.

TRAVEL

TOURS CONDUCTED OR INDEPENDENT

To Western Europe, Palestine, Soviet Russia, Paris International Exposition,
and the Salzburg Festival
Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK
11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

WRITING INSTRUCTION

PERSONALLY CONDUCTED, mail course in modern short story writing. A professional apprenticeship, $30. Satisfaction assured. Robert L. Newman, 251 W. 71st St., N. Y.

CONTRIBUTORS

GEORGE SELDES, a journalist of many years' experience abroad, has just returned from three months in Spain as correspondent of the New York Post.

MAURY MAVERICK of Texas and JERRY VOORHIS of California are both members of the progressive bloc in Congress.

McALISTER COLEMAN is head of the Information Bureau of the Utility Users' League of New Jersey.

ROBERT KEEN LAMB, now on the economics faculty of Williams College resigned last year as instructor in economics at Harvard, where he worked in close cooperation with Drs. Sweezy and Walsh. At one time he served as the university's director of publicity.

MORRIE RYSKIND, playwright, humorist, and M-G-M scenarist, is The Nation's Hollywood correspondent.

LECTURE

MUHLENBERG LIBRARY FORUM 209 West 23rd Street

Discussion Group

SOME BASIC CONCEPTS IN POLITICS AND ECONOMICS: Aristotle, St. Augustine, Karl Marx, John Dewey.

Leader: Herbert Lamm
Wednesday Evenings at 8.30 o'clock

LUNCHEON

Annual Luncheon of the
CONSUMERS LEAGUE OF NEW YORK
GOVERNOR FRANK MURPHY OF MICHIGAN

will speak on
"GOVERNMENT'S STAKE IN INDUSTRIAL PEACE"

May 14—12:45 P. M.—Hotel Pennsylvania
TICKETS $1.50—for sale at 112 East 19th St.
GRamercy 7-0544

SCHOOL

THE COMMUNITY SCHOOL

2059 Bedford Ave. Brooklyn, N. Y.
BUckminster 2-9700

A Low Tuition, Progressive School, Coeducational, Ages 4-13. Enriched Curriculum, Child Psychologist. Reservations for 1937-38 Now Accepted.

RECORDS

At last records of Union Songs. Catalogue on request. TIMELY RECORDING CO. Dept. N. 235 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62 cents a line

Minimum three lines

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 22, 1937

NUMBER 21

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

577

EDITORIALS:

MR. GREEN'S SOLIDARITY

579

HOT GOLD

580

NAZI SCOUTS IN AFRICA

581

WHAT NEXT IN SOCIAL SECURITY?

by Maxwell S. Stewart

582

TIME, FORTUNE, LIFE

by Dwight Macdonald

583

KINGS AND BUS DRIVERS

by Harold J. Laski

586

HOFFMAN OF NEW JERSEY

by McAlister Coleman

588

"BUNKUM AND BUNTING"

by Oswald Garrison Villard

592

FROM PILATE'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

by Heywood Broun

593

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

FREEDOM AND MR. MINSKY

by Joseph Wood Krutch

594

BLUNDERING INTO WAR

by Stephen Raushenbush

595

FOR AN INVESTORS' UNION

by Isidor Feinstein

597

LITERARY CHOREOGRAPHY

by Babette Deutsch

598

ANTI-METAPHYSICAL PHILOSOPHY

by Eliseo Vivas

599

VAN GOGH: A SELF-PORTRAIT

by Michael Sayers

601

FILMS: ANOTHER MADMAN

by Mark Van Doren

602

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE PRESIDENT'S RETURN TO WASHINGTON at least threw the gears in and started various wheels moving. But this is not to imply that the government machine knows where it is going. Never during the Roosevelt regime have so many obstacles blocked the road. There seems, for example, to be no detour around the immovable bulk of the Supreme Court steam-roller stalled directly in the middle of the right of way. Until that gets into motion little else can, though the legislative traffic is backed up for miles. Except for relief, few bills of any importance are scheduled for early action. A new farm-relief measure providing for production control to support the "ever-normal" granary principle and for automatic tariff adjustments to prevent extreme price fluctuations is being introduced with backing from the Administration and from influential farm organizations. But in these days not even such auspicious omens insure adoption. The same may be said of several new labor measures, now in committee and supposed to have Presidential support. Mr. Roosevelt insists that he will push his whole program of federal action to raise social standards, but his mere say-so no longer creates the fact.

★

WHATEVER ITS LEGAL JUSTIFICATION THE Supreme Court decision on the Louisiana chain-store tax will have enormous social effects which the liberal majority must surely have contemplated. In upholding the right of a state to tax chains on the basis of their total number of stores—including those outside the state—the court may well have doomed the national chains. The social value of such an outcome is highly debatable and will be discussed here at greater length next week.

★

THE MAKE-UP OF THE NEW SPANISH CABINET headed by Dr. Juan Negrin is significant for several reasons. Largo Caballero, who is widely known abroad as the "Spanish Lenin," has no place in it; and the name of Julio Alvarez del Vayo, formerly War Minister, is also missing. The Anarcho-Syndicalists, who had four posts in the preceding ministry, have been left out of the present one "after refusal to participate." The new ministry is parliamentary in character, and the number of portfolios has been reduced from nineteen to nine. What is most important, Indalecio Prieto, right Socialist, who is often considered Caballero's rival for party leadership, has taken over the posts of War, Air, and Marine. It is known that Caballero wished to concentrate these three posts in his own hands, which would have had the effect of eliminating Prieto from the Cabinet. Instead Prieto has emerged as the dominant figure. It would be unfortunate, however, if the government should lose the services of the ex-Premier, who despite his age is able and popular. And it would be disastrous to drive him into opposition.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

★

DR. NEGRIN, A CLOSE FRIEND OF PRIETO, IS himself a man of great force—vivacious, energetic, and highly cultured. As Minister of Finance he controlled the Carabineros, who together with the Communists suppressed the recent Anarchist-Trotskyite flare-up in Barcelona. The Carabineros are a special frontier force of carefully selected Socialists. In the past the Communists have been very modest in claiming posts for their party—they held only two minor places in Caballero's Cabinet—and have refrained from criticizing too harshly the Anarchists' indiscipline at the front and in the rear. But the alliance of the irreconcilable Anarchists with the Trotskyites, together with recent indications that the Anarchists are not as powerful as they were reputed to be, has led the Communists to demand a different set-up. They want a government that will not only pursue the war with greater vigor, but be less tolerant toward minorities which refuse to cooperate with the Popular Front. Negrin is an acceptable choice.

★

DESPITE STRONG ITALIAN AND GERMAN reinforcements and the support of a tremendous air fleet and motorized equipment, Franco has not been able to take Bilbao after three weeks' effort. Bilbao is hungry, overcrowded, badly organized, poorly supplied with arms, and has no airplanes. Yet it can resist. There are two reasons, and they have operated against the rebels ever since the civil war started. First, Franco's man power is very limited, whereas the Loyalists can make up in quantity what they lack in quality. Second, the population of newly acquired territory is hostile, and that applies especially to the Basque Catholics, who do not trust the Catholicism of Franco's Moors and Nazis. Bilbao could easily be saved in the eleventh hour if the Basques received fifty airplanes. We learn that these airplanes are already in Bilbao but cannot fly owing to the absence of an adequate airdrome. Reinforcements from Asturias and Santander may be able to hold Franco until the field is prepared. Other fronts seem to be quiet but are not. The daily reports of the official Agence Espagne show that the slaughter continues and that on the Madrid, Guadalajara, and Cordoba fronts the government is pushing back the enemy meter by meter. The encirclement of the rebels in University City apparently determined one section of them to surrender. The other section forthwith attacked the first, while the Loyalists watched with pleasure. It is only a matter of time before this wedge into Madrid will be expelled. Meanwhile there is documentary proof from prisoners that Germany and Italy sent men into Spain after the new patrol system was introduced. But what is another scrap of paper in a full wastepaper basket?

★

THE CURRENT SOVIET CAMPAIGN AGAINST graft, bureaucracy, and "Trotskyism" has culminated in the arrest of four high officials of the Central Trade Union Council. It is charged that through carelessness, inefficiency, and favoritism millions of rubles of the workers' funds, supposedly designed for social insurance, were either frittered away on worthless projects or diverted to anti-social purposes. The shake-up among the trade-union executives follows closely on the heels of the demotion of Marshal Tukhachevsky, who was mentioned in the January trials, and the arrest of Tumanov, a former director of the Prombank, who is accused of having diverted Soviet funds for the use of foreign Trotskyists. Press attacks have also been directed against a group of writers who are charged with having been associated with Yagoda, the former GPU leader who is now in prison charged with wholesale misappropriation of funds. That the periodic "cleanings" which are so characteristic of Soviet life are often subject to grave abuse is indicated in Vishinsky's warning against "unjustified charges of sabotage." While these "cleanings" are undoubtedly valuable in ridding the country of incompetent or dishonest officials, they are frequently carried so far that they make conscientious and able officials afraid to take responsibility lest they be charged with wrecking. Through its paralyzing effect on economic life, the purge may prove more detrimental than the evils it seeks to correct.

★

RENEWAL OF ANTI-JEWISH RIOTS IN POLAND, in which fifty-three persons were injured in a few days' time, has again fixed attention on the desperate plight of the three million Jews in that country. Although the Polish Jews have long suffered harsh discrimination and lived under unbelievable conditions of poverty, they have only recently been made the object of a systematic terror comparable to that in Nazi Germany. Jews are barred from many important sectors of Polish economic life. They are forbidden to bid for government, municipal, or army orders; Jewish workers have been excluded from the government tobacco, salt, and match monopolies; Jewish students are rapidly being driven out of the universities; and the proportion of Jews in state employment has fallen to less than 1 per cent. Where official discrimination does not exist, Polish nationalists have taken the law into their own hands. Market stalls belonging to Jews have repeatedly been destroyed, hundreds of shops have been wrecked, and Jews have been forcefully ejected from cafes and restaurants. While the government has officially attempted to check the riots and pogroms which have brought death to hundreds within the past few years, its efforts have had little effect because of its general anti-Semitic bias.

THOSE INTERESTED IN THE UNGENTLE ART of getting and staying rich will follow with interest the efforts of the government to collect back taxes aggregating $1,800,000 from Pierre S. du Pont and John J. Raskob. Mr. du Pont, it appears, had foresight enough to get out of the stock market early in 1929 with a profit of some $35,000,000. After the crash he and Mr. Raskob initiated a series of gross sales aggregating some $30,000,000 which ended, sometime in 1930, with each having exactly the same stock he originally held but together able to show a combined loss of $7,500,000, which they deducted from their 1929 income-tax returns. Although the market value of the stocks had changed materially between sales, enough to throw out the balance between the two by $700,000 at one time, the transactions ended with their respective shares only $46 short of a perfect balance. This, the defense claims, was accidental, since the complicated sales were wholly unconnected and the prices were not manipulated. The government, the defense holds further, is betraying an avarice definitely shocking to the gentlemen traders.

★

THE AMERICAN COMMITTEE FOR SPANISH Relief has suffered important defections, but Michael Williams still stands firm for civilization according to Franco. In his honor, and in the hope of alienating all decent Catholics from his relief project, we print here the caption of a photograph reproduced in a French pamphlet on the destruction of Durango, sister city of Guernica. "The priest Melilla," it reads, "was struck at the altar as he celebrated mass. He was found clad in his sacred vestments, killed by a bomb." The photograph, which is even more vivid than its caption, was taken after the fascist angels had spread their wings over the second "martyred city" of the Basques. The Tale of Guernica, as its context is revealed, becomes ever more terrible. The Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian reports that on April 22—three days before the massacre—a dispatch appeared in the Frankfurter Zeitung in which the system of demoralizing the unprotected "reds" by bombing them first and then firing down on them with machine-guns was described in every detail. It was obvious, said the Guardian's correspondent, that the author of the dispatch had been in contact with the German air authorities in the north of Spain; and the diary of the captured Nazi aviator which recorded that rebel fliers had orders to "shoot everything that moved" is one more evidence of the thoroughness with which the Zeitung's "system" was applied in Guernica. We may be sure that the flames of Guernica will not soon die down. They have already destroyed Franco's pretensions of "saving" Spain. When will they get too hot for a committee which calls itself American?

★

THE NEWS FROM PARIS OF H. DE KERILLIS'S resignation as leader writer of the Echo de Paris, together with that of the editor and a large part of the staff, is an indication of the troubles that have lately beset the rightist press. Since the passage of Blum's press-reform laws the newspapers of the right have suffered a loss in revenue from subsidies and have been forced to raise their price. This, with the violence of their attacks on the government and their open support of Franco, has caused their circulation to fall off. As a journalist M. de Kerillis may be compared with Carbuccia of the Gringoire, whose calumnies were responsible for the suicide of Roger Salengro, Minister of the Interior, and with Charles Maurras of the Action Française, now in prison for instigating the attempt to murder Léon Blum in 1936. But a more dangerous man than De Kerillis is Jacques Doriot, head of the Parti Populaire Français and successor to De la Rocque as France's would-be Führer. Already publisher of a weekly, Emancipation Nationale, he has just bought control of the daily Liberté. Through it he will continue to preach that spurious socialism which is a sure sign of genuine fascism.

★

AS CONTRIBUTOR OF OUR WEEKLY LETTER from Washington, Paul W. Ward has served The Nation since January, 1936—and the phrase may justly be taken in a double sense. It is with deep regret and some trepidation, therefore, that we announce to our readers Mr. Ward's departure for England, where he will take charge of the London bureau of the Baltimore Sun. Both in Washington and in our pages he has become an institution—if one so lively can be called an institution—and for excellent reasons. As a first-rate newspaperman with a clear and uncynical understanding of social forces, he has carried on a tradition in American journalism which has played an important role in the past and will be even more important in the complex future. Mr. Ward's particular talent for penetration and exposure is certainly needed in London as much as in Washington, and we look forward to his dispatches in the Baltimore Sun as well as to the articles he will occasionally contribute to these pages. Despite these compensations we hope his absence from the American front will be brief.

Mr. Green's Solidarity

THE antiquated woodcutters of the American Federation of Labor continue to hack away at the Committee for Industrial Organization—and they can hardly be expected to understand why industrial unionism, like the oak tree of the fable, grows stronger as they hack. Every move so far made by Green and Frey to discredit the C. I. O. and establish their own right to speak for American labor has had exactly the opposite effect. The A. F. of L. long ago demonstrated its incapacity to build a modern labor movement; it has actually functioned as an enemy of labor and in its frantic fight for survival has not hesitated to employ every weapon forbidden to labor's friends. As Mr. Lewis pointed out at the convention of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union in Atlantic City, Mr. Green indulged in plain treachery in the General Motors strike when he asked Governor Murphy by telephone not to permit a sole-bargaining agreement with any one union, meaning the United Automobile Workers. A little later an A. F. of L. organizer, the notorious F. J. Dillon, sent a telegram to the country's leading union hater, Edsel Ford, attacking the U. A. W. (not by name), denouncing the sitdown as "repulsive and demoralizing," and expressing the "sincere hope that you will view with favor the desire of the A. F. of L. to cooperate with managements generally in preserving . . . industrial peace." Edsel Ford was noncommittal, but the Consolidated Edison of New York recently took the hint when it tried to drive its workers into a "safe" A. F. of L. craft union in order to combat the militant C. I. O. local which was successfully organizing its employees. In other cases A. F. of L. craft unions, in their zeal to fight the C. I. O., have themselves assumed the character of industrial unions—which means that they will presently be at each other's throats.

In Washington the executive council of the federation has tried to fight the C. I. O. in other, more dangerous, ways. It attempted to protect craft unions by having the Wagner Act amended to prevent the granting of exclusive bargaining privileges to any one union in a plant, and accepted the good offices of the reactionary Representative Dies to get the amendment introduced in the House when no genuine friend of labor would touch it. Its lobbyists backed the move for a Congressional investigation of sitdowns the main proponents of which were Dies and other Southern red-baiters who are afraid of the textile drive in the South. John P. Frey, moreover, asked the National Labor Relations Board to "respect craft divisions" in holding plant elections, saying that the granting of "sole-bargaining rights was a denial of the rights of a minority."

These are scattered examples. Throughout the country the A. F. of L. bureaucrat is functioning as the agent of disruption. As such, he is being used by the employers and spurned by the rank and file. Meanwhile Mr. Green continues to assume the pose of outraged virtue. In reply to Lewis's speech at Atlantic City he said that Lewis "lacked proper understanding of his telephone call to Governor Murphy"—he did not deny making it. He went on to "offer as an answer to this unwarranted allegation my life's record of service to . . . organized labor," and ended by pleading for "unity, solidarity, and cooperation within the ranks of labor," for which he said he was ready to "render any service."

To Mr. Green the answer can be made that within labor's ranks unity, solidarity, and cooperation prevail, of an extent and quality to frighten an A. F. of L. bureaucrat out of his wits. That solidarity begins just to the left of the craft-union officialdom; from week to week it covers an ever-widening sector of workers (it has even increased the membership of craft unions), and it promises to encompass the great majority of wage-earners. At the moment the C. I. O. is mopping up the independent companies in the steel industry after having organized the great bulk of steel workers. In New York City it recently demonstrated its hold on the imagination of the rank and file when, in an election held for the 13,500 employees of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company, 10,638 out of 11,585 cast their ballots for the C. I. O. Here too we had a perfect example of A. F. of L. tactics. Having failed to organize these workers, the A. F. of L. union in the field now says it will not abide by the outcome of the election in which it refused to take part. To the overwhelming vote in favor of the C. I. O. it opposed the dry-as-dust contention that the election was illegally held. It was the same sort of solidarity Mr. Green had in mind when two days after his appeal for unity he ordered the suspension of C. I. O. affiliates from the Los Angeles Central Labor Council, thus ridding himself of 10,000 troublesome members—who were promptly granted C. I. O. charters.

We may look forward to similar actions in other cities. We do not minimize their deplorable effects, but in the long run they can have no important influence on labor's course. Even at this point the announcement that the A. F. of L. may soon formally expel the C. I. O. unions makes the same impression as if we were told that a dead shell had decided to "expel" the living organism that has already sloughed it off.

Hot Gold

THERE could be no surer sign that the fires of reform are burning low in Washington than the undue prominence that has been given recently to the subject of "hot gold." The problem is by no means a new one. For more than four years gold has been pouring steadily into the country. At the end of 1932 the national gold stocks were $4,226,000,000, which was nearly a billion and a half more than was needed as backing for our currency. At the end of 1934 they had risen to no less than $8,238,000,000 in devalued dollars. By the end of 1936 we had added another three billion, bringing the total to $11,258,000,000. By the middle of this May we held approximately $11,900,000,000, or more than 53 per cent of the world's supply of monetary gold.

Meanwhile, stimulated by unprecedented prices, gold production has risen to record heights. The increase in 1936 was larger than in any year in history, except after the three big gold strikes in Transvaal, California, and Australia. The spectacle of miners the world over working feverishly to dig out ever-increasing amounts of the yellow metal only to have it taken to Fort Knox and buried once more in the earth has been the subject of many well-taken quips. There can be no doubt that the United States is suffering from one of the most colossal gyp games in history, albeit one in which we laid down the rules. Gold is considerably overvalued in terms of American currency. Every ounce of the metal which we obtain from abroad has to be paid for, ultimately, in the product of "cheap" American labor. Although we get only about two-thirds as much gold per unit of labor as before the depression, we have been buying huge amounts on these terms.

All this would not be so bad if it served any useful purpose. But the accumulation of more than half the world's gold supply in the United States means that a number of countries are deprived of sufficient gold to stabilize their currencies and abolish trade restrictions. And the gold is of no conceivable value to us as long as we continue to keep out foreign imports. We have accumulated gold because we did not want goods. Moreover, the recent moves of the Federal Reserve Board to reduce excess reserves and "sterilize" gold imports were prompted by fear lest our huge reserves stimulate a runaway inflation. The United States is an integral part of the world economic system, and any action we take which is injurious to world stability must ultimately react against our well-being. The only real gainers from $35 gold, apart from the Soviet government, are the owners of mining stocks, who in some instances have reaped fortunes.

The time to think of all this was obviously before devaluing the dollar by 41 per cent when a much smaller devaluation would have achieved the desired purpose. There was scarcely an economist in the country who did not point out at that time the very pitfalls into which we are now stumbling. The undervaluing of the dollar was bound to bring huge capital imports and to distort our normal trade balance. It was certain to be followed by an unhealthy rise in prices. But that damage has largely been done. The question is now whether it would be wise to reverse the process by reducing the buying price of gold from $35 an ounce to, say, $30. Many economists have openly supported the proposal. The president of the Bank of International Settlements has suggested that the price of gold be reduced throughout the world as a means of checking the increase in gold production.

A reduction in the price of gold would undoubtedly have certain good results. It would definitely eliminate the threat of an immediate inflation, and would check the influx of capital which is now causing great concern. But there are certain dangers involved in fighting fire with fire. Any change in value of a currency, whether up or down, is bound to have profound repercussions throughout the economic system, as was illustrated by the recent collapse of the stock market on the rumor of revaluation. New maladjustments are created and a period of instability ensues. Nothing can be more disastrous to business confidence than continued uncertainty regarding the value of the monetary unit. While something must obviously be done to check the continuous inflow of hot gold, it is not necessary to resort to a measure as drastic as revaluation. What is really necessary to restore world economic stability is for the United States to discharge its responsibility as a leading creditor nation. This implies accepting a substantial surplus of imports over exports. While this process might be accelerated by raising the value of the dollar, it can also be achieved, at considerably less cost, by more vigorously pressing Secretary Hull's program for tariff reduction. Once abnormal barriers to trade are removed, the gold question will take care of itself.

Nazi Scouts in Africa

THE Führer seems determined to regain Germany's former African empire by fair means or foul. He was not daunted by the recent outlawing of the Deutsches Bund, his private army in Southwest Africa. When the Union government put its foot down on these Nazi scouts, it was a simple matter to ship them home to Germany and train them there. Already 600 young Germans from the colony are taking a postgraduate course in the Fatherland. They form the "Corporation of Patriots" and are to educate in their turn other Afro-Germans in those special skills and prejudices necessary for "tasks awaiting them abroad." This very week they are meeting in convention in Saxony. When their training is finished, the army will return, bit by bit, for a new attempt to establish Hitler's place in the southern sun.

Southwest Africa was given to the Union of South Africa as a mandated territory under the League of Nations. In 1923 representatives of the German government at London urged the Germans in Africa to co-operate in the mandate and to regard their future as bound to the Union. Thereupon some of the Germans became British subjects, and matters went smoothly for a while. But when Hitler came to power, his agents provocateurs began stirring up trouble. Numbers of German aliens entered the territory, established a boycott against their countrymen who had accepted Union nationality, organized or terrorized them, and encouraged the belief that Southwest Africa would soon be turned over to Germany.

Since last December the Union government has been pressing a measure to combat this threat and on April 2 General Hertzog, the Prime Minister, signed a proclamation granting power to the administrator of the mandate to publish the names of all public bodies and political organizations which should henceforth be closed to alien membership. It was aimed, obviously, at the Deutsches Bund. Three days later Herr Wiehl, the German Minister, presented a note of protest to General Hertzog, describing the ruling as "a combative measure against the Germans in Southwest Africa." Meanwhile, back in the Fatherland, the official press was voicing high indignation over the martyrdom of Germans in Africa. The Deutsche Allgemeine Zeitung announced that "the deprivation of their political rights will be regarded as a challenge by South Africans and this challenge must disturb the good relations between Germany and the Union." The Union stuck firm to its program, despite bullying. On April 19 the administrator at Windhoek decreed that by July 1 the Deutsches Bund must either disband or be wholly reorganized as an association of British subjects. And that is where matters stand today.

The Hertzog government deserves credit for having called Hitler's bluff—in contrast to many European governments. He has driven the Nazis underground. But his work will not be finished as long as Afro-German boys are carrying the gospel of Nazi imperialism from headquarters in Berlin back to Southwest Africa.

What Next in Social Security?

BY MAXWELL S. STEWART

SOME Monday in the near future the Supreme Court is expected to uphold the constitutionality of the old-age and unemployment provisions of the Social Security Act. Of the two phases of the act at issue the old-age annuity plan is by far the more important. For if federal old-age protection is held constitutional, there will no longer be any legal excuse for maintaining the present cumbersome federal-state plan of unemployment insurance. The constitutional case for a national system of protecting the jobless could be made even stronger than that for old-age annuities, since it could be defended as essential for preserving national economic stability.

Merely to list the specific changes which must be made before the act can afford even reasonable protection against unemployment would be tedious. Benefits which extend only from fifteen to twenty weeks would mean very little in a depression such as the one from which we are now emerging. In fact, it is doubtful whether such assistance has any long-range social value. For it abandons the individual worker in his hour of greatest need, and fails to support consumer buying power when it is most desperately required. Nor can the exclusion of three-fifths of the employed from its benefits be defended.

A national insurance system, on the other hand, would make possible a uniform program involving a substantial increase in both the amount and duration of benefits. Part of the extra expense involved in liberalizing benefits might be saved by pooling risks on a nation-wide rather than a state-wide scale. But additional funds will undoubtedly be necessary. European experience has shown that no worker-supported system can meet the needs of a protracted depression without government assistance. Unemployment is not really an insurable risk. No one knows whether the percentage of jobless will average 5 or 15 per cent over the next twenty years. And in so far as the causes of unemployment are social rather than individual, there would seem to be no justification for placing the burden of jobless protection solely on the working class and consumers rather than on the country as a whole. At least part of the cost should be met through taxes levied on the basis of capacity to pay.

In the case of the old-age annuities, reforms are also necessary but should be materially easier to make. Even the most conservative groups in Congress, including the Republicans and anti-New Deal Democrats, have come to see the absurdity of accumulating a forty-seven-billion-dollar reserve fund. It has become rather generally recognized, moreover, that the men and women who are now over sixty years of age should be protected even though they cannot possibly pay the cost on a strict insurance basis. Fortunately, both these weaknesses can be corrected without a drastic change in the principles of the present law. The British government has met the problem of the older worker by paying full pensions to all insured workers regardless of whether or not they were too old to set aside enough to meet the cost of their own old-age protection. By adopting this principle the United States could provide reasonably adequate security for the men and women who are now past forty without openly repudiating actuarial principles.

Such a plan would be of very little assistance, however, to the workers who are now under forty years of age. They would still have to look forward to an ultimate pay-roll deduction of 3 per cent for the old-age annuity, in addition to bearing the brunt, in increased prices, of a 6 per cent pay-roll tax for old-age and unemployment protection. Nine per cent of a worker's income may not seem too much to pay for security; but with nearly four-fifths of America's families receiving less than a "reasonably satisfactory" standard of living—according to the Brookings Institution—a 9 per cent reduction becomes a serious matter. While it is not possible to provide security for the aged without taxing the young, it is fair to ask, as in the case of unemployment insurance, whether the working class and consumers should shoulder the entire burden or whether some responsibility should not be borne by the community as a whole. The rates of contribution now in force might be retained as a concession to those who feel that every person should provide for his own old age, but the increases provided for subsequent years should be suspended and the funds necessary for an adequate program should be derived from social taxation. In any case, immediate action should be taken to extend the benefits of compulsory old-age protection to agricultural workers, domestic servants, and the categories of white-collar employees who are now exempt from the provisions of the law. Other groups, such as housewives and self-employed workers, should be permitted to take out voluntary insurance.

Another necessary reform which should present no important technical difficulties is the provision for disability and survivors' pensions in connection with the old-age annuity plan. Every important country in the world except the United States has provided some form of protection against disability, or premature old age. Most countries combine invalidity insurance with old-age pensions on the ground that old age is really but a special type of disability. Widows' and orphans' pensions are also almost invariably attached to old-age insurance. Most American states grant aid to dependent children, but at present none make special provision for widows.

The greatest opportunity presented by the Supreme Court's action, however, lies in a totally different field. If federal old-age annuities are upheld, one of the primany obstacles to a federal program of health insurance will have been eliminated. An adequate program of health protection would mean more to the average American than all the other forms of social insurance combined. Recently there has been some discussion of an amendment which would add cash sickness benefits to the old-age annuity scheme. At first sight this seems sensible enough. The number of days of illness in a given year per 1,000 of the population can be calculated almost as accurately as the chance of living to a ripe old age. Such a scheme would probably encounter very little opposition as long as it was divorced from medical assistance. Doctors would favor it because it would greatly increase the possibility of their being paid, and no organized group, except possibly the insurance companies, would be likely to oppose it. Obviously such a plan would represent an important step forward, although compensation which is not attached to a program of medical aid would raise many difficult problems. Some system of control would have to be set up involving the medical profession. But under private medicine, doctors would have no incentive to check malingering; on the contrary, they would have every inducement to help a prospective patient collect his sickness allowance if only for the sake of collecting their fees.

A modest cash benefit would do very little, moreover, toward meeting the primary problem—the provision of adequate medical care for the millions of Americans who are unable to pay for such care even when fully employed. It would not begin to cover the cost of cases demanding hospitalization and specialist's care. Nor would voluntary health insurance solve this problem for the great majority of Americans. The average family can ill afford the $75 to $100 a year which would be necessary to obtain adequate medical care. As a consequence, most individuals will take a chance on avoiding sickness rather than curtail their meager standard of living.

It is not to be supposed that the struggle for adequate health insurance will be an easy one in the United States. Until recently there has been little to show for the campaign which progressive groups have waged for nearly a quarter of a century. The picture has been fundamentally changed in the last few years, however, by the dramatic success of group hospitalization. Hundreds of thousands of families who had no interest in "socialized medicine" as such have found satisfaction and protection in insurance against hospital bills. The brilliant battle of the United States Public Health Service against venereal disease has also helped to popularize the value of public medicine. Given a favorable Supreme Court decision, no time should be lost in taking advantage of the favorable political atmosphere for an immediate drive for nationwide health protection.

Compulsory health insurance may not be an ideal solution of the problem of medical care. Under it, it would be difficult to make provision for millions of persons, such as farmers, casual workers, and domestics, who are desperately in need of assistance. But however far short of the ideal, it would raise a heavy burden from the backs of American wage-earners of this generation.

Time, Fortune, Life

BY DWIGHT MACDONALD

I
THE editors of Time are quick to resent the term "fascist." And indeed the adjective is a bit over-enthusiastic. But Time, although consciously its philosophy is no more than a cynical, tired Republicanism, does present abundant evidence of a fascist unconscious. One might instance its neurotic interest in the surgical details of bloodshed, its worship of "potent" individuals, its corresponding contempt for the masses. There is one department, however, in which these fascist tendencies have emerged quite frankly into the open. This is the "Foreign News" section, second in length and importance only to "National Affairs." Ever since Time was founded in 1923 this has been wholly or mostly written by one Laird Shields Goldsborough, a classmate of Luce's at Yale. It is difficult to convey the irresponsible malice, the positive venom of Goldsborough's attitude toward the masses and their leaders. For his information about the U. S. S. R. he depends largely on White Russian émigrés—whence the great Time theory that Trotsky is really "Stalin's stooge," an undercover emissary busy fomenting revolutions which Stalin's bourgeois alliances won't allow him to encourage openly (Time, December 28, 1936). His treatment of the Spanish war must be read to be believed. "The Spanish government, a regime of Socialists, Communists, and rattle-brained liberals, had emptied the jails of cutthroats to defend itself," he wrote early in the conflict. "The government's militia, largely composed of ill-trained, ill-disciplined shoemakers, cab-drivers, and waiters, who were only prevented from scattering in despair by their officers standing behind them with cocked firearms . . ."—such is his description of the defenders of Madrid (Time, October 26, 1936). In the same article he announced gleefully, "The Spanish Republic was actually at its last gasp." Goldsborough's falsifications have for years been an office scandal.

Next to radicals Goldsborough hates Jews. Léon Blum, being both, is abused in terms worthy of Herr Streicher. It is "lean, spidery Léon Blum, Socialist and Jew," "Jew Blum," ". . . the peculiar detestation Léon Blum is capable of arousing"—in peculiar, not to say pathological, people, one might add. Before Blum came into power he was "millionaire Socialist Blum," who "lives in a sumptuous old house crammed with exquisite bibelots" and "delights to rush among the Paris rabble and deliver mixed Socialist-Communist harangues." History played its customary trick on the editor of Time's foreign-news section, and Goldsborough later on had to tell his readers that this ridiculous old Sheeny had somehow managed to crawl into the premiership of France. It is only fair to say that Goldsborough, despite his name and personal appearance, is almost certainly not a Jew himself.

It all goes back to 1934, when Goldsborough made a trip to Italy for Fortune. He returned so violent a partisan of Il Duce that even Il Luce was alarmed. The uncritical panegyrics on fascism he wrote for Fortune's Italian number had to be scrapped in favor of a more realistic treatment by various staff writers. But in his province of Time Goldsborough says what he likes. For example (July 20, 1936): "A scant fourteen years ago the kingdom of Italy was as confused, irresolute, and radical-ridden as are France and Spain today. The years have dignified and tempered Benito Mussolini, and he has dignified and tempered the Italian people. . . . The features of Benito Mussolini in his prime are those of an Augustan Caesar. . . ."

The Goldsborough scandal has reached such a ripe stage that even Luce's more conservative lieutenants have tried to have him restrained. But Goldsborough has formidable talents: a chambermaid's instinct for scandal plus a spinster's love of gossip. He scooped the world on Mrs. Simpson, exposing the whole affair months before other journalists woke up to what was taking place. His stuff furthermore has pace, color, humor, drama, every virtue in fact except such dull ones as accuracy and honesty. Hence he is said to be the most highly paid writer on any of Luce's magazines. So far Luce has overruled all opposition and given Goldsborough his full personal backing, which means that his articles are not blue-penciled by the editor. That Luce, for good solid cash reasons, should thus specially protect the writer who most flagrantly violates his high-minded code of factual objectivity—this is a paradox only to the unsophisticated.

During the past few weeks a remarkable change has come over Time's foreign news. The Spanish situation is being reported honestly; Léon Blum is "Jew Blum" no longer; Europe has become a more comprehensible, if less exciting place. Explanation: Goldsborough went to London for the coronation.

II

The reading matter in Luce's magazines is produced by the cooperation of three groups: researchers, writers, editors. The researchers are all female, mostly college graduates. They work at the high nervous tension peculiar to commercial journalism. Luce has been publishing magazines for fourteen years, but it still takes a major crisis to produce each issue. For the fantastic amounts of overtime the researchers put in while the magazines are going to press, they get no time-and-a-half pay. In fact, they receive no pay at all beyond one dollar for dinner plus their taxi fare home after 10 p. m.—this deadline apparently representing Luce's idea of the hour at which the streets become unsafe for solitary females. Theoretically, they take time off during less busy periods. But quiet intervals are rare in Luce's high-powered enterprises, and they are lucky if they make up half their overtime. Considering this unpaid labor, the importance of the work, and the intelligence it requires, their pay is low. It begins at $25 a week and rises, by $10 or so a year, to a permanent plateau of about $75. But they put up with this exploitation because the human relationships are pleasant and the work is interesting.

Luce pays his writers well—after the probation period. The beginners are paid niggardly salaries and generally kicked around. But once the writer shows himself to be valuable, his earnings bound upward, to $10,000, even $15,000 or more, a year. Such salaries, however, are not given for nothing. As nuns sacrifice their hair, so Luce's writers are shorn of their names. It is a symbolic renunciation of the world, the flesh, and the devil. Once they have taken the veil, any gallivanting outside the walls is discouraged. Writers who have contributed to secular journals have been "spoken to," delicately but unmistakably.

The specifications for an editorship at Time, Inc., are those for a good radio set: maximum receptivity and minimum static (read: independent thought). After years of selective breeding, Luce has developed a set of human instruments delicately adapted to their great task, the transmission of the dynamic radiations of the Lucian personality out of the ether on to the printed page. These instruments are devoted, flexible, intelligent (but not too intelligent). They do everything but talk out of turn. They are well oiled with salaries ranging from $15,000 to $35,000, plus blocks of bonus stock. The archetype of these admirable mechanisms is Roy Larsen, second in command and most likely successor to Luce. Quiet, impersonal, realistic, inhumanly efficient, Larsen, unlike Luce, doesn't take the racket too seriously. To Luce journalism is a crusade, to Larsen a game. It is possible that now that Luce's earnest pioneering has opened up rich new territory, Larsen, the cool and adroit manipulator, could exploit it more smoothly if Luce were out of the way. On the other hand, perhaps Luce's crusading fervor, his dash of publishing genius, is still the vital factor. The question is intriguing but academic, since Luce shows no signs of retiring.

Several years ago Time, Inc., grew out of the stage at which Luce had direct personal contact with most of his employees. During 1936 the number of employees shot up from 718 to 1,221. The question of employer-employee relationships is urgent. Luce seems to have evolved one answer, his employees another.

Speaking to a group of his advertising salesmen last year, Luce outlined the ideal corporation into which he hoped Time, Inc., would grow. In place of the cash nexus which binds employee to employer under capitalism, Luce told the boys, he would substitute something resembling Mussolini's corporative state. This interesting, though unfortunately as yet non-existent, political concept has fascinated Luce ever since he supervised a lengthy treatise on the subject in Fortune several years ago. Luce's idea, roughly, is that the corporation accepts responsibility for the general economic and social well-being of its employees. It sees to it that they are well-paid, contented, and never without pocket handkerchiefs. In return, the employee identifies his own future with that of the corporation, centering all personal ambitions therein and thinking of it as "my" rather than "their" corporation—though, of course, not taking this too literally in the matter of dividends. These will somehow or other continue to find their way to the Harimans and the Harknesses.

But labor relations at Time, Inc., seem likely to take a less idyllic form. From the point of view of the proletariat, Luce's corporative state shares the disadvantages of its model. When he talks of employees, Luce is really thinking of the better-paid males, and his corporative corporation is designed for their special benefit. Time, Inc., is a man's world, with an all-male aristocracy of editors, executives, and writers dominating the feminine masses of researchers and office workers. Considering the large salaries of the men, the average salary, which is $45.68 a week, indicates that the female proletariat is badly underpaid. And so in the past year the employees have taken steps to protect their economic interests themselves. Late last summer a unit of the Newspaper Guild was formed. It has grown amazingly, until at present 119 out of 234 eligible employees in New York City have signed up. (Of the 1,221 total employees, 547 work in the circulation department at Chicago.) The most enthusiastic response has come from the women in general and the writers on Fortune, the Architectural Forum, and the March of Time. The one sector in which almost no progress has been made is the Time writing staff, a culturally backward subregion comparable to the Bible Belt of the South.

III

The future of Time, Inc., as a business enterprise is largely bound up with the success of Life, its latest and by far its most ambitious venture. So far Life has been so successful as to be a pain in the neck to its publishers. They were foolish enough to draw up their 1937 advertising contracts on the basis of a guaranteed minimum circulation of 300,000. For months they have been selling over 1,000,000 copies a week. "This means," explained Luce sadly in his 1936 report to stockholders, "that Life's 1937 advertisers are paying some $2,500,000 for space which is conservatively worth $7,000,000." The management's underestimate of Life's possibilities—which Luce frankly admits was "an error in judgment"—was even more serious than these figures indicate, since recent circulation tests indicate that over 4,000,000 copies of Life could be sold every week if they existed. They will not exist for some time because, with its low advertising rates, Life loses more money the more copies it sells. Its pre-publication advertising contracts were closed at $1,500 a page, which was raised to $3,000 early this year. But until 1938, when this will be raised farther to $5,000 or over, Life will content itself with a beggarly 1,000,000 readers. If the economic system holds together through 1938, Time, Inc., will begin to get back some of the millions it has spent on Life. But even if it doesn't, and Life fails to reap the costly seed it has sown, the organization can stand a good deal of financial strain. At the beginning of this year its books showed current assets of $8,400,000 ($2,100,000 in cash, $2,700,000 in government bonds) against current liabilities of $1,500,000. Financially, the future of Time, Inc., seems well assured.

Its ideological future is harder to analyze. As a publisher Luce has many points of resemblance to Hearst. But the parallel must not be pushed too far. When Landon was nominated, for instance, Luce, like Hearst, made a pilgrimage to Topeka and returned enchanted, for much the same reasons. And so during the spring of 1936 the liberal fraction on Time was conscious of strong pro-Landon pressure. Landon trivia were treated at length and reverently, while the New Deal was chronicled briefly and flippantly. Luce personally saw to it that Landon got the editorial breaks. As the futility and the ineptitude of Landon's campaign became progressively apparent, Luce steadily lost interest in editing Time, which as steadily drifted over toward Roosevelt. By the end of the summer Time was chilly to Landon and friendly to Roosevelt and the C. I. O. Luce and his editors had checked their prejudices against the actual state of affairs, and had shifted their editorial emphasis accordingly. Hearst stupidly remained faithful to Landon unto the end and had to perform his about-face after the election, always an awkward maneuver. The distinction is important. Those in charge of Time, Inc., have excellent facilities for finding out what is actually going on: the Fortune Survey, to name one, predicted Roosevelt's victory last fall with remarkable accuracy. And once they have found out what is going on, they are by no means fanatical about sticking to their guns. There is always a lag, and often an inexcusably big one, between the march of events and the recognizing of the same by Luce's magazines. But the one great good thing about Luce's journalism is that it does change its ground, however reluctantly, that it is sooner or later sensitive to which way the wind is blowing.

Here emerges the difference between Lucian and Hearstian journalism. It would not occur to one to take issue, argumentatively, with a Hearst editorial. The plane on which it is conducted is beyond reason, beyond the reach of any marshaling of evidence. But for all their prejudices, their semi-conscious editorializing, Luce and his editors at least think their conclusions are determined by the weight of evidence. (And even if the more sophisticated among them don't even think thus, at least they accept the necessity for hypocrisy.)

The pragmatic-objective school of thought which Time, Inc., represents can flourish only within a healthy, self-confident capitalist culture. In 1900-29, as in 1850-1900 in England, this country had, or thought it had, such a culture. As England had its Victorian rationalists, so we developed a dominant school of historians, economists, and sociologists which believed in piling up data ("fact-finding") and which was not interested in interpreting these data. The implication was that the basic premises on which society rested didn't need questioning. But since 1929 the fact-finding school has lost ground: the progressives insist on critical interpretation, and the conservatives doubt if the system can stand the facts. That Time, Inc., carries on the old tradition is due partly to Time's freakish prosperity all through the depression, which has preserved intact a booming little capitalist culture peculiar to half a dozen floors of the Chrysler Building.

Even if Time, Inc., doesn't feel the pinch of the next depression either, its rulers will increasingly feel the pressure from a contradiction in their own editorial rationale. Their incomes, friends, sympathies, prejudices are all far over to the right. But they profess to be, and want to be, guided only by the weight of factual evidence, and in most cases this evidence leads to a left-wing conclusion. The arguments against the present system are always so much better than the arguments for it. And Luce's editors, unlike Hearst and Hitler, still take arguments seriously. As the capitalist crisis sharpens and this dilemma becomes more and more painful, it seems likely that they will subordinate the stubborn, unwelcome facts to some supra-rational principle. That is to say, modulate from laissez faire capitalism into fascist capitalism.

Objectively as well ■ subjectively they will be pushed in this direction. Year by year the gears of Time, Inc., mesh more deeply into the capitalist system. It now has between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 invested in stocks and bonds of other corporations. To watch over these investments, and to increase them by judicious speculation, it maintains its own staff of market experts. Last year its "Other Income," that is, speculative profits, came to $1,065,000, which was more than a third of its total net profits. Obviously such a publishing enterprise cannot be expected to remain editorially aloof from the economic system. The business classes are becoming aware that something beyond old-style capitalism is necessary. This means, if they have anything to say, some form of fascism.

This development is epitomized in Luce's personal drift toward the right. In 1928 he voted for Smith, in 1932 for Hoover, in 1936 for Landon. His current direction may be indicated by a few sentences from a recent speech: "Without the aristocratic principle no society can endure. . . . What slowly deadened our aristocratic sense was the expanding frontier, but still more the expanding machine. . . . We got a plutocracy without any common sense of dignity and obligation. . . . The triumph of the mass mind is nowhere more apparent than in the frustration of the upper classes." It is all there—the aristocratic principle, the distrust of the masses, even the sense of noblesse oblige. Luce's opinions are those of the ruling business class to which he belongs and whose great mouthpiece he is, of the people he went to college with, the people he puts up in his streamlined guest cottages, the people he lunches with in the Cloud Club inside the chromium spire of the Chrysler Building, the people, in a word, who pay for the advertising which pays for his magazines. The decay of American capitalism is pushing all these people in a certain direction. But it is premature to call Time, Inc., fascist. Proto-fascist would be more accurate.

[This is the last of three articles on Time, Inc. The first two appeared in the issues of May 1 and May 8.]

Kings and Bus Drivers

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

THE Coronation approaches to the rumble of growing labor unrest. The London busmen are already out on strike, and a threatened dispute in the mining industry may result in a national stoppage in the last week of May. There is a good deal of unrest, also, among the engineers; a big strike, lasting two weeks, has only just been settled among the shipyard apprentices on the Clyde.

The causes of the unrest are various. The busmen have struck for the seven-and-a-half-hour day. They complain of the great speeding-up in London transport. This has resulted, they claim, in increased nervous strain and a heavy incidence of digestive trouble among the men. The Transport Board hardly disputes the facts of the claim. Its answer is that, granted the rates of interest it must pay (4 per cent, 4½ per cent, 5 per cent) on its different classes of stock, it cannot afford the half-million sterling that concession of the claim would cost. Since Saturday last not a bus has moved on the London streets; and the strain on alternative forms of transport has been grave. So far the strike has been met with good temper, as the weather is fine and the London busman is deservedly popular. The government has taken no action as yet, save to appoint a court of inquiry which is to make an interim report by the week-end. It is difficult to believe that some action will not be taken, for the absence of five thousand buses from the streets in the present congested condition of London would be calamitous. On physiological grounds the men have an unanswerable case; and the real reply to the board is that a Tory Parliament gave to the shareholders of the former transport companies unnaturally good terms when the present monopoly was formed. There is no case for more than 3 per cent on shares of this character; and a reduction in the rate of interest by Act of Parliament is the obvious way out. But it is difficult to see a Parliament of the present character being persuaded to take this road.

The threat of a mining dispute arises out of conditions in the rich Nottingham coal field. There, ever since the dispute of 1926, a company union has dominated the situation, and a condition of owners' control exists such as Americans know in parts of the West Virginia coal field. The Miners' Federation has fought hard for its overthrow, and a secret ballot of the men has been overwhelmingly against the company union. So far the owners have proved adamant, though it is possible that the pressure of parliamentary opinion—which is widely favorable to the miners—may yet compel them to give way before a national stoppage occurs.

In the engineering trades the situation is different again. Wages have hardly recovered from the depth of the depression; prices, as the orthodox Economist admits, are "rising at an alarming rate." Meanwhile, largely through the rearmament program, the Stamp index of profits has risen from the base of 100 in 1929 to 114 last year; and individual firms show immense increases. While employment is greater by 15.2 per cent than in 1932, output has risen by more than 37 per cent; the increase in the output per individual worker is about one-fifth on his production in 1932. Profits in the four years 1932-36 are up by over 52 per cent, while wages in the same period only rose by 3.6 per cent. If to this picture there be added the growing tendency to employ women and youths, and the resistance of industry and finance to Neville Chamberlain's very mild proposal of a tax on profits, it is not difficult to understand the feeling of unrest that prevails.

Mostly it is an unrest of the rank and file rather than of the leaders. It is no secret that the pressure on the latter from below has been very great. The leaders are anxious to avoid disputes in a critical international situation; the men see no reason why they should not share in the real boom that is being created by the immense armament program. Their dissatisfaction with existing conditions has been intensified by some of the spectacular profits that are being made in the armaments industry and by the fact that financial resistance to Mr. Chamberlain's budget proposals is nowhere regarded by business men as other than common sense. They cannot see why a demand for higher wages should be "unpatriotic," if a demand for lower taxation is regarded as wholly reasonable. At the base of the industrial pyramid the mood of defeatism which has lasted since 1931 is at long last beginning to disappear. I make no doubt that in the next few months the leaders of the big unions will begin to adjust themselves to a new psychology. The alternative will be widespread unofficial strikes; and these are always evidence of bad leadership.

Meanwhile, the preparations for the Coronation proceed upon their majestic way. I do not find in the average Englishman any great excitement over the spectacle. He feels that it is an extra day's holiday, a break in the grim routine. He is pretty fully aware of, and somewhat amused at, the big commercial implications and the effort to hide them from the public gaze. He is treated to a mass of articles on the symbolic meaning of the ceremony, and books on the royal family from every conceivable aspect litter the bookshops. But I doubt whether the effect of all the propaganda and publicity blots out from his mind the memory of the abdication last December. He is quite prepared to accept the King and Queen as two well-meaning persons anxious to do a dull job as well as possible; he thinks they should be given a fair chance to prove themselves. Yet in himself he does not think that everything is quite the same as before. He remembers that Edward VIII was a fairy prince one day and an exile a week later; the halo has not yet been regilded, and it will take longer than five months to do the regilding. It is symptomatic that in the new Civil List no proposal is made for an allowance for the Duke of Windsor; the government does not want a revival of criticism. It is symptomatic of something, too, that books which remind the reader of how new is the tradition of monarchical glamor are having a steady sale and awakening a good deal more critical interest than was expected.

It is even becoming fashionable to argue that the time has come to democratize the social habits of the monarchy; I have found a good deal of sympathy in quite unexpected quarters for Mr. Atlee's criticism of its unnecessary pomp and luxury. It is certain that a new critical mood exists. Labor leaders who accept Coronation honors will not find justification as easy as at the Jubilee. The sense that the monarchy is, at bottom, a reserve power in the hands of capitalist interests is more widespread than at any time for fifty years. I do not for a moment mean that there is any overt republicanism; that is not the case. I do mean that the monarchy is on trial in a way that would not have seemed possible six months ago, and the Coronation will have little of the profound symbolic effect it would have had if there had been no abdication. It is a diversion magnificently staged, but for the average man no more than a diversion. Its perspective is utterly different from what it was when George V was crowned, and one does not have to go far to discover that this is the case.

The kind of atmosphere which surrounds the monarchy dates from no earlier than Disraeli's time, and is significantly connected with the growth of that imperialist cult of which he was one of the founders. The Crown has been immensely useful to the reactionary forces of Great Britain as the symbol of imperial unity. But there is a growing awareness, awakened by the Jubilee of 1935 and greatly sharpened by the abdication, that it symbolizes a historical moment in the evolution of capitalism which may well pass away. Certainly its habits will be more closely watched than ever before. Certainly, also, its exploitation in the interests of party will be more sharply criticized. A neutral monarch will survive by reason of his neutrality for a considerable period. But under present conditions that neutrality has become an urgent matter.

Edward VIII made it obvious that the king must satisfy the bourgeois virtues in a bourgeois society; so soon as he ceased to typify them he ceased, also, to be an adequate symbol of national unity. But what precisely will the Crown make of a situation in which its ministers seek to utilize its powers for social transformation instead of social conservatism? That is the unknown factor in the present situation. Being British, we shall not confront it until necessity compels us. But one day we shall have to confront it, and the results may be more surprising than we care to imagine. That is why I do not think we need regard the Coronation of George VI as more than an absorbing pageant which need not, after all, be taken too seriously.

Hoffman of New Jersey

BY McALISTER COLEMAN

II. Champion of the Upper-Dog

IN the fall of 1934, when Harold G. Hoffman was campaigning for the governorship, the Utility Users' Protective League, engaged at the time in a fight to reduce the rates of the Public Service Electric and Gas Company, sent him a questionnaire about his stand on utilities. He answered, "I believe good government comes through progressive steps and not through overnight reforms. Therefore I am not a reformer but a candidate who, after fifteen years of public office, declines to make a lot of wild promises that cannot be fulfilled without some revolutionary changes in our form and theory of government and in the hearts of men."

In his inaugural address, however, the new Republican Governor did promise to strengthen the almost impotent Public Utility Commission of the state, and soon after the inauguration the consumers' group presented a series of bills designed to accomplish this purpose. The bills were mild enough in all conscience and were supported not too vigorously by the "clean government" group from Essex headed by the Reverend Lester H. Clee, pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Newark and Republican Speaker of the Assembly. Mr. Clee, however, soon became more interested in his battles against pari-mutuel betting and greyhound racing than in any struggle against the extortionate rates of Public Service. The bills died the customary death of all such measures and were replaced by bills bearing the imprimatur of the Governor. Most of the Hoffman utility measures were meaningless. Two of them made future prosecution of rate cases by Jersey consumers next to impossible: one provided that all rate cases must be wound up within six months, and another gave the commission the right to "negotiate and agree" with the utilities without the intervention of the consumers. As it took two long years of the hardest sort of fighting to obtain a rate reduction of $5,000,000 annually from Public Service, and as a "negotiation and agreement" between the commission and the companies, with no consumers represented, is a meeting of woolly lambs and saber-toothed tigers, Hoffman's contribution to Public Service was a royal one.

The Governor was equally generous in his support of the real-estate interests, chief among which are the large insurance companies. In his inaugural address he had come out for a sales tax, and he pressed at once for its enactment. After a long-drawn-out fight which split the Republican majority the tax was passed by dint of a trade with Hague's Democrats. The object in laying a 2 per cent tax on necessities as well as luxuries was, of course, to relieve the realtors. The tax proved so unpopular, however, that after a few months' trial the Governor was forced to sign a repealer.

A situation soon developed with which no glittering gubernatorial eloquence nor legislative horse-trading could cope. Early in 1935 everyone informed on state matters knew that federal funds for unemployment relief would be stopped unless the state contributed its share. The federal government had spent millions for relief in Jersey. The state had not met its obligations. There was ample warning from Washington. But the Governor still denounced the New Deal at Rotarian luncheons, and the legislature still bickered over betting. Matters dragged along until April, 1936, when the Trenton State House was occupied by a determined group of workless men and women demanding some sort of action. For an exciting week they staged one of the pioneer sitdown strikes in this country, taking over the Assembly and Senate chambers and listening to their leaders' speeches. They also read the comment of the Governor: "People should support the government and not expect the government to support them. Some persons have the idea that the government owes them a living. This has never been and never will be. The carpetbaggers had that idea and they nearly ruined a section of the country."

State House guards stood about while the representatives of the unemployed held mock sessions of the legislature, taunting the lawmakers for their failure to come to grips with reality. The Governor sent telegrams to Washington begging the federal government to care for the state's "unemployables." Finally the sitdowners rose and drifted away, after having voted to form a Farmer-Labor Party and divert highway funds to relief purposes, a proposal against which the Governor thundered. The demonstration had thrown a temporary scare into "respectable" persons all over the state, but it accomplished little else. The unemployed, nearly a million of them, were thrown on the mercies of the near-bankrupt municipalities and their overseers of the poor. When Hoffman was criticized for his part in this shabby business, he comforted himself by reading articles in the New York Herald Tribune congratulating Jersey on its "forthrightness" in handling relief.

The results of two short months of this "forthrightness" were uncovered by investigators for the Division of Social Research of the WPA. The report of these agents stated that there had been few chiselers on the rolls, that the vaunted reduction in relief costs was due to seasonal occupational pick-up, and that on the whole there was "starvation and disease" in many New Jersey homes. Republican papers and the New York Board of Trade attempted to discount this report by conducting their own investigations. These consisted, for the most part, in asking secretaries of New Jersey chambers of commerce how things were going in their communities. Just as breezily optimistic replies were being printed, word came from Hoboken—where more than 5,000 had been dropped from the rolls—that three-year-old Donald Hastie, whose invalid father was receiving $2.50 a week for relief for a family of five, had died of "malnutrition." The baby had been licking paint off the walls to allay his hunger. Little more about the "success" of the New Jersey experiment appeared in the press.

A windfall from taxes on the huge Dorrance estate helped some of the more desperately hard-up communities, but a year after state funds were cut off, an Ocean City poormaster was quoted in the New York World-Telegram as saying: "Clients don't bother me very much. I just say no, and give them nothing. I know the poor devils need it bad enough, but we ain't got it." In some places investigators reported that family relief had dropped as low as $5 a month. Still the Governor insisted that to divert the highway funds, the only money in sight, would be unfair to automobile owners. He said further that relief was making "bums" out of Jersey-men. When the legislature voted to divert the funds, pitifully inadequate as they were, Hoffman vetoed the bill. The other day it was repassed over his veto.

Foes of the Governor inside his own party, whose name is coming to be legion, secretly sympathizing with his bold defense of property against human rights, did not attack him for his relief policy. Instead they chose to bait him on his inept handling of the Bruno Hauptmann case. Of all the fantastic tales that have ever come out of this land of the tabloid editor's dreams, the Hauptmann case is surely the most fantastic. And the part played in it by Harold Giles Hoffman remains one of the deepest mysteries of the whole macabre story. The motive for the Governor's sensational intervention in the case has been sought in his political ambitions, his yen for publicity, his love of playing detective. As to the last, it is of record that Ellis Parker, chief of Burlington County detectives, a lifelong friend of the Hoffmans, once exclaimed: "That boy would have made a great detective." Parker and his debonaire son, long protected by Hoffman's stubborn refusal to allow them to be taken to New York for trial in connection with the kidnapping and torture of Paul Wendel, have finally been tried by the federal government. On the stand Wendel has vehemently insisted that Hoffman knew all about the strange activities of the Parkers.

It may have been interest in Parker's theory that someone other than Hauptmann stole the baby that led Hoffman to make his mysterious midnight visit in October, 1935, to the cell of the condemned German. Jersey politicians say that he looked on the case as offering another springboard to advancement, this time into national prominence as candidate for Vice-President on the Landon ticket. His friends say that, driven by a stubborn and probably sincere conviction that he was on the right track in holding up the execution of Hauptmann, he became so involved with the Parkers, the Nazi groups, and others in the state trying to save Hauptmann from the chair that, lover of law and order as he is, he found himself openly defying the law that called for the extradition of the Parkers. What is certain is that Hoffman is a good-enough politician to understand the loss of prestige he suffered in the Hauptmann case. Practically the entire press of the state has rubbed it into him. He was indirectly rebuked by his own State Committee, and had to campaign vigorously to land as the fourth of four delegates to last year's Republican convention. At Cleveland he was openly snubbed by the national leaders.

Now, after a period of morose silence, he is attempting a comeback by his attacks on the C. I. O. No longer able to boast that he is "a man who has risen from the common people but who has never lost the common touch," he wants to reconcile his wealthy supporters of other days to his ambitions for 1940 and beyond. His term as governor ends next January, and he is forbidden by law to succeed himself. Nothing short of a miracle can prevent the election of A. Harry Moore on the Democratic ticket. But Hoffman is young and has a mighty itch for office. A man who has been elected fifteen times to public jobs is not going back to banking in South Amboy.

Ordinarily the North Jersey Council for Industrial Organization could afford to ignore the Governor and his threats of violence. But Jersey workers, organized and unorganized, are showing such militancy as has not been seen since the Passaic strike of 1926. Already there have been sitdown strikes in plants all over the state from Trenton to Jersey City. And the Governor has sent state troopers to protect scabs—pardon me, I mean "loyal workers"—in a factory outside Trenton.

At one time or another during his stormy career Hoffman has shown his contempt for the small consumers, the unemployed, the organized labor movement. Always he has been loyal to his friends in the utilities, the insurance companies, and the other labor-sweating corporations. He is backed by a hard-bitten group of reactionary bosses. They will give him every anti-labor move their enthusiastic support.

The man has a childish love for soldiers and a dangerous flair for the sensational. At his summer residence at Sea Girt he lives in an armed camp, seldom out of earshot of the sounds of his drilling National Guard. Unless he is soon impeached, the "Boy Captain" may yet be seen happily leading his yellow-legs against striking workers in defense of "hallowed property rights."

[The first part of Mr. Coleman's article, How to Become a Governor, appeared last week.]

HAVELOCK ELLIS

STUDIES IN THE PSYCHOLOGY OF SEX. A magnificent edition of a great classic, complete and unabridged in four volumes, boxed, $15.00.

EUGENE O'NEILL

NINE PLAYS BY EUGENE O'NEILL. Nobel Prize edition. A selection by the author, which includes "Strange Interlude", "Mourning Becomes Electra" and "The Emperor Jones." Beautifully printed and bound, $5.00.

MARCEL PROUST

REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST. His life work of seven novels in a beautiful, compact, complete set of four volumes; 4300 pages, boxed, $12.50. The Scott-Moncrieff-Frederick Blossom translation.

ANGELS IN UNDRESS

The autobiography of MARK BENNEY, burglar. "It belongs in the first rank of modern picaresque literature."—N. Y. TIMES, 5th printing, $2.50.

BELOVED FRIEND

The Story of Tchaikowsky and Nadejda von Meck, by CATHERINE DRINKER BOWEN and BARBARA VON MECK. A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection, $3.00.

TOGETHER AND APART

By MARGARET KENNEDY, author of "The Constant Nymph." A best-seller since its publication.

THE RISING STAR OF

Random House

THE first book to bear the imprint of Random House appeared in 1928. ¶ In the past five years, more Random House books have been chosen by the "Fifty Books of the Year" juries for typographic excellence than those of any other publisher in America, though a dozen firms publish more books in a month than Random House publishes in a season. ¶ The editorial content of Random House books is consistent with the beauty of their format. Featured on this page are only some of the books that Random House has sponsored in the nine years of its existence.

Random House's American authors include Eugene O'Neill, Robinson Jeffers, William Faulkner, Maurice Hindus, Gertrude Stein, Morley Callaghan, Gene

THE MODERN LIBRARY

215 of the greatest books ever written, complete and unabridged in compact, handsomely designed volumes for only 95c each. Best-selling titles are:

Wm Maugham, OF HUMAN BONDAGE
Buck, THE GOOD EARTH
Mann, MAGIC MOUNTAIN
Lundberg, IMPERIAL HEARST
Lawrence, SONS AND LOVERS

The MODERN LIBRARY "GIANTS"

—One-volume editions of thirty-four great works of literature formerly available only at much higher prices. The "GIANTS" are complete and unabridged, and cost but $1.10 each—"the greatest bargain in books in America today."—N. Y. TIMES. Popular titles are:

Werfel, THE FORTY DAYS OF MUSA DASH
Wilkie Collins, THE MOONSTONE and
THE WOMAN IN WHITE
Complete Poems of KEATS and SHELLEY
Complete Novels of JANE AUSTEN

THE WAR IN OUTLINE

By LIDDELL HART. A complete history of the World War in 285 pages, $2.00.

JOHN STRACHEY

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF SOCIALISM ($3.00) THE COMING STRUGGLE FOR POWER ($1.10)

ANDRÉ MALRAUX

DAYS OF WRATH ($1.75) MAN'S FATE (95c)

THE WOMEN, by Clare Boothe
EXCURSION, by Victor Wolfson
"BROTHER RAT", by John Monks and Fred Finklehoffe
TOVARICH, adapted by R. E. Sherwood
"HAVING WONDERFUL TIME", by Arthur
Kober
DEAD END, by Sidney Kingsley
BOY MEETS GIRL, by The Spewacks
THE AVON FLOWS, by George Jean Nathan
Each $2.00

MOSCOW SKIES ($2.75) HUMANITY UP.
ROOTED ($3.50) RED BREAD ($1.50)

By JAMES JOYCE. Complete and unabridged, with a new preface by James Joyce and the now famous decision of Judge Woolsey. 55th thousand, $3.50.

OF FAMOUS AMERICAN STORIES. The cream of American short-story writing, 67 stories in all, from Irving and Poe through Hemingway and Faulkner. An anthology you must have for your library. 1300 pages, $3.00.

The famous Jowett translation never before available at less than $25.00. Now complete and unabridged in two magnificent volumes, boxed at $5.00.

By C. E. M. JOAD. "As thrilling and as easy to read as a novel." — W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM. $2.50.

ROBINSON JEFFERS: Solstice, and Other Poems, $2.50

STEPHEN SPENDER: Poems, $1.50; Vienna, $1.25. ¶ W. H. AUDEN: On This Island, $1.50; Poems, $2.50. ¶ C. DAY LEWIS: A Time to Dance, $1.75; Collected Poems and A Hope for Poetry, $2.50.

A TIME TO REMEMBER, by Leane Zugsmith, $2.00
THE ANTIGUA STAMP, by Robert Graves $2.50
THE GROWN-UPS, by Catharine Whitcomb, $2.50
PEOPLE ON THE EARTH, by Edwin Corle, $2.00
GLITTERING DEATH, by Joseph Peyré, $2.50
SEVEN GOTHIC TALES, by Isak Dinesen, $2.50

Send me the books whose titles I have listed below. ☐ I enclose remittance of $ ☐ Send C.O.D. (plus postage)

Name.....
Address.....
City.....State.....
NOTE. Books may be returned within five days for full refund if you are not completely satisfied.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

"Bunkum and Bunting"

"BUNKUM and bunting"—thus Sir Stafford Cripps, the former Labor Party leader, characterized the coronation. I felt jubilant when I read it, for I am one American who is absolutely disgusted with the whole British Coronation. I was born a republican. The son of a man who left a kingdom after having been a rebel at fourteen, I was brought up an absolute republican, and though I have seen kings and queens in many countries, and kaisers too, I have always felt a sense of disgust and shame that some human beings continue to be ruled by men and women for no earthly reason except the accident of birth. Now that the Coronation is over, I want to go on record as protesting against the pages and pages of space given to it by the American press, and against this fresh demonstration, in the rush of Americans to London, of our readiness to toady not only to royalty but to ordinary people with titles attached. "Bunkum and bunting" it has been in London, and pure bunkum on this side of the water, all the more repellant to me because of the utter dullness of the British royal family. I know King George V was greatly beloved by the British people. Why? Because he was an agreeable, dull, and totally unassuming gentleman of the most mediocre attainments, and in him the great British middle class saw their own prototype. He had nothing to do and did that well. He was the embodiment of mid-Victorian respectability, the very opposite of his son and his reprobate father, who would, I fancy, have been run out of most clubs if he had not been royalty.

As for Windsor, why not tell the truth about him? He is a callow, undeveloped, hard-drinking, loose-living man, whose mentality has been at all times years behind that of others of his age. His affair with Mrs. Simpson was a piece of luck for him in that it aroused sympathy among millions and millions of people which he could not otherwise have won. It relieved him from a position which any man of intelligence and ability with a desire really to serve his countrymen would have run away from as fast as he could—the job of being a puppet king, unable to make a radio speech even without asking the kind permission of whoever happened to be Prime Minister. He was unable to visit the distressed areas of his country and express a decent sense of outrage at the horrible conditions he saw without being regarded as a dangerous person who must be still further hedged about by counselors and servitors so as to make it impossible for him again to express any human emotion. To be confined to the routine of opening bazaars and Parliament and signing his name to messages to the House of Commons and House of Lords which he is not even allowed to write would seem to most men of spirit and character like penal servitude for life.

The attitude of our own press toward the Coronation brings up the old question of whether the public demands this sort of news in quantity and the newspapers are merely "giving the public what it wants," or whether the newspapers are seeking to create a sensational or morbidly sentimental interest in British royalty. I certainly don't believe that the offices of the great newspapers in the large cities of the United States have been stormed by mobs of people demanding pages of pictures and a lot more gush about what has been happening in England. I don't believe that five people sat down and wrote to the New York Times or Herald Tribune demanding, in advance of the Coronation, forty-eight or fifty-four columns of news from London every day. As is usually the case, the newspapers sought to sensationalize a wholly commercialized show. It is not to be denied that a considerable portion of the people of the United States are snobbish or sycophantic in their attitude toward royalty anywhere. But that is nothing new.

I speak as a journalist who has conducted a New York daily newspaper when I say that the American papers and news associations distinctly overplayed the Coronation story, precisely as the World-Telegram, to mention only one, tremendously overplayed the recent unexplained murder of an artist's model in New York, leaping to the opportunity to print nude or half-nude pictures of her day after day, not because those pictures related to the daily news of the story, but because the editors had a chance to imitate burlesque and to allow nudity in their columns. At least the World-Telegram didn't have the indecency to say that it printed those pages and pages of pictures to meet a public demand for them, that it was only "giving the public what it wants." I do not think that the newspapers overplayed the dreadful Hindenburg disaster at Lakehurst, for that was a most thrilling and moving human tragedy and was of enormous importance from half a dozen points of view.

But as for the Coronation, why, gentlemen of the press, let's be good Americans, let's have some realization that the simple inauguration of a President of the United States is, as Sir Stafford Cripps says, the ceremony that is really impressive and moving, the type of thing England ought to do, instead of giving a medieval commercial show with the poor victim and his wife wearing five-pound crowns and looking unutterably silly in their royal robes, and the hotels and shops coining money out of gaping Americans.

BROUN'S PAGE

From Pilate's Autobiography

ISCARIOT might have died upon the cross but for the circumstance that he was a coward, and so lived to hang himself. When first he came before me the case against him was not altogether clear. Some Roman soldiers had broken up a meeting where Jewish fanatics were advocating resistance to the government. In such affairs I was usually inclined to be lenient, for Jerusalem knew many factions and it was my theory that no great harm could come out of talk. Indeed, at most of these meetings the orators were inclined to attack their fellow-countrymen rather than the Romans. But soldiers are both patriotic and impulsive. It has been my experience that they become inflamed much more readily than the rest of an audience. Possibly I should have been touched by their loyalty, for it was upon the phrase "Death to Pontius Pilate" that they moved in and dispersed the meeting.

My first idea was to have the speaker scourged and let it go at that. But when I asked him why some sentence should not be pronounced against him, he stood up to me boldly and declared that he was a Jewish patriot and that he expected neither mercy nor justice in a Roman court. At this point a captain of the guard stepped up to me and whispered in my ear, "This fellow is dangerous, for he speaks our tongue as well as any Roman. He has even dared to approach our soldiers. The crucifixion of one such might save the lives of many others. Let him die for the sins of his people."

As a soldier I am not squeamish about death, and yet it is a clumsy way of solving any problem. I have never liked it much to see any man die when his talents, be they vices or virtues, could be put to some useful purpose. I decided, therefore, to try the temper of this prisoner Iscariot, because already I had a strong suspicion that I might bend him to my will. And so I said, "Judas Iscariot, you are hereby sentenced to be scourged and then taken to the hill called Calvary—." No sooner had I pronounced the word "scourged" than the fellow turned ghastly pale, and before I could complete the verdict he had fallen into a swoon. I knew then that I could make him my tool and servant, for he was a coward.

When he fell into a swoon I had two soldiers carry him into an inner room. When his wits returned we were alone. "Iscariot," I said, "you did not hear me out. I gave the verdict that you should first be scourged and then crucified because you seek to overthrow the Roman rule."

His voice was less firm than before but he answered, "I seek to destroy the Roman rule. You have said it."

"Iscariot," I replied, "nails through your hands and nails through your feet, and there to hang while the thirst rips you in the strong sun and after the night has fallen. You are a strong man and it will be many hours before your agony has ended. Nails through your hands, Iscariot, and nails through your feet."

He writhed as if already the pain had begun to grip him, and he replied no louder than a whisper, "Then I must die for the Jewish people."

"But," I reminded him, "the servant of Caesar can be merciful as well as stern. You have only to say the word and I will spare you from the cross or any painful indignity."

"The word?" he muttered.

"It need not even be a word," I said. "You have only to nod your head and I will spare you the agony of Calvary. What I want is to have you serve me according to my directions."

"To be a spy?" asked Iscariot, and now his voice was firmer. "That would be against my heart and spirit. Whip me now and crucify me and let's have done with it. I die for my people."

"Not so fast," I interrupted. "You know, Iscariot, it will not be as fast as all that. Nails through your hands and nails through your feet. Nor have I asked you to serve as a spy. You know and I know that some of the fiercest accusations which you bring are not against the Romans but against other sects in Jerusalem. Who are these people for whom you are prepared to die?"

He answered that it was one thing for a Jew to fight against other Jews but wholly different if he should aid a Roman in seizing even those whom he, Iscariot, bitterly despised.

"I understand the point," I explained, "but you are a man of intelligence, and certainly it would be silly for you to say that you are prepared to die, and die in agony, for your enemies. That is madness."

"I have no stomach for crucifixion," I told him, "and if I have made its actualities seem real to you, I myself have come almost to feel the nails in my palms. It is not the way out for men of spirit, and here is my offer. And mark you, it is my last one. I pledge you that I will not require you to inform ever of anything concerning your present associates. You will not be pressed to betray your friends. All I ask is that you shall bring full and fair reports of the sayings and the doings of all so-called prophets and teachers and holy men who may gain a following here or in Galilee, for what begins in Galilee must ever end in Jerusalem. If this little thing you will do, then I shall spare your life and speak no more of nails through the hands and nails through the feet."

Iscariot sat for a long time and said no word, but he was greatly troubled. And at last he looked up and spoke not then, but he nodded his head. And so the bargain which was more momentous than either of us supposed was sealed for all eternity. Just the nod of a head.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

FREEDOM AND MR. MINSKY

BY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

WITH a certain sense of shame I confess that the fate of the burlesque show itself does not interest me greatly. Theoretically I am all for ribaldry and Rabelaisianism, and if I had ever seen a performance which actually resembled what some manly critics think they remember when they go into raptures over the idea of burlesque, I should probably be as enthusiastic as they. The fact remains, nevertheless, that when I have dutifully visited its temples in Irving Place and Fourteenth Street as well as in Times Square, I have never seen anything which was not pretty dismal and—though something may be said for the strip-tease—exasperatingly anaphrodisiac. Invariably the audience has impressed me more than the show itself, and invariably it has depressed me more as well. I do not like to realize that there are men whose home life—if I may thus euphemistically put it—is so dull that performances as unimaginative as these seem glamorous. And though it has been recognized since the time of Aristotle that the soul needs cathartics, it is distressing to think that anyone should find salubrious such veterinary doses as the burlesque show administers.

Despite all this I doubt that those responsible for closing the theaters have performed a public service as important as they seem to think; and when a cardinal speaks tremendously of "the wave of filth which is overwhelming us" he is being more dramatic than truthful. The serious fact, if there is one, is not that burlesque shows exist but that there are human beings who find in them the entertainment most suited to their needs; and these human beings are not going to be greatly improved by finding the box offices closed. Am I my brother's keeper? If the answer is yes, then those who make it have not discharged their responsibility when they have done no more than deprive "their brother" of his mean pleasures, and the cardinal and rabbi who unite to congratulate themselves publicly on what they have accomplished are dangerously smug.

They are also dangerous in a more tangible way, for the immediate result of their agitation has been the passage by the state legislature of the Dunnigan bill, which specifically empowers the Commissioner of Licenses to revoke the license of any theater housing a play which in his opinion is immoral. At present it is doubtful if the commissioner was within his rights in closing the burlesque theaters without a legal trial, but if Governor Lehman should sign the Dunnigan bill any commissioner of licenses would immediately become an arbitrary individual censor of all dramatic performances and a one-man dictator of the theater. Quite obviously the possibilities of abuse inherent in any such situation are almost limitless, and there would be nothing on earth to prevent the establishment of a censorship of the theater as rigid and as insane as that of Nazi Germany. Again and again it has been shown that the only way to exercise any control over the theater without establishing a censorship is by means of laws, like those at present existing, which make the question of obscenity one to be determined by a court trial; and if the crusaders against burlesque are sincere in protesting that they have no desire to do more than clean up obvious filth, they will support the representatives of all branches of the theater who have already urged Governor Lehman to veto the Dunnigan bill.

Even if the burlesque shows were ten times worse than they actually are, the fact would be no excuse either for exercising extra-legal power against them or for creating laws which obviously lend themselves to abuse. The question is not whether they deserve to survive or whether Commissioner Moss happens to be, personally, a man who can be trusted. In the first place, he will have successors, and, in the second place, there could be nothing more repugnant to the idea of democracy than the proposal to invest an individual with power to set up his own personal standard of propriety as the law governing theatrical performances. To defend an abuse of power on the ground that it was exercised in a good cause is monstrous, and it would logically lead, among other things, to the defense of lynch law whenever the victim happened to be guilty.

Nor am I among those who hold that arbitrary suppression of the abuses of freedom actually serves to protect the legitimate exercise of it. Certainly no one could maintain that the Dunnigan bill protects anyone's liberty, and it is in general true that no liberty is really secure unless it is broad enough to permit a certain margin of abuse. The fact is usually recognized in our laws. No one has yet devised a code governing the conduct of the press which could guarantee its freedom without permitting the excesses of yellow journalism, and it is doubtful if any such code could be drawn. You cannot give freedom to truth without giving a certain latitude to error, and the attempt to distinguish too precisely between liberty and license always means that liberty itself is infringed. What is true in general is as conspicuously true where the theater or any other form of artistic expression is concerned. There is no more reason for allowing one man to decide what a theater may or may not present than there would be for allowing one man to decide what a newspaper may print. The line between frankness and obscenity or between the free discussion of existing institutions and mere dema-goguary is ■ wavering, indistinct line which no law can draw precisely, and it is better that a few lies should be told than that any truths should be suppressed. It is not by a few tolerable abuses that liberty is endangered. It may be surrounded by an area in which abuse is possible, but that area serves to protect not to endanger. It is the margin of safety—even if the Minsky brothers are squatters there.

BOOKS

Blundering into War

NEUTRALITY FOR THE UNITED STATES. Edwin Borchard and William Potter Lage. Yale University Press. $3.50.

THE distinguished authors are certain that it was stupidity about legal matters and naivete about world affairs which forced us into the World War. They think that there is great hope of staying out of another war if we keep our lawbooks dusted and our emotions under control. While there is no formula offered for staying out, the hope for it is a sturdy insistence upon our neutral rights, as in the days of 1793, coupled with objuratation of the temptation to sit in judgment on foreign nations and of the credulous belief that wars diminish the essential causes of war. A really bright Secretary of State would help, we gather, and ■ neutral President.

This book is the best detailed description available of our legal blundering during the years 1914-17. It is written with some fervor, some contempt, some mild bitterness toward international-law colleagues and others who have apparently been engaged in twisting international law into ■ hybrid moral and legal obligation upon us to take sides in all world affairs. Theirs are profane, if not amateur, hands laid on the ark of the pre-covenant law.

A believer in international law has ■ hard time these days. Comes the legislator pragmatically and says neither side observed international law when the World War became desperate, so why trust to it to protect us next time? Lady Godiva rode in mailed armor compared to the protection given ■ neutral nation by a non-obeyed international law. In response appears Judge John Bassett Moore, dean of the profession, and tells the legislators that "it is a maxim of the common law that in the midst of arms the laws are silent (inter arma leges silent), but this does not mean that the laws cease to exist." They do not really function in war time, but although they sleep, they are still there, so beware! To the legislator this seems like ■ touchdown for his side and a devastating admission of general uselessness and incapacity around the village firehouse.

Professor Borchard, however, thinks international law, which might have saved us, did not have a chance from 1914 to 1917. We were unneutral almost from the start, and on top of that committed a series of gratuitous legal blunders which grew like young giants in their importance. Later, when we tried to disown one of them, the armed-merchantman controversy which led to the story that "the submarines got us into the war," a vested political interest in it had grown up which our State Department could not oppose. The combina-

SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE

by
C. B. S. Evans,
M.D., F.A.M.A.,
Member White
House Conference,
Committee on
Maternal Care,
Washington—In-
troduction by R.
W. Holmes, M.D.,
F.A.C.S., Professor of Obstetrics, Northwestern University Medical School—Prefatory
and other notes by Norman Haire, Ch. M., M.B.,
Specializing Obstetri-
cian, Gynecologist and
Sexologist, London,
England.
Illustrations by Robert L.
Dickinson, M.D., F.A.C.S., —Senior Gynecologist and Obstetrician, Brooklyn Hospital.

Illustrated with Correct Anatomical Diagrams
Fully Explained

A 3-WAY-GUIDE:

TELLS SHOWS EXPLAINS

CONTENTS

Bride and Groom

Sexual Overtures
First Sexual Contact
Frequency of Sexual Relations
The Sexual Cycle
Sexual Response in Men and Women: Timing
Woman's Hygiene

The Cold Wife—Frigidity

Mental, Psychic and Physical Barriers
Effects of Menstruation
Effects of Physical Development
Effects of Early Parental Training
The Clumsy Husband
Pseudo-Frigidity
Pseudo-Response
Sexual Underdevelopment
The Pleasure-motif in ■■

The Unsatisfied Wife

■ upon Nerves
Fear of Pregnancy
The Acquiescent Wife
True and False Sexual Response
Happily Managing the Sex Act
Problems of Orgasm
The Satisfaction of Normal Sexual Appetite
The Oversexed Wife

Married Courtship

Making Desires Known via the Special Language of ■■ Tactics the Husband Should Use
Tactics the Wife Should Use
Helpful Preliminaries to Sexual Union
The Sensual Appeal; the Spiritual Appeal
Secondary Sexual Centers

The Perfect Physical Expression of Love

Positions in Intercourse: Factors in Determining Choice
Two Types of Orgasm in Women
Producing Simultaneous Climax
The Mechanical Principles of ■■ Union
Sexual Stimulation
Sexual Adjustment

COMMENTS

"This book is one of the clearest and most sensible expositions of the ars amandi. . . . The importance of the wife's reaching an orgasm and the technique of insuring that result are emphasized."
—Quarterly Review of Biology

"Begins with a description of the nervousness of the young bride on the first night of marriage, and ends with an account of the positions in which coitus may take place."

—Lancet (leading English medical journal)

"Deals with the physical and psychological problems of coitus. . . . Can be freely recommended to patients who require guidance in their marital life. . . . It would certainly help men to understand the 'frigid wife'."

—General Practice

"The frank, yet delicate, handling of the subject makes the manual one that ■ physician may safely suggest."

—Amer. Journal of Obstetrics and Gynecology

"Evans gives all the advice that anybody needs."

—Journal of the Amer. Medical Ass'n

*The membership of the American Medical Association consists of approximately 100,000 physicians.

THE CHARTS

Female Sex Organs, Side View ■ Female Genital Parts • Male Sex Organs, Side View ■ Male Sex Organs, Front View ■ Male Reproductive Cell, Front and Side Views

(Detailed explanations accompany charts.)

FREE OFFER

Mail coupon to your bookseller or to
EMERSON BOOKS, INC., 21-N
251 West 19th St., New York

Send me in plain wrapper SEX PRACTICE in MARRIAGE for FREE INSPECTION. I will deposit $1.95 and a few cents postage on delivery. If not entirely satisfied, I may return book within 5 days and purchase price will be refunded. I am over 21 years old.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you wish to enclose only $1.95 with coupon, thus saving delivery charges. (Same money-back guarantee, of course.)

New Victor Higher Fidelity Recording by the

PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA

EUGENE ORMANDY, Conductor

THE PATHÉTIQUE TSCHAIKOWSKY'S SYMPHONY NO. 6 IN B MINOR

VICTOR offers you interpretations by two world-supreme orchestras of this universal work . . . The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, has also made a Victor recording of the Tschaiowsky "Pathétique" Symphony. Hear them both. Many music lovers will want both.

The world's greatest artists are on Victor Records, which are made to last a lifetime.

RCA Victor Phonograph-Radios begin at $69.50. RCA Victor Record Players are as low as $18.50.

. . .

RCA presents the "Magic Key" every Sunday, 2 to 3 p. m., E. D. T., on the NBC Blue Network

VICTOR RECORDS

A Service of the Radio Corporation of America

tion of the general atmosphere of unneutrality plus the legal blundering in and out of season doomed us.

He cites our success in staying out of the Anglo-French war in 1792 by insisting upon our neutral rights to a certain extent. True, we got into it in 1812, but only after twenty years, and our entry was not due so much to interference with our neutral rights, specifically impressment of our sailors, as to the growth of the "War Hawk" party which looked with loving eyes toward Canada and Florida. There was no other major naval war until 1914.

Came 1914 and we "fumbled" all over the field, dropping the ball right in front of our opponents on every play. "Our unneutrality began as early as 1914." We threw away the international law on blockades by admitting the idea that if Great Britain was really hard pressed she had a right to do anything. Later, under international law we had no business submitting to the black list. Even Canada would not follow our course and submit on that. "Subservient" is a word the authors use often.

The largest legal oversight came early in 1914 when we neglected to warn American passengers off belligerent munitions ships. From that little oversight came the offspring claim that American citizens had a right to risk the peace of their country on alien ships legally subject to attack. Ambassador Gerard asked, "Why should we enter a great war because . . . Americans may be hired to protect by their presence cargoes of ammunition?" Walter Millis has more recently retold the Lusitania story in a way which suggests to shocked readers that Great Britain was only drawing the ultimate diplomatic advantage out of that oversight when the ship slowed down in front of the German submarine which sank it.

The largest legal mistake came early in 1914 when we allowed armed British merchantmen the free use of our ports. That mistake became more important with the appearance of the submarine in 1915. Professor Borchard holds: "It may truthfully be said that American intervention in the European war was largely induced by the attempt of the Wilson Administration to maintain not only the privilege of British merchantmen to arm but to use their arms against submarines, while yet enjoying immunity from submarine attack because the merchantman had American citizens among her passengers and crew." Once our State Department had gone off the deep end on that claim, the claim became a fundamental American "right," and the honor and self-respect of the nation were involved in its defense.

Oddly enough, we had what is rarely given, the chance to pull back from the one-sided consequences of this legal error. Early in 1916 Lansing realized that we had no business protecting armed belligerent merchant ships, and proposed a new deal whereby the Allies would disarm their merchant ships and the Germans would stop and search them and remove passengers and crew before sinking them. This seemed to Lansing and Wilson a "reasonable and reciprocally just" modus vivendi. Why did we not insist upon it? Clearly it would have avoided the continuation of the submarine controversy, for lack of which we might not have entered the war. Professor Borchard answers that a "vested political interest" in our earlier position had grown up which was too strong for the Administration. Professor Seymour's "American Neutrality, 1914-1917" (1935) utterly ignored the fact that we had for a month or so completely admitted the unreasonableness of our own sacred rights. Neither of these treatments seems to recognize the important pull of the several billion dollars of war money which would have been jeopardized by the change. Perhaps our universities have still to educate their professors to realize the part money plays in our village, or why prominent names get on preferred lists.

Legal blunders it may be possible to avoid, but how does one avoid partisanship when all one's money is on one horse? And what is international law among friends?

Naivete about world affairs is, according to the authors, a greater danger to our peace and neutrality than it was in 1914. They have some stinging things to say about discriminatory and discretionary neutrality, world cooperation, crusaders "bearing fire and brimstone in one hand and sweet-scented lavender in the other," and "the preposterous career" of world wars for peace, democracy, and a new order.

While these last subjects are somewhat curtly treated, this is a heat-provoking book and a decided addition to the revaluation of America's great adventure.

STEPHEN RAUSHENBUSH

For an Investors' Union

FALSE SECURITY: THE BETRAYAL OF THE AMERICAN INVESTOR. By Bernard J. Reis. With an Introduction by John T. Flynn. Equinox Cooperative Press. $2.75.

MR. REIS'S book is an anatomy of grand larceny as practiced by the better classes. He begins it with a sentence of devastating restraint. "Simply stated," he says, "honesty plays little part in American business." Mr. Reis is both a lawyer and a certified public accountant, and has thus been professionally trained to evade laws and misrepresent balance sheets. But he happens to be one of those queer souls who—no doubt through some glandular derangement—prefer to spend their brief light tilting with the windmills rather than in the service of our corporate Fagins. He places the peculiar knowledge of his two peculiar professions at the disposal of the small investor.

The ordinary well-informed reader will find himself superficially familiar with the subjects that Mr. Reis discusses: the diffusion of corporate ownership and the useful role this diffusion plays in concentrating corporate control; the guaranteed mortgage scandals; the story of foreign-bond financing; the investment trust; the collapse of real-estate bonds; the trustee, and how little he deserves to be trusted; the reorganization racket, "Reshearing Shorn Lambs"; 77B, the answer to Wall Street's prayer; the certified reports of certified public accountants; the corporate jugglings of Mr. Hearst; and the feebleness of the SEC.

Unfortunately revelation has followed revelation and investigation has followed investigation with such rapidity in the past few years that they have tended to cancel each other. The public and the journalists who chew its cud have hardly had time to digest one sensation before it was succeeded by another. Mr. Reis, by his careful presentation and analysis, brings into view many things that were not immediately apparent in the headlines. He supplies a useful source book in finance, corporation law, accounting—and ethics.

The position of the investor, as shown by Mr. Reis, is incredibly insecure. The reports he gets from the corporation of which he is an "owner" are usually written to be as uninformative as possible. The great banking institutions that act as trustees of his bonds are rarely trustworthy. The courts to which he must appeal against wrong, if he can afford to hire lawyers and accountants, are almost never realistic in

BARGAINS in BOOKS

UP TO 75% OFF FORMER PRICES

Offered by America's Oldest Mail Order Book House

LIMITED QUANTITIES of EACH TITLE

1. SEXUAL LIFE IN ANCIENT ROME. By Otto Kiefer. Illustrated with 16 full-page plates. Acute portraits of the sexual life of leading Roman men and women, the sadism of the masses, the causes of the Empire's decay. ($5.00) $1.98

2. THE ART OF MARRIAGE. By J. F. Hayden, B.Sc. Extensive, frank, complete, this book includes notable chapters on unequalized sexuality, frigidity of wives, sexual satiety, prematurity, lack of art in procedure, impotence, prudery, etc. Also contains the fullest treatise on Frigidity that can be found today, as well as one on Reservatus. ILLUSTRATED, Revised, enlarged. Our Special Price, $1.98

3. FOUR FAMOUS VAN GOGH MASTERPIECES Beautifully Reproduced in Full Color

Cornfield—Zuave—Still Life—Blooming Apple Orchard

Ideal for framing, these pictures look like original oils when properly framed. Size of each reproduction, 14¼x18 inches. Together with an introductory booklet by G. R. Benson, illustrated with 17 half-tone photographic plates of Van Gogh's paintings. A nation-wide survey of American Art Schools placed Van Gogh FOURTH among the most popular artists OF ALL TIME. DaVinci, who was third, received only 3 more votes—Van Gogh preceded Titian, Rubens, Holbein and other great masters.

Originally sold at ($10.00)

Our Price, the set of 4 full-color reproductions, $1.98

4. ARTHUR TRAIN'S FAMOUS DISTRICT ATTORNEY SERIES. Tut, Tut, Mr. Tutt—The Butler's Story—Mortmain—The Goldfish—By Advice of Counsel. Illustrated. Artcraft binding. ($15.00) $4.88
The 5-volume set,

5. MASTERS IN ART SERIES: Goya; Holbein's Drawings; Giotto; Watteau; Vermeer; Turner; Tintoretto; Ruisdael; Rossetti; Raeburn; Nattier; Murillo; Metsu; Mantegna; Constable; Lippi; Jan Steen; Ghirlandajo; Francia; Duccio; de Hooch; David; Chardin; Watts. Twenty-four long-out-of-print, paper-covered books in the famous Masters in Art Series. 7½"x10". Containing 240 beautiful full-page plates. Any 6 books, $2.98 The 24 books, 88c

6. GEORGE WASHINGTON'S COMPLETE DIARIES. The first complete issue. From his first expedition as a youth of 16 to the days of his final illness. Illustrated from old prints, engravings and facsimiles. "The material contained in these handsome volumes constitutes beyond question, ONE OF THE MOST IMPORTANT HUMAN DOCUMENTS THAT HAS BEEN LATELY ADDED TO THE LITERATURE OF AMERICAN HISTORY."—Sat. Review of Literature. ($25.00) The 4-vol. set, only $3.98

7. DIEGO RIVERA'S MOST FAMOUS FRESCOS. Twelve prints in full color. Size, 9 by 12 inches. Diego Rivera is universally recognized as the world's foremost fresco painter. When these prints were first issued, they were sold FROM $5.00 TO $10.00 PER PRINT. ($7.50) 98c

8. TORTURES AND TORTURES OF THE CHRISTIAN MARTYRS. With 46 full-page original plates. (Limited edition). "Probably no more awful lesson of Man's inhumanity to Man, concentrated into so short a space, can be found throughout the annals of literature. ($7.50) $2.98

9. MARX TWAIN'S "1601." This much suppressed masterpiece now available after 25 years. "Brilliant satire, spine-shaking humor." Conversation it was in the time of the Tudors, and sketches Old and New. ($3.00) $1.58

10. Complete and Unexpurgated MEMOIRS OF CASANOVA. (12 volumes bound in 6). This is the rare unabridged edition to which have been added the Chapters discovered by Arthur Symonds. Edition limited to 500 sets on Louvain laid antique paper. Privately printed. ($50.00) $14.88

The complete set,

11. THE NATION AT WAR. By General Peyton C. March, U. S. Army, Chief of Staff of the Army in the World War. Limited, numbered, signed edition. Complete in 1 large, handsome, fully illus. volume. Boxed. ($10.00) $1.98

12. FAMOUS REMBRANDT ETCHINGS. The Three Trees—The Mill—Faust—measuring 15¼"x12½", 12½"x10¼", 10¾"x12½", respectively. Ideal for framing. Originals of The Three Trees have fetched $6,000 at Art Auctions. ($5.00) The set of 3, only 98c

13. MYTHS AND LEGENDS OF MANKIND. Profusely illustrated with 119 full-page plates. In 3 large, handsome volumes. "These volumes will captivate you from the first page and hold you spellbound to the last." Explains the deeper, original meanings behind countless of our present myths, beliefs and superstitions. The 3-volume set, $3.96

Satisfaction Guaranteed or Your Money Back

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION

Established 1884

367-373 Fourth Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which please send me the books I have circled below; delivery charges prepaid.

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10 11 12 13
(Mark circle around books desired)

☐ Please send me FREE Catalog No. 282-N, just off press!

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

Seeing RUSSIA with Experts

GENERAL SURVEY TOUR. Leader: Robert Magidoff, literary worker in Moscow since 1935. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. With Third Class passage. $399

A TRAVEL "COLLECTIVE." Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. With Third Class passage. $543

JULIEN BRYAN'S SIXTH ANNUAL TRIP through the highways and byways of the Soviet Union. Sailing July 10. Nine weeks. With Third Class passage. $694

A PUBLIC HEALTH SURVEY. Leader: John A. Kingsbury, co-author of "Red Medicine." Program arranged by Commissariat of Public Health. Sailing July 10. Nine weeks. With Tourist Class passage. $797

OPEN ROAD TRAVEL SEMINAR (Fourth Season). Leader: Anna Louise Strong, author of "The New Soviet Constitution," etc., just back from fifteen years in Russia. Sailing July 4. Nine weeks. With Tourist Class passage. $895

SOVIET UNION AND ITS THEATRE. Leader: Julia Dorn, just back from two years' work in the Soviet theatre. Sailing July 21. Eight weeks. With Third Class passage. $515

AMERICAN STUDENT UNION TOUR TO EUROPE AND RUSSIA. (Second Season). Leader: James Wechsler. Membership restricted to students. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks. With Third Class passage. $499

Many other unusual trips in Europe and the Soviet Union

THE OPEN ROAD

8 West 40th Street

12th floor

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

An American Marxist Journal
That Will Interest You

MARXIST QUARTERLY

A Journal that because of its independent, scholarly and creative approach is considered the beginning of a re-birth of American Marxism. The first issue evoked tremendous enthusiasm; our second issue, we feel, is still better. In this April-June issue are the following articles:

ANSWER TO BROOKINGS
By Lewis Corey

THE AMERICAN CIVIL WAR
By Louis M. Hacker

RAILROAD STRIKES OF 1877
By Philip L. Slaner

THEORY OF CLASSES
By Abraham Edel

NATURE AND DIALECTIC
By Sidney Hook

PHILOSOPHY AND PHILOSOPHIZING
By Franz Mehring

ON ART AND SOCIETY
By Meyer Schapiro

THE EARLIER SCIENCE
By Benjamin Ginzburg
(First of a series of four articles on the history of science.)

In addition, there are Communications, Discussions and Book Reviews: The Pragmatism of John Dewey, by Corliss Lamont; Marx and Hegel, by Edward Conze; Philosophy of Aldous Huxley, by Eliseo Vivas; Social Significance of Biology, by A.B., etc.

Subscribe Now — Get this Issue!

50c A COPY: $2 A YEAR

MARXIST QUARTERLY

20 Vesey Street

New York City

their approach to the problems of the financial market; there God is on the side of the biggest law firms. In reorganization he is at the mercy of the insiders, bankers and management; and the latest device set up to protect his interests, the SEC, grows more flabby every day under pressure from the Wall Street crowd.

Mr. Reis comes to revive Caesar as well as to bewail him. He places little faith in government regulation, but he has a solution. He says to investors what the C. I. O. says to workers, "Organize." He is a director of Consumers' Union, and he proposes the establishment of an investors' union. I think his proposal a realistic one, and of intriguing potentialities in the task of reconstructing our society. The individual stockholder or bondholder is as helpless as the individual worker. The workers no longer have the instruments of production, and the "owners" of industry no longer have the instruments of control. I look forward to the sight of widows and orphans picketing at Broad and Wall. There are times when the small investor, too, has nothing to lose but his chains.

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN

Literary Choreography

DANCE OF THE QUICK AND THE DEAD, AN ENTERTAINMENT OF THE IMAGINATION. By Sacheverell Sitwell. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.25.

THE problem that presented itself to the author here, as he explains at the outset, was "how to give vitality to the past while combining it with what an experimental writer of our time has called 'the continuous present.'" What first engages the reader, however, is not the subject of the author's discourse but his crystal style, now clear as glass, now quivering with all the colors a fountain displays in sunlight, now clouded as though by the rousing of some inchoate genie. It is a style that Walter Pater might have shaped and would certainly have admired, but, as Mr. Sitwell appreciates, at this period of history such a jewel is worn with a difference. The difference, which one feels more sharply as one moves toward the closing pages, darkened as these are by a kind of eschatological terror, is that even a man as fortunately situated as Sacheverell Sitwell cannot escape from the immediate horrors of contemporary life. He may care to offer us no more than "an entertainment of the imagination," unconcerned as to whether our response will take any form but delighted applause or a mute shrinking from the spectacle. But his imaginings are haunted. A sinister shadow obtrudes upon the liveliest and most gracious movements of the dancers. At the happiest moments one feels a macabre jerking of the bones. Here is a dance of the quick and the dead. But often it is the ghosts who rejoice us, while those who jostle us on the streets are specters drawing us toward the charnel-house.

It is obvious that Mr. Sitwell is a poet rather than a thinker. This, in spite of the fact that his opening chapter abounds in ideas which could be enlarged upon or profitably debated, such as that since "the State, the Aristocrat, and the Priest are no longer in exercise of their functions," it is "upon the efforts of the individual" that "all our reliance for the future must rest." But though he throws out suggestive notions, he is never polemical, and it is plain that he does not seek to persuade us to act but rather to induce us to feel. It may be argued that the awareness which comes with an enlargement of our sympathies leads ultimately to action, that new styles of architecture are dependent upon a change of heart. But this is the reader's affair. Mr. Sitwell is content merely to set the scene and direct the ballet.

With an ease that seems peculiar to this century—one thinks of Pound and Joyce and Virginia Woolf as among our more accomplished trapeze artists—he swings across centuries and continents, diving among the gin-drinkers of the Victorian London slums and resting—is it only a moment later?—on the brink of a lily tank beside the golden girls, naked but for the cassia flowers at their ears, whose dalliance furnishes the diversion of an Indian king. The illustrations which punctuate and define the text are eloquent of the freedom with which the poet moves from one civilization to another, choosing always some pregnant symbol to arrest the fancy, like a living statue that at a signal may take another attitude or drop its pose and walk away. Pages from Cruikshank's "Comic Almanack" are followed by reproductions of paintings by Brueghel and his awful master, Hieronymus Bosch. Doré and Daumier are companioned by Watteau and Gavarni. Numerous plates from a grim work on the criminal prisons of London are relieved by an Ajanta wall-painting or the figure of a pretty woman in fancy dress, and these are flanked by terrifying pictures of the Moa, a giant bird of New Zealand, now all but extinct. All afford themes for the play of the author's imagination. All make for the rich variety and the grotesque contrasts of the world he evokes.

As one reads, one feels that one is in the presence of the highly civilized man whom Clive Bell, in his essay on Civilization, delighted to praise: one "willing at any moment to follow intellect into the oddest holes and corners, while his instinctive reaction to life will be ever conditioned by taste." Yet perhaps Mr. Sitwell is too much the poet to answer wholly to Clive Bell's description of this phenomenon. He is not merely the appreciator. Freely roam though he can, and does, through the manifold realms that excite the interest of a cultivated intelligence, he must pause to brood over some particular manifestation of loveliness or ugliness. He has intensities that are foreign to the highly civilized. He is, moreover, obsessed by a harrowing sense of time, and by the almost equally harrowing consciousness, present to every sensitive contemporary, of an increasing vulgarity, an encroaching debasement of values.

Implicit in these pages is the reminder that art is man's strongest bulwark against the tide of the centuries. The book itself is proof that the artist, the poet, by the power of imagination helps his fellows to know the quick from the dead, moves his fellows to join in the dance of life.

BABETTE DEUTSCH

Anti-Metaphysical Philosophy

THE LOGICAL SYNTAX OF LANGUAGE. By Rudolph Carnap. Translated from the German by Amethe Smeaton. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $7.50.

AN EXAMINATION OF LOGICAL POSITIVISM. By Julius Rudolph Weinberg. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

THE publication of Mr. Weinberg's book and of the translation of Professor Carnap's famous work marks another milestone in the progress of what is undoubtedly the most vigorous movement in contemporary philosophy. In a few years logical positivism has swept the philosophical world and threatened the main traditions of Western philosophy by attempting to demonstrate through a logical

A question
the rest of the world is asking —and a statesman's startling
answer?

A New Foreign Policy for the United States
By LIVINGSTON HARTLEY

HERE are the disturbing facts about America's relation to the rest of the world:

1. Our first line of defense on our Atlantic Coast is not our own—but the British navy.
2. We look across the Atlantic at a power far superior to our own; and across the Pacific at another power rapidly advancing toward superiority.
3. Our responsibility for the Philippines forms the "Achilles' heel" of our national self defense.
4. In all American history there has been but one 100 per cent success for American diplomacy.

Because of these facts—and dozens of others revealed in a startling new book about American foreign policy—the rest of the world is asking: Is America afraid to employ her undisputed national supremacy for her own national good? This is one of the most astonishing paradoxes in history, because the United States is the strongest, richest, most secure nation on earth today. Yet she is gradually losing by diplomacy what she fought for—and won—in 1918!

What America can do about it . . .

Livingston Hartley, former official of the U. S. Department of State, and feature writer for The Washington Post, tells how America must use her tremendous national influence to protect her own national interests and ideals. IS AMERICA AFRAID? is a hard-hitting demand for a constructive, permanent foreign policy, and a composite picture of America's relation to a world apparently well on the road to war. Just published, 142 pages, $2.50.

Order from your bookseller, or mail coupon below:

To: PRENTICE-HALL, INC.
70 Fifth Ave., New York, N. Y.
Send me a copy of Is America Afraid?
☐ I enclose $2.50.
☐ Send C. O. D. (Postage extra).
I understand I may return book within
5 days for full refund if I am not satisfied.

Name

Address

City & State.....

BURLINGAME PUBLIC

DINNER

Vito Marcantonio
will announce the establishment of
THE PEOPLES' VOICE

■ new progressive weekly in East Harlem at ■

DINNER

SUNDAY—MAY 23—6:30 P. M.

Roger Smith Restaurant, 40 East 41st Street, N. Y. C.

Tickets—$2.50

SPEAKERS:

Roger Baldwin
Heywood Broun
Hon. Maury Maverick of Texas
Hon. John T. Bernard of Minnesota
Hon. Gerald Boileau of Wisconsin

Tickets at: Le Blang's, 1482 B'way; Rand Book Store, 7 E. 15 St., Columbia Bookshop, 2960 B'way, Workers Bookshop, 50 E. 13 St., All Peoples Party, 246 E. 116 St., 20 Vesey St., Room 601, COr. 7-6567.

LECTURES

PERSONAL:

Will the Messrs. Broun, Wertheim, Villard and all other interested parties please hold off their Supreme Court arguments until they hear

EARL BROWDER

General Secretary of the Communist Party

on

"WHAT KIND OF SUPREME COURT?"

Mr. Browder will be glad to answer their questions—and yours, after his lecture. The Chairman will be Joseph Freeman, editor of the New Masses, which is sponsoring the event.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 26, 8:30 P. M.

CARNEGIE HALL 57th Street and Seventh Avenue
New York City

Tickets: 35c, 55c, 83c. On sale at New Masses, 31 East 27th St., N. Y. C.
All seats reserved

MASS MEETING

NATIONAL CONGRESS OF AMERICAN WRITERS
CARNEGIE HALL ■ FRIDAY, JUNE 4TH ■ 8:30 P. M.

Tickets 35c to $1.10
At THE BOOK UNION,
381 4th Ave. [MU. 5-1454]
or League of American Writers [ST. 9-6959]

Speakers
DONALD OGDEN STEWART, EARL BROWDER, JORIS IVENS, SENATOR GERALD P. NYE, ARCHIBALD MACLEISH, and others.

THE GROUP FORUM

Meets at Hotel Peter Stuyvesant—2 West 11th St.

TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 25TH, AT 8:45 P. M.

Discussion on:

"WHAT IS HAPPENING IN SPAIN TO-DAY"

Speakers: THEODORE DREISER (Distinguished American Writer)
JOSE GIBERNAU (Spanish Consul)
HELEN SELDES (Foreign Correspondent—just returned from Spain)
Admission 50 cents

BERTRAM D. WOLFE co-author with Diego Rivera of "Portrait of America" and "Portrait of Mexico"
Just returned from SPAIN

after visiting Barcelona, Valencia, Madrid, the front, will speak on

CIVIL WAR IN SPAIN

THURSDAY, MAY 27, 8 P. M.

at CENTER HOTEL, 108 West 43rd Street, Grand Ballroom

Admission, 25c. Tickets may be obtained in advance at analysis of language that metaphysics is sheer nonsense. But the iconoclasm of this movement, for which it is notorious, is by no means its only aspect. On the constructive side the movement has sought to bring about the "unification of the sciences" by showing that all scientific statements are ultimately of a physical nature. This is what is termed "physicalism." This doctrine does not mean, however, that all events are to be explained in terms of the laws of what we now call physics. It means that all the sciences are language constructions which refer ultimately to data determined in spatio-temporal terms.
NEW WORKERS SCHOOL, 7th FLOOR, 131 WEST 33rd STREET, N. Y. C.

In one sense the thesis of the unity of science is not new, since we have long known that the various sciences are guided by the same method. But in another sense it is, for it includes the task of constructing a universal language into which the statements of all the sciences can be translated. And it is toward this end that the efforts of Professor Carnap's volume are addressed. When this task shall have been accomplished, the claim is made, the barriers which now exist between the various sciences will break down. As a consequence so-called irreducible concepts like "life" and "mind" will be shown to refer fundamentally to the same subject matter as that of physics.

Is this not disguised materialism? The logical positivists answer that materialism is a metaphysical doctrine which pretends to tell us about the nature of reality, while their own interest is focused only on the statements made by science. Thus it is not for them a question of reality but of the kind of subject matter that is admitted into scientific discourse.

How successful Professor Carnap's efforts have been is something on which the reviewer is not competent to pass judgment. But this much may be asserted by anyone—no language as yet invented has permitted the translation into physical terms of a vast range of data which are legitimate objects of human curiosity. There are of course no a priori grounds on which to disprove the pious hope that all significant statements will some day be reduced to those of some future physical language. But the positivists have intolerantly disposed of a good many fields which have not yet admitted of such translation by ruling them out as nonsense. Even if it could be shown that some of these problems, such as the problems of value, are nonsense, this would only prove that some nonsense is of high importance. And if the positivists, in the exercise of a right no one will deny them, insist on ruling these problems from the range of their interests, these problems will nevertheless deserve the attention of some of the best minds of any age. Another criticism is also here in point. While scientists seem little worried about the unity of the sciences, they have been carrying out the process of unification through the merging of fields of research rather than by drawing up royal schemes. Now if the enterprise of the logical positivists is of no practical value to the scientists, what objective value has it? This criticism does not apply, of course, to the destructive side of the movement. Here, while it may not have shown everybody that all metaphysics is nonsense, logical positivism will end by making some metaphysicians, at least, considerably more cautious about the kind and quality of the nonsense they indulge in.

Mr. Weinberg's book, it should be noted, is not an introduction but a critical exegesis presupposing some knowledge of the doctrine criticized. But those not adverse to a little hard work will find the book eminently well worth reading.

ELISEO VIVAS

Van Gogh: A Self-Portrait

DEAR THEO: THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF VINCENT VAN GOGH. Edited by Irving Stone. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.75.

MR. STONE and his publishers have done the reading public a considerable service by producing this compendious and inexpensive single volume. There are no important omissions, and as Mr. Stone has edited the letters they form a continuous autobiographical document which will undoubtedly take its place among the self-exploratory records of great artists. In Vincent Van Gogh there was something of the saint, or more precisely of the martyr, as well as of the artist. He strikes one at times as a queer compound of Rembrandt Van Ryn, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and D. H. Lawrence, with a dash, too, of a sort of tormented St. Francis of Assisi.

His life was one of almost intolerable poverty and desperate loneliness. Night after night he poured out these letters to his brother Theo, who, despite intervals of discouragement and despair, had faith in Vincent and loved him—loved him and therefore had faith in him. Every sentence is marked by the intense moral purpose of the writer, and by the tragic desperation of a struggle for mere existence in a society which had repudiated every value upon which the artist subsists. The neat little, tight little bourgeois world of the late nineteenth century simply didn't want persons like Vincent Van Gogh to survive. Instead of being happy in his art, he was forced to become a martyr to it. "All I ask," he says at one terrible moment, "all I ask in painting is a way of escaping from life." It seemed to him that his successful contemporaries had, in his own phrase, "cauterized certain nerves within them."

It was the age, in Zola's language, of le triomphe de la médiocrité. "Moral grandeur diminishes; material grandeur comes in its stead." The future of art seemed to lie out of the Western world, in the tropics whither Gauguin had fled, or anywhere away from "the boredom of civilization." With wonderful insight and simplicity Van Gogh states the dilemma in which the harassed artist has found himself since the Industrial Revolution: "One wants to be an honest man; one is so, one works hard; but still one cannot make both ends meet; one must give up the work, there is no chance of carrying it out without spending on it more than one gets back. . . . One cannot present oneself as somebody who comes to propose a good business or who has a plan which will bring great profit. On the contrary, it will end with a deficit, and still one feels a power surging within; one has work to do and it must be done." The book is crammed with truth, and not only the sad truths but the happier ones also, the passionate observations of one to whom each day brought further mastery and intenser vision. Some of the descriptive passages in these letters are as vivid as Van Gogh's own paintings. "Doctor Gachet with the heart-broken expression of our time"; or a typical landscape: "the immeasurable plain with cornfields against the hills, immense as ■ sea, delicate yellow, delicate soft green, delicate soft violet of ■ plowed and weeded piece of soil, regularly checkered by the green of flowering potato plants, everything under a sky with delicate blue, white, pink, violet tones." But one could quote from every page, every paragraph.

In short, here is that rare and precious thing, ■ great book, the greatness of a man in his own words.

MICHAEL SAYERS

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

TRAVEL

JOHN L. SPIVAK

57 DAY TOUR
SAILING JULY 3

$689

U.
S.
S.
R.

ADD IT UP EITHER WAY

You + Russia + John L. Spivak

or

You + Russia + Langston Hughes

Equals an experience never to be forgotten

There is still time to send in your application for membership in these two tours.

For full particulars, address

EDUTRAVEL, Inc., ■ Fifth Ave., New York

Tel.: GRamercy 7-3284-3285

LANGSTON HUGHES

60 DAY TOUR
SAILING JULY 3

$499

RESORTS

DECORATION DAY WEEK END

May 28 to 31 . . . 3 Days—$16.00

($6.50 day — . . . slightly higher for deluxe cabins)

CAMP TAMIMENT TAMIMENT—PENNSYLVANIA

New York Office: 7 East 15th St.—ALgonquin 4-3441

Philadelphia: 1240 Widener Bldg.—Rittenhouse 3394

TWIN PINES
—
TROUT
LAKE

VACATION NEWS

Your request will bring 1937 booklet describing Twin Pines and its new main house, with de luxe accommodations . . . each room with individual screened sun porch, semi-private shower and bath. June rate, $25.00.

S. SAIDEL LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

may be requested by subscribers to The Nation as often as necessary. To assure regular delivery of copies please give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Write to the Circulation Department, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

John Doe, B. A. I.

To that long list of hard-earned university degrees after your name, Current History Magazine now proposes to confer another. It is the degree of B.A.I. (Bachelor of Accurate Information) certifying your qualifications to discuss world affairs intelligently.

B.A.I. after John Doe's name means that he has the assurance that the facts are on his side. B.A.I. means that he has come as close to understanding history-in-the-making as anybody possibly can while that history is still alive, real.

B.A.I. means that John Doe has been able to plow under propaganda, rumor, and say-so, and drive a hard shaft clean through to the facts. It means that he has ruled out guesswork and grinding axes.

No, it is not absolutely necessary to read Current History in order to qualify for a B.A.I. You can do as Current History's editors have done for their thousands of readers each month—obtain and sift reports from 1,000 different sources all over the world; secure copies of the actual documents; keep in touch with a list of the world's most recognized authorities who analyze and interpret important happenings.

Of course, it is more convenient to go directly to Current History for your information. In the June issue, for example, you will not want to miss the authoritative article on "Spain Balks the Fascists," by Lawrence A. Fernsworth, London Times and Current History correspondent in Spain. Mr. Fernsworth explains why Great Britain backed down on the blockade and gives a vivid picture of German and Italian intervention. Other articles include a review of France's first year under Premier Blum; Germany's synthetic gasoline; what America thinks of the Supreme Court plan; and a survey by the editors on "Paying Off the New Deal."

Readers of The Nation are invited to take advantage of Current History's special introductory offer:

SIX MONTHS FOR ONE DOLLAR

(Regular price, $3.00 for One Year)

You need send no money now, if you prefer. Current History will bill you after you have received your first copy.

Please send me CURRENT HISTORY for six months in accordance with your special offer.

☐ I enclose $1.00.

☐ Bill me later.

NAME

ADDRESS

CURRENT HISTORY

63 Park Row

New York, N. Y.

FILMS

Another Madman

"NIGHT MUST FALL" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) runs parallel at many points to "Love from a Stranger," whose failure to hold its audience I noticed two weeks ago. But if Basil Rathbone's overacting was the cause of that failure, an equivalent defect does not appear in the acting of Robert Montgomery. I am disposed to blame the failure of "Night Must Fall" upon an audience which could not understand it. The people around me at the Capitol were in the first place unable to conquer their disappointment in Mr. Montgomery because he had refused to give them another insipid role; and in the second place they were obviously incapable of liking the particular effect of which by some miracle he was so much the master. This effect returns me to the theme of horror, a theme which the American movie public finds quite palatable as long as there is no subtlety in the handling—in racket pictures, for instance, and in the G-men messes where someone is knocked over the head or drilled full of bullets every three minutes by the director's stopwatch. When, that is to say, the horror is physical. But in "Night Must Fall" it is psychological, long delayed, and presented to us through a personality nine-tenths of which is as charming as ever it was. So the people around me kept fidgeting in their seats and wondering when Mr. Montgomery would uncover the remaining 10 per cent of his cuteness; and when he did not, but turned it rather into something really sinister, they got up and went home.

They had counted on this bewitching murderer to come through with the revelation that he was the Irish darling most of his victims thought him to be. The revelation they missed was more valuable, for it was nothing less than that Mr. Montgomery is an actor after all. For the first time in my memory he consented to turn his face full at the camera; it is not so attractive that way, though as he manipulated it the other evening it was at least twice as powerful. Mr. Montgomery had studied his part with genuine intelligence. He had noted the precise degree to which it overlapped his previous parts, and had employed his old tricks up to that point; but beyond it he had set to work at something so good in itself as to shed a certain beam of superiority back over the whole. He was both convincing and absorbing.

"The Last Night" (Amkino) is the newest Russian film to deal with events on the eve of the October Revolution. It does so by the device of showing us two representative Moscow families, one rich and one poor—or, more significantly, one the family of a manufacturer and the other the family of a worker. The manufacturer is stuffily conceived, but his light-minded daughter who flirts indiscriminately with reds and whites rings somehow very true; and the family of Zakharkin the worker is without exception interesting, although no member of it steps out of the convention thus far established.

"The Prince and the Pauper" (Warner Brothers) has been released, naturally enough, on the eve of George VI's coronation; for it tells Mark Twain's story of the young Edward VI and of how a beggar boy came near to being crowned in his place. The picture is not important, but it is momentarily exciting; and the Mauch twins who play the title roles are more than passable. Good enough for Coronation week.

MARK VAN DOREN

RESORTS

BERKSHIRE PINES

In the Lovely Berkshire Hills

A combination parents have been seeking. Hotel facilities and a fully equipped day camp for children under intelligent guidance of 12 trained counselors with progressive outlook.

All land and water sports—Golf nearby.

DECORATION DAY WEEK END RATE
$15.00

Anytime Friday to Monday evening

Special Rates in June

WEST COPAKE, N. Y. TEL, COPAKE 46

LOCUST GROVE FARM

A real 97 acre farm completely improved just 55 miles from New York. Run by an artist* for artistic people. Our cows and chickens, finest home cooked food. Decoration Day week-end rates $3.00 daily. Special June rates. Information from

*G. A. PODORSON, 132 W. 23 St., N.Y.—WA. 9-1532 or Hopewell Junction, N. Y.—Phone 14-F-6

THE PRESSES in BUSHKILL, PA.

THE IDEAL SUMMER RESORT

Reservations for DECORATION DAY week end are coming in fast. Have you made yours?

Telephone or write at

Tel. Bushkill 9011 Box 145 Bushkill, Penn.

SPERLINGS LILAC LODGE

in Rockland County

The Most Beautiful Place for your vacation. Dietary laws observed. Tennis, Handball Courts.

Moderate prices for Decoration Day

West Nyack, N. Y. Tel. Nanuet 409

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

MARTIN'S HIGH VIEW VILLA

Riverdale, N. J.

minutes city—60c R. T.—Rent 1-2-3-4-5 Rooms, Furnished, Kitchenettes, All improvements. Beautiful country—16 acres. Athletics, Swimming, Dancing. Golf nearby. Call Topping 2-4221.

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL

West End Ave. SHoepstead 3-3000
37 Minutes from Times Square

Live in this modern fireproof hotel away from noise.

SINGLES WEEKLY UP.

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP, CAPACITY 30. MODERN; JEWISH AMERICAN MEALS. REASONABLE RATES, BUSHKILL, PA.

JUNE IN VERMONT! Enjoy an inexpensive simple country vacation among a small group of progressives. Write Ethan Allen Farm, R. F. D. No. 2, Chester, Vermont.

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

PIONEER YOUTH CAMP

Rifton, N. Y.

In the Catskills

BOYS AND GIRLS FROM SIX TO SIXTEEN
Fourteenth consecutive season of progressive camping. Happy, healthy activities in cooperative community of seven separate age groups. Exceptional staff. Intelligent direction develops social awareness. Creative of environment rich in historical background.

ARTS

MUSIC

SPORTS

DRAMATICS

CRAFTS

SWIMMING

Non-profit-making

non-sectarian

Rate for 9-week $175

Special rate to members of Teachers' Union

Inquire at

PIONEER YOUTH OF AMERICA, INC.

219 W. 29th St., New York, N. Y.

Pe. 6-3055

MISCELLANEOUS

Progressive parents nine year old girl desirous of caring for few children during summer at their spacious charming old colonial house thirty miles upstate, three acres, children's swimming pool, arts, crafts, piano. $15 weekly. Box No. 908, c/o The Nation.

Cultural and Social Organization with membership of over 1000, wishes to find suitable Adult Camp or summer resort that it can recommend officially to membership for summer vacation. Box No. 910, c/o The Nation.

TRAVEL

RUSSIA

SOVIET TRAVEL SEMINAR

60 Days All Inclusive $485

ENGLAND, DENMARK, SWEDEN
32 Days in SOVIET RUSSIA and ARMENIA
Paris Exposition of 1937

Leader: PROF. BERNHARD J. STERN,
Sociologist, Columbia University
Editor: Science and Society

UNITED FRONT GROUP

30 days in Russia . . . visits also to Scandinavia and Paris

60 Days All Inclusive $398

Leader: ALVIN E. COONS, Labor Editor
Modern Third Class on Atlantic

For Details Apply to

Compass Travel Bureau

55 WEST 42nd ST., NEW YORK

Longacre 5-3070

TOURS CONDUCTED BY INDEPENDENT

To Western Europe, Palestine, Soviet Russia, Paris International Exposition,
and the Salzburg Festival

Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

SUMMER RENTALS

SUMMER COTTAGE FOR RENT: Five rooms, electricity, water, brook, 300-acre farm, 115 miles from city. $200. To rent to family with children. ST. 9-7711. MILVY, 25 East 10th St.

Harrison, Maine. 350 miles. Island camp; 12 acres, sandy beach, gas, plumbing. Six rooms, bath. Accommodates 8. $300 season. Shongut, Mohegan Lake, N. Y.

Private pool, tennis, 5 houses, 10 acres, refined, sanitary improvements, frigidaire, gas. 50 min. commuting, $225 to $325. Box 185, Congers, N. Y.

Adirondacks, Warrensburg, N. Y. Comfortable, furnished house, all conveniences; four bedrooms; garage; walking distance from public golf course; tennis courts. Boat on Echo Lake. Pictures mailed. $200 for season. William Wallace, Box 41.

LAKE MOHEGAN. Group of boys, seasonable rental—$20, $25 each. Showers, baths, congenial surroundings. Mrs. Wolsky, Peekskill 467W.

WESTPORT, CONN. Charming old house and bungalow in summer colony. Tennis, swimming, children's camp. Reasonable rentals—Watkins 9-3045.

FOR SALE

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy
A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value

G. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515-M

APARTMENT WANTED

Completely furnished reasonable apartment. Middle June to September; in Village or Brooklyn Heights. Suitable couple and child. Write 1714 Adams St., Madison, Wis.

APARTMENT TO SHARE

Western girl desires pleasant, intelligent girl share attractive apartment East 38th all conveniences—$40 month, complete. Box No. 911, c/o The Nation.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

BOOKS

A $1000 Prize Contest

is offered by

Harper's Magazine

Believing that our American traditions and ideals need to be reinterpreted in the light of new economic and social conditions, Harper's Magazine offers a prize of $1000 for the best contribution on "The American Way."

No set limit of length or treatment is imposed: it is hoped that manuscripts submitted will be of average magazine length, and that the material will be fresh and explicit, and a guide to action.

The contest closes September 15, 1937. The judges will be the editors of Harper's Magazine, who will also pay $250 each for non-prize-winning manuscripts suitable for publication in the magazine. Subject to the author's consent, the prize-winning manuscript will be published in book form by Harper & Brothers.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE

49 East 33rd St. New York, N. Y.

Six poems from the Russian

A. S. PUSHKIN Y. LERMONTOV

Ruslan and Ludmilla

Izmael Bey

Poltava

Lithuanian Maid

Caucasian Captive

The Daemon

Press Comments Describing This Book:

TIMES, Trenton, New Jersey.

These poems long, but length could not destroy the beauty in the poet's heart. There is no weariness in these fine lines.

BLACKWELL DAILY JOURNAL, Blackwell, Okla.

All the have been translated into comprehensive and interesting English and Mr. Krup is deserving of great credit.

THE BOSTON GLOBE.

Pushkin and Lermontov both terminated their lives in duels, but their work lives on. Now three of the most admired poems of each are here presented in faithful and unabridged translation for Americans to judge their work on its merits.

DAVID DAVIDOVITCH BURLIUK.

outstanding Russian painter and poet.

These have not lost their lustre in translation. In English they are bright and convincing in original Russian.

Illustrations by Herbert Fouts, 317 pp., $2.

Send only checks or money orders through mail

JACOB KRUP, Publisher and Editor

145 East 23rd Street

New York, N. Y.

RECORDS

100,000

European Recordings

Announcing extraordinary sale of 100,000 Parlophone, Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous records comprise the cream of the world's finest music. A selection gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c & 75c per record. Values $1.50 & $2.00. Mail orders. Catalog.

GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507 Fifth Ave. MURRAY HILL 2-4221.

ANTIQUES

Artist with sound knowledge can secure genuine antiques from rural districts in England, and deliver in America at moderate prices. Braun, 106, Great Russell Street, London, W.C.1.

COURSES IN PHOTOGRAPHY

Elementary photographic class now forming. Course covers fundamentals and technique of photography for beginners. Lectures, demonstrations in development, printing, enlarging by qualified instructors. Club darkroom and equipment available. Class limited 15 students. Twelve lectures—$10. Also amateurs interested in joining progressive Manhattan Camera Club communicate: Box 909, c/o The Nation.

Letters to the Editors

Who Wouldn't Strike?

Dear Sirs: As frequent visitors and part-time residents in one of the most notoriously backward open-shop communities in America, it has been our good fortune to become associated with an intensely dramatic and significant "labor disturbance." Out of the 1,100 employees of the Firth Carpet Company at Firthcliffs (just outside of Newburgh) 1,050 walked out last week under the leadership of the C. I. O.'s Textile Workers' Organizing Committee. Axminster weavers in the United States average over $30 a week, but at Firthcliffs the best paid were making $20. Unskilled labor was paid as little as $11; everybody worked over forty hours a week and not a few averaged twelve hours a day six days a week; twenty minutes out for lunch was the maximum.

So labor-hating are the city and its one newspaper that it has been impossible to rally any citizens' support or get a column of even neutral publicity. The owner of the plant, a patent violator of the Wagner Act, is Lord Askroyd. He is said to be in England attending the coronation. His huge daily advertisements in the local paper cunningly lay the blame on "outside agitators," "undesirable characters," and "communistic influences." The courage and militancy of the strikers have been magnificent, and the picketing has been uniformly peaceful and disciplined. "Violence" occurred Tuesday when scabs tried to drive through the picket line and ran down a deputy sheriff. The sheriff was so mad he gave the driver a ticket and told him never to come back. Yet the workers continue to be represented as a bloodthirsty, atheistic, and lawless mob.

The company is taking steps to organize a vigilante committee. No decent, humane citizen of Newburgh or Cornwall would join it if he understood the real situation. We hope that everyone within a radius of twenty miles who reads this letter will communicate with us immediately at Hemlock Glen, Grand Avenue, Newburgh. The strikers must have support. Anonymity will be scrupulously preserved if you desire it. But act at once.

DWIGHT MACDONALD
SELDEN RODMAN

Newburgh, N. Y., May 13

The Nation as Tyrant

Dear Sirs: You approve of the Wagner Labor Act. I wonder how you'd like exclusive majority bargaining and the closed shop for newspaper and periodical publishing and writing, with no rights for individual papers and suppression for non-members—no employment, no work. The fact is The Nation and New Republic have become very obedient organs of tyranny and terrorism. As for enlightenment and culture they are secondary in your activity.

CYRUS H. ESHLEMAN

Lakewood, Ohio, April 22

[As far as The Nation is concerned, the closed shop begins at home. Its editorial department is organized as a unit of the American Newspaper Guild. It has a closed-shop contract with the Bookkeepers, Stenographers, and Accountants Union which covers all other departments.]

Right to a Job

Dear Sirs: Does a group industrially unionized possess a legal right to a permanent job in a business corporation? As no such right appears discernible where the business is unincorporated, any such right must flow from some definite and special feature of a corporation itself.

Such a feature exists; it is that of limited personal liability. The owner of a business, liable personally to his last cent for its debts, incorporates his concern and his personal liability vanishes. But rights imply correlative duties.

From the feature of limited liability a principle has emerged which has become one of the main bases of corporate jurisprudence. This principle is that the corporation is not the embodiment of a debt-free owner but is to be deemed a separate legal entity, operated for its own sake. But if the good of the corporation itself be paramount, each section of those connected with the corporation—directors, executives, manual and clerical workers, technicians, salesmen, stockholders—may be presumed to possess the rights and duties consonant to the vital needs of the corporation. Stockholders, or their predecessors, contributed necessary funds to the corporation; the workers contribute, each day, the necessary work. Each receives a recompense: dividends to the stockholders, wages to the worker. But so likewise, it may be argued, should each have his stake in the corporation: his shares to the shareholder, permanency of job to the worker. That the courts have already implicitly allowed a "colorable claim" to exist to such vested right appears from the facts that to strike, to unionize, and to picket are conceded to be lawful.

The question arises: Should control of a corporation lodge in the hands of those now called by that term—or should it be shared by them with the entirety of the workers? Answer this question in the affirmative and the right of the worker in such circumstances to his job is also conceded.

FREDERIC DREW BOND

Winsted, Conn., May 3

CONTRIBUTORS

MAXWELL S. STEWART has just published a new book entitled "Social Security."

DWIGHT MACDONALD was a member of the editorial staff of Fortune from March, 1929, until June, 1936.

HAROLD J. LASKI is professor of political science at the University of London and influential in British labor circles.

McALISTER COLEMAN is the head of the information bureau of the Utility Users' Protective League of New Jersey.

STEPHEN RAUSHENBUSH was in charge of preparing the material for the Senate Munitions Investigation Committee and acted as counsel for the committee during the hearings.

ISIDOR FEINSTEIN, an editor of the New York Post, is the author of "The Court Disposes," published this week.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • MAY 29, 1937

NUMBER 22

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

605

EDITORIALS:

SECURITY UPHELD

607

ROBINSON WILL NOT DO!

607

EUROPEAN DEMOCRACY ON THE OFFENSIVE

608

JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER

609

HUGHES CHECKMATES THE PRESIDENT

by Robert S. Allen

610

THE STRUGGLE FOR CZECHO-SLOVAKIA

by Robert Dell

611

OKLAHOMA TRIES COOPERATIVE MEDICINE

by James Rorty

614

"INDIAN FIESTA HUGE SUCCESS"

by Muriel Rukeyser

616

A PIONEER'S MAY DAY IN MOSCOW

618

PHILIP SNOWDEN

by Oswald Garrison Villard

619

JESTING PRELATE

by Heywood Broun

620

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NEW DEAL—FRENCH VERSION

by Raymond Gram Swing

621

A GIST OF GISTS OF GISTS

by Kenneth Burke

622

HER GOSSAMER SOUL

by Raymond Weaver

623

A LIBERAL EDUCATION

by W. A. Rudlin

624

POPULAR SCIENCE

by Jack Schuyler

626

NEW NOVELS

by Caroline Smith

627

DRAMA: THREE MEN ON A RUBBER CHECK

by Joseph Wood Krutch

628

RECORDS

by B. H. Haggin

629

The Shape of Things

★

THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL FOR A FORTY-hour maximum week, a forty-cent minimum wage, and the exclusion from interstate commerce of articles manufactured in sweatshops or by child labor may, as Robert Allen indicates elsewhere in this issue, be a tactical maneuver in the Supreme Court fight, but it is nevertheless of great social importance. Most New Deal legislation in the field of labor has contained a large proportion of unsound practice along with highly desirable objectives. This is not true of the present proposal. The flexibility which is necessary in the enforcement of maximum-hour and minimum-wage legislation is afforded by the special apprenticeship regulations and provision for such seasonal and industrial variations as are demanded by special conditions. A forty-hour week, or even a thirty-five-hour week, would be technically far more defensible than the thirty-hour week proposed in the Black-Connery bill. Most large industries are now operating on approximately a forty-hour schedule, and a slight change would not greatly affect production or increase industrial costs. Some objection to minimum-wage legislation has been raised in labor quarters on the ground that minimum standards tend to become maximum standards as well. This doubtless happens, and it can be remedied only by aggressive labor action. But it should not blind us to the necessity of adopting legislation for the protection of the thousands of men and women whose present wages fall far below the amount necessary to preserve a decent standard of living.

★

THE NEGRIN GOVERNMENT HAS RECEIVED unexpectedly strong support from political and trade-union organizations—both Anarchist and U. G. T.—in all parts of the country, Catalonia included. Thus encouraged, it has briskly cut away the red tape and cobwebs that had accumulated in the war machine. Several old army men and other persons who had forfeited the trust of their coworkers have been superseded by new appointees with military ability and of undoubted loyalty. One of these, Fernandez Bolanes, an old Socialist, left New York several days ago to become Assistant Minister of War, and General Rojo has been given additional powers as Chief of Staff. Concentration of army authority and a single command for all fronts, frequently urged in recent months, at last seem on the point of emerging.

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

In true Spanish fashion there is widespread public discussion of an early Loyalist offensive. The strong pressure on Toledo and the definite, if slow, advance on the Guadalajara front in the direction of Saragossa may be the beginning of this event. News reaches us of a plan to organize a giant Loyalist army of half a million soldiers. Perhaps much-needed help will now be sent to Bilbao. On that front Mola appears to have sacrificed a large proportion of his numerically weak forces in preliminary pushes. The Basques at last have a few airplanes, and they have begun to work. The morale of the city is excellent. It is still possible that Bilbao will not fall.

★

SOME FOUR THOUSAND BASQUE CHILDREN, refugees from Spain's civil war, many of them fresh from the horror of Guernica and other towns bombed by German airmen, have arrived in England, where they have become the objects of touching care on the part of the British government and various social organizations. The United States, with twenty-one million Catholics, has so far shown no comparable eagerness to take a quota of children. A small beginning has been made through the American Board of Guardians for Basque Refugee Children, which has headquarters at 20 Vesey Street, New York. Already offers of financial help and adoption are coming in. The attitude of the State Department is still ambiguous. A request that 500 Basque children be admitted was met by a formal acknowledgment and the astonishing statement that the decision would be left to the American consul in Paris. But it is unthinkable that the government should actually interfere with a move to rescue these children. Here is a cause in which progressive friends of Spain, Catholic charitable organizations, and government agencies might well work together. France and England are doing their share and have demonstratively sent their ships to protect transports carrying the children. The Scandinavian countries have also volunteered to help. Rich America cannot do less.

★

ALIQUIPPA, PENNSYLVANIA, DESERVES THE honor of being the scene of the first big election in the steel industry under the Wagner Labor Relations Act. And Aliquippa, after thirty years of company unions, company houses, company stool pigeons, and a company dictatorship fortunately outside the experience of most Americans, did itself proud by voting two to one for the C. I. O. The wonder is that the majority was not larger, for the men of Aliquippa were voting not only for the right to join an independent union but for free speech and the privilege of calling their souls their own. Aside from its human significance for the inhabitants of one company town, the Jones and Laughlin election has wide significance as the first major test of strength between the Steel Workers' Organization and the independent companies which make about 40 per cent of the country's steel. The other independents are known to be embarrassed by the C. I. O. valentine that Jones and Laughlin have just received from their 27,000 employees. Crucible has already accepted the verdict and signed a contract.

It will soon be made clear whether the other diehards will persist in their stiff-necked opposition or submit gracefully to what seems now happily inevitable—complete unionization of steel.

★

ALTHOUGH PASSAGE OF THE RELIEF BILL IN the House with an appropriation of $1,500,000,000 for the next fiscal year is being hailed in some quarters as a triumph of "liberalism," organized WPA workers have called a one-day strike for May 27 to protest against the shameful reduction in the relief allotment. It is generally conceded that the $1,500,000,000 appropriation will necessitate a reduction of from 500,000 to 600,000 in WPA rolls. While employment has undoubtedly risen during the past twelve months, tens of thousands of unemployed who previously had eked out an existence have reached the end of their resources. Other tens of thousands of "employables" are theoretically eligible for WPA work but have never been able to obtain jobs because of the inadequacy of the relief funds. No one even pretends that the 500,000 who are to be cut from the rolls will all be able to find jobs in private industry. In view of the general illiberality of Congress at the moment, we are glad to note that the Murray-Hatch resolution calling for a federal commission to study unemployment has been reported out in the House. A move is also under way, after seven years of mass unemployment, for a census of the jobless. The project is a commendable one if carried out fairly, but highly dangerous if combined, as in the Maloney bill, with proposals to reduce the hours of labor in a fixed ratio with an increase in joblessness. Share-the-work movements of this type should be labeled for what they are—attempts to force the working class to bear the entire burden of an economic breakdown which is not of its making.

★

CARDINAL MUNDELEIN'S DENUNCIATION OF the Nazi government's persecution of German Catholics will make Americans more widely aware of the struggle between the Third Reich and the Vatican. No sooner was the Concordat signed in July, 1933, than the Nazis started playing the old game of "scraps of paper." The Concordat guaranteed liberty of profession and free public exercise of the Catholic religion, the right of the church to establish and maintain schools and charitable and cultural organizations, and protection against insult to the person or calling of priests. The Nazis have since violated every one of these provisions. Priests and nuns have been arrested and imprisoned on fabricated charges, church property and funds confiscated, Catholic teachers dismissed, pastoral letters seized, and religious processions banned. The Hitler youth movement has declared war on the Catholic youth associations, and the government of Bavaria, center of German Catholicism, has announced the closing of Catholic schools. The Vatican has protested against this, but because of its anomalous position with respect to fascism, its opposition has been cautious, almost apologetic. Its letter on Mundelein characteristically stated that he was free to say what he wished but avoided giving him forthright support. Meanwhile the forthcoming pastoral letter of the German Catholic Church is awaited in the hope that the increasingly bitter struggle may force the church to declare itself.

★

THE FEROCIOUS DOWAGERS OF ENGLAND, Scotland, Wales, and the dominions, operating through the government of Stanley Baldwin, have won again; and the Duke of Windsor will marry his lady without benefit of attendance by royal relatives. As yet no specific action has been taken to prevent Wallis Warfield from assuming the title of Her Royal Highness, but we can already hear the Duchess of Norfolk muttering under her aristocratic breath that she for one will never submit to the indignity of sitting down the table from that etc., etc. Meanwhile we are advised that the Anti-Dowager Federation, which persists in regretting the downfall of King Edward VIII, has started a movement to repeal the ancient British law that cats may look at kings.

Security Upheld

THE Supreme Court's action in upholding the unemployment and old-age sections of the Social Security Act may go down in history as the most important of the court's epoch-making decisions of recent months. Of all the legislation passed during the four years of the New Deal, the Social Security Act is perhaps the most sweeping in its implications. Nearly twenty-five million workers are directly affected by its operation. To overthrow the act some months after tax collection had been started would have entailed incalculable confusion. But the significance of the decisions is by no means limited to the provisions of the act itself. The acceptance of the federal pay-roll tax for protection against unemployment places the court's stamp of approval on one of the most dubious principles incorporated in New Deal legislation—coercion of the states by means of the federal taxing power. Awkward and inadequate though the tactic may be, it opens a new vista for federal-state legislation. If the United States can persuade states to adopt unemployment legislation of a certain type by offering tax exemption to the citizens of those states which comply, the same principle may be applied to many other types of legislation in which uniformity is desired. It could be used to obtain such measures of reform as the prohibition of child labor, minimum-wage laws, and uniform marriage and divorce regulations, and to bring about a general simplification of our chaotic tax laws.

The necessity of resorting to this cumbersome and time-consuming device for social security has been virtually eliminated, however, by the decision upholding the federal tax on employers for old-age annuities. As Maxwell S. Stewart pointed out in last week's Nation, if a federal old-age insurance program is constitutional, there is every reason to believe that federal unemployment insurance would be equally valid. Protection against unemployment is, if anything, more clearly of national interest than old-age pensions, since it contributes directly to national economic stability. If the Administration is alert, it will immediately capitalize on its victory by formulating a federal plan for unemployment insurance which will eliminate the primary objections to the forty-six different plans thus far adopted.

Validation of the federal old-age annuities would also seem to open the door to other types of social-security legislation which have so far been avoided. Survivors' and disability insurance might be adopted on a national scale. Federal health insurance has been brought within the realm of practicability, and might be attached to the old-age program. It might even be possible to take advantage of the favorable situation which has been created by the court's action to push through a well-integrated program which would provide federal care for the millions of destitute individuals who are now dependent on the vagaries of local relief.

The political effects of the decision may not be so favorable, but they have been largely discounted. No one would suggest that the President's attack on the court was conceived solely for the purpose of pushing through the most vital parts of his New Deal program. But whether it be good luck or good strategy we can be thankful that it was the most doubtful parts of the program—the NRA and AAA—that were invalidated, and that the Wagner Act and the Social Security Act have been salvaged.

Robinson Will Not Do!

JUSTICE VAN DEVANTER'S resignation brought down to the ground of practical reality a question which has hitherto remained in the relatively higher regions of hypothetical discussion. For some sixteen weeks liberals and radicals have joined in a mighty effort in behalf of the President's Supreme Court plan. In the name of millions yet unborn they have defended the President's campaign to liberalize the Supreme Court, even though they preferred a constitutional amendment. Now Justice Van Devanter's resignation has rent the veil of high thinking, and those who, like The Nation, have supported the plan as a move toward a crucial reform face the fact that the first fruit of their effort is the almost certain appointment to the Supreme Court bench of an Arkansas politician. It turns out, further, that the appointment will probably be made on exactly the same basis as the naming of any local postmaster. If Joe Robinson is given a Supreme Court justiceship it will be as a "reward" for services rendered as a political boss who has driven Presidential measures through the Senate, whether he believed in them or not. A third fact is the rush of the Senate, in a burst of pork-barrel solidarity, to confirm Robinson even before he is nominated.

The whole picture has only one constructive aspect. The preview of Roosevelt's intentions unveiled by Van Devanter's resignation (the veil has now been drawn close again), coupled with the adverse vote in the Judiciary Committee, provide an opportunity for liberal forces to make their opinion effective. The Supreme Court fight, as Robert S. Allen points out on another page of this issue, has entered a phase in which the President's word alone is not necessarily final and in which he has specific need of continued liberal, labor, and any other support he can muster. Such support has been based on what was no less than the President's moral responsibility to appoint truly liberal justices of an intellectual stature commensurate with the issues they will be called upon to decide. The clear intimation that, instead, the President will not hesitate to drag Supreme Court appointments into the political market-place is a warning, particularly to labor, that in the end liberal pressure must be put behind a constitutional amendment—which has been practically forgotten in the heat of the debate. More immediately, notice must be served that Robinson will not do. We use his name in a generic, not a personal, sense—he is undoubtedly an amiable and popular boss—though as an individual he can almost be called the epitome of what we should not have in a Supreme Court justice.

It is said by the President's apologists, who have one of the hardest assignments of their lives, that Robinson can at least be counted upon to back up the New Deal measures which he has guided through the Senate with a practiced hand. But even that statement may not be true. A Supreme Court justice is not responsible to the President who appoints him. His power is, within its range, absolute and cannot be alienated. He is much more likely, once he is safely established, to be responsive to his own deepest convictions. Senator Robinson is a conservative Southern provincial Democrat. He may harbor the traditional small-town "populist" antagonism toward Northern bankers, but the utilities magnate of the region (Harvey Couch) is his fishing mate, and his closest bonds are with the Arkansas planter. Arkansas has become a by-word in the past few years for the number and violence of planters' attacks on the civil rights of poor share-croppers, especially of Negroes. Robinson has been notoriously silent on these matters. That a man who so thoroughly represents the ruling class in Arkansas should be elevated to the Supreme Court at this juncture is ironical and dangerous. Where his heart and vote would be in a case involving the relative rights of planters and share-croppers, or of whites and "niggers," is not hard to imagine. Yet the history of legislation in the next twenty years will be written in terms of just such cases—of the haves challenging the have-nots—and on their just and wise disposal will rest the probabilities of lasting economic peace and security.

It is surely significant that only practical considerations have been put forward in favor of the Robinson appointment. No claims are made for him of intellectual distinction, and his qualifications as a lawyer are admittedly limited. He "deserves" the appointment—presumably for putting through like a good soldier or a ward boss so many bills he privately detested; since he is set upon it Roosevelt can deny it to him only at the risk of splitting the Democratic Party and facing a Senate revolt. These are cogent reasons to a politician. But to labor and to liberals generally they should be an open challenge. It is reported that Roosevelt, probably as a result of the general reaction to the Robinson boom, will hesitate to appoint him unless he can at the same time make another one or two appointments and thus be able to smuggle the Arkansas conservative into the Supreme Court in a liberal sandwich. It is also reported that Robinson's final payment for the honor must be the delivery of the necessary votes to pass the President's bill in whatever form it ultimately takes. This is the time for the great liberal majority that elected Roosevelt to make it clear that Robinson was not what they had in mind when they backed his plan.

European Democracy on the Offensive

AMID the hustle and bustle of official visits which has marked European diplomacy in recent weeks, certain hopeful signs are discernible. There are indications not only that France is seeking to regain its lost prestige in Central Europe but that it is being aided in its efforts by an unmistakable reaction against fascist diplomacy. The visit to Paris of Dr. Guido Schmidt, Austrian Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, is evidence of a new restiveness on the part of Austria against German and Italian domination. While Schmidt is said to have rejected France's proposal for an Austrian-Little Entente bloc to combat fascist influence along the Danube, the recall of von Papen from Vienna is sufficient proof of the growing antagonism against both Germany and Italy in formerly quiescent Austria.

Behind this rather surprising development lies the movement for a closer economic union between the states which made up the former Hapsburg empire—Czecho-Slovakia, Austria, and Hungary. By all natural laws they constitute an economic unit, and for Austria, a manufacturing nation, the combination offers far more than the present artificial ties with Germany and Italy. While Mussolini made it clear at the recent Venice conference with Schuschnigg that he would not tolerate a Prague-Vienna agreement as long as he remained the protector of Austria's "independence," there may yet come a time when Il Duce will prefer Czecho-Slovakian to German troops along the Brenner Pass. At the moment, however, the keystone of fascist foreign policy is the attempt to isolate Czecho-Slovakia. Some progress has undoubtedly been made in this direction. The Italian-Yugoslav pact has bent Yugoslavia, temporarily at least, toward the Berlin-Rome axis. But the efforts of the fascist countries in Rumania have met with distinctly less success. A warning from Paris that French credits for armaments would be withdrawn if Rumania concluded a mutual-assistance pact with Poland brought word that Bucharest would not consider a pact either with Poland or Italy.

The reassertion of French influence in Central Europe has probably saved the Little Entente and, what is more important, may have preserved the League as an active political force. For the ties which bind the democratic powers to Central Europe are embodied in the Covenant of the League, and anything which strengthens these ties reinforces the principle of collective security.

A similar consolidation of the forces favoring the collective principle may be expected to emerge from the Imperial Conference now being held in London. Constitutionally, the only obligation imposed upon the dominions to support the motherland in the event of a general world war is that imposed by the League Covenant. In view of the strong nationalistic tendencies which are present in all the dominions, Great Britain may be expected to throw its influence unreservedly on the side of strengthening these bonds. For the Empire as a whole, however, friendship with the United States is fully as important as a means of security as Britain's ties with France and the other democratic countries of Europe. And if this is to be achieved, economic relationships must be strengthened. The Canadian Prime Minister, W. L. Mackenzie King, is especially anxious to bring about a liberalization of the Ottawa agreements which would permit the various units of the Empire to enter into reciprocal agreements with the United States. While the prospective British Prime Minister, Neville Chamberlain, is known to be opposed to this suggestion, the other dominions, particularly Australia and New Zealand, appear convinced of the importance of closer relations with this country. Any step which would bind the United States more closely to the democratic countries of Europe is, at this stage, a definite setback for the fascist international. While it is too early to foresee the final outcome of any of these moves, it is reassuring to find the democracies once more on the offensive.

John D. Rockefeller

THE case of John D. Rockefeller is without parallel in our history. Around no other man has such a storm of abuse and denunciation raged. He was the central target of the progressives and reformers after the turn of the century, representing in his person the worst abuses of the era of consolidation and ruthless business competition. He had built up the great Standard Oil Company long before the attacks upon him became serious. He caused heartbreak, financial ruin, and business disaster for his competitors. When the whole story was written, it appalled those who read it and inevitably became a political issue, resulting in the famous split-up of Standard Oil into the constituent companies which have since gone lucratively on their way. It did result in some good. Standard Oil purchased Senators—as Mr. Hearst revealed in the stolen Archbold letters—where it did not choose and elect them. It bought state legislators by the dozen and stopped at nothing to achieve its ends. When all this was revealed to the American people, it made it clear whither the country was drifting, how through unrestrained competition we were heading into unrestrained monopoly, and at what dreadful cost to our whole society the few were becoming billionaires.

But the reformers did not achieve as much as they thought they had. Not even the creation of the Federal Trade Commission fundamentally reformed the business methods represented by Rockefeller; was it not the proud boast of the New Deal that its NRA codes temporarily put an end to no fewer than 1,000 unethical business methods in the first six months of its existence? The public uprising in the days of Theodore Roosevelt could not prevent the drift to monopoly. The post-World War orgy of speculation piled up corporate wealth and power as if the Rockefeller days of "frenzied finance" had never been under attack. The New Deal temporarily suspended governmental regulation and the anti-trust laws, and the second Roosevelt is only just now considering their reinforcement. Let anyone who thinks we have been heading off illegal combinations consult Senator Borah!

But as the years went by and other great issues arose, the public attitude toward Mr. Rockefeller gradually changed. He actually outlived the hate and bitterness with which the public regarded him. True, he lived behind barbed wires, heavily guarded until death. When he traveled, it was usually with as much secrecy as possible. But the newspapers no longer denounced him, and instead actually sought interviews from him and handled him gently and pleasantly. The movie public no longer hissed when it saw his pictures, but laughed tolerantly at his habit of giving away silver dimes and his other eccentricities. He had become a sort of national antique, almost an institution. The oncoming generations, without knowledge of what he had stood for and what he had done, regarded him with curiosity because he was so fabulously rich. The sins of the Wigginses and Charlie Mitchells threw Mr. Rockefeller still farther into the background. No longer were the Rockefeller benefactions attacked by clergymen and teachers of ethics as "tainted money." If all this was in part due to forgetfulness, it was also due to a greater public realization that the system of which he was part produced Mr. Rockefeller and not Mr. Rockefeller and his associates the system. But after all, it was his longevity and the retirement in which he lived, as well as new issues and new men, which gradually changed the public attitude.

It was not his benefactions. Great as those have been and important as have been their results, notably in the fields of public health and education, they were never looked upon as bringing him absolution. They could not offset the lives blasted, the careers wrecked, the injury done to our national life and public morale. It is an utterly unnatural and unsafe situation in a republic when any individual is permitted to amass such wealth—even if the methods used are beyond reproach. To no man should be given the power which Mr. Rockefeller wielded during his active life. This truth is not mitigated by the obvious determination of his son to use his wealth as a public trust. We must have no aristocracy of wealth—good or bad.

Hughes Checkmates the President

BY ROBERT S. ALLEN

Washington, May 23

THE Supreme Court reorganization legislation is in a very bad way on Capitol Hill, and the President has only himself to blame. Two months ago the program had an assured majority of six in the Senate and from fifty to seventy-five in the House. Today the original six-judge bill is entirely washed up, and the prospects even of a compromise on a two-judge basis are none too bright. Finally aroused to the danger of damaging defeat which faces him, the President is bestirring himself and cracking the whip. He probably will succeed in preventing a complete rout, but he is in the tightest spot of his incumbency, and if he emerges with even part of his skin he can count himself lucky.

For a highly touted political wizard the President's generalship on the court legislation has been a brilliant flop. His opening maneuvers had all the elements of dynamic leadership and astute strategy—surprise, boldness, and aggressiveness. He sprang his plan without warning, catching the opposition off guard and unprepared. While it was still floundering around, disorganized and leaderless, he followed up his offensive with two smashing radio attacks. The situation was clearly in his hands. He had only to push home his drive by forcing speedy legislative action. Instead, Mr. Roosevelt stopped dead in his tracks and amiably let the opposition rally its cohorts and launch a shattering counter-attack. Every dictate of ordinary horse sense called for starting the bill through the legislative mill in the House. That was, and still is, the weak point of the opposition. The chamber's limited-debate rules and general amenability to party control lend themselves readily to parliamentary manipulation by a forceful and determined leadership. Committee hearings could have been rushed and the bill jammed through the House in a few days. Then with this okay in his hands, the President would have been in a powerful position to deal with the Senate. For one thing, the fence straddlers and waverers there would have been less inclined to rebel. Also, on the ground that public views already had been heard in the House, committee hearings in the Senate could have been either dispensed with entirely or held to a minimum. Finally, there was the psychological factor. House approval would have put the Senate opposition on the defensive.

But despite all these patent advantages to be gained by starting the ball rolling in the House, the President and his corps of master-minds, for some still unexplained reason, decided to launch their Congressional offensive in the hard-boiled Senate. As one disgusted Democratic floor leader expressed it, "This proposition wasn't tough enough, they had to make it tougher by going at it the hardest way."

Given the advantage in maneuvering, the surprised and delighted opposition lost no time in making the most of its opportunities. It outsmarted, outlobbied, and out-demagogued the Administration at every turn. While the latter was complacently planning to raise the party issue, the opposition secretly got together and arranged with the Republicans and Liberty Leaguers to lie low and let the dissenting Democrats carry the torch and do the breast-thumping. Then, screening their operations behind a furious hullabaloo about censorship and strong-arm tactics, the oppositionists conducted a wily filibuster in the Senate Judiciary Committee, dragging out the dull and inane proceedings nearly two months. These hearings did not contribute a single new valuable fact to the controversy. But they did enable Chief Justice Hughes to get in some hefty blows at the President's proposal. Few realize how important a part Mr. Hughes has played in the fight against the court bill. He has conducted his operations with consummate deftness and finesse—and tremendous effectiveness. He alone is responsible for the three five-to-four decisions (Washington minimum-wage, Wagner labor-act, and Herndon civil-liberties cases) that have so heavily undermined public and Congressional support for the President's bill. More than any other factor these decisions have been responsible for the defensive dilemma the President now finds himself in. They took the sting out of his attacks on the court and gave the wavering Senators, whose votes he needed to win, just the alibi they needed to line up against him. Mr. Hughes has played high politics these last three months and played it with boldness and agility. Not only did he reverse himself, but he accomplished the much more difficult feat of persuading Justice Roberts to stop nesting with the four diehards and loop the loop with him.

In the inner White House circle, where the full significance of the Chief Justice's activities are thoroughly realized, there is bitterness and fury against him. So much, in fact, that a few weeks ago a serious canvass was made of the Constitution and statutes to ascertain whether, in the event the court bill passed, he could be replaced with a new Chief Justice.

While Mr. Hughes and the opposition were steadily cutting the ground from under him and he was clearly losing votes in the Senate, the President persisted in his complacent confidence. Several of his younger lieutenants tried to warn him, but he brushed them aside as over-zealous. "Give the opposition plenty of rope," he laughed; "they'll hang themselves." There was a hanging party all right, but it wasn't the opposition that dangled from the end of the rope. Not until the President returned from his Texas fishing trip did he discard his cocky attitude of disparaging the capabilities and strength of his foes and get down to earth. By then his six-judge bill was defunct. The two votes needed in the Judiciary Committee—Senator Joseph O'Mahoney of Wyoming and Senator Pat McCarran of Nevada—to get a favorable report there had been lost. Both of these men could have been held in line had they been properly handled. McCarran comes up for election next year and must have Administration backing to win. He is a pompous, blatant glad-hander with reactionary leanings but can be wooed to an occasional liberal vote if the bait is tempting enough. McCarran wanted particularly a United States marshalship for one of his henchmen. His colleague, Senator Key Pittman, also wanted the plum. Pittman had declared for the President's bill. Why under the circumstances he could not have been persuaded to take something else is a mystery none of the Administration wire-pullers have been able to explain. The reason probably is over-confidence. They didn't think they had to trade with McCarran. O'Mahoney, a notch higher in caliber than McCarran, is a hand-made product of the Administration. From an unknown Cheyenne lawyer it elevated him to First Assistant Postmaster General and then put him in the Senate. Between Jim Farley and O'Mahoney existed close personal and political ties. In the early days of the fight Big Jim could have "done business" with Joe. But, again, over-confidence caused the Administration manipulators to delay too long, and O'Mahoney, peeved at what he felt was lack of regard for his importance, gradually worked himself into a rage and wound up carrying an opposition banner.

The unfavorable committee vote was a body blow to the President. It was the first time in his four years in office that a measure bearing his official blessing had been turned down by a committee. Not even the fiercely fought holding-company bill had suffered such a rebuff. The stinging defeat whipped the President into a flurry of belated activity. The new wage-and-hour (Connery-Black) bill was hurriedly completed and introduced at once instead of being delayed until the court measure had been disposed of, as was originally intended. It was hoped that by this move indirect support could be rallied for the judicial bill on the ground that its defeat would also spell doom for the drastic labor proposal. On his part the President began summoning uncommitted and critical Senators to the White House—something he should have done months ago. In these conferences he is making it clear he is willing to accept a compromise. No definite formula is being suggested, but practically any proposal that will enable him to add several justices to the bench is sure to be acceptable. Publicly, however, the White House is maintaining the pose of "standing pat" on the six-judge bill. Secretary Stephen Early even went to the length last week of bawling out the White House correspondent of the Associated Press for saying in a story that the President had told Congressional leaders he was willing to compromise. But behind this window-dressing the stage is being prepared for a back-down. Already Administration mouthpieces are claiming a "moral" victory in the resignation of Van Devanter and the three liberal decisions.

The Struggle for Czecho-Slovakia

BY ROBERT DELL

Geneva, May 3

ONE of the greatest mistakes made in the peace settlement after the World War was undoubtedly the partition of the Austrian Empire, or at any rate its economic disruption. I am still of the opinion that I held during the war that the best solution would have been a federal republic on the Swiss model composed of self-governing cantons. That was also the opinion of the Bohemian Socialist Party and of its leader, Smeral, who foresaw how disastrous the economic disruption of Austria-Hungary would be. "Vienna," he said, "should be the salon for all the nations of the Austrian Empire." Smeral's opposition to the partition of Austria-Hungary led not long before the end of the war to a breach between him and Svehla, leader of the Czech Peasant Party, who was backed by Masaryk. Smeral and Svehla had collaborated in the early years of the war.

Masaryk and Svehla had their way, and thus Czecho-Slovakia was created. Events have justified Smeral's point of view. Both politically and economically Czecho-Slovakia is a fantastic country. Long and narrow, it has strategically the most difficult frontier to defend in Europe. It contains a mixture of races which makes it a sort of Austrian Empire in miniature. Of its 15,000,000 inhabitants about 3,500,000 are of German race and 750,000 are Magyars; Poles, Ruthenians, and other races are also represented. The overwhelming majority of German inhabitants are not, as many people seem to think, former citizens of Germany, separated from their native country, but Austrians who had always lived in the territories which now constitute Czecho-Slovakia. However, in that part of Czecho-Slovakia nearest to the German frontier, which is almost entirely industrial, the majority of the inhabitants are of German origin.

From the economic point of view the structure of Czecho-Slovakia is equally unsatisfactory. After the partition of Austria-Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia had 95 per cent of the industry and 5 per cent of the agriculture. The industry was much too extensive for a population of 15,000,000, and the home market could not absorb its products. Nearly all the textile industry was in Czecho-Slovakia. Had there been a customs union between the succession states of the old Austrian Empire, as there should have been, the fact that the textile industry was in Czecho-Slovakia would not have mattered. But the succession states set up tariff barriers against one another and tried to be self-supporting. The Hungarians, for instance, instead of importing their textiles from Czecho-Slovakia, set up at great expense a textile industry of their own. On the other hand, two-thirds of the Hungarian wine production remained in the present Hungarian territory, which was left with about one-third of the inhabitants of the old kingdom of Hungary. When I was in Budapest in 1924, I had an interview with the Hungarian Minister of Agriculture, who complained that the Hungarian wine growers were suffering severely because the other succession states would not buy their wine. I asked him why they would not, and he replied: "No doubt they would buy our wine if we would buy their manufactured goods."

Since 1931 England has ceased to be a free-trade country, and tariff barriers have been raised everywhere. It has become more and more difficult for Czecho-Slovak manufacturers to export their products, and Czecho-Slovakia has suffered more than any other country in Europe from the world economic crisis. The restoration of the economic unity of Central Europe is no easy task, for since the end of the war unnecessary new industries have been artificially fostered, but it is a task that should be attempted. The remedy is a customs union among the countries of the Danubian basin, not what is called treaty revision. Certain frontier readjustments are no doubt desirable and will become possible if and when the danger of aggression and war can be averted, but there can be no question of going back on the main territorial arrangements of the peace treaties. The dismemberment of Austria-Hungary was no doubt a mistake, but the dismemberment of Czecho-Slovakia would be a disaster for Europe.

Considering the difficult political and economic conditions with which they have had to deal, the success achieved by the rulers of Czecho-Slovakia has been remarkable. That success is mainly due to the two statesmen who have guided the destinies of the country from the first—Masaryk and Benes. In no country bound by the minorities treaties have the provisions of those treaties been so well observed or the national minorities so liberally treated. I do not say that the national minorities have never had any genuine grievance, but their grievances have been trivial in comparison, for instance, with those of the national minorities in Germany and Poland. The concessions recently made by the Czecho-Slovak government to the German minority leave that group without any reasonable cause for complaint.

Great efforts have been made to deal with the economic difficulties arising from the economic structure of the country. Svehla realized from the first the necessity of increasing the home market for industrial products by an agrarian reform. Under his leadership the Agrarian Party broke up the great landed estates and distributed them among the peasants, who were organized on a co-operative basis. Svehla put at the head of the agrarian cooperatives, which distributed the agricultural products, men of real capacity who for several years obtained great results. They established financial cooperatives in which the greater part of the capital of the country was concentrated. In this way the Agrarian Party secured financial resources which have made it the richest political party in Czecho-Slovakia.

Svehla also succeeded in getting a considerable part of Czecho-Slovakian industry other than agriculture, notably the sugar and alcohol industries, under the influence of the Agrarian Party, and this weakened the National Democratic Party, which is essentially the party of the capitalists. More than that, Svehla and Beran, who was then general secretary of the Agrarian Party and is now its leader, succeeded soon after the end of the war in making a sort of alliance between the Agrarian Party and the Skoda firm. Since 1922 the Minister of War has always been a member of the Agrarian Party.

Svehla acted in politics on the maxim "divide and conquer," and did not hesitate when necessary to resort to corruption to attain his ends. Masaryk had aimed from the first at the creation of a single united Labor Party, but he failed in this attempt. One of the causes of his failure was the unpopularity of Smeral, the first president of the Communist Party, on account of his opposition to the disruption of Austria-Hungary. As it was, there were three Czecho-Slovak labor parties—the Socialist Party, affiliated to the Second International, the Communist Party, affiliated to the Third International, and the National Socialist Party, of which Benes was a member, which must not be confused with German National Socialism. Svehla succeeded in dividing the political labor movement still further by suborning Stribrny, leader of the National Socialist Party, who was obliged to leave the party. Nevertheless, Svehla, who, although he had little more than an elementary education, was a remarkably able politician, allowed himself to be influenced by Masaryk and induced the Agrarian Party to agree to all the immediate demands of the workers, such as social insurance, holidays with pay, the eight-hour day, and so on. For this reason, Czecho-Slovakia has an advanced social legislation.

Svehla was obliged by ill health to retire from political life before he was able to realize all his agrarian program. He was succeeded as president of the Agrarian Party by Beran, who had been secretary for nearly thirty years. Beran, a man of about fifty, is a remarkable organizer with great financial ability. He has amassed a large fortune, but he lives very simply.

For the purpose of increasing the home market and satisfying the demands of the peasants it was necessary not only to break up the great estates but also to repopulate the agricultural districts. The greater part of the agricultural land had been in the hands of the church and the aristocracy, and had been to a great extent depopulated. Large numbers of the peasants, unable to get work or at any rate to earn a living, had gone to Budapest or Vienna or emigrated, especially to North America. For this reason, although Czecho-Slovakia has only 15,000,000 inhabitants, there are about 3,500,000 Czecho-Slovak emigrants in other countries. Dr. Milan Hodza, the Slovak agrarian leader, was made Minister of Agriculture in order that he might carry out this internal colonization by founding villages in South Bohemia, North Moravia, and South and East Slovakia. The question was of more importance for Slovakia than for Bohemia. The American Slovaks had been persuaded to found a bank in Czecho-Slovakia to finance the internal colonization, but instead of carrying out the policy for which he had been appointed, Hodza used the American-Slovak bank to consolidate his own position in Slovakia and pursued a reactionary economic policy. He was responsible, for instance, for the high import duties on wheat imported from Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Rumania. Ultimately, Hodza was obliged to resign from the Ministry of Agriculture, and his influence in the Agrarian Party was diminished. He did not succeed Svehla as president of the party, although he had better qualifications than Beran for the post.

Beran's ambition was to become Prime Minister and ultimately to succeed Masaryk as President of the republic. For the moment, however, he agreed to compensate Hodza by making him Prime Minister. Beran's intention undoubtedly was that Hodza should be a stop-gap and that he himself should succeed him after a certain time. His calculation was that as Prime Minister of Czecho-Slovakia and president of the largest political party in the country he could not fail to become President of the republic after the death of Masaryk, who had been elected President for life.

Beran's plans, however, were suspected by Masaryk, Benes, and Hodza, and it was for the purpose of check-mating them that Masaryk abdicated, expressing the wish that Benes succeed him. Hodza, although not particularly friendly to Benes, felt obliged to bow to Masaryk's wishes. Beran had not the courage to stand against Benes, but on the suggestion of Dr. Kahanek put forward Professor Nemec as an opposition candidate. Nemec is a man with little or no influence in politics, and thanks to the fact and also to the support that Benes received from the Second and Third Internationals, the Vatican, and Hodza, Benes was elected with an even larger majority than Masaryk had obtained.

Kahanek, who thus came into prominence, is a man of forty, of Silesian origin. His mother was a Polish Jewess. He took his doctor's degree in law and began his political career as a journalist in the National Socialist Party. When Stribny was obliged to leave the party, Kahanek went with him and became editor of a paper founded by Stribny in which he consistently attacked Masaryk and Benes. This paper had considerable circulation in Prague, and at the general election in 1929 Stribny succeeded in getting three of his friends elected to Parliament. Kahanek got in touch with Beck, the Polish Foreign Minister, who advised him to separate from Stribny and join the Agrarian Party as editor of its newspapers. Kahanek joined the Agrarian Party in the summer of 1934, since when he has succeeded in getting Beran entirely under his influence and is now in everything but name the leader of the Agrarian Party.

He directed the party campaign for the general election in the spring of 1935.

In consequence of the world economic crisis there was a strong movement to the left in the working class of Czecho-Slovakia, particularly among the German workmen. Kahanek recognized the probability of a large increase in the Socialist and Communist vote. He consulted Beck, who advised him to go to Berlin and gave him introductions to Nazi leaders. The result of the visit to Berlin was that the Agrarian Party under Kahanek's influence founded the Henlein party—the German Nazi party in Czecho-Slovakia. It was thought that the Henlein party would not elect more than thirty deputies in 1935, but in fact the party polled a majority of the German votes, and elected forty-four deputies against the forty-five of the Agrarian Party. Henlein himself is an insignificant young man of about thirty whose chief qualification for leadership of the party is the fact that his name begins with the same letter of the alphabet as that of Hitler. There are, however, among his colleagues young men of great capacity who are in constant touch with Berlin. The party has received considerable encouragement in England, and when Henlein went to London last year he had an interview with Sir Robert Vansittart, permanent head of the Foreign Office, at the latter's private house.

Kahanek has succeeded in persuading not only the Agrarian Party but other parties of the right, with the exception of the Czech Catholic Party, to cooperate with the Henlein party on the ground that it is an obstacle to socialism and communism, although, from the point of view of the parties of the right, the chief aim of the Henlein party is treasonable. In Czecho-Slovakia as elsewhere in Europe class and economic interests are stronger than patriotism. Kahanek is working with Beck against the foreign policy of Benes, that is to say, the entente among Czecho-Slovakia, France, and Soviet Russia. In collaboration with the Slovak clericals, who are in close contact with Beck, Kahanek is trying to bring about an entente between Czecho-Slovakia and Hungary. He favors the policy, initiated by Beck, of forming a bloc of so-called neutral states from the Baltic to the Adriatic. The aims of Beck and Kahanek were advanced when Yugoslavia and Rumania refused recently to accept the French proposal that the Little Entente treaty should become a treaty of mutual assistance against aggression from any country, including therefore Germany. At present this treaty obliges the three states to aid one another only in the event of an aggression by Hungary. The French government offered to make pacts with Yugoslavia and Rumania if they agreed to the proposal.

It was to further the policy of the bloc of "neutral states" that Beck recently visited Bucharest. In reality this policy is aimed against France and Russia and is favorable to Germany. It is an insane policy from the Czecho-Slovak point of view, and the majority of the people of Czecho-Slovakia are undoubtedly opposed to it, but Kahanek can count on the support of 146 members of the Czecho-Slovak Parliament. It will be seen that Benes has in Kahanek a dangerous opponent.

Oklahoma Tries Cooperative Medicine

BY JAMES RORTY

IN OKLAHOMA today the next-to-immovable body of organized medicine is being pushed by the gathering force of the farmer-cooperators. Organized in the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union, the farmers have tasted the benefits of a cooperative group-practice and group-prepayment system in the complete service offered by the Farmers' Union Cooperative Hospital in Elk City. In their opinion, Dr. M. Shadid, the Socialist founder and medical director of the Elk City enterprise, has given them good medical care for much less than they formerly paid to the rugged medical individualists. He has enabled them to own and manage their own hospital and to employ their own doctors, dentists, and nurses. Hence, when they heard that the Oklahoma Medical Association was trying to get Dr. Shadid's license revoked by the State Medical Board on charges including advertising for business, hiring people to solicit business, and "fleecing the public," they were as mad as only drought-stricken, mortgage-burdened Oklahoma farmers can be. They have stayed mad, too, for the past six months. Results: a dog fight in the courts and in the legislature between the medical politicians and the Farmers' Union, with the final outcome still undetermined as The Nation goes to press. The lower house passed a bill legalizing Dr. Shadid's enterprise, but it died in the Senate. Now Dr. Shadid is awaiting the decision of the state Supreme Court as to whether the District Court or the state Board of Medical Examiners has jurisdiction over his case—the board is determined to take away his license.

When the fight began to get hot last December the Oklahoma Union Farmer sounded a general alarm in a leading editorial which ran in part as follows:

An attempt has been made to destroy our Farmers' Union Cooperative Hospital at Elk City. . . . B. F. Oliver, a layman who lives at Sayre, has filed the charges. . . . The question at once presents itself to the fair-minded person just what a layman like Mr. Oliver would know about the ethics of the medical profession. Thereupon it becomes the opinion of any fair-minded person that this must be a move on the part of certain doctors in the Medical Association. It is known as a fact that many doctors in western Oklahoma have gradually lost some of their practice because of the success of this humanitarian institution built on the principles of Christianity.

In the same issue the Union Farmer devoted a page to the returns from a questionnaire sent to former patients of the hospital. Under the headline, "Thousands of Dollars Saved by Members Proves Why Doctors Want to Stop Co-op Hospital," the editor asserted categorically that not one of the several hundred who filled out the questionnaires expressed the slightest dissatisfaction with the service or with the charges or with the treatments. The farmers' lack of reverence for the local medical hierarchy is apparent in these excerpts from their replies:

. . . This is one of the meanest things that any organization, supposed to be composed of the highest class of professions, could do—to charge Dr. Shadid with fleecing the citizenship of Oklahoma. A bigger lie could not be told by the worst outlaw that ever lived.

We think more of the few dollars invested in the Community Hospital than any investment we have ever made, and Dr. Shadid as a doctor and surgeon, and I think this bunch fighting him should be sat down so hard it would jar their ancestors for four generations past and all their future followers so inclined.

If the lowdown, undermining doctors can succeed in destroying our hospital, I think we would be done a great injury and injustice. . . . All these slugs care for is their own selfish greed.

A score of Dr. Shadid's patients testified that the care they received in the Community Hospital was good, that the service they got for a $50 stock investment and a $25 annual fee saved them many hundreds of dollars, and that they would patronize the hospital even if they weren't members because it offered the best service available.

As one reads this testimony the impression grows that the Oklahoma Medical Association may have grabbed a bear by the tail. This impression deepens as one notes the tone adopted by leading Oklahoma newspapers in handling the affair. Elsewhere similar raids by the medical politicians—as, for example, when the Los Angeles medical-center system was abandoned at the nadir of the depression—have been carried out without stirring more than a feeble ripple of protest in the newspapers. But Oklahoma is different. The Farmers' Union is a formidable political force. So is the organization known as the Veterans of Industry, composed chiefly of the more or less socialist workers who, finding themselves black-listed after the great strikes of the nineties, went West and built sod houses on the Oklahoma prairie. So is Oscar Ameringer (Adam Coaldigger), editor of the American Guardian. They are all backing Dr. Shadid and the Elk City Community Hospital, and neither the politicians nor the newspaper commentators are unmoved by this fact. For example, R. M. McClintock, political columnist for the Daily Oklahoman of Oklahoma City, had this to say early in the fight:

Nothing seems more certain, from present indications, than that if the Medical Association pushes the issue against Dr. Shadid, it will run into a tremendous storm in the legislature, with results that may prove most harmful in the end to the medical profession itself. . . .

The Elk City doctor . . . is no quack. For years he was an honored and successful practitioner in Elk City. It's true he was all those years a Socialist, but that did not affect his skill as a physician and surgeon. It was perhaps his socialism that led him to the idea of building a cooperative hospital in Elk City. He found a ready helper in the late John A. Simpson, president of the Farmers' Union. . . . Between the two of them, and the rank and file of organized labor and agriculture in western Oklahoma, the hospital was founded. . . . The fact that the hospital has had to be enlarged three times would seem to indicate that, on the whole, it is filling a real need. . . .

As for Dr. Shadid, the Syrian immigrant who worked his way through medical school and for thirty years has served the farmers of western Oklahoma both as a working physician and as a working Socialist, the opposition of the medical politicians is nothing new to him. He has beaten it before and expects to beat it again. In the current fight his chief ammunition is to be found in a pamphlet entitled "The Doctors' Seven Years of Conspiracy to Destroy the Cooperative Community Hospital at Elk City." This tells an amazing story of sabotage, espionage, and persecution—a story supported at many points by documents supplied, it would appear, by physicians not in sympathy with the excited medical politicians.

Here are some of the high points of this story: the desertion of Dr. Shadid by medical associates as the result of the pressure from the County Medical Association, which as usual threatened expulsion; the canceling of Dr. Shadid's own membership in the association without charges and without trial (during a disbanding and subsequent reorganization of the organization); a suit for damages inspired, according to Dr. Shadid, by his political enemies; a hearty slap at the Medical Association administered by former Governor "Alfalfa Bill" Murray when he wrote, "I want to state that there is no danger of any doctor who may be employed in that hospital [the Elk City Community Hospital] losing his license. . . . In the first place, if the Medical Board attempts such conspiracy, they will be dismissed by the Governor and prosecuted for such conspiracy under the laws, as will any other doctor in such conspiracy"; an affidavit dated October 3, 1936, in which a lay witness testifies to hearing two doctors describe a $10 assessment alleged to have been levied by the Medical Association on its members, this fund to be used allegedly to pass a new state law restricting the corporate practice of medicine in such a way as to eliminate Dr. Shadid and his Community Hospital. Sensational confirmation of the existence of the "slush fund" came only two weeks ago when Dr. J. S. Fulton, according to the Oklahoma News of May 11, told the annual convention of the state Medical Association that the Shadid fight had "cost a good deal of money. If you ask me where and why, I'd say I don't know. This is no time to raise questions."

Dr. Shadid cites in his appendix the resolutions endorsing the Elk City medical cooperative by the Oklahoma State Federation of Labor and by the state executive board of the Farmers' Union, and concludes his brief with the following burst of eloquence:

I plead for the Community Hospital—the first cooperative hospital in the nation! I plead for the 15,000 men, women, and children who put $150,000 in it out of their pittance, and for the 100,000 men, women, and children in the Farmers' Union in this state who are going to have access to this and to similar hospitals on a basis that they can afford. I plead for the cooperative movement in the state and in the nation, which are getting ready to follow our example! I plead for the underprivileged, the disinherited, and the poor, whose only refuge is consumers' cooperation! I plead for the American people, for their constitutional rights, for their self-determination, for their privilege to escape from the domination of special privilege, which is leading this country toward dictatorship and chaos!

This language will be familiar to anyone who has attended conventions of the Farmers' Union. These are native slogans, populist rather than socialist. Against them the State Medical Association can marshal only the outworn, more or less disingenuous shibboleth of "freedom of medical choice" and chorus its horror of "advertising" as a means of mobilizing patients for a medical cooperative. Yet to the layman it would seem obvious that advertising, from the point of view of the public interest, is good or bad depending upon the economic and social relationship which it expresses and promotes. Dr. Shadid's leaflet describing his hospital contains no misleading super-salesmanship.

At the tenth biennial congress of the Cooperative League of the United States Dr. Shadid was a featured speaker on the subject of cooperative medicine, and his speech was one of the most competent and realistic analyses of the problem yet made. The following quotations are from this speech:

. . . A medical cooperative must be supported by a dues-paying system, and dividends must be paid in the form of low dues and improved service. To charge for medical and hospital care the prevailing fees under the profit system and pay dividends at the end of each year as you do in the retail trade or in the ginning of cotton, for instance, is disastrous. First because competing doctors will cut their fees below those of the cooperative and wean its membership away, and secondly because when the members need hospitalization many of them will demand credit and this will be equally disastrous. A dues-paying system is beyond the reach of medical competitors in the first place and renders credit business unnecessary. . . .

People have not been educated to pay for medical care unless ill, and hence the dues must be low to begin with, even though you may be forced to give a service with trimmings or additional extras. On the other hand, when sick, they demand the best care obtainable regardless of whether the patient is rich or poor. . . .

The dues, to be low, must be based on sufficient volume. Two thousand families is the minimum number required to support a medical cooperative and a hospital, and I do not think it advisable to establish a medical cooperative without a hospital. General practice is not equally as vulnerable as hospitalization to cooperative effort, for the savings effected are not equally great. Furthermore, it is difficult to wean away enough people from their family doctor to make a medical cooperative a success without hospitalization, and in the long run such effort will not be fruitful and satisfactory. . . .

The dues must be compulsory, and default in their payment after a generous period of grace should result in cancelation of membership. Every cooperative in the world could succeed if its members would patronize it. But the Rochdale principles of cooperation do not provide for compelling the members to patronize their cooperative. We need a patronage-compelling principle in the cooperative movement. To compel patronage sounds paradoxical, but it is not as paradoxical as it may sound.

The "trimmings" and "additional extras" which Dr. Shadid refers to include charges of $1 per day for hospital board, $10 for use of the operating room, $5 for the anaesthetic, $3 for each X-ray, and $2 for each laboratory examination, such as blood or urine. Apparently these fees, which are duly listed in Dr. Shadid's promotion literature, are considered "fleecing" by the Medical Association. The latter further objects to the fact that non-members of the cooperative are charged according to their ability to pay, although this is the recognized practice of both individual physicians and of private clinics, and to the fact that representatives of the union are regularly in the field recruiting new members—which again seems proper enough.

It seems pretty obvious, however, that the Medical Association's real grievance against Dr. Shadid is his success. Already a cooperative hospital is planned for Oklahoma City. Similar projects are in their formative stages in other cities, both East and West. Quite possibly we are witnessing the beginning of a great and extraordinarily valuable development of medical cooperatives in this country—a development needed almost equally by the organized farmers, by organized labor, and by the medical profession, no matter what any transiently entrenched group of medical politicians may think or say about it.

"Indian Fiesta Huge Success"

BY MURIEL RUKEYSER

PALM SPRINGS with its Indian reservation is a hundred and twenty miles away from Hollywood, on a road that drives straight through the Pasadena gardens, the close miles of orange groves whose scent lies on the air far beyond the sight of the trees. The country changes from planted land bearing citrus and grapevines and date palms to mountain and desert. The mountains come up, crumpled in the lines and creases that are foreign to the East; they rise until there is clean snow at the peaks of the San Jacinto range; under, there is desert, the dead sand-white pointed now with purple and yellow flowers. The desert persists; the road narrows; houses and towns are far apart. But very suddenly the road is four-lane again; tourist bungalows line it; in a minute, hotels; and then a street of shops, the sparsely arranged window displays of expensive stores, the clothes, perfumes, slick-paper magazines, camera shops, bars. And on the street men in trunks, women in Hollywood pajamas, the trick jewelry of resorts.

[The Indians will enact their ancient tribal ceremonies and weird rites for the first time. Around great fires built at the edge of the stream these descendants of original desert tribes will be accompanied by tom-toms and shrill yells, as done centuries ago. Walls of the canyon will echo ancient songs and chants, as well as the excited yells . . . —The Desert Sun, Palm Springs.]

Palm Springs is fashionable, high-priced, hot all year. The ending season is having a final spurt; hotels that will close next week—it is getting too hot, it is desert here, all around this particular oasis—are open now for one more week-end. The Indians are to celebrate the first All-Indian Fiesta to be held in public here. Palm Canyon, in the reservation, has drums tonight, dancing, fires.

[As a crowd far beyond first-night expectations sat or stood in awed silence, one of the most dramatic Indian portrayals and pageants ever presented for the eyes of the white race took place last night in beautiful Palm Canyon.]

The road is dusty beyond the town, tapering off, branching, evading boulders, crossing a wide stream that washes the car wheels. The immense prehistoric palms stand architecturally before sky, and then sink as the canyon deepens. The car reaches a gate with the usual Indian-reservation sign, "No Liquor"; the fee, usually a quarter, has been raised to a dollar for the fiesta. From the parking space a bus takes you down into the canyon. Night has come quickly during the last hour. A full moon deepens the folds in the hills, the palm shadows. But from here you can see the beacon light that is flashed at Hollywood premières. At the edge of the canyon the crowd stands looking across the gorge, across the heavy stream. Their faces are lit blue and orange. The moon is unimportant, for five terrific spotlights are turned on the clearing, seen in miniature very far below.

[The huge arc lights, loaned through the courtesy of Twentieth Century-Fox Studios, sweeping the sky above the entire Coachella valley and then down into the canyon, turning it into a fairyland of myriad colors, reminded one of the gala premières of the cinema capital, Hollywood.]

Well over two thousand people witnessed the first performance, assuring the financial success of the event.]

They were dancing a hoop-dance under the lights, stepping through the wooden ring, left foot, right foot, swinging it over the head and down in a cylinder around the body. The drumbeat echoed immensely loud and rhythmical in the gorge, too loud for a single drum, as impossible as the lights. The beat quickens fast, draws into a fast double beat, and stops with the dance. Clapping comes from all the walls of the canyon. The dancers retire. And suddenly a terrific herald voice roars out of a powerful microphone and spreads through the entire valley: "We wish to thank you for the quiet during the last dance. Absolute quiet is necessary to get the effect of these numbers. The next on the program will be Weeping Star, who will sing the well-loved 'Land of the Sky-Blue Waters.'"

The Indian woman, in a pale-blue doeskin robe, comes up to the microphone in the center of the clearing. It is adjusted for her by a technician in shirt sleeves, who quickly ducks behind a bush, dragging a length of cable beside him to get it out of the way. She begins, in a high, quavering voice:

To the land of the sky-y-blue waters
They brought a captive ma-id. . . .

There was more dancing. Victory Dance by Four Boys from Sherman School. Stump Dance—a Social Dance for Neighborly Indian tribes. And songs. Indian Love Call by Thunder Cloud, Cherokee, and Weeping Star, Kickapoo tribe. More cars arrived, crowding the top of the gorge. All the parking spaces were filled.

[One of the happiest men in Southern California last night was H. H. Quackenbush, whose smile grew larger as more and more cars kept arriving with their parties of eager spectators.]

The huge voice was coming through the microphone again: "The audience is invited to come down into the canyon and cross the stream for the remainder of the program. By coming up closer to the dance circles the Indian fire dance and the peon games may be better observed." The crowd began to file down the trails into the canyon, across the board bridge over the stream, and up the sand-hill to the clearing. The lights turned brighter, orange and white, passing over the entire canyon to light the way; and as the crowd formed a circle around the Indians, the spotlights fizzled off.

The Sherman Indians were dancing Navajo Skip Dance, A Social Dance, while the crowd quieted down. The costumes were feathered and mirrored ("Gee, what swell costumes!" said one of the women in the circle; "must have cost p-lenty!"), and the high white boots of the women were hidden under dyed doeskin skirts. The couples swung the circle, dancing with the delicate double stamp, smiling.

Now, with the lights off, quiet was ordered. Salvador Lopez, the heavy Indian, rolled up his shirt sleeves and adjusted the feather headdress. The fire in the center of the ring was scattered until it burned low, and coals covered the clearing. He placed his hands over his eyes and groaned heavily. In the audience an answering groan was heard, and a run of laughter. Somebody up the gorge yelled, "Oh, Rob-ert!" and one of the technicians turned. "What about Gray Earth's song?" The technician spoke to an Indian boy, who called back, "We cut Gray Earth's song!" The Indian chief took his hands off his eyes, and groaned again. A flashlight powder went off. "You think some of these fellows will get movie jobs?" somebody whispered. "They're a good-looking bunch."

[Feature writers, newspaper and newsreel camera men from the large metropolitan papers and film companies were present to record this great successful event. The fame of Palm Springs, winter playground of smart people, was spread in still a wider circle last night through the efforts of these aforementioned people.]

The chief had groaned for almost twenty minutes. Now the monotonous lovely two-line song was chanted by the men and women sitting behind him, still in their rouge and costumes. He leaned over the embers, slowly selected one, and put it in his mouth, blowing his cheeks painfully. After a minute he took it, black, in his hand and dropped it. Laughter ran around the circle, and the ring closed in about him. "Sleight of hand," a man said loudly. Three people came into the circle with him, all white people with cameras. A girl with a Leica sat just under his knees, focusing up at his broad hot face. One camera man hurriedly ran around the Indian's arm as he picked up another coal and put it in his mouth. Another flashlight powder went off. He groaned, raised his arms up to the dimmed full moon, and chanted with the chorus. An Indian woman was asked what the words meant. "My heart is breaking in the fire." The cameras clicked when he opened his mouth and the live coal went in, or seemed to. "Sleight of hand," said the man.

[Large crowds are expected tomorrow, when the ceremonies will be repeated at 11 a. m. and 3 p. m.]

The crowd was tapering off, spilling down the hill and over to where the cars were. Hardly any of the spectators were left when the games began. The announcer had thundered, "And now we wish to thank Twentieth Century-Fox for so kindly permitting us the use of their lighting equipment and personnel," and had advised anyone wishing to see the peon games to adjourn to the next campfire, lower on the hill. The photographers crawled out of the ring. The Indian retreated, taking off his headdress. There would be a double program tomorrow.

The spotlights were out for good, and the moonlight was intense. Cars left in a rattle of horns. Around the second fire the women sat, with the little children. Almost all the white people were gone. A boy said, leaving, "They took in a scad of money, all right, at a dollar a head." "Do they live in tents?" somebody asked. "No, shacks."

The Indians were dancing, waiting for the others to come. Three on a side, one side crouched low, the other bent back, stamping. One shook a gourd, beating the rhythm, the man beside him shook a flashlight in the same tempo. They laughed, stopping at the end of each phase of the dance. Somebody started to sing. "Sh!" said an Indian mother to a tired baby. "There's your uncle Billy Sunday, see him? He's singing the bird song."

Now the games started, the little black and white sticks of the peon game concealed in the hands of one side of four, the singing and bobbing as they prepared, the guessing of the other side. The chorus sang, the boys taking the song, the women across the fire answering. The chief who had swallowed fire was playing, the sly look on his large face growing as he won. They laughed at each other. "The baby keeps quiet as long as she can see the fire," said the Indian mother.

The games went on. They might go on all night. But most of the people were gone. There would be two performances tomorrow.

[Entire program directed by Don Admiral, assisted by Frank Bogert. Lighting under the direction of Robert S. Comer of Twentieth Century-Fox. Lighting equipment, courtesy of Darryl Zanuck, president of Twentieth Century-Fox. Earl Strebe, director of lights and sound.]

A Pioneer's May Day in Moscow

[The letter printed below was written to Louis Fischer by his fourteen-year-old son. For many years The Nation's Moscow correspondent, Mr. Fischer is now in New York and will sail shortly for Spain. His children have been brought up in Moscow.]

Moscow, May 5

DEAR PAPA: This May first was very exciting for me. On April 28 an order was published saying that children over twelve would not be allowed into the Red Square without their own passes. But I wanted to try. I went with Gordon [a foreign correspondent] without a pass. There were little difficulties, but I got through nevertheless. During the military parade I stood all the time with Negrin [the thirteen-year-old son of the new Spanish Prime Minister]. With him were the two sons of the Spanish Ambassador in London, who came with the Spanish delegation. After the parade we went home. I wanted to go to Dr. Rosen's, but the Spanish Ambassador invited me to lunch. After we had eaten, Negrin, the other two Spanish boys, and I went walking through the city. Unlike the military parade, the decorations in the city and the civilian demonstration were not particularly interesting. Negrin suggested that we go again to the Red Square. Although we had no passes we were let through, and we saw the end of the civilian demonstration and the sports parade. We stood on the diplomats' grandstand, which except for us was practically empty. The boys wanted very much to go over to the Spanish delegation, which stood on the other side of the Mausoleum. Suddenly I saw Zeitlin, who was taking pictures of the demonstration. On his breast proudly shone his new decoration. He came over to me. Since I knew that he had various acquaintances among the military commanders on guard, I asked him to take us over to the delegation, which he did without difficulty.

The Spanish delegation was greeted boisterously by all paraders. After the parade came the sports parade. The sportsmen marched in beautiful straight rows. Then the Spanish delegation, and we with it, started to go home. Just at the moment when we passed the Mausoleum, the members of the government came down from the Mausoleum; and then came a moving scene. Suddenly I saw a young Spaniard and Stalin embrace and kiss. Gradually the whole delegation, and we with it, came nearer, and Stalin, as well as all the members of the government, shook hands with all of us—that means me too. I cannot describe my excitement. When I got home I could scarcely, from excitement, tell about it, and I had to give Mama my word as a Pioneer that I was not joking. Mama immediately telephoned all our acquaintances and told them about it.

On May 2, during the day, I went to the Palace of Pioneers in order to know when the meeting would take place between the Moscow Pioneers and the foreign delegations. At seven o'clock in the evening we were to await the Spanish delegation in the courtyard of the palace. Even before the delegation arrived, Zeitlin was there with his Ford and two trucks with Jupiter lights. He was greeted and questioned by the members of the Photo Circle of the palace. He had to promise them that he would give them films for their cameras. (Almost all the members of the Photo Circle have their own Soviet Leicas.) Finally the delegations arrived in seven buses. Before them marched a section of Pioneers all of whom wore three badges. They were accompanied by a Red Army orchestra. The Pioneers made a cordon, and the delegations, boisterously greeted, marched into the palace. I was very disturbed when I did not see Zamora [a son of the former President of Spain] among the members of the Spanish delegation. Later it developed that he came in another automobile. After some short speeches by various delegations, all the delegations assembled in the great hall. I got in after much difficulty because the hall was quite overfilled. Once I almost got through but without Vitya [his thirteen-year-old-brother], and so I remained outside on his account. Finally they let us both in. During the official part I sat with Vitya somewhere far in the rear. I was very sad that we sat so far behind because I had got to know the Spaniards during the parade.

After the official program there was a long intermission. You can imagine how the boys stormed the Spaniards and asked them for addresses of Spanish Pioneer groups. In return the Pioneers gave the Spaniards their Pioneer neckerchiefs and badges. I and Vitya gave them everything we had. After the intermission we no longer sat in the rear but near a Spanish professor whom Vitya and I took over as our protege. We talked with him through a dictionary. During the artistic performances three Zeppelins suddenly flew over the Palace of Pioneers. A small intermission had to be declared because everybody ran to the windows in order to admire the beautifully lit-up airships. Then the children showed their own productions.

The meeting ended very late, and the farewells made it later, so that we didn't get home until 1 a. m. Mama was quite upset by our appearance—without neckerchiefs and badges. She thought that we had been attacked in the night and robbed. After we had excitedly told her everything we went to bed and I slept the next morning until 11:30, when mama waked me. This was the record sleep for my whole previous life. Today I played hooky.

YURI

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Philip Snowden

THAT Philip Snowden's frail, battered body was able to contain his burning spirit for seventy years seems little short of a miracle. A "lifelong cripple" the press dispatches dubbed him. But that only tells half the story of his fight against ill health and disability—a fight greatly intensified when several very patriotic, brave, and manly British soldiers in uniform assaulted this lame and delicate man and "punished" the future Chancellor of the Exchequer for his pacifism during the World War then ended. But no amount of bodily suffering could daunt his ardent soul. Nobody ever accused him of cowardice or of weakening in his beliefs. Even when he joined Ramsay MacDonald in deserting his old Labor associates for the National Government, he somehow retained the friendship and regard of his former allies while Ramsay MacDonald was ostracized and avoided, when not openly cut, by men who had stood shoulder to shoulder to him in the days that tested the metal of everyone and truly tried men's souls.

Philip Snowden was in Australia when the crisis of July, 1914, arose. The Parliamentary Labor Party numbered then but forty members. It met to discuss its attitude toward the war, and went with Ramsay MacDonald in his opposition to Great Britain's entry into the struggle. But on August 5 there was a split. MacDonald resigned his leadership, and Arthur Henderson succeeded him and entered the war Cabinet. Only Keir Hardie, F. W. Jowett, and Tom Richardson stood with MacDonald—until Philip Snowden arrived. Snowden never hesitated for a minute. He knew that it meant going into the wilderness; he knew that in its war hysteria the public would not spare him and his associates, that they would be hated and denounced, spied upon, and pronounced traitors. But like the MacDonald of that day he felt that the salvation of his soul required that he take this stand. War did not, as a biographer of MacDonald says of him, "suspend private judgment and private duty." Snowden might have kept silent; the dreadful injuries to his body from that so nearly fatal bicycle accident could well have been the excuse for his remaining in safety.

Of that he never thought. He kept his seat in Parliament, fought—vainly—for an intelligent war and a worth-while peace, and never hesitated to speak for peace, no matter what the risk. Mrs. Snowden alone addressed five hundred peace meetings during the war, and only two or three were broken up—she would have landed in jail here in this intolerant America, as I once told her, after her second meeting, if she had come unscathed through her first. In Parliament, during the war, Snowden built higher the foundations for the great esteem in which he was held by foes and friends alike. His energy was boundless; his knowledge, commanding; his selflessness, obvious; his integrity, transparent; his courage, sublime. It is only the truth that a London correspondent of the New York Times cabled in reporting Snowden's death: "No politician has ever been more scathing to his opponents and left fewer lasting wounds. The British Labor Party produced no other who has left such a memory of ability, honesty, and strength of character."

In Snowden's career his wife, Ethel Annakin, played no little part. An ardent advocate of women's suffrage, she created a sensation when she first came to New York by her beauty, her ability, her eloquence, her power to convert. She made inroads among conservatives whom no American woman leader had been able to affect. She was the type of trained Englishwoman we have all come to admire so much, so obviously capable of dealing with the most difficult affairs of state that no one could hear her and then stick to the old nonsense about the inferiority of women's brains and their physiological inability to deal with national events and issues. Sadly enough it was she who yielded to the lure of London society when the day of triumph came for Ramsay MacDonald and Snowden. It was she who won a reputation for being one of the most charming hostesses in London, but one who was more and more seen in the company of lords and ladies, dukes and duchesses. To her is attributed Philip Snowden's acceptance of the viscounty which sat as strangely upon him as the title of Baron Passfield sits upon Sidney Webb. Still, Snowden remained his old self—frank, simple, direct, outspoken. Only two weeks before his death he had lashed out at the present Cabinet with the scathing words that rose to his lips whenever his sense of justice was outraged. "Weak and muddling," he called the government's policy, and properly denounced the "mad race in armament."

The saddest episode beyond doubt was his turning upon his old associate MacDonald some two years ago with a bitterness that hurt all his old friends. Perhaps the sting lay in the truth of that denunciation. Here was one occasion when he might well have softened the blows. But that was Philip Snowden. If truth and duty compelled him, he spared no one. He placed fidelity to his ideals and standards above everything else. His Spartan will carried him over breaks like these, which must have pained him to the core, as it did over the weaknesses of his body and over the disappointments of the labor movement. Always his mind worked like the first-class machine it was, obviously, however, without dominating his emotions. A great Englishman is gone.

BROUN'S PAGE

Jesting Prelate

THE orchestra, for some obscure reason, played Basque airs, but then there was a sudden silence as out strode Mrs. S. Stanwood Menken portraying the "Spirit of Spain." Mrs. Menken is an experienced pageanteer and has portrayed many spirits from Soft Coal to Rugged Individualism, but seldom has she been gowned more lavishly than last week at Madison Square Garden when she did her bit for the rebel refugees. A last-minute announcement asserted that the American Committee for Spanish Relief would aid civilians on both sides, but practically all the speakers, and particularly the Reverend Bernard Grimley, glorified the cause of the invaders and minimized the tragedy of Guernica.

The spotlight played upon Mrs. Menken and she gave back beam for beam—the costume with its peacock-like headdress was studded with glittering stones, and Mrs. Menken was pleased to proffer their radiance to the starving children of Bilbao who cry aloud for bread. Murmurs of admiration ran through the fifteen thousand in the Garden, and when the contributions had been counted it was found that a sum had been raised almost equal to one-third the value of the costume.

It may have been a little startling to find the spirit of tortured Spain represented by a dowager in diamonds, but the brilliants were less hard and sharp than the comforting words spoken by the Reverend Mr. Grimley, who lives in London and edits the Catholic Times. Mr. Grimley simplified the conflict between the Loyalists and the forces of Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco by saying, "The issue is God or anti-God." This disposed of the suspicions of all who have surmised that the Führer was interested in Spanish metals or that Mussolini wished to extend the sphere of Fascist influence. The audience applauded warmly at being thus categorically informed as to God's attitude in the situation, and the Reverend Mr. Grimley, already tingling with pride in the importance of his role as courier from heaven, ventured just a little farther. It was all very well for Mrs. S. Stanwood Menken to represent the Spirit of Spain, but he, the Reverend B. Grimley of London, was serving as the amplifier of a still, small voice.

Mighty Moses on a historic occasion grew heady because he had once been intrusted with the tablets of stone and took on an arrogance which served to draw a rebuke from on high. The error of Mr. Grimley was one into which many members of the cloth of all denominations are prone to stray. He just would have his little joke, and he grew facetious concerning things with which not even a reverend editor should deal lightly. He referred to "the women and children who seem always to be getting in the way of the bombs of the other side." I have taken the quotation from the account of the meeting in the New York Herald Tribune.

The good father went a bit too far. Nobody laughed very loud. Probably it should be said in defense of the Reverend Mr. Grimley that he never saw a woman bombed. Into his mind there came no clear picture of the mangled children of Guernica after the blackbirds of Hitler had wended their way home. The London editor might be interested to learn that in America members of many faiths, including, it would seem, Cardinal Mundelein of Chicago, do not regard the Nazi bombers as the ravens of the Lord.

They say that evening clothes predominated in the Garden, and while Mrs. S. Stanwood Menken undoubtedly outshone all the other ladies, there were many who sought to follow in her train. In such an atmosphere it may be difficult to remember or to heed the effect of machine-gun bullets and incendiary bombs upon frightened and huddled masses of people. White and stuffed shirts may serve as a curtain to shut off the unpleasant picture of blood upon a pinafore.

But even while the Reverend Mr. Grimley was making his little joke, the following press-association dispatch was coming into the newspaper offices of New York City:

By the Associated Press. Hendaye, Franco-Spanish Frontier, May 10.—The semi-autonomous Basque government sent a note to the international Non-Intervention Committee in London protesting "the Germans' criminal action" in the Basque offensive. "German aviation at the service of the rebels continues action against Munguia, Larrauri, Maruri, Larrabezua, and Plencia, dropping a great number of hand grenades and machine-gunning the civilian population, which menaced by death must flee into the fields, thus causing numerous victims, especially women and children."

These, Father Grimley, are not the "reds" against whom you thundered but your coreligionists, the Basques of Spain. As a matter of fact, I wonder whether doubt may not assail the most faithful and leave them wondering whether the Creator for whom you undertook to speak really rides the skies with the Nazi bombers and ordains the slaughter of Communist children. At four thousand feet I doubt whether the German aviators can tell true believers from heretics, particularly when the targets are less than ten years old.

Presently, quite presently perhaps, you will return to your desk and your labors in London, and it may be that upon your homecoming you will complain that the Americans have no sense of humor. But really, Father, you were not funny. For that you should utter a prayer of thanks. Had you been it would have been even worse.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

New Deal—French Version

WHICH WAY FRANCE? By Alexander Werth. Harper and Brothers. $3.

THE story of how France was first inhumanly punished by deflation, then lifted from the trough of the depression under the leadership of Blum, inevitably bears a resemblance to the story of the United States under Roosevelt. The similarities are not in the same focus, since they are inner fundamentals working themselves out in quite different national expressions. But the likenesses deserve far more attention than they usually receive.

The thesis that France under Blum won a victory against fascism, or to put it the other way around, that but for Blum France would by now have become a fascist state, is too precise. And that is the implied thesis of Mr. Werth's admirable history of France's recent years. Mr. Werth leaves no doubt that the Popular Front would not have been possible without the fascist menace. But his record offers no convincing proof that France was in real danger of succumbing to fascism. More probably the danger was passed by rather than overcome. What France overcame was not so much fascism as its own inner lethargy and complaisance. A democratic nation, innately capable of self-government, developed its capabilities in a crucial hour. Galvanized into action, France, like the United States, with a sudden impulse carried through basic reforms. It gave scope and freedom to organized labor. It made the control of credit a national instead of a private concern, going much farther than the Banking Act of the New Deal. With a gust of courage it decided that concentrated economic power called for more national control.

That it was immeasurably more dangerous for French democracy than for our own to deal with its problems goes without saying. France is not blessed with America's natural resources and market, and is not protected by two broad oceans. France, moreover, had been in a false position of strength relative to the rest of Europe, an equation which time was swiftly rectifying, with attendant spiritual hazards. And in France extremes of right and left were organized, able to pour their fighters into the street. Thus the story of France before and during the Blum government has been even more exciting than the story of the New Deal. And since all the democracies are parts of a world unity, the experiences of France should be known to every democrat everywhere, as a portion of his own self-knowledge. For this reason unqualified recommendation can be given to Mr. Werth's stirring book. Here is a vivid, honest, and accomplished example of journalism. It is not history, in the sense that all the major values could so soon have been tested and weighed. But it is journalism at its best, and since France has been so exciting, this account of it by a sensitive, competent writer could not fail to be stirring.

It is to Mr. Werth's credit that he is honest enough to introduce the doubts which are at odds with his main thesis. He writes primarily as an interpreter of the Popular Front and sees France through Popular Front eyes. Thus his implication is that the Popular Front saved France from fascism. Beginning with the riot of February 6, 1934, disturbances were frequent and ominous. But Mr. Werth even uses italics to emphasize his opinion that the Croix de Feu never had a chance to seize power. Colonel de la Rocque did not funk his opportunities. That being so, the real mission of the Blum government was not to suppress fascism; it was to govern France. And the actual deeds of this government become more important than the circumstances which brought it into power. That the government itself has been primarily concerned with governing is today clearer than it was early in the year, where Mr. Werth's recital ends. The subsequent "breathing spell" has suspended the full application of the forty-hour week, and France, like the United States, has been committed to waiting upon recovery before pressing for more reforms. To M. Blum, the radical, has fallen the most delicate duty of devaluation, and he has gone about it in a conservative spirit. His united front is crumbling somewhat in consequence. But France is enjoying the blessing of having an honest and intelligent Premier, heading a revitalized regime. It has, too, an enormously strengthened labor movement, and when finally the regime falls, it will leave the control of the complex modern economic system vested much more directly than before in democratic institutions.

Mr. Werth by implication voices dissatisfaction with the French policy in Spain, which has estranged so many in this country who otherwise would have been enthusiastic for the Popular Front regime. He contributes the important historic detail that the British, warning Blum against helping the Spanish government, stated that they would not feel themselves bound by their Locarno obligations if the help brought France into war. But he also is discerning enough to explain that this warning was overplayed by the Blum government to quiet its own supporters. Blum's first anxiety was to keep France at peace; his second was to be sure of British support if France were overtaken by war. His anxieties for Spain came third. And here again, he was responsible for France rather than for the desires of the leftists in his coalition. The verdict on his course can only be reached when the Spanish crisis is over. Today it seems a fair assumption that had the French been forthright in their support of the Spanish government, General Franco would have been defeated months ago, and that neither Italy nor Germany would have dared to intervene. But much of Mussolini's and Hitler's timidity, now beginning to be apparent, must be attributed to the British rearmament program, which came after Blum's non-intervention policy; so the theory is hard to prove. One result of the Blum policy has been to bring France and Britain into closer cooperation than at any time since the war, an accomplishment in the foreign field that bulks as large as any of Blum's domestic achievements.

Readers will not ask Mr. Werth for a sympathetic appraisal of either Laval or Doumergue. He is the Manchester Guardian correspondent in Paris, and his feelings are all for the other side. But being in the best Manchester Guardian tradition, he also is intellectually honest, and if he does not answer all the questions he suggests it is because he knows he cannot. Even his major question, "Which Way France?" is left open. It cannot be said too often that few questions are of more immediate importance to Americans; his evidence, therefore, deserves a wide audience in this country. In a second edition Mr. Werth should add a footnote explaining in detail

Just Out!

THE U. S. IN WORLD AFFAIRS IN 1936

By Whitney H. Shepardson

in collaboration with

William O. Scroggs

Can we remain neutral in a world headed for war? This book gives the latest facts on which any reasoned answer to this question must be based. It is the latest and most vital volume in the series which has established itself as the outstanding authority in its field. It discusses the effect on our foreign relations of the recent Pan-American conferences, the upswing in business and in foreign trade, the Far-Eastern situation which has been influenced by the German-Japanese pact, the Spanish situation, etc. Published for the Council on Foreign Relations. - $3.00

HARPER & BROTHERS - 49 E. 33rd St., N. Y.

The Drama of The Americans Who Work —But Don't Talk

With the keen insight of the novelist and the pitiless accuracy of a reporter, the author here presents America in terms of the great backbone of our population—the unsung farmers and workers who make our country what it is. Traveling by bus, he visited mining towns, cotton plantations, industrial communities, wheat farms, oil fields; lived with beet workers, iron puddlers, lumberjacks, mill hands—and here is their story, as dramatic as any play on Broadway, as moving and powerful as today's best selling novel. $2.75

THE ROAD

IN SEARCH OF AMERICA

By Nathan Asch

W. W. Norton & Co.
70 5th Ave., N. Y.

the French law on compulsory labor arbitration, an issue which is sure to arise in this country. And it would be useful if he would explain how the craft and industrial unions in France compose their inherent differences.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING

A Gist of Gists of Gists

ONE MIGHTY TORRENT: THE DRAMA OF BIOGRAPHY. By Edgar Johnson. Stackpole Sons. $3.50.

EACH man's way of living, as we might say, is his particular way of getting the "gist" of experience. The world is manifold; it has many loose ends, and each man knots a few of them. He knots them in accordance with his own particular vision of necessities and opportunities. Put all his acts together—and they reveal what he has taken to be the "gist" of experience.

Then appears a biographer. He looks at the man, makes a selection of his acts, weights, organizes, interprets, to give us what he considers to have been the gist of this man's life. And after many such biographies have been amassed, one may become a kind of "statistician," looking over an entire field. People having lived gists, and writers having given gists of these lives, after a sufficient accumulation one may "transcend" both lives and biographies by taking as his starting-point this "higher level" afforded by the accumulation itself.

Edgar Johnson's "One Mighty Torrent" is an engrossing work conducted on this "higher," "statistical" level. He has epitomized for us the course of English biography from the sixteenth century to the present—including the autobiographies, memoirs, diaries, letters, and biographical fiction that he considers significant. In this large undertaking, I think he has done us a double service.

Like John Chamberlain, in his highly succinct job of reporting the variants of populism (in "Farewell to Reform"), Johnson has put together some important lore, reducing a welter of material to "abstracts," that we may proceed to build upon it in whatever way we please—whereas otherwise we should have first to cover this preparatory ground ourselves. And in the course of thus making a field "handy" for others, who would get at it quickly, he has produced a work packed with "events."

I hope that our young novelists especially will read it. For it might have a healthy effect upon their notions of "realism," which have become disturbingly oversimplified in recent years. Realism has become "naturalism"—and naturalism has come to mean hardly more than an efficiently organized way of running people down. Reading Johnson's book, we are reminded that imaginative enterprise requires much subtler tactics, that realism should not be the mere bureaucratization of debunking and indictment. It should be the attempt to find the acts, thoughts, situations, and speeches in which a character names his number. Flaubert thought of it that way. Realism was not to him merely a roundabout way of asking us to pay $2.50 for words that we can get outside of books for nothing. It is the search for gists, for those events wherein a character sums up himself and the life beyond himself with accuracy and picturesqueness.

Johnson's book gives us a maximum of such events. He has gone through his material in search of characteristic moments, significant condensations, incidents that reveal the essence of the given biographer and the given biographer's subject. The literary efficiency of wit, of sharp appraisal (the startling kind of short-circuiting we get in the poems of Marianne Moore, where we can leap across gaps suddenly)—that sort of emphasis has become lost as the result of competitive crudeness; and Johnson's connoisseurship might do much to correct such blunt notions of "power."

There is no use here in attempting further to condense his condensations. I might mention, however, the almost frightening effect we get as we move from Chapter VII, Eighteenth Century Apogee (discussing that massive Tory, Samuel Johnson, that intellectual bouncer who perfected epigrammatic ways of kicking out the enemy) to Chapter VIII, Romantic Letter-Writers (dealing with Byron, Shelley, and Keats). I never felt so strongly what was let loose upon the world as the romanticism of business and the counter-romanticism of poetry caught its full stride. Another highly suggestive contrast is got by the matching of Steffens and Lawrence.

If you want not a survey but a final putting together of the material surveyed, perhaps Johnson's book will not be completely satisfactory. The range of the author's appreciation, his pliancy when confronting many different kinds of material, is the virtue here. And that is virtue enough for one book. He has recorded the plenitude of human personality. If you want not only this plenitude but also some underlying logic of unification, you may find the book, comprehensive as it is, still unfinished. Perhaps it were better left unfinished, in this sense. Perhaps men are as different as daisies and liverwort—and that's the end of it. And perhaps we should be content merely to contemplate and relish this diversity. In any case, I do not see how a reader could fail to enjoy the documents of diversity as here assembled, a literary springtime wherein the tiny brooks of personality converge to make the sweep onward of a torrential flood.

KENNETH BURKE

Her Gossamer Soul

A CARDINAL OF THE MEDICI. BEING THE MEMOIRS OF THE NAMELESS MOTHER OF THE CARDINAL IPPOLITO DE' MEDICI. By Susan Hicks Beach. The Macmillan Company. $3.

MRS. Hicks Beach is, according to the blurb on her book, sister-in-law to the late Sir Michael Beach. The bearing of this piece of information upon a labor of learning devoted to the Renaissance is not apparent unless it be that the reader is supposed to be reassured in the presence of the wife of a brother of a lord. Sir Michael's sister-in-law, so the blurb further says, was moved to authorship when she saw Titian's portrait of the young Ippolito in the Pitti Palace. The book she wrote she burned "because she judged her knowledge of Italy to be insufficient. Later, having again visited Italy, she spent five years writing the novel as it now stands."

"Antony and Cleopatra" could have gained nothing had Shakespeare been erudite in archaeology; "Romola" is heavy with the weight of learning, and "Salammbô" is rigid with scholarship. "Thais," "The Romance of Leonardo da Vinci," and "Cloud Cuckoo Land" though written by cultivated scholars, are unhampered by information and exemplify the ancient dictum that poetry is truer than history. We are told that Mrs. Beach, because she felt she needed to learn more facts, burned the book that a portrait arresting to her imagination had stirred her to write. This would suggest the likely probability that Mrs. Beach was not primarily a novelist, and her published rewriting establishes that she certainly is not.

Soundproof room, General Electric laboratory, Schenectady

How Science Conquers Noise

NO echoes roll, no outside noise intrudes in this chamber where G-E scientists calibrate sensitive instruments that measure sound.

These instruments, in soundproof rooms, are used to get rid of noise. They measure the whispers produced by fans. Research like this makes possible the development of new fans—fans that are quieter and more efficient—that will deliver fresh air to your offices and factories—that will provide you with year-round comfort through air conditioning.

Research on sound is helping to reduce the level of noise in shops and offices. Electric instruments, perfected in General Electric laboratories in Schenectady, trace elusive sound to its source. They locate vibrations that produce distracting rattles and squeaks. They investigate the causes of sound in machinery—make possible the development of machines that hum instead of roar—reduce noise and costs.

All over the country people are protesting against unnecessary noise. And General Electric scientists, enlisted in this same crusade, are helping to make possible for you quieter, more comfortable living and working conditions.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY
PUBLICATION . . .

Six Articles on Foreign Affairs

Throughout the world foreign correspondents of The Nation cover the news of prime interest to liberals in America. By cable, radiogram, and mail they forward an accurate account of the march of events and authoritative interpretation from the progressive point of view. Much of their information appears anonymously in our editorial section. Occasionally, however, outstanding articles arranged several weeks in advance of publication appear under a by-line. The following are coming soon:

England After Baldwin

Prime Minister Baldwin, having steered empire and monarchy safely past the perils of romantic love and an American divorcee with as little loss of prestige as could have been expected, will shortly retire to the House of Lords. S. K. Ratcliffe will discuss the effects of Baldwin's abdication and the prospects of his probable successor, Neville Chamberlain.

The Balkan Complex

M. E. Ravage, The Nation's correspondent in Paris, has recently visited the Balkan countries. He will discuss soon the crucial developments which have occurred recently in Europe's traditional cradle of war.

Also

Growing Pains of Mexican Labor by L. O. Prendergast
Social Credit in Alberta by Donald Leslie
The Mailed Fist in Greece by Julian Bach, Jr.
The Myth of Scandinavia's "Middle Way" by Finn Moe

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

5-29-37

Nor is she in any legitimate sense of the word a historian. Her book shows her to be a very industrious literary lady who has experimented in genteel cross-fertilization.

"The Narrative," Mrs. Beach opens her preface by saying, "was a literary product of the sixteenth century"; and to authenticate this Orphic pronouncement she quotes from the "Cambridge Modern History" a statement to the effect that though the Renaissance led to the decay of imaginative literature it fostered the development of biography, memoir, and autobiography. This may be Mrs. Beach's way of suggesting that she has a Renaissance mind of limited imagination. "The adoption of the narrative form—which is, of course, not original—for this picture of the life of the Cardinal Ippolito de' Medici," she goes on to say, "has made a certain simplification possible. The stage of the Italy of 1503-42 is so gorgeous, the scene is so pulsating and so crowded with vigorous personalities, that a comparative lucid setting for any one selected figure seems easier of attainment from the single point of view." Since Mrs. Beach was instigated to write by an initial emotion before Cardinal Ippolito's portrait, the most obvious "single point of view" for her "Narrative" would have been that of the Cardinal himself. Mrs. Beach has chosen rather that of the Cardinal's nameless mother.

Mrs. Beach makes her narrator speak of "my gossamer soul"; and in her preface, with no apparent intention of irony, she says that the material of her extended research "had to be passed through a very fine sieve."

"History pretends to be an account of facts, but I ask myself what facts really are, and if they are more than personal opinions on precarious materials." The sixteenth-century person of Mrs. Beach's "Narrative" who opines—and who uses a phrase of Keats apropos of the dreams of one of her husbands who was bald—discusses the sack of Rome and touches upon Luther. So to rewrite history as the "personal opinions" of a "gossamer soul" of "impersonal compassion" but much pedantry and elegantia who scorns the "mere device of intelligence," doubtless does "make a certain simplification possible," but at the cost of making scholarship pretentious and history trivial.

RAYMOND WEAVER

A Liberal Education

THE AMBERLEY PAPERS. THE LETTERS AND DIARIES OF BERTRAND RUSSELL'S PARENTS. By Bertrand and Patricia Russell. W. W. Norton and Company. Two Volumes. $10.

IN 1864 Bertrand Russell's father, Lord Amberley, married Kate Stanley, a daughter of Lord Stanley of Alderley. They were both dead by 1876, but they left behind diaries and correspondence that have been brought together by Bertrand and Patricia Russell into some thousand pages that will be a delight to anyone interested in that complex of Whiggism, rationalism, and radicalism that gave nineteenth-century England its peculiar character. Almost every aspect of the political and intellectual life of the time is reflected here—in the mentality and character of the Amberleys themselves, in the quality of their friends and acquaintances, in the books they read and the causes they championed.

The family hero of the Russells was the ancestor who was executed in 1683 for resistance to the Stuarts. His father became in consequence a promoter of the Revolution of 1688 and was made a duke by William III. "It followed," says Bertrand Russell, "that the Glorious Revolution was indeed glorious, that resistance to kings is in some cases justifiable, and that civil and religious liberty are above all things to be prized. My grandfather (Lord John Russell) was willing to support anti-governmental movements abroad, especially in Italy, though in English affairs, after the passing of the Reform Bill in 1832, he was far from radical. Nevertheless, his principles remained such as would naturally lead to radicalism in his son, to which he never objected." Amberley's mother was more radical than her husband and influenced him in a way which earned her the title, among Lord John's colleagues, of "Deadly Nightshade." Kate Stanley was one of a large and vigorous family, "each with his or her own very definite opinion on religion and politics, and each disagreeing with all the others." Over these exercises presided Kate's mother, impatient of fools, "downright, free from prudery, and eighteenth-century rather than Victorian in her conversation."

Such traditions were more than safe in the hands of Amberley and his wife. Her early diaries and letters show the gradual growth of modern ideas in her mind, notwithstanding an orthodox upbringing that forbade all books likely to be unsettling. After Harrow, Amberley spent a year at Edinburgh, where, in Lord John's time, Brougham, philosophic radicalism, and the Edinburgh Review had flourished. Two unhappy years were spent at Cambridge, where a theological emancipation took place that was to bring his views very close to those of Herbert Spencer. After their marriage and his very short but strenuous political career, the Amberleys devoted themselves to study, writing, and the society of such people as John Stuart Mill, Lecky, Carlyle, Grote, Jowett, and John Bright, with whom they discussed such issues as a League of Nations, Home Rule, Malthusianism, deism, ecclesiastical and political reform. Mill was an especially strong influence. Having read the "Subjection of Women" Kate became an ardent and active feminist. The cumulative effect of their unorthodox views set society by the ears. "But the Amberleys had always, when possible, chosen their associates for brains, and in their later years they saw very little of the grand folk who figure in their early diaries." They brought that preference with them to the United States when in 1867 they spent four months seeing less of Mrs. Belmont, "an uninteresting little woman," and the Van Rensselaers, "who seemed very dull," and more of Emerson, Longfellow, Lowell, the schools and prisons, the Oneida Settlement, Congress, and the White House.

Kate found Emerson "a very kind, gentle, amiable man; his face, smile, and accent are remarkably like Gladstone's; he talks much, and goes on a long time without any question or remark being made by the listener; when answering a question he frequently would wander on to something quite different, with but a slight connecting link. He asked me much about Carlyle, especially whether his friends did not look upon his recent course as a kind of aberration from his better self; he evidently feels great regret about Carlyle's despotic and anti-liberal views."

Everywhere in these papers there are to be found fragments stamped with the intricacies, the beauties, and the flaws of the genuine liberal design. There is the correspondence that illuminates the subtle shading of Whig into Liberal and Liberal into radical. There are the pages that bear witness to the intellectual vigor and honesty that led Amberley and his kind to take part in reform movements, to consider political questions on their merits, and to refuse to conceal their opinions whatever they might be. There is the family controversy in which are exhibited the va-

A BOOK UNION bargain!

THESE TWO GREAT BOOKS
and
BOOK UNION MEMBERSHIP FOR ONE YEAR

$2.95

(Regular Value $6.00)

FREUD AND MARX

By REUBEN OSBORN, with an Introduction by JOHN STRACHEY, is the first book to synthesize and to show the inescapable complementary character of the theories of Sigmund Freud and Karl Marx. JOHN STRACHEY says: "Profoundly original and stimulating, this book breaks into a whole new world of fruitful investigation." 285 pages—just published by the Exquinox Cooperative Press at $2.50; the Book Union Selection for June.

R. Palme Dutt's "WORLD POLITICS 1918-1936" is an indispensable prerequisite to an understanding of international events today. A leading best-seller on the Book Union recommended list; regularly $2.50.

MEMBERSHIP IN THE BOOK UNION

(regularly $1.00 a year) entitles you to discounts up to 40% on all Book Union Selections; 20% on all other books of all publishers. It is the means whereby liberal readers all over the world not only keep informed of the best new "left" books but obtain those they wish to read ("left-wing" and others) at substantial savings. Membership also brings you the free monthly Bulletin (terse, helpful digests of new books) and FREE BOOK DIVIDENDS (an important book, free, if you take at least four of the regular Selections during the year at the reduced members' prices). Now over 3,000 members—and growing rapidly!

Mail the coupon! You save 1/2!

To: BOOK UNION, INC.

381 Fourth Ave., New York City.

N-6

Please enroll me for one year as a member of THE BOOK UNION, and send me at once a copy of FREUD AND MARX, and WORLD POLITICS. ☐ I enclose $2.95 in full payment, including postage. (or) ☐ Send C.O.D.

Name

Address

City and State

be in MOSCOW when the curtain goes up on the

5TH ANNUAL SOVIET THEATRE FESTIVAL

with WILLIAM CHALLEE of the GROUP THEATRE

Sailing August
18th, including visits to London,
Copenhagen,
Stockholm, Hel-singsfors, Leningrad, Moscow, Kiev, Vienna
and Paris.

Other Russian tours from $237
up

EDUTRAVEL, INC.

85 FIFTH AVE., NEW YORK, N. Y.
Tel.: GRAMERCY 7-3824-5

ALL - INCLUSIVE
COST - 42 DAYS

$393

TOURS TO THE SOVIET UNION

MISS THYRA J. EDWARDS—educator, social worker—National
Minorities Tour—Sailing July
9th.

DR. EDWARD KALLMAN'S economy tour of Western Europe and U. S. S. R., conducted with plenty of leisure and free-lancing.
Sailing July 7th.

CULTURAL TOUR—led by Dr.
James C. Coleman—writer and authority on International Social Relations (8 countries). Sailing
July 8th.

HISTORY IN THE MAKING—
Lillian Hodgehead, music educator and world traveler (Sweden,
Finland, U. S. S. R., Istanbul, Athens, Rome and Paris). Sailing June 9th.

SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY TOUR
—Leader, Fred W. Ingvaldstad,
Lecturer, Educator, and World
Traveller. Sailing July 7th.

MR. MARTIN E. CORDULACK—
educator (U. S. S. R. and other European countries). Sailing
July 3rd.

Other Conducted and Individual Tours in Europe and the U.S.S.R.

TOURS TO MEXICO WORLD TOURISTS, INC.

175 Fifth Ave.

New York

ALgonquin 4-6656-7-8

THE BEACON

Chicago's Liberal Magazine

A Monthly Journal of Opinion and News-Behind-the-News Devoted to Chicago and the Middle-West

THE BEACON analyzes and interprets the Chicago scene in a progressive, forthright manner. THE BEACON contains articles of permanent interest on social, political, and cultural subjects.

For Future Issues—

Chicago's Traction Problem

How Pure Is Our Milk?

The Chicago Press and Politics

ONE YEAR—$1.50

ORDER NOW!

THE BEACON, 3037 Argyle Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

I enclose $1.50 for a year's subscription to THE BEACON.

Name _____

Address _____

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

rieties of opinion on the subject of the Paris Commune and the weaknesses of the case made for the Communards by their English champions. There is also the record of Amberley's speech to the Liberal electors of Leeds in which he took a position with regard to the extension of the franchise which illustrates perfectly that fatal absence in nineteenth-century liberalism of any real principle upon which to base reform. Should the franchise be extended from the ten-pound to the six-pound householders? Amberley searched in vain for some principle, short of universal suffrage, which would enable him to decide the question. In the special circumstances of his period the matter was not urgent; there was still half a century in which reform could be advocated in terms of more or less, faster or slower. The time was to come, however, when liberalism would find it increasingly necessary and increasingly difficult to abandon the construction of programs different from the Conservative in degree in favor of the discovery of a philosophy different in kind.

W. A. RUDLIN

Popular Science

FAMOUS AMERICAN MEN OF SCIENCE. By J. G. Crowther. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

ATOMS, MEN, AND STARS. By Rogers D. Rusk. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

THE common methods of interpreting the development of science are illustrated by these two books. Dr. Rusk describes the changing scientific world, the frontier developments, the new concepts, and, what is perhaps more important, he interprets current scientific concepts in terms of their impact upon man's ideas and personal philosophy. To Dr. Rusk science is the dominating factor in society today, molding social institutions and human relations as no other single factor does. Thus it is essential to understand and analyze the scientific revolution that began with the twentieth century and, after the discovery of X-rays, radioactivity, the electron, and wireless communication, swept on to important discoveries concerning the nature of matter, light and energy.

Mr. Crowther, on the other hand, proceeds on the basis of the belief that science is just one manifestation of social organization during a particular epoch. Science takes its material from the industrial and technical conditions of the times, and its practical benefits are limited by the social and economic framework. Discussing the lives and scientific work of four of the greatest American scientists—Benjamin Franklin, Josiah W. Gibbs, Joseph Henry, and Thomas A. Edison—Mr. Crowther relates the problems with which these scientists were concerned to the social needs of the times. "The progress of science is not accidental. It is due to the needs of the society in which it occurs, and its direction is affected by the conditions of that society."

Typical of Dr. Rusk's philosophy is his discussion of science and war. He says that "those who would put the blame on science and mechanism forget the impersonal character of science." That is, science develops independent of the needs and desires of man. As science marches onward and upward, presumably, man must learn to adjust himself to newly discovered relationships. But people cannot adjust themselves or reconsider their ideas without understanding the increasingly complex developments in scientific research. In simple and clear language Dr. Rusk carefully explains the significance of frontier research, the discovery of heavy water and isotopes, electronic physics, the concepts of space-time and relativity, our newer knowledge of the universe, the principle of uncertainty, and the mystery of cosmic rays.

Mr. Crowther performs pioneer work in correlating the biographies of particular scientists who lived before the twentieth century with social and economic development in the United States. Benjamin Franklin was the most important scientist of the eighteenth century, for he helped to establish modern ideas of experimental science, besides transforming the study of electricity into a science. The American Constitution itself was influenced by the development of science through the systematization of Newtonian mechanics. The American system of government, characterized by checks and balances, corresponds to the Newtonian concepts of action and equal reaction and a balance of forces.

Joseph Henry was the first to discover electro-magnetic self-induction and probably preceded Faraday in the discovery of electro-magnetic induction. Henry's largest contribution, however, came as a result of his duties as first secretary of the Smithsonian Institute. He organized scientific research and developed rational methods of discovering and promoting science. Josiah Willard Gibbs laid the foundations for efficient and rationalized industry through his establishment of physical chemistry. Thomas A. Edison was the first great scientific inventor who saw invention as dependent upon industry, thus reducing invention to a rational and business activity. During preceding centuries science was encouraged and subsidized by industry and to a large extent developed along certain lines in response to the demands of commerce and industry. At the present time, however, science has become the Supreme Court from which there is no appeal, and therefore its progress cannot be ascribed completely to the outlook or material needs of society. Today science is in advance of its direct industrial application.

"Famous American Men of Science" and "Atoms, Men, and Stars" should be read together for a true picture of the present place of science in society.

JACK SCHUYLER

New Novels

THEY CAME LIKE SWALLOWS. By William Maxwell. Harper and Brothers. $2.

AT A time when novels have tended to be intricately romantic or furiously thematic or to depict the fading or the birth of an epoch, Mr. Maxwell has limited himself to the simple delineation of human relationships within a small family. Two boys and their father think about their mother for something like a fortnight, at the end of which suddenly she dies. The two weeks include the signing of the armistice at the end of the World War and the first appearance, in a Middle Western town, of the influenza epidemic. But momentous as these events are in themselves, they have very little bearing on the story. The mother might have died of pneumonia or in childbirth instead of influenza a day or so after her baby was born. The important fact is that she is dead—and that she lived and was a force beyond measurement in the family. And still more important is not the influence of world-shaking events upon men and women and children but the influence of men, women, and children upon one another. Their hates, their loves, their momentary distresses and ecstasies are brought into focus and made moving and real. The drama of fiction may very well dwell in a changing world, in the gigantic forces of society. But Mr. Maxwell, looking into the small end of a telescope and

AMERICAN WRITERS CONGRESS

Speakers—Ernest Hemingway, Senator Gerald P. Nye, Archibald MacLeish, Earl Browder, Donald Ogden Stewart, Congressman John T. Bernard
On LABOR — SPAIN — FASCISM

● Fresh from Spain — High Spots of JORIS IVENS' BATTLE FILMS

TICKETS—35c, 55c, 83c, $1.10—at League of Amer. Writers, Phone ST. 9-6959; Book Union, Phone MU. 5-1454; Workers Bookshop—50 E. 13th St., N. Y., 1001 Prospect Ave., Bronx; Sutter Ave., Bklyn., and Putnam Bookstore, N. Y.

Carnegie Hall — Fri., June 4 — 8:30 P. M.

Nation readers are cordially invited to the
JUNE CONFERENCE

of the League for Industrial Democracy

at
NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB, NAPANOCH, N. Y.

June 18-20, 1937

Subject: "TOWARD A FARMER-LABOR PARTY"

Speakers: Norman Thomas, who will have just returned from Europe will describe the European labor parties he saw there. Numerous other well known speakers.

For information write to

Dr. Harry W. Laidler, League for Industrial Democracy
112 East 19th Street, New York City

COMMUNISM VS. FASCISM A Religious War in the Making?

Officially and unofficially, in scores of letters, in editorials and syndicated columns, liberal and radical America has reacted sharply to Alfred M. Bingham's article — War Mongering on the Left (May issue of Common Sense). The second article of the series Communism vs. Fascism appears in the June issue. Along with this second article, more provocative than the first, Common Sense prints comments pro and con by Maury Maverick, Herbert Agar, General Johnson, Harry Elmer Barnes, Jay Franklin, Robert Morss Lovett, Rep. Teigan and the New Masses.

WHERE DO YOU STAND ON THIS ISSUE? ←

Do you believe in American intervention in Spain? Will the next war again "make the world safe for democracy?" Or will it be another imperialist war between satisfied and unsatisfied powers? Will defenders of Soviet Russia be defending democracy or dictatorship? Is fascism closer to capitalist democracy or Russian collectivism? These and many other related questions are answered with new insight in two of the year's most exciting and original articles. Read both of them. And in the same issue: SEVENTY-NINE OLD MEN by Robert S. Allen and Drew Pearson; ROOSEVELT'S SUCCESSOR? An Interview with Governor Murphy by Georges Schreiber; AAA IN REVERSE! by Mordecai Ezekiel; and FRANCE HUNTS A HITLER by R. W. Wiley.

COMMON SENSE, 315 Fourth Avenue, New York

Enclosed find $1. Please enter my trial subscription to Common Sense for 7 months. This is to include both articles by Alfred M. Bingham.

Name

Address

writing with skill and clarity, has created another kind of drama which, within its limits, is no less suitable and satisfying.

THE SCANDALS OF CLOCHEMERLE. By Gabriel Chevallier. Translated from the French by Jocelyn Godefroi. Simon and Schuster. $2.50.

In complete contrast to Mr. Maxwell's simple naturalness, M. Chevallier is artificial, elegant, bawdy in thought but nice in language. A little French town decides that it must have a public memorial; but instead of a useless statue to a problematically great man it erects a urinal which shall be of constant benefit to at least half of the population, and with Gallic forthrightness places the object in the square across from the church. As might be expected the town is shaken to its foundations. A pro-memorial faction springs up to fight with a desperate opposition. M. Chevallier manages to be quite funny about the affair, although here and there he is perhaps over-elaborate in his witticisms. It is all a matter of taste; if you think a urinal in front of a church is amusing, then you will be amused.

LIGHT WOMAN. By Zona Gale. D. Appleton-Century Company. $2.

What happens to a nice small-town family when one of the sons brings home a young woman from the city, with the city's brittle sophistication. Since the family really is nice, and since the young woman is nice, too, underneath her shallow smartness and her slightly phony foreign accent, it all turns out for the best. Miss Gale being Miss Gale, she has introduced into this triviality a garrulous grandma who is slightly dotty but consistently amusing. Otherwise "A Light Woman" is a pretty light novel.

CAROLINE SMITH

DO YOU UNDERSTAND LABOR'S UNREST TODAY?

The answer to the problems which have puzzled you every time you've read of Labor Strife on the Industrial front is in

- The New Leader—America's Leading Labor News-Magazine brings you from every corner of the globe, in a brisk, fighting style, the vital news—news suppressed or warped by the daily press.
- Subscribe Today—assure yourself of a news-magazine with a piercing editorial eye, a complete coverage of the struggles for civil rights and freedom on an international front; news of the world fight on Fascism and the bitter battle of the working men and women attempting to win their just place in society.
- News Stories and articles you'll never forget—direct correspondence from Valencia, and the front-line trenches in Spain's war against fascism—forbidden news out of the underground movement in Germany, Austria and Italy—Social Democracy in the Scandinavian Countries and British Labor's fight for power. . . .

$1.00 Clipped to this Ad. brings you for one year

THE NEW LEADER

America's Labor Newspaper

7 EAST 15TH STREET

NEW YORK CITY

DRAMA

Three Men on a Rubber Check

JUST as most of the critics were packing vacation bags there suddenly erupted at the Cort Theater a breach of the peace in three acts which several of them paused long enough to call "the funniest farce of the season." Judicial review will be likely, I think, to confirm this judgment, even though "Room Service" happens to be the kind of play which even the spectator who has laughed himself sick will find it difficult to describe. For one thing a very great deal depends upon the unfailing inventiveness and verve of George Abbott's direction. For another a great deal more depends upon three of the actors who helped to make "Three Men on a Horse" a masterpiece of the same mad kind. For the sake of my own reputation, I rather wish that I did not have to report that some of the funniest incidents are concerned with the passionate attachment of one of the characters to a stuffed moose head and with his heroic refusal to sacrifice it at a hock shop: "I shot that moose myself and I ate him—right up to the neck—but nobody's going to touch the rest of him." On the morning after, I am also compelled to admit that there are passages in even the modern drama—to say nothing of the classics—probably superior in sheer wit to the dialogue between two of the schemers who haven't eaten for eighteen hours and are growing faint. But inasmuch as I laughed as heartily as the rest of the spectators I must confess that it goes something like this: "I see spots before my eyes." "So do I." "Mine are beginning to look like hamburgers." "If you see one with onions, save it for me."

In accordance with the habit of all good dramatic critics who try to keep themselves prepared to review plays like "Room Service," I have just recently reread the "Poetics" of Aristotle. He says that "manners" should be subservient to "action"; and striving to test the present work in the light of this dogma, I am puzzled to decide whether it meets the test or not, for the two elements seem almost equally important. Fundamentally the story is as old as comic fiction, but the "manners"—which I take to include whatever serves to render the action concrete—are very much of the moment. In other words, the shoestring producer of plays who is busy dodging bill collectors while living on the credit of a bad check which will take five days to bounce back from California is blood brother to ten thousand rogues whose difficulties have convulsed heartless spectators ever since credit was invented. But much that reflects upon the ways of life on the fringe as it is led today has never, I believe, been so well burlesqued. Come to think of it, there are subtleties too. Consider, if you see the play, the moment when the young playwright from Oswego enters the hotel room of the producer just as he and his aides have decided to skip and have donned several suits of clothes each and then buttoned an overcoat over all. The innocent, about to remove his own coat, suddenly realizes that the others are bundled to the ears and hastily gets back into the garment, which was already half off. Somehow, without the speaking of a word, everybody knows he has concluded in a flash that all this has something to do with the etiquette of the strange world he is about to enter, and that he is not going to betray his ignorance by taking off an overcoat in the house. That is a superb piece of direction.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

RECORDS

FOR sheer gorgeousness of sound there is nothing like Delius's music; but one work after another is the same gorgeousness under one new title after another, the only difference in later works being that the gorgeousness is further enriched, elaborated, and subtilized; and with the lack of clarity of definition in the idiom there is a lack of clarity of definition in form. As a result one may enjoy an occasional hearing of a single work—especially a work like "Brigg Fair," which is in the highly vertebrate form of theme and variations; but one may find that the several works in Volume II of the Delius Society, issued here by Columbia, are for those who like Delius in the strangely intense way that others like Mahler, Bruckner, Sibelius. On seven records ($14) the volume offers the early "Over the Hills and Far Away" and the mature "In a Summer Garden," Intermezzo from "Fennimore and Gerda," and "Sea-Drift"—the first three for orchestra, the last for orchestra, chorus, and solo baritone. The performances by the London Philharmonic, London Select Choir, and John Brownlee under the direction of Beecham are excellent; so, for the most part, is the recording.

One usually has to criticize transcriptions of Bach for overstatement, but understatement can be as bad; and of Pochon's arrangement for string quartet of the great Passacaglia and Fugue for organ I can say only that one might as well attempt to produce the effect of an El Greco with water colors. Not only is the medium too weak for the cumulative power and magnificence of the work, but it is incapable of the variety of color that is to be achieved on the organ by registration; and its worst deficiency is the lack of an equivalent for the organ's pedal tones. There is no need, then, of going into detail about the badness of the Stradivarius String Quartet's performance (Columbia: two records, $3).

The Lener Quartet set of Beethoven's Opus 18, No. 4 (Columbia: three records, $5), is in all ways good. On single Columbia discs are beautiful performances by Gieseeking of Chopin's Prelude Opus 28, No. 23 and Waltz Opus 64, No. 1, Schubert's Moment Musical Opus 94, No. 3, and Brahms's Intermezzo Opus 119, No. 3 ($1); brilliant performances by Anatol Kitain of Liszt's "Feux Follets" and "Sonetto del Petrarco No. 123" ($1.50); and good performances by Beecham and the London Philharmonic of the Nocturne and Wedding March from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music ($1.50).

There is a way of avoiding the fuzzy reproduction one gets from new Columbia records while the steel needles are scraping away the loose film left by the withdrawal of the stamper. With the present batch of Columbia records I experimented with B.C.N. needles, and found that they did not affect the loose film very much and gave reproduction that was clouded only slightly and often not at all. On Beecham's Mendelssohn record the orchestral tone sounded less rich and brilliant (a test with a constant-frequency record showed that B.C.N. reproduced frequencies from 6,000 to 5,000 with less intensity than steel); but with string quartet and voice there was no appreciable loss in quality. One difficulty is that B.C.N. points tend to break under the combined pressure of (1) the great intensities of present-day orchestral recordings and (2) the needle-track error of straight-arm pick-ups. This difficulty disappears when curved-arm pick-ups are used.

B. H. HAGGIN

Travel in SELECT SMALL GROUPS

EUROPE

Guests in Europe. For students only. Student hosts and guides abroad. France, England, Holland, Belgium, six days in the Alps, choice of Italy, Central Europe and Scandinavia. Sailing June 30. 8½ weeks.

$659

EUROPE and RUSSIA

Public Housing. Leader: Helen Alfred, Director, National Public Housing Conference. England, Holland, France, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Poland, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark. Sailing June 23. 11 weeks.

$670

American Student Union Tour. Leader: James Wechsler. For students only. Social inquiry in France, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark, England. Sailing July 3. 8 weeks.

$499

RUSSIA

General Survey Tour. Leader: Robert Magidoff, literary worker in Moscow since 1935. Sailing July 3. 8 weeks.

$399

A Travel "Collective." Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. 8 weeks.

$543

Theatre Festival Tour. Leader: Will Geer of New Theatre League. 5 weeks in Russia including Theatre Festival. Sailing July 28. 7½ weeks.

$595

Julien Bryan's Sixth Annual Trip through the highways and byways of the Soviet Union. Sailing July 10. 9 weeks.

$674

†A Public Health Survey. Leader: John A. Kingsbury, co-author "Red Medicine." Program arranged by Commissariat of Public Health. Sailing July 10. 9 weeks.

$797

†Open Road Travel Seminar. Leader: Anna Louise Strong, author "The New Soviet Constitution," etc., just back from 15 years in Russia. Sailing July 4. 9 weeks.

$895

* Third Class Steamship Passage
† Tourist Steamship Passage

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street New York

Cooperating with Intourist

RESORTS

DECORATION DAY WEEK END

May 28 to 31 . . . 3 Days—$16.00

($6.50 day rate . . . slightly higher for deluxe cabins)

CAMP TAMIMENT TAMIMENT—PENNSYLVANIA

New York Office: 7 East 15th St.—ALgonquin 4-3441

Philadelphia: 1240 Widener Bldg.—Rittenhouse 3394

TWIN PINES
on TROUT
LAKE

VACATION NEWS

Your request will bring 1937 booklet describing Twin Pines and its new main house, with de luxe accommodations . . . each room with individual screened porch, semi-private shower and bath. June rate, $25.00.

S. SAIDEL LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

Spain Sends Thanks

Dear Sirs: It is with much pleasure that I quote the text of a cable which I have received from the Ministry of Agriculture:

Please convey to the magazine The Nation, of New York City, the expression of deep gratitude from the government, in the name of the republican people of Spain who are fighting for the liberty of the world, upon the arrival of the important shipment of food-stuffs donated by the subscribers of that publication to the noncombatant population. Their wishes will be carried out, and in due time detailed information as to the distribution of this food will be forwarded.

THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

To the above message I wish to add my heartfelt thanks for your splendid aid to this humanitarian cause.

FERNANDO DE LOS RIOS,
Spanish Ambassador

Washington, May 16

Puerto Rico

Dear Sirs: I noticed in your issue of April 17 a letter from Mr. Santiago Iglesias in which he minimizes the Ponce (Puerto Rico) massacre of March 21 last, saying, "Eighteen people were wounded of whom ten fatally." I have watched how carefully the true figures, and a true account of what happened at Ponce, are being kept from the American public. Twenty citizens were killed in Ponce on Palm Sunday, and nearly 200 were wounded; the Nationalist boys were not armed, certainly not with rifles, and so far there is no evidence that anyone except the police, under the direct order of the Puerto Rico Chief of Police, Colonel Orbeta, fired. Women and children were slaughtered, and tear gas, bombs, machine-guns, rifles, and revolvers—not to mention clubs—were used most savagely against harmless citizens, as is proved by the many photographs taken that morning in Ponce. When at last the truth about conditions in Puerto Rico is written, the American public will blush with shame.

J. GOWEN WASHBURN
San Juan, Puerto Rico, May 4

Dear Sirs: According to the letter from Mr. Iglesias, resident commissioner of Puerto Rico in Washington, in which he protested against the article by Oswald Garrison Villard published in The Nation of April 3, the dastardly massacre of Puerto Ricans in Ponce perpetrated by the colonial police under implicit orders of Governor Winship was the result of leniency shown by the colonial government in handling prior incidents arising from dissatisfaction of the Puerto Rican people, or some faction of that people, with American misrule.

Evidently Mr. Iglesias thinks that the colonial government should have been practicing open-air mass murder long before now, encouraged by the piratical axiom that "dead men tell no tales," and that everyone in the island would be willing to forgo the right of his children to happiness and freedom for the mere pittance that political panhandlers and carpetbaggers of the New Deal may dole out to the islanders.

The readers of The Nation must understand that so long as Puerto Rico remains politically and economically exploited, so long as it is not made a free nation by an act of the United States Congress, we Puerto Ricans can never be good friends of American nationals or even sympathetic to American principles and ideals,

J. M. GARCIA CASANOVA
Flushing, N. Y., May 11

Dear Sirs: Your article in the April 3 issue on Liberty and Death in Puerto Rico has been brought to my attention. I realize that living conditions in Puerto Rico could be improved; however, it cannot be accomplished within a few years. Previous to 1932, if I remember correctly, there was no agitation for independence and no political disorders; the depression to a great extent retarded further progress. Our federal government came to the assistance of the Puerto Rican people during this period through home relief, building of concrete homes, and many projects which will show results in years to come. The Roosevelt Administration has contributed $40,000,000 for this purpose.

Only recently the Puerto Rican legislature commended Governor Winship for his courage in striving to improve both the political and economic conditions of the island. The occasional demonstrations for "independence" by some members of the Nationalist Party, whose voting strength is less than 5 per cent of the total population, are most deplorable, for the agitation does not represent the sentiments of the great majority of the people, who will resist the efforts of a minor group to change their relationship to the United States.

C. T.
Woodhaven, N. Y., May 12

Of Time and Mr. Luce

Dear Sirs: A reprint of page 502 of the May 1 issue of The Nation should go to every subscriber of Time, Life, and Fortune. Good work!

MAYNARD DIXON
San Francisco, Cal., May 6

And Mr. Carney

Dear Sirs: I should like to thank Dwight Macdonald for the first of his three articles about Henry Luce and Time, Inc. He has justified a move I made some months ago when I suspected Mr. Luce's fascist leanings and decided to terminate my subscription to Time.

The Nation's stand against William P. Carney of The New York Times is admirable. What puzzles me is how such a great newspaper can tolerate the biased and untruthful dispatches of Mr. Carney, who, in his articles indicate, seems to be enjoying General Mola's slaughter of the Basques immensely.

JACOB H. JAFFE
Jersey City, N. J., May 7

Credit Due

Dear Sirs: It is stated on the title page of "The Economics of the Iron and Steel Industry" that the work is published by the McGraw-Hill Book Company for the Bureau of Business Research, University of Pittsburgh. It appears to me that Mr. Macdonald's review, in your issue of May 8, should have mentioned the bureau as the organization responsible for the investigation and for publication of the findings.

Your readers will, of course, understand that I do not in any wise detract from the full credit due the authors.

RALPH S. WATKINS, Director
Bureau of Business Research, University of Pittsburgh
Pittsburgh, Pa., May 13

RESORTS

STAR LAKE CAMP

in the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:

116 Nassau St., Room 2124
BEekman 3-6345

Introducing the NEW

VACATIONLAND

150 acres. Rooms with semi-private bath-shower. Free boating on private lake. 2 fast clay tennis courts, handball, baseball, complete social staff. Theatricals. Unexcelled cuisine. Dietary laws.

DECORATION DAY WEEKEND 3 Days $10.50
Daily 4.00

Come up—See for yourself and discover the new

VACATIONLAND SWAN LAKE, N. Y.
Everything the — denotes LIBERTY 1708 M
N. Y. C. Phone LOrraine 7-2978 eves.

BERKSHIRE PINES

In the Lovely Berkshire Hills

A combination parents have been seeking. Hotel facilities and a fully equipped day camp for children under intelligent guidance of 12 trained counselors with progressive outlook.

All land and water sports—Golf nearby.

DECORATION DAY WEEK END RATE
$15.00

Anytime Friday to Monday evening

Special Rates in June

WEST COPAKE, N. Y. TEL, COPAKE 46

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE CAMP

ON SYLVAN LAKE, HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.

A progressive summer place for young and old
Children's Camp: Co-ed—boys and girls—ages 6-14 years. Intermediate Colony: Co-ed—boys and girls—ages 15-18 years.

All camp activities. Educational activities conducted with particular stress on the progressive character of the organization. A non-profit institution. Prices in Children's Camp, for members: $150 per season—$75 first half season—$80 second half—$32 for two weeks.

Intermediate Colony—$32 for two weeks. For non-members—$1.00 per week. Prices for adults: For members—$18-$24. For non-members—$19-$25.

For further information write or call:

175 E. Broadway, N. Y. Phone: ORchard 4-8000-2052

SHUSTIN'S

LOCUST MANOR

unexcelled cuisine—complete social and athletic activities—tennis—handball—two acre swimming pool—dance orchestra—entertainment—golf—etc.

Phone or Write

R.F.D. Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 1198-3012

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One R mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. Golf, tennis, handball on premises; riding nearby. Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364.

MARTIN'S HIGH VIEW VILLA

Rivervale, N. J.

minutes city—60c R. T.—Rent 1-2-3-4-5 Rooms, Furnished, Kitchens, All improvements. Beautiful country—16 acres. Athletics, Swimming, Dancing. Golf nearby. Call Topping 2-4221.

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, Boating, Fishing, Tennis. Only 1 1/4 hrs. from N. Y. C. DECORATION DAY WEEK END RATE $3.50 per day. $18 per week. R.R. Station Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

RESORTS

SPERLINGS LILAC LODGE

in Rockland County

The Most Beautiful Place for your vacation. Dietary laws observed. Tennis, Handball Courts.

Moderate prices for Decoration Day

West Nyack, N. Y. Tel. Nanuet 409

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP—CAPACITY 30. JEWISH AMERICAN MEALS. SPECIAL JUNE RATE $16.00. BUSHKILL, PA.

CHILDREN'S CAMPS

FAIR HAVEN In the Bear Mt. section of the Ramapos

A Progressive Co-ed Camp—ages 3-16

Separate Pre-school Community. Counselor training group for campers 15-16

Stressing creative, non-competitive activities, with individual attention. Arts and crafts, shop, dramatics, dancing, music, study of nature and stars. Archery, fishing, swimming, horses; all athletics. Outdoor and covered playgrounds. Showers in each building. Enrollment limited to 85. Write at once for reservation.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Rosman, directors.

FAIR HAVEN, Garnersville, N. Y.

Phones: Haverstraw 9879 N. Y.: BUckminster 2-7061
PENnsylvania 6-7321

YOUR CHILDREN

Do you want a home for your children on a ranch outside Sante Fe where they will get superb care and training; learn German, French, Spanish, painting, dancing, woodwork, sports—know Indians, cowboys. Write for references, rates. Rancho Arroyo, Sante Fe, N. M.

SCHOOL CAMP

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK

A camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen of where keynote of happiness is in creative activity with a social environment developing responsibility and comradeship.

For reservations and further information write:

JAS. H. DICK

SCHOOL

THE COMMUNITY SCHOOL

2059 Bedford Ave. Brooklyn, N. Y.
BUckminster 2-9700

A Low Tuition, Progressive School, Coeducational, Ages 4-13. Enriched Curriculum, Child Psychologist. Reservations for 1937-38 Now Accepted.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets

Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUR. 2-4221.

MANUSCRIPT ANALYSIS

EXPERT MANUSCRIPT ANALYSIS. Only $1 for each 3000 words. We correct, revise, and help you sell your stories and articles. Ghost writing. Moderate fees. Columbia Literary Bureau, P. O. Box 335, Times Square Sta., N. Y. C.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Discussion Group invites congenial men, women to join in planned summer events: Stadium concerts, hikes, boat rides. Write Box No. 916, c/o The Nation.

French Liberal (Alumnus Eastern College) seeks paying guests. Fine flat in picturesque Breton city. $25 a week—Other terms off-season. Yachting, motoring tuition included. M. Bayssiere Lycee Garcons, Quimper, France.

ORANGES FOR SALE

Sweet, juicy, sun-ripened on trees. Delivered Express prepaid. $4.00 bushel. Grapefruit $3.25. No sprays used. A. H. Burket, Sebring, Florida.

TRAVEL

RUSSIA

SOVIET TRAVEL SEMINAR

60 Days All Inclusive $485

ENGLAND, DENMARK, SWEDEN

32 Days in SOVIET RUSSIA and ARMENIA
Paris Exposition of 1937

Leader: PROF. BERNHARD J. STERN,
Sociologist, Columbia University
Editor: Science and Society

UNITED FRONT GROUP

30 days in Russia . . . visits also to Scandinavia and Paris

55 Days All Inclusive $398

Leader: ALVIN E. COONS, Labor Editor
Modern Third Class on Atlantic

For Details Apply to

Compass Travel Bureau

55 WEST 42nd ST., NEW YORK
LOngacre 5-3070

TOURS CONDUCTED BY INDEPENDENT

To Western Europe, Palestine, Soviet Russia, Paris International Exposition,
and the Salzburg Festival

Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

FREIGHTERS

The ONLY COMPLETE freighter booklet lists several hundred more freighter trips than any other publication. Includes many that do not pay travel agencies commission and which cannot be learned about elsewhere. Costs 25c and will save you many times that amount. Send coin or stamps. HARIAN PUBLICATIONS, Dept. JG, 270 Lafayette St., N. Y. C.

WANTED

Couple driving COAST-MEXICO about July 4 want couple share expenses; driving. 6 week trip. Box 917, c/o The Nation.

HOTELS

MANGER

"One Price"
FINER HOTELS

RATES
Rooms From $3 Double From $4.50

10% discount until September first allowed on transient rooms Washington Hotels if this is presented. Write for Booklet.

WASHINGTON

(34)

Hotel HAMILTON

ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
14th & K N.W. Phone D1st.

HAY-ADAMS

ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
16th & H St. N.W. Phone Met.

Hotel ANNAPOLIS

H St. Bet. 11th and 12th N.W.
Rooms from $2.00; Double $3.50
With Kitchenette If Desired
FREE PARKING AT WASHINGTON HOTELS

BOSTON

Hotel MANGER

The Wonder Hotel of New England
In North Station. Phone CAP. 2600
Radio in Every Room

NEW YORK

Hotel WINDSOR

58th St. & 6th Ave. COL. 5-2100

Spain Needs—

[The Nation lacks space to reprint the many letters received from organizations requesting aid in various forms for the Loyalist cause in Spain. For the benefit of our readers who appreciate the vital necessity of helping in any way they can, we print below a list of the organizations and the special needs to be filled.]

FOOD. In order to make its funds go as far as possible in the purchase of foodstuffs, chiefly flour, sugar, milk, and canned goods, the North American Committee to Aid Spanish Democracy desires to establish contact with manufacturers of food products, millers, food merchants, and cooperative food organizations. Write to Purchasing Office of Committee, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

FOSTER-PARENTS. Two hundred persons are wanted to become the foster-parents of two hundred Spanish children in Loyalist territory. The sum of twenty-five cents a day guaranteed for one year will save one of the thousands of homeless children. The scheme is sponsored by John Langdon Davies on behalf of the National Joint Committee for Spanish Relief. Write to "Foster-Parents," 35 Marsham Street, London, S. W. 1, England.

BOOKS. Books and magazines in all languages are urgently wanted for the hospitals of Loyalist Spain. Send whatever you can spare to the warehouse of the North American Committee, 227 West Seventeenth Street, New York.

MONEY. In order that more relief workers with food, clothing, and medical supplies for refugee children on both sides may be sent by the American Friends' Service Committee in cooperation with the Federal Council of Churches and the Fellowship of Reconciliation. Write to Spanish Child Feeding Mission, 20 South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia.

LETTERS. Modern Age Books, Inc., will publish an anthology of letters from men and women of all nationalities who have gone to Spain to aid the Loyalist cause. Those who have received letters of this type or know of possible sources of such material are urgently requested to communicate at once with Marcel Acier, 152 Thompson Street, New York.

TRANSLATORS. Volunteers sympathetic to the Loyalist cause to translate into English verse the balladry of the civil war. Write to Rolfe Humphries, League of American Writers, 125 East Twenty-fourth Street, New York.

MEDICAL SUPPLIES. Money is urgently needed to purchase medical supplies for Loyalist hospitals. Medical Bureau of American Friends of Spanish Democracy, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York.

CIGARETTES, CHOCOLATE, books, magazines, razor blades, and medical supplies are wanted for shipment to the American soldiers fighting in Spain. Friends of the Lincoln Battalion, 125 West Forty-fifth Street, New York.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

SUMMER RENTALS

Furnished 11 room house, edge of small village. Electricity, bath, fireplace, hardwood floors, plenty of good water. Large shaded lawn, porches, garage. View of sunset and mountains from porch, cool breezes due to elevation, 1600 ft. Good roads. Season $200. A. L. Lawsing, Randolph Center, Vt.

WESTPORT, CONN. Charming old house and bungalow in Stonybrook Colony. Tennis, swimming, children's camp. Reasonable rentals—Watkins 9-3045.

Bungalow, 3 rooms, large sleeping porch, modern improvements, garage, swimming, 3½ miles North of Peekskill. Our boys aged 10 and 6. EDgecomb 4-5520 (during day), KIngbridge 6-9489 (evenings).

In Watchung Mountains, unusual furnished 6 room house, 4 bedrooms, 2 baths, woody. Long season, $400. WASHINGTON Heights 7-3150.

Westport, Conn. Stonybrook Colony, attractive bungalow, all conveniences, tennis, swimming, handball, schoolhouse for children. Weekends at Westport. Berman, TOP. 2-5017.

SUMMER RENTALS

WATCHUNG MOUNTAINS. Bungalows—Conveniences. Excellent Commutation, Tennis, Solariums, Bathing nearby. $175 up. Arons, Watchung, N. J. PLainfield 6-3428W.

HOUSE ON ESTATE. 2½ miles from Tannersville, N. Y. 9 rooms, modern conveniences, beautiful country, brook, riding academy nearby, 115 miles from city. $350 season. M. I. Halperin, 41 Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn; STerling 3-2240.

FOR RENT—FURNISHED

Studio or apartment; unusually artistic surroundings; Steinway; Radio; library; spacious; sunny; centrally located; reasonable; references exchanged. SUs. 7-9880.

Studio, large, cool, kitchenette, bath. Steinway grand and Radio-Victrola. For summer months. Padawer, 25 West 71 St. N. Y. C.

SUBLET

Three room furnished apartment for Summer. Choice Brooklyn section, 20 minutes to city. References. Box 913, c/o The Nation.

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT S. ALLEN is coauthor with Drew Pearson of "Nine Old Men" and of the syndicated newspaper column Washington Merry-Go-Round.

ROBERT DELL, the Manchester Guardian's correspondent in Geneva, has had a long and distinguished career as a journalist. His articles on critical developments in Europe have appeared several times in The Nation during the last year.

JAMES RORTY, who wrote a series of articles on medical politics and economics for The Nation last summer, is looking for a sufficiently courageous publisher to issue an extended treatment of the subject in book form.

MURIEL RUKEYSER is the author of "Theory of Flight," a first book of verse which placed her in the front rank of the younger American poets.

RAYMOND GRAM SWING, for many years a foreign correspondent in England and on the Continent, was later an editor of The Nation. He is now a radio commentator on foreign affairs over WOR.

KENNETH BURKE, author of "Permanence and Change" and other books, is a lecturer on literary criticism at the New School for Social Research during the current term.

RAYMOND WEAVER is associate professor of English at Columbia University, where he has been conducting special studies in classical antiquity and the Italian Renaissance.

FOR SALE

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy
A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value
C. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515-M

"A Home in the Country." Colonial, 9 rooms, 2 baths, 10 acres, near Suffern, N. Y. Reasonable. Box No. 912, c/o The Nation.

SITUATIONS WANTED

Young Woman, Traveled and College Trained, wishes position as private or social secretary with person traveling Europe or Orient. Box No. 914, c/o The Nation.

Young Lady, accomplished dancer, intellectual, artistic, capable teacher, seeks summer engagement. Modern, folk dances; limbering exercises. Camp or private family. Will perform week-ends. Job Urgent. Owns tent. Box No. 915, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

A lady, attractive, cultured, cooperative, with some practical nursing experience, as companion to old lady and general helper in small family (adults only). Salary $100 month. Mrs. Albert O. Yaeger, 31 Madison Avenue, Springfield, Mass.

BURLINGAME

PUBLIC LIBRARY

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 5, 1937

NUMBER 23

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

633

EDITORIALS:

THE NEW CRISIS IN SPAIN

635

RAISING LABOR STANDARDS

635

WHAT ARE AMERICAN NAZIS DOING?

by Ludwig Lore

636

CONGRESS LOOKS TOWARD 1938

by Robert W. Horton

638

HITLER'S SPIES IN SPAIN by H. C. Engelbrecht

639

THE NEW GERMAN AMBASSADOR

by E. B. Ashton

642

LATIN AMERICA: BOYCOTT FASCISM!

by G. Arbaiza

643

CONSUMERS ON THE MARCH

by Colston E. Warne

645

DEFENDING JUSTICE IN PUERTO RICO

by Arthur Garfield Hays

647

NO SWASTIKAS AT THE WORLD'S FAIR!

by Oswald Garrison Villard

648

NEW LIBERTY LEAGUERS

by Heywood Broun

649

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

FAILURE STORY by Maxwell Geismar

650

THE FUTURE OF SOCIAL SECURITY

by Mary Van Kleeck

650

THE NOVEL, NO by Harry Levin

651

THE DREYFUS AFFAIR by Clara Gruening Stillman

651

TAX REFORM by Maxwell S. Stewart

653

THE SECOND EMPIRE by Catherine Radziwill

655

WAR POEM by Ben Belitt

656

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Gruening,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

REPUBLIC STEEL HAS DRAWN FIRST BLOOD in the fight of the independents to resist even to the death (of union pickets) the signing of a contract with the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee. Republic and its fellow-independents are certainly violating the spirit if not the letter of the Wagner Act; and they show every sign of having banded together in a conspiracy to defeat unionization and collective bargaining. In the light of its real attitude and its profits Republic's sanctimonious answer to the question "Why not sign with the C. I. O.?" is even more objectionable than the usual employer's plaint. "Of course," runs the litany, "it's the easiest thing to do, but that doesn't make it the right thing. . . . We can't let 400,000 people down just because it's the easiest thing to do." The self-righteousness of Republic has already led to the death of five persons. The role of the city police in the battle of Chicago is being investigated. It needs to be. According to one of the wounded, "I saw a woman fall as she was being clubbed by the policemen. She was bleeding and looked like she was dying. I ran over to pick her up when the police hit me over the head." Whose police are they?

★

THE STORY OF THE KILLINGS AT PONCE IN Puerto Rico on Palm Sunday is told in sharp outline on another page of this issue by Arthur Garfield Hays, who represented the American Civil Liberties Union as chairman of an impartial investigation of the tragedy. The findings of the committee were unqualifiedly against the government, and the responsibility for the slaughter of twenty people and the wounding of nearly two hundred more was laid squarely upon Governor Winship. The report also asserts that civil liberties are dead in Puerto Rico, and calls upon the Governor to see to it that the rights of the people as guaranteed in the Organic Act of the island are restored and protected. These are shocking charges, the more so since the government of Puerto Rico is directly under the control of Ernest Gruening, a sincere progressive and anti-imperialist, who as chief of the Division of Territories and Insular Possessions has been carrying out vast projects of relief and long-range reconstruction. That the indictment brought by Mr. Hays is taken seriously is indicated by the hurried trip to Washington of Dr. Gruening and Governor Winship.

The Governor is bringing with him a detailed reply to the committee's report, which may be in the hands of the public by the time this comment is read.

★

BALDWIN IS GONE. THE DOOR OF THE HOUSE of Lords has closed upon a figure and a career whose contours—and whose démarches—resembled those of a caterpillar tank. Self-contained, blundering, yet heavily confident, Baldwin has carried his last objective. He has even earned the term "greatest" from no less an appraiser of public men than the New York Times. If we withhold the adjective it is because we never took Baldwin's view of himself and also because we reserve the term for men whose blunders as well as their successes are more bound up with boldness, imagination, and human understanding. Standing pat has not yet become the criterion of genius, except for those to the right of center. Baldwin's only talent was for standing pat; and it was his good luck that the times were fitted to his talent. An exhausted and uncertain England let him rule in spite of his blunders, his stubbornness, his sturdily reactionary policies in disarmament, in India, in Ethiopia, in Spain, in the Simpson affair. It also listened to his unctuous speeches. But he was beginning to outrun his era even as he resigned. One cannot resist the impression that toward the end time stood still until Baldwin should step down; or that the loud tick of history will soon drown out his "greatness." P.S.: Ramsay MacDonald also resigned.

★

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN IS CAST IN A SHARPER mold. His hardness is not sheathed in the smug hypocrisy of Baldwin. Moreover, Mr. Chamberlain comes to office at a time when issues are beginning to sharpen all along the line. Labor is more restive than it has been since 1926. The recent "neutral" period in British politics has been based on recovery and on a fear of war that haunts all classes and unites them in a truce for rearmament. Baldwin was perfectly equipped to prolong and fully exploit that neutral atmosphere. But it is becoming clearer every day who will benefit most from both recovery and rearmament. Mr. Chamberlain's first opposition is coming from the right—big business does not like his excess-profits tax—but he is likely soon to meet more fundamental opposition from the left because of his real, and apparent, conservatism. His accession definitely stamps the National Government as a Conservative one—despite the fact that the old balance is maintained in the Cabinet—and it is expected that the Conservatives will confirm it by forcing a "coronation" election.

★

WE COMMEND THIS ISSUE OF THE NATION to the attention of every member of Congress. It provides a rather complete guide to the methods of Nazi propaganda in foreign countries. Though objectives may differ, the technique is the same: witness the similarity between the network in Spain, as described by Mr.

Engelbrecht, and the nature of Nazi activity in this country outlined by Mr. Lore. Nazi influence is already established here—and it will grow like a weed once the economic conditions are ripe. It must be fought steadily and persistently. A genuine Congressional investigation of fascist activities is in order—preferably without the participation of Mr. Dickstein, who obviously likes red-hunting better.

★

THE FULL SIGNIFICANCE OF THE NAZI crusade against the church, both Protestant and Catholic, is gradually being made clear. The accusation of immoral practices against priests turns out to be merely a despicable and probably effective weapon for discrediting the church in the interests of the totalitarian state—which can brook no rivals for the control of youth. Herr Goebbels has expressly declared that the Hitler regime is out to destroy the faith of parishioners in their priests. We hold no brief for the religious superstition and ignorance with which such priest-ridden countries as Italy and Spain have been held in thrall; but the fascist fanaticism which Hitler would substitute bodes no better for the human soul. Meanwhile we cannot but reflect upon the aid and comfort which the Vatican and all its satellites, down to Michael Williams, have given to the destroying angel of fascism in Spain.

★

THE RECENT WARNING TO THE JEWS OF Italy that they must demonstrate their undivided loyalty to fascism has little relation to anti-Semitism in the common or Hitler sense. Compared with the Germans, the Italians have little need, either psychological or economic, for a scapegoat. Nor, if they had, would the Italian Jews adequately serve the purpose, since they number less than 50,000, or about one-eighth of 1 per cent of the Italian population. The recent editorial in the Popolo d'Italia is a warning that Italy, as a totalitarian state, will tolerate from its citizens no sentiment conflicting with their duty as Italians and as Fascists. The statement was directed chiefly against Zionists and indicates no new policy. In September, 1936, at the time of the World Jewish Congress in Geneva, to which the Italian Jews sent four delegates, the Regime Fascista published a similar indictment of Jews who took part in Zionist campaigns or allied themselves with the "Jewish International." As its invasion of Spain shows, Italy's foreign policy has become increasingly focused upon the Mediterranean, where its chief rival is England. For at least two years Italian agents have been stirring up the Arabs against the British. Mussolini's opposition to Zionism is only the reverse of this same policy.

★

PRESIDENT CONANT OF HARVARD DESERVES great credit for acceding to the demand of 131 junior teachers for an inquiry into the issues raised by the dismissal of Alan R. Sweezy and J. Raymond Walsh. The inquiry will be made by the group of nine professors chosen by the protesting group.

The New Crisis in Spain

IT IS impossible to exaggerate the danger which has arisen as a result of the shelling of Almeria. The immediate incident may, as Germany claims, be "settled" with the brutal reprisal; but the attack is a clear warning that the two fascist powers will not brook a Loyalist victory in Spain if it is within their power to prevent it. While the circumstances surrounding the bombing of the Deutschland are not wholly clear, there is every indication that it was deliberately provoked by Germany to furnish an excuse to destroy the increasingly effective non-intervention mechanism. According to the German government's own admission, the Deutschland was not on patrol duty off the Spanish coast where it had been assigned but was lying near the breakwater in a rebel port on the island of Iviza. It is significant that the patrol of that island is in the hands of the French, and that in any case the international patrol is not supposed to be active in Spanish waters. Moreover, according to the official report of the Spanish government, issued some hours before the German pronouncement, the Deutschland opened fire on the Spanish planes with its anti-aircraft guns. This the Germans deny. But they also denied the bombing of Guernica. And the wholly unexplained presence of the ship in a rebel port arouses further suspicion.

In incidents of this type it really makes little difference who fires the first shot as far as the consequences are concerned. If Germany intended to defy the non-intervention pact, it would have little difficulty in finding a pretext for its action. If it had decided against active intervention, it would not allow such an incident to create a war situation any more than Britain has done when its ships have been attacked by the rebels. The best way to judge intent is by Germany's reaction to the present crisis. We must conclude that the recent discussions between Mussolini and Göring were more fruitful than we had supposed.

The failure of the League Council to take definite action in response to the Spanish government's appeal against Italian aggression has encouraged the fascists to their new attacks. Never before in the League's history has a member government submitted more complete proof of aggression by a fellow-member than is to be found in the Spanish White Book. Evidence was submitted showing that complete units of the Italian army are maintained in Spain, that these units act as veritable armies of occupation, and that high Italian officials have actively assisted these invading armies. But whereas six years ago the League at least went through the motions of condemning Japan and two years ago it declared sanctions against Italy, it has shown paralysis in the Spanish crisis.

The attack on Almeria spells the end of non-intervention as a practicable solution of the Spanish crisis. If a gradual drift toward a European war is to be checked, the fact of German and Italian intervention will have to be accepted and measures taken to stop it. Machinery already exists in the League for such action. If it is not used, all that has been achieved in the past few months toward isolating the Spanish conflict will be lost.

Raising Labor Standards

OPPONENTS of the new Administration bill to establish minimum wages and maximum hours are seeking to discredit the proposal by referring to it as the "new NRA." The inference is unfair. The NRA was essentially a measure for industrial self-control. Each industry was given wide latitude in prescribing the "unfair business practices" which were to be outlawed. The labor provisions varied widely from industry to industry, depending on the degree of pressure which organized labor was able to bring to bear on the code-making authorities. Viewing it in retrospect, most observers agree that the NRA was a failure. For months before it was outlawed by the Supreme Court it showed unmistakable signs of decay. But its final collapse had little to do with its labor provisions. As recovery developed, industry lost interest in the regimentation it had eagerly embraced in 1933, with the result that the vast superstructure of regulation became unenforceable.

None of these defects are to be found in the new wages-and-hours bill. It does not touch the field of business practices; it does not attempt to cover the whole range of economic activity but only such industries as are producing goods for interstate commerce. While the enforcement of any law of nation-wide application presents difficulties, they should not prove unusually serious. The ease of enforcement depends, in the last analysis, on the strength and alertness of organized labor.

Nevertheless, the New York Herald Tribune, among other tory newspapers, has repeatedly declared the bill unsound. The objections may be summarized under five heads: (1) that the bill will lower living standards through an unwise reduction in hours; (2) that it places too much power in the hands of five men; (3) that it will drive many weaker industries out of business; (4) that it would necessitate the fixing and lowering of the wages of skilled labor; and (5) that it does not sufficiently take into account sectional and industrial differences.

The first objection would be well taken if the bill were combined with the thirty-hour-week proposal of the original Black-Connery bill. But it is difficult to see how anyone can wish to impose a higher maximum—except for seasonal work for which allowance is made—than the forty-hour limit which the bill will probably incorporate. Since few large industries work more than forty hours today, there can be no question of lowering productivity. Nor are we impressed by the fascist threat which is said to lurk in the proposed five-man committee. The conservative critics would be the last to deny that flexibility is desirable in both the hour-and-wage regulations. But how can such flexibility be achieved without putting ultimate responsibility on one man or group of men? In practice the power that would be wielded by this commission would not even approach the power over the national economy exercised by the Federal Reserve Board.

We shall not deny that certain marginal industries, such as the textile industry, will be adversely affected by a law prescribing a $16-a-week minimum wage. A number of establishments still exist only through a merciless exploitation of their employees. Even though the law is a blanket one, applying to all domestic competition, enterprises depending on low wages to offset the natural advantages of their more favored competitors will suffer more than others. It is conceivable that some of these may be put out of business by minimum-wage legislation and that their employees will lose their jobs. Every advance in the history of labor legislation has been at the expense of employees in marginal industries. But for every man who loses a job through an improvement of labor standards, at least one or two other jobs are created by the increase in buying power.

It is of course true that effective minimum wages will tend to reduce the share of the national income obtained by more favored groups, including skilled workers. While the enhanced buying power of the lowest brackets would result in some increase in production, there would also be an actual transference of income. But this is scarcely an argument against the proposal, since hundreds of thousands of the most needy would undoubtedly benefit.

None of the large New York papers have come out openly against minimum-wage legislation or the prohibition of child labor. But they suggest that the individual states are in a better position than the federal government to take into account sectional differences. It seems incredible that any person in 1937 can still take this position. State legislation in the field of social welfare has not only been inconsistent, backward, and badly drafted, but it has been hopelessly tardy. The states which need the legislation most are the last ones likely to act. No state can be expected to adopt a minimum wage which injures its industries in competition with similar industries in other states. All the logic lies on the side of federal action. Every American, regardless of where he works, has the right to a living wage, to decent hours of labor, and the opportunity to give his children the education necessary to fit them for life.

What Are American Nazis Doing?

BY LUDWIG LORE

THE American branch of the German National Socialist Party is engaged in so many activities that their enumeration alone would fill pages of this magazine. It must be understood from the outset that there is no official branch of the German fascist party. The German-American Bund, successor to the first official Nazi organization in America, which was dissolved on instructions from Berlin some two and a half years ago, is the political expression of Nazism in the United States. It has more than one hundred branches and tens of thousands of members in this country. The Deutscher Weckruf und Beobachter, its official organ, published in New York, is edited with that impertinent "frankness" and disregard for the truth so characteristic of similar publications in the Fatherland.

The main task of Nazi propaganda in this country is gradually so to permeate German- and English-speaking non-fascist groups with the Nazi ideology that they will affiliate in corpore with the Bund and become active in the interest of its manifold propaganda objectives. It is significant that almost every issue of the Nazi weekly announces several new affiliates from among German-American societies, and hardly a festival, affair, concert, or dance is held by these formerly non-political organizations without speeches by professional Nazi propagandists.

That a tremendous amount of this work is being carried on by or with the direct assistance of the Ministry for Propaganda and Enlightenment in Berlin is easily confirmed. During the last nine months the following persons were sent to America by Minister Joseph Goebbels to function along their respective lines of Nazi activity: Professor Julius Richter of the University of Berlin, attached to the propaganda division of the Nazi Faith Movement, teaching at the Biblical Seminary in New York; Dr. Norbert Zimmer from Hanover, "scientific lecturer"; Captain Henry Hamilton Beamish, British fascist leader, with his German aid Dr. Kräger (provided for him by Berlin); Hanns Münz, actor and lecturer; Ida M. Eversden, St. Louis, Missouri; Colin Ross, lecturer, traveler, and writer; Ulrich Rheinberg; the Reverend Mr. Becker, Giessem; Rudolf Malek (specially engaged in anti-Soviet activities among German societies); Otto Doelz; Kurt Klinge, assistant organizer; Josef Danner, theatrical director, Pittsburgh; Dr. Otto Vollbehr; Thea Rasche, aviatrix; Ernst Reichard, president of the German advertising federation; Emerson Bainbridge, English propagandist now on the Nazi pay roll; and others—for this list does not claim to be complete.

The German Propaganda Ministry is helpful in other directions as well. Henry Albert Phillips's "Germany Today and Tomorrow" was ordered and paid for by the kindly Goebbels; Dr. Charles C. Tansil of Washington University aids the German embassy by making pro-Nazi speeches and writing articles. The Propaganda Ministry assisted in the publication of the Nazi propaganda articles written by Miss Margaret Frazier of Indianapolis, a graduate of Indiana University and of Kensington High School, London. A chain of German film theaters in the United States, subsidized by Berlin, shows Nazi films exclusively. Nazi films picturing the Third Reich in its various activities are released to German societies for a purely nominal fee. Hanns Münz, who is a member both of the American Nazi group and of the German National Socialist Party, directs the German theater "Deutsche Schauspielbühne," which is to conduct German cultural (Nazi) propaganda in various parts of the United States. Mr. Josef Danner in Pittsburgh is engaged in similar work. The Reich propaganda machine has organized Nazi literature centers in nineteen American cities.

It goes without saying that such "friendly assistance" is given to many other German and American writers of more or less established reputation, many of whom hide their identity behind one or more pseudonyms. One of the most versatile and gifted of these is George Sylvester Viereck, whose work is to be found in all sorts of weekly and monthly American publications under the names of George F(our) Corner, Donald Furtman Wickett, Dr. Claudius Murchison, and William R. Sticher. The two last-named gentlemen are not fictitious, but the articles which have appeared under their names during the last two years were written by the genial poet.

Dr. Goebbels should also get credit for the establishment of the Committee for German-American History. Its personnel includes Fritz Kuhn, the American leader of the Nazi movement, Carl Günther Orgell, Rudolf Markmann, Richard Mettin, Karl T. Marx, and George Froböse—the highest officials of the Nazi organization here. This committee is to publish a series of books proving to the satisfaction of their authors that it is because of the Aryan immigrants from Germany that America has not fully succumbed to the poisonous influence of Jewry.

More than twenty schools for German children have been founded. Readers imported from the Reich and written by Nazi school authorities implant anti-Semitic hatred in youthful German-American souls. At a meeting of the Nazi officials of the Eastern states held on February 3, Fritz Kuhn announced the formation of a political school for Nazi officials which began to function on February 15. There are a good many other organizations and movements in America which owe their existence to the enlightening influence and the munificence of the Third Reich. There are large Nazi camps in New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Texas, California, and other states, and there has been a revival of a number of slowly dying German-language newspapers in smaller American cities which simultaneously began preaching the German brand of fascism.

I have hardly scratched the surface of Nazi activities here. The German-American Board of Trade was reorganized on April 22 and is now under German government control. H. A. Johnson, the New York representative of the Leipzig Fair, who in 1934 was implicated in the the vice-presidents are Johannes Scroëder (Hamburg-American Line and North German Lloyd), who was shown before the Congressional Committee Investigating Un-American Activities in 1934 to have been involved in transporting and supporting German Nazi agents in this country; A. T. Gausebeck (Robert C. Mayer and Company, Inc.), who was exposed as having financed Nazi agents in this country and handled financial transactions which Berlin wants to keep under cover; H. H. Hollesen (New York Potash Export Company, Inc.), New York agent of Stinnes, whose office is one of the Nazi commercial and military intelligence centers; P. Paul Huber (vice-president in charge of the Foreign Department of the Guaranty Trust Company), known Nazi sympathizer; A. Scheurer (formerly with the Hamburg-American Line), for the last four years "personal observer" in America for Hitler; Ernst Schmitz (German Railroad Tourist Office) charged before the 1934 Congressional committee with taking Nazi pay. The manager of the German-American Board of Trade is Dr. Albert Degener, who has repeatedly admitted that he is working in the United States for the Nazi Party.

The center for German technical intelligence has been reorganized. The old "Technischer Verein" is the formal screen. The leader of the New York Gestapo (German Secret State Police), Ernst Krause Wichmann, replaced Rudolph Wildermann, who was considered inefficient, with the Nazi-trained Diplom Ingenieur Rudolph Pickenbrock. Mr. Pickenbrock is responsible for conveying technical information to Dr. Matschoss of the German Engineers Club in Berlin. F. Willy von Meister of the New York office of the Deutsche Zeppelin Rhe-derei is still in charge of all technical intelligence and was recently reconfirmed in the office. Besides, he is official liaison man for the Nazi Party with the most important American industrial and commercial institutions. Several private American travel bureaus serve Nazi purposes in a similar capacity—furnishing intelligence of the most diverse kind.

The American Nazi movement has branched out widely in the organization of youth groups for girls and boys, in the establishment of women's circles, and in the inauguration of storm troop units, which are known as Ordnungs Dienst, in many parts of the United States. Its members attend weekly training practices, wear a uniform, and must be at all times at the disposal of the superior officers of the Nazi organization.

Finally a word or two must be said about the "international" aspect of Nazi activities. Leader Kuhn announced in his German weekly on April 22 that all Nazi organizations in America, Canada, and South America will cooperate in the future. "... Close working agreements of all German racial groups in North, South and Central America, similar to the German organizations in European countries which jointly take care of German interests, have been concluded. The political tasks which await us in the New World are so important and gigantic that they make it worth while to devote our best efforts to them. . . ." More recently fascist meetings and conferences held among German, Italian, White Russian, Polish, Finnish, Hungarian, and native-born American groups have displayed a growing tendency toward organizational unity, and the signs point to a general fascist merger sooner or later.

Fascism in the United States is becoming stronger. Caveant Consules!

Congress Looks Toward 1938

BY ROBERT W. HORTON

Washington, May 27

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT'S wage-and-hour bill is the political fire escape for Congressional opponents of the Supreme Court plan. More than a few of the boys on both sides of the Capitol are quietly preparing to take this way out. And that means, of course, that the President will have slight difficulty harvesting the necessary votes to put it across. It won't require any such squeeze play as was tried on the court plan.

This new measure, now on the firing line of hearings, was thrust into the legislative mill much more subtly than was the court plan. The latter was shoved at the Congress with a gesture that none could mistake. Take it or else—. The wage-and-hour measure, while originating in practically the same place, followed the conventional procedure of being introduced by a member of the House and a member of the Senate. This makes possible the pretense that the bill is entirely the work of Congress. And in this case even the most important details were omitted—blank spaces were left in the original drafts—such as the maximum number of hours in the working week and the minimum wage. The Administration has insisted in conferences on the bill that the hours be thirty-five and the hourly wage forty cents. But there is a fairly strong sentiment for thirty hours.

Even that fundamental dispute will not unduly delay passage of the bill. There is an election next year, and of course all the House and one-third of the Senate have eyes for that alone. Thus, this new Administration reform comes at exactly the right time for the campaigners, particularly the campaigners against the Supreme Court plan. They have been hearing from home ever since the President boxed the high court's ears, and what many of them have heard and are still hearing has convinced them that they are dangerously far out on a limb. Until the wage-and-hour bill came along, great was the consternation among those who saw an election just ahead.

Now, however, their worries are dissolving in the light of a fine idea. They figure this way. The new measure is the major project of this session. Indeed, it is probably one of the most important bills of the Administration's entire career. Therefore it can be the perfect band-wagon on which to ride into the elections of 1938. A vote for the bill is a vote for Roosevelt. A vote for Roosevelt is a vote for themselves back home. On the stump they will so blow up their vote for the wage-and-hour bill that those who cast the ballots will forget about the candidate's opposition to the court plan. But it may not work out just that way. James A. Farley has his doomsday book well filled with the names of those who have squawked out of turn about the court plan. If he does what he has indicated that he plans to do, the unhappy candidates will find themselves shorn of the Administration's support. In fact, some of them are quite likely, certain Senators in particular, to find the electorate reminded of their desertion of the "cause," and the reminder will be inspired by James A. Farley.

As for the bill itself, in one of its most doubtful aspects it takes advantage of certain words in the Hughes opinion in the Jones and Laughlin Wagner Act case whereby the government would be empowered to eliminate from the market goods produced by intrastate industry. The authors of the bill assume from Hughes's language that if goods (not services) so produced compete with identical goods moving in interstate commerce, then the former acquire the same status before the law as the latter. That the court would so interpret the situation is not certain. The drafters of the wage-and-hour bill are playing a long shot. That being the case, it becomes clearer why the President continues to insist upon his court plan. That he will compromise is generally admitted but not to the extent of leaving the court as it is at present. Any way you look at it, the court plan and the wage-and-hour bill cannot be divorced.

Henry Morgenthau, Jr., has a tiger by the tail. Its name is gold. And there are more rumors floating between Wall Street and Washington as to what the Treasury will do with the beast than there are keyholes in a hotel. The tickers hint almost daily of a forthcoming "new gold policy," but the new policy fails to appear. Frankly, no one, not even the best heads in the Treasury, knows the answer. Purchases of gold—we take all comers regardless—since the last week in December have passed the $700,000,000 mark and are still rising. The gold is of no actual benefit to anyone save the seller. The Treasury, following a kind of "dust-to-dust" theory, carts the metal out to Fort Knox, Kentucky, and tucks it away in the world's biggest safe-deposit box. There, at least, it is prevented from becoming the basis of an enormous credit inflation, but this gold buying is one of this government's most luxurious and expensive undertakings. It is costing, at the present price, about $1,500,000,000 per year. True, we have the gold, but we don't use it, and we buy it at $35 an ounce—a price which many believe cannot be maintained indefinitely. When it is finally reduced, the Treasury will take an enormous loss. Reducing the price would also raise merry hell with commodity prices. And the farm representatives in Congress are as bitterly opposed to that as they are heartily in favor of reelection. There is a rather insistent demand that the President call an international monetary conference. In fact, Representative Martin Dies of Texas has a resolution in the House requesting the President to do so. But the position of the Congressional money experts is that a monetary conference would be as futile as disarmament conferences have been unless the country puts its money system in order before sitting down at the conference table. The Treasury is none too comfortable about the whole problem. Neither is Congress, but even opponents of the gold-buying program, including Senator Vandenberg of Michigan, confess publicly that they haven't the slightest idea what to suggest as a substitute.

Secretary Morgenthau is credited by those who know his work intimately with doing an excellent job in the Treasury against terrible odds. He runs the department with as little politics as possible and insists upon that principle with considerable success. Unstinted praise is given to him by associates who are not trying to butter their bread. These people say that Morgenthau is the only man in the Cabinet who doesn't pull his punches when talking government finance to the President. He stalks into the White House, brushes past the ultra-violet Marvin McIntyre, and on into the President's office. "Frank, you just can't do that. We can't afford it." That is a paraphrase of his attitude, and his associates say that Morgenthau has done more than any other Cabinet member or high official to keep the Administration's financial feet close to the ground. Morgenthau is genuinely interested in setting up a system of taxation that will really work, and he has brought to Washington as his expert as able a tax man as could be found in the country—Roswell Magill of Columbia University. The Secretary has put the whole job of tax reform on Magill's shoulders and told him to go ahead. Magill, as Under Secretary of the Treasury, will have a completely overhauled tax system to present to Congress this fall, and it can be said that it will not include the present system of hidden and nuisance taxes. He is strongly averse to the increasingly long list of excise taxes which are renewed from year to year simply because Congress is unwilling to face taxation realistically and put the burden where it belongs. Magill takes the position that income, gift, and inheritance taxes, along with those on liquor and tobacco, should be the backbone and practically the sole support of the federal government. They should be so set up that when revenues increase beyond demands they can be lowered and vice versa. In other words, he would have a basic tax system which does not originate in a Congressional convulsion every two or three years, with every revision becoming more and more complicated so that in the end you reach the point of diminishing returns because even the Bureau of Internal Revenue can't unwind the complications and administer the law efficiently. The present American tax-law tangle exceeds even that which inspired the story about the English set-up. They tell the story in London about the fellow who received his tax blanks, and having looked them over thoroughly and being unable to decide just what it was he was supposed to do, returned the tax forms to the government with the words: "Having looked over your application blank, I don't think I want to join." If Magill has his way we can expect a tax system that will not turn up $600,000,000 short on revenue estimates, as the present one has just done.

Hitler's Spies in Spain

BY H. C. ENGELBRECHT

THREE days after the outbreak of the fascist rebellion in Spain last summer, the government militia began a search of Nazi headquarters in Barcelona. They discovered tens of thousands of documents left behind in the wild flight of Nazi agents. A few were published by the Manchester Guardian and other papers, but these samples merely hinted at the rich mine which remained to be worked. The complete story has been told by Franz Spielhagen in "Spione und Verschwörer in Spanien" (Paris, Editions de Carrefour).*

Here for the first time we are taken behind the scenes of Nazi intrigue in other countries, and the documentation is so complete that doubt of that intrigue is no longer possible. The evidence is contained in word-for-word quotations and in numerous photostats. Here is a primer of Nazi methods which the citizens and officials of democratic countries should study well. Spain was the locale of this particular endeavor, but the same technique is pursued throughout the world, and one has only to read with an American locale in mind to realize the significance of the revelations. The documents disclose the names of the Nazi organizations which carry on subversive work, how their efforts are financed and what sums are expended, how the secret agents operate, what methods are employed in smuggling in propaganda material, and what is the function of German business firms, shipping companies, newspapermen, travel bureaus, and the diplomatic corps and consuls in these underground activities.

The Nazis began to work in Spain in 1930. Since Hitler had not then come to power, state funds were not available for propaganda. The beginning was therefore modest: an agent was placed in Portugal whose field of operation was the entire Iberian Peninsula. But the year 1933 marked a turning-point; the Nazis were victorious in Germany and Lerroux and Gil Robles in Spain. To solidify friendly relations with Hitler, Gil Robles attended the Nürnberg congress of the Nazi Party in 1933. From this time on the Nazis made great progress in Spain. Before long they had organized fifty local units on the Spanish mainland, in Spanish Morocco, the

*"Spione und Verschwörer in Spanien" by Franz Spielhagen may be purchased at the Moderne Deutsche Buchhandlung, 250 East Eighty-fourth Street, New York.

Balearics, and the Canaries. These Nazi cells became the nuclei of other German groups recruited from churches, schools, labor, and women. The Nazis also maintained close contact with like-minded Spanish circles. The leaders of the Nazi groups were careful not to appear as foreign propagandists. All of them held positions in German business firms, being either agents of established companies or at the head of businesses of their own which they had founded to serve as a front for their real activities. They stored their propaganda material in their office filing cabinets.

Early in 1936, when it appeared probable that the Popular Front would be returned to power, the Nazis went underground. Orders went out that all correspondence must be written on plain paper bearing no letterhead and that all Nazi affairs must be discussed in terms of business transactions. It is not difficult to understand what would be meant by the following: "The very popular meetings of our customers must be restricted, so that our competitors may not get an insight into our business practices." Official titles in the party were omitted entirely, both in the address and in the greetings of letters; postcards were forbidden. All Nazi cells were notified that they were part of an "association formed for the purpose of keeping its members informed as to the cultural, artistic, and political developments in Germany." This was their story and they must stick to it. From this time on a vast correspondence dealt with "customers," "our new stock of goods," "the new manufacturing methods of our competitors," and similar matters. In preparation for any eventuality, all "front fighters"—that is, Nazi hooligans—were ordered to report by June 15, 1936, and to be ready to aid their Spanish comrades.

These Nazi cells had the aid of various groups in Germany, including the Foreign Office, the Labor Front, the Propaganda Ministry, the Fichte Bund, and the Gestapo. All these poured money into Spain, and most of them had their own separate agents at work there. For the year 1935 sums totaling 3,000,000 pesetas are listed in the documents discovered as having been expended in Spain, but this list omits the contributions of the Luft Hansa and the shipping lines in free transportation of Nazi agents and propaganda material, the cost of printing the pamphlets, handbills, and books, the moneys diverted from relief and war-memorial funds, the contributions made to German churches and schools, and other items. These sums add up to far more than 3,000,000 pesetas for the year.

How did this well-financed organization work? Its chief spy agency was the Harbor Service (Hafendienst), which is under the control of the Gestapo, the Secret Police Bureau. This Harbor Service has nothing to do with the sea or with shipping; its headquarters are in Berlin, and other offices are in Paris, Zurich, Prague, and Brussels—all inland cities. The name is merely a cover for espionage work. The reports of the Harbor Service reveal the dogged hounding of Germans abroad. Everybody was under observation—German tourists, the crews of German ships and airplanes, German churches, German newspapermen, German business firms, the German Automobile Club. If any German abroad made a derogatory remark about the Nazis or failed to show the proper enthusiasm for the new order in Germany, he immediately found himself in trouble. Close attention was also paid to Spanish politicians, hotels, newspapermen, and, above all, to Jews and Freemasons.

In spite of all this espionage some anti-Hitler Germans in Spain persisted in their adherence to Otto Strasser's Schwarze Front, with headquarters in Prague. The Nazi spies decided to place one of their men in this opposition group and did it in a way that simple and trusting anti-fascists everywhere may well remember. One of them subscribed to Otto Strasser's paper and ordered his books and pamphlets. In due time the German anti-fascists in Spain were notified from Prague that there was a new "sympathizer" with whom they ought to get in touch. They looked him up, admitted him to their ranks, and opened the way for the persecution of the entire group.

Smuggling propaganda material into Spain was one of the chief tasks of this spy service. It was easy enough since the consuls and diplomatic officials were compelled to cooperate—most of them, indeed, needed no coercion. Only small bundles were brought in. Some were addressed to the embassy and were thus immune from inspection; others were made part of a ship captain's manifest, which was never searched. As soon as a ship or a plane landed, consular or diplomatic officials took possession of the package. The embassy and the consular offices were frequently used as storage places.

The Nazis had fifty men in Spain to deal with the press and the other media of propaganda. First and foremost their attention was devoted to the press. Every newspaper was entered in a file, together with the names of the editor, the owner, and the financial backers, its circulation, its political orientation, and its attitude toward Nazi Germany. This file listed twenty-two papers as "friendly to Germany," including ABC, Epoca, Renovacion, and Informaciones. All monarchic, Catholic, and reactionary papers were in this group. Gil Robles's Informaciones had this notation: "Can be considered the mouthpiece of Germany." Its financial backer was given as Juan March. The weekly Aspiraciones was reported as the "organ of a Catholic organization of 40,000 women, which is carrying on a bitter fight against the Jews and Freemasons." This paper was suppressed later, but the "young ladies immediately founded another journal and called it Lealtad." All German business groups in Spain were asked to aid this paper with their advertising. It is worth noting in view of present developments that even in 1932 a Nazi press agent reported concerning the leading Portuguese journal: "The official government organ is completely in my hands."

The chief of this press supervision was a man known as the correspondent of the Deutsche Wochenschau a post which he himself characterized as a "camouflage maneuver." He operated by establishing connections with a Spanish news agency, the Servicio Prensa, which placed in the Spanish press the articles and news items he furnished. Whenever a Spanish paper published an article, it paid 5 or 10 pesetas for it ("this is necessary for reasons of camouflage"), but in return received a "tip" (the word used is actually Trinkgeld) of at least 250 pesetas—this was the sum paid to the small provincial papers. All these financial transactions were carefully covered up; in many cases the embassy or the consuls handled the money. One is reminded of the corruption of the French press by the Russians before the World War.

These tactics were increasingly successful. In 1934, 164 propaganda articles were placed in 30 papers; 1935 was much better, with 86 articles in 25 papers in the first four months. During the Nürnberg congress of the Nazis in September, 1935, 145 items in one month made a record. The cost of this was 22,450 pesetas. In order to make newspapers more receptive to this press service, the full power of concentrated advertising was put to work. All German business in Spain had been coordinated, and Jews and Freemasons had been removed. Through their own advertising agency the Nazis placed all German advertising with the "right" papers. The impact of this centrally controlled patronage was considerable. Sometimes Spanish papers issued special German numbers, demanding ads from German business in return.

After the press in importance came traveling lecturers, Nazi films—generally shown privately—weekly Spanish broadcasts from Germany, and the translation of German books. There is a good laugh in the letter which reports that Goebbels's book "Vom Kaiserhof zur Reichskanzlei" could not be placed with any Spanish publisher. Goebbels demanded huge royalties, while the Spanish publishers asked subsidies, since "this was obviously propaganda." The press bureau bemoaned this "regrettable fact."

Supporting the press bureau were the Fichte Bund, the German travel agencies, the Ibero-American Institute, and other organizations. The Fichte Bund—the name is a savage irony on the Jacobin socialist philosopher—deserves special attention. Its membership is made up of non-Nazis, but it is an important cog in the Nazi propaganda machine everywhere. In 1935 it sent out 5,000,000 copies of 75 pamphlets in 64 languages and tons of books. It is one of Rosenberg's most effective agencies.

Another task set for the Brown Network in Spain was industrial espionage. It kept records of 734 German and Spanish firms and knew exactly what they were doing and whom they employed. The purpose of this was twofold: first, to prevent the industrial development of Spain, so that this good market for German manufactured goods would not be lost. Anyone who aided Spain in developing its own industries was a "traitor to Germany," and harsh measures were adopted against him. If he was a German citizen, he was recalled to Germany and dealt with according to his "crime." Secondly, the Nazis wished to discover undeveloped mines of iron, copper, and other metals and to get control of them. Many of the moves of Franco's German-dominated army have been merely a continuation of this program. The industrial spies also watched closely every official step to ease commercial arrangements between Spain and other countries, and any move tending to take trade away from Germany was sabotaged. It is interesting to learn that there are 600 of these Nazi industrial spies spread over the face of the globe.

Spanish Morocco was of special interest to the Nazis. In this small territory they established four cells—in Tetuan, Melilla, Ceuta, and Larache—from which they poured their anti-Semitic, anti-French, anti-British propaganda into French Morocco and points east. "The Jew is devouring you as vermin devour sheep, and France is his protector." "From India to Egypt and on to the frontiers of Sus in Morocco, the borderland of the Great Desert, everything is in ferment. How far have things gone when . . . desperate Arabs cry out against Jews and Frenchmen, 'Long live the Germans'?" As a result anti-Semitic, anti-French, and anti-British movements were generated in the Arab world. The Arab press was so responsive to Nazi money that its demonstrative friendliness to Germany caused apprehension. "Such open pro-German sympathies will certainly be attributed to German activities."

No move was against the rules in this diplomatic game. In 1935, for instance, a group of Germans in Tetuan signed a protest against French discrimination in Tangier. The protest was forwarded to Berlin, and the German Ambassador in Paris made official representation to the French Foreign Office about the matter. But these documents show that the entire affair had been cooked up in Berlin. Even the text of the protest had been forwarded to Africa by the Ribbentrop Bureau in Berlin.

As we draw closer to the outbreak of the rebellion, we find the Nazis beginning to smuggle arms into Spain. This was done under the guise of potato shipments. Strange that firms dealing in windmills, telescopes, and steel goods should suddenly enter the potato business! Every now and then a little slip occurred in the correspondence, and "early potatoes" and "steel goods" got a bit mixed. What was happening was that the pistoleros of the Spanish Falange needed guns for their rioting. The record shows that a single Nazi agent delivered 492 pistols with ammunition to a Madrid group, and there were many agents at work. Orders for rifles were also placed. Aircraft salesmen appeared in Tetuan, headquarters of both the Nazis and General Franco.

The documents dating from this period contain many references to the close contact between the Nazis and the Spanish fascists. Among those counted as allies are "our good friend, General Goded," who failed to take Barcelona and was executed; General Hillan-Astray, leader of the Foreign Legion; a high official in the War Department; the reactionary Governor-General of Catalonia, Escalos; and others. Frequent notes of rejoicing make their appearance, too: "We're sitting pretty now"; and "The realization of our desires is near at hand." The Spanish Ambassador in Berlin assured the Nazis that all would go well "in matters concerning the export of potatoes."

But "all did not go well"; the revolt so carefully nurtured failed in half of Spain. The role of the Nazis in its preparation is clear from their own records. Their purpose, in addition to spreading fascism and obtaining military raw materials, was clearly expressed in a 1935 memorandum of the Nazi press bureau: "One look at the map will show the strategic importance of Spain in a war between Germany and France."

The New German Ambassador

BY E. B. ASHTON

THE fear of fascism, hitherto confined in America to liberals and Marxists, has lately spread to other quarters. It has even struck Senator Borah and Ambassador Dodd, whose warning voices were raised, ironically enough, just after some of the most progressive members of Congress had taken the lead in killing a proposed House investigation of Nazi propaganda in this country. To be sure, a repetition of the abortive 1934 investigation of "un-American activities" would only help the forces it was meant to check; but it seems doubtful whether we can safely continue to ignore an attack on our democracy from the very source which today is threatening the last vestiges of democracy in Europe. This attack fits too well into the plans of our potentially anti-democratic elements, which are more numerous than they appear to be in a period of prosperity. We can ill afford to let Berlin forge weapons which the Liberty League and the National Association of Manufacturers will later find useful.

A recent event gives immediate emphasis to the constant need for vigilance. On May 14 the German government sent a new Ambassador to the United States. Dr. Hans Luther, who was replaced by Dr. Hans Heinrich Dieckhoff, was no Nazi either in name or in spirit. His appointment to Washington had been the price for his resignation as president of the Reichsbank to make way for Dr. Schacht. In this country he made a good diplomatic record, but he did not build up in influential sections of American opinion the pro-Nazi sentiment which the Reich needs—and which in England, for instance, Herr von Ribbentrop, has succeeded in creating despite his notorious lack of tact and diplomatic grace. Why Luther failed in that respect is obvious: he did not stoop to Nazi tactics, he did not sponsor a publicity machine, he did not seek out our economic royalists and extol to them the blessings of Nazism. He left the dirtier jobs of a totalitarian embassy to the underlings who in reality were put there to spy on him, and he attended to his duties with a discretion which ingratiated him with Americans but naturally did not satisfy his superiors. For Berlin does not really care about correct diplomatic relations. What the Nazis most desire is an American branch sufficiently influential to offset the condemnation evoked by almost every act of Hitler's Reich.

To close the American gap in Germany's international line of defense will be no easy task. The man for the job was carefully chosen. Dr. Dieckhoff had been for three years in charge of the Anglo-American Division of the German Foreign Office, and since last summer its Secretary of State. He holds no membership card in the "National Socialist German Workers' Party." This fact, wholly irrelevant in Germany, is already being played up here to allay the normal American suspicion of any envoy of Hitler's. His experience as a career diplomat will help him to avoid the gaffes which have marred Ribbentrop's ambassadorial successes and which here would hardly be dismissed with the amused tolerance of the English. But Dieckhoff, who is Ribbentrop's brother-in-law and diplomatic mentor as well as Hitler's personal choice, is thoroughly familiar with all the newer methods of furthering German policy abroad. First among these is to perfect the cooperation between the German Embassy and the Nazi field organization in the country under cultivation. What is done by the German government must coincide with what is done by the Nazi Party. Only such coordination can produce the concentrated and efficient Nazi propaganda which in Austria and Hungary has been openly directed at the overthrow of the existing governments, which brought the blessing of full-fledged Nazi movements to Rumania, Switzerland, Holland, and Belgium, and which turned powerful political groups into Nazi allies in such former enemy countries as France and Great Britain.

If further proof is needed that Herr Dieckhoff represents the latest in German "diplomacy," we can look at his successor in the Wilhelmstrasse. Hans Georg Viktor von Mackensen has not only the distinction of bearing the name of Germany's cavalry idol; as German Minister to Budapest he directed a Nazi conspiracy that came close to upsetting Premier Daranyi's regime. When the coup failed, its guiding genius was of course withdrawn, but his transfer to Berlin was not a "kick upstairs"; it was a legitimate promotion for a man who had shown himself worthy of greater opportunities. There is no reason to believe that the orders issued by Mackensen will vary from the ones he has so faithfully executed. In fact, current gossip in Berlin indicates that the Mackensen policy will probably be marked by an intensification of the combination of ideological crusade and brutal Realpolitik which, under rules laid down years ago in "Mein Kampf," has been Hitler's foreign policy ever since his rise to power. Mackensen went to Berlin to direct the technique he had formerly applied in the field, and Dieckhoff has come to Washington to take charge in a sector where the technique, so far, could not be effectively applied.

Here only harmony of personnel is needed to begin operations immediately. Nazism abroad seldom seeks to become a mass movement. Its objective is a numerically small but thoroughly disciplined organization of reliable men in strategic positions, who can influence or, if necessary, coerce other and larger groups in the direction set by Berlin. Sufficient man-power is provided by the Germans themselves, who are completely gleichgeschaltet and often hold places of great social and economic importance, and by those German-born Americans who either perjured themselves when renouncing allegiance to "any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty" or were enticed into the Nazi fold after their naturalization. Today probably not more than a few thousand American citizens are actually taking orders from abroad. But the effect of their activity is to be seen in the attitude of millions of "racial comrades" whom the Third Reich counts as legitimate subjects of Adolf Hitler. In America the aims of the Germans are quite different from those that they pursue among their "little neighbors" in Europe. The Nazi goal in America is to influence our foreign policy in such a way that the United States will not interfere with German plans to capture the governments of other countries abroad.

Ready for the drive to bring "Germany abroad" under Nazi direction is a highly efficient organization in this country. Four years of industrious work by the Spanknöbels and the Kuhns have not been fruitless. SA and SS units and a branch of the Gestapo have existed for a long time. The members are drilling in their own camps, and if they are not armed yet they will be as soon as their leaders believe it can be done without adverse effects. They are already gaining in self-confidence. Only a short while ago, when the discovery that they were wearing uniforms created something of a stir, they had the impudence to cite the example of the American Legion and similar associations in support of their right to wear uniforms denoting allegiance to a foreign power.

But a field organization can function smoothly only when it is supported and supplemented by the diplomatic office. Governmental and social standing, uncontrolled disbursement of funds, safety of communication, and all the other emoluments of diplomatic immunity are invaluable factors in a campaign such as the Nazi are waging. Over here until now Hitler's expeditionary force has been handicapped not only by American resistance but by inefficient use of its own resources. Under Luther, though his lieutenants did the best they could, perfect teamwork could not be achieved. The arrival of Dr. Dieckhoff, who brings to his post the experiences of Ribbentrop, Mackensen, Papen, and all the other streamlined Nazi envoys, marks the beginning of a new era in fascist propaganda in America.

Latin America: Boycott Fascism!

BY G. ARBAIZA

IT WAS to be expected that the Spanish-speaking peoples of the Western Hemisphere, who have always boasted of la raza, would be stirred by the foreign invasion of Spain and take a stand against it. Yet, with one exception, the republics of Spanish ancestry have remained silent, and the champions of "the race" throughout Latin America have not raised a finger of protest now that nearly two hundred thousand Italians, Germans, African Moors, and other mercenaries are tearing Spain and "the race" to pieces. The reason for this silence is not indifference. It is suppression.

The fascist invasion of Spain has split Spanish-speaking America into two camps. The great majority of the ruling classes are for the invaders. The government of only one country, Mexico, has supported the Loyalists. Most of the others are at bottom pro-fascist, even though they hide their proclivities behind a pretense of "absolute neutrality." The well-to-do creole classes are praying for Franco.

Side by side with the rulers stand the political and military cliques, the Catholic church and its hordes of female bigots, the greater part of the press, venal editors and intellectuals, large local and foreign business interests, feudal sugar and cotton planters, degenerate tropical hidalgos that trace their lineage to the monarchist Spain of past centuries, European immigrants and adventurers who have married into the local bourgeoisie, and the first crop of Latin American fascists. They are heart and soul with Franco and his allies. They have all united in preventing the majority of the Latin American people—students, workers, professionals, writers, artists, teachers—from knowing what is happening in Spain and from expressing themselves on the tragic issue. The only activity permitted in some countries has been the collection of funds for the victims of the war, and the feeling shown by the people with this excuse in Buenos Aires, Montevideo, Havana, and other cities leaves no doubt about the strength of anti-fascist sentiment.

Suppression of news favorable to republican Spain is general in the wealthy newspapers of Peru, Brazil, Cuba, Venezuela, Guatemala, Ecuador, and other lesser countries. One finds an impartial presentation of news in the journals of Argentina, Uruguay, Chile, Mexico, Colombia, Panama, and Costa Rica, even if the undertone is in many cases pro-fascist. Many people in Latin America do not know as yet that the Italians and the Germans are fighting in Spain. Editorially, the Latin American press is applauding the invasion or condoning it or taking a cowardly refuge behind "neutrality."

President Roosevelt at Buenos Aires appealed to Latin America in the name of democratic government to help avert the catastrophe that impends in Europe and that we know the fascist powers are doing their best to bring about. The answer to this appeal is to be found in the attitude taken by the great majority of the Latin American rulers and ruling classes toward the Spanish issue. They have revealed themselves as potential allies of fascism in this hemisphere; and in one country at least, Brazil, there is a promising crop of tropical fascists, a million strong, partly financed by German and Italian bankers and entrepreneurs.

The thing seems logical after all. If the coming struggle is to be between democracy and dictatorship, on which side would you expect to find fifteen Latin American dictators? The only countries free from dictatorship today are Colombia, Costa Rica, Mexico, and Panama. Out of nineteen rulers, twelve wear epaulets—General Justo in Argentina, Colonel Toro in Bolivia, Colonel Batista, de facto dictator in Cuba, General Trujillo in the Dominican Republic, General Ubico in Guatemala, General Carias in Honduras, General Somoza in Nicaragua, General Hernandez in El Salvador, General Benavides in Peru, Colonel Franco in Paraguay, and General Lopez Contreras in Venezuela. Add to this list four red-hunting dictators—Vargas of Brazil, Alessandri of Chile, Paez of Ecuador, and Terra of Uruguay—and you have the most formidable cordon of dictatorships Latin America has had in recent decades.

Most Latin American dictators fear that a Loyalist victory in Spain may encourage their political enemies or local radical elements to undertake organized rebellion. A Socialist Spain would be a living example and a source of Socialist literature to Spanish-speaking America. Only recently the governments of Argentina, Brazil, and Chile, at the instigation of Rio de Janeiro, were planning joint measures to prevent the landing of Spanish "leftists" from Spain seeking asylum in South America.

Many of the dictators have borrowed Nazi methods, and have spread the Communist phobia in their own countries. The dictators' political enemies are no longer revoltosos but rojos; and they are rounded up and thrown into jail or exiled because of their "communistic ideas." Some of the dictators have enacted laws barring "Communists" from the suffrage and making it a criminal offense to profess "communistic" or "other dangerous ideas." Secretary of the Interior Cabrera of Chile admitted last year that negotiations had been in progress among South American countries to act jointly to "drown such ideas." El Imparcial of Santiago, Chile, has been urging Latin American countries to join the anti-Communist front of Germany and Japan. This phobia has been particularly virulent in Brazil, Peru, Venezuela, Guatemala, and Ecuador, where it has had thousands of victims, many of whom probably never knew or had a chance to know what communism is.

Recognition of Franco by Guatemala, Nicaragua, and El Salvador has rather damaged his chances of being recognized in other more important countries. The recent virtual rupture between the Valencia government and Peru illustrates the hidden hostility against republican Spain which prevails in official Latin America. The Peruvian consul at Valencia, Ibañez, was arrested a few days ago by the Spanish authorities, charged with operating a secret wireless station in the consulate building and giving shelter to suspicious refugees, many of whom were detained. After an angry Peruvian protest, Valencia placed Spanish affairs in Peru in charge of the Mexican representative, and Lima is dealing now with the former Spanish minister, Avilez, who still occupies the legation building and has gone over to Franco. The Peruvian dictator, Benavides, a classic cuartelazo colonel, is perhaps the most rabid and amusing anti-Communist in South America. His latest piece of anti-Communist legislation, his Ley de Seguridad Pública, groups among Communist crimes even the shooting off of fireworks.

What is happening in Spain is of more than racial concern to South America. While everybody expected the Rome-Berlin partnership to strike east, toward "the grain fields of the Ukraine," it has actually struck west, toward Gibraltar. Spain has mineral resources—iron, copper, mercury, and manganese—and Germany and Italy want these as well as the Spanish market. But when Nazis and Fascisti planned a fascist Spain and equipped Franco, they had larger designs. They wanted to get at the British position in Gibraltar from the rear and create a new military threat to France on its southern frontier. Thus 200,000 Loyalist Spaniards are fighting England's battle by keeping Franco's armies from turning toward Gibraltar, just as they are fighting France's by blocking Franco's way to the French frontier. The British proposal for a truce and withdrawal of foreign troops was only an attempt to get rid of the menace to Gibraltar. When the Italians landed in Majorca, they made another move in a game whose ultimate purpose is to break down English naval power in the Mediterranean.

However, the Italian challenge goes beyond the Mediterranean. It points to the Atlantic. The new Italian naval program provides for an expanded fleet with a cruising range great enough to operate in the Atlantic; the German-Italian partnership seeks to dominate not only the Straits of Gibraltar and Spanish Morocco but the Canary Islands, a strategic base commanding the sea route between Europe and South America. What, then, is the aim of a fascist armada powerful enough to cruise the Atlantic?

In the first place, to intercept and harass or destroy British trade with South America if the fascist challengers break through Gibraltar. In case of war Great Britain would be largely dependent on grains and beef and mutton from Argentina, a source of food supplies more accessible than Australia. Argentina fed the Allies right through the World War. This carries the fascist arrow of possible aggression across the Atlantic to the mineral and pastoral wealth of South America, whose exportable resources are now under the dual control of Great Britain and the United States, the two powers that hold a commanding position in South American commerce, investments, shipping and trade routes. If the fascist arrow tears this line that links South America to Great Britain, Germany and Italy will move swiftly toward economic supremacy in the southern continent. That is how fascism may come to the shores of South America. So the soldiers of republican Spain may be fighting now not only England's and France's battle but also South America's.

In the meantime the immense inarticulate majority of Latin Americans who would help the Spanish republic but find themselves besieged by fascist propaganda and "neutral" silence are badly in need of enlightenment about the events and the implications of the struggle in Spain. An information bureau on the Spanish war, set up in New York or Mexico to distribute literature in the other southern countries, would be welcomed by millions of their inhabitants. But Latin Americans who have been aroused by the fascist massacre of Spaniards, and the many others who would be if they knew the truth, have at their command a practical way of registering their protest and making it effective. Let them boycott en masse the trade and traders of Germany and Italy in Latin America. Nothing could be better calculated to restrain their murderous intervention in Spain.

Consumers on the March

BY COLSTON E. WARNE

I

A QUICKENING interest in consumer movements has been noted in the past four years. Cooperatives have expanded. Buying groups have been formed. Consumer testing bureaus have grown. Protest bodies have been launched. Consumers' strikes have occurred. The government has set up consumer advisory boards. Popular magazines have featured articles on the long-established cooperatives of Europe. Never has there been such a wave of enthusiasm "to do something for the consumer."

Few attempts have been made to analyze this profusion of recent consumer developments. Many have discovered the consumer; not all are agreed on just what to do with him now that he has been discovered. As a result conflicts exist today in the consumer movement which are reminiscent of struggles in the labor movement.

In this struggle of competing ideas, it is possible to evaluate several types of organization participating in the recent development. We have first the consumers' cooperatives which for more than a half-century have been seeking to establish the Rochdale idea in America. Local stores owned by consumers and run by democratically elected boards of directors sell goods at market prices to members, refunding "profits" on the basis of purchases after paying interest on the members' investment and setting aside suitable reserves. More than 6,500 of these local consumers' societies were reported at the end of 1935. They were federated into nine wholesale societies and capped nationally by the Cooperative League of the United States, with its headquarters in New York City. The cooperative movement is seasoned. It is built upon a wide experience here and abroad. The store organizations have followed a somewhat traditional pattern, registering a steady though not spectacular growth. Expansion has lately been marked in several new fields. Gasoline stations, restaurant chains, housing projects, credit unions, and insurance societies have been formed. Agricultural groups have been especially active, frequently utilizing in the consumer field the experience and the capital which they have gleaned from successful cooperative-marketing undertakings. The extension of the urban movement has been much more difficult owing to the weakness of trade unionism, the domination of the chain store, and, perhaps most of all, the lack of homogeneity of the population.

The Cooperative League has modified its policies in step with these developments. Up to the advent of the New Deal it had, despite some sharp dissent, been set on a doctrinaire course by its philanthropist president, James Peter Warbasse, who held fast to the idea that the Rochdale societies alone would some day in a fair and free battle usher in the cooperative commonwealth. With the appointment of E. R. Bowen as secretary of the Cooperative League, the large agricultural cooperatives which bridged across into the consumers' field were actively courted and a number of them brought into affiliation. The league's organ, Consumers' Cooperation, came to reflect a more tolerant attitude toward political movements and especially toward cooperative enterprises which would not meet squarely the test of Rochdale orthodoxy. Buying clubs and national cooperative mail-order houses came to be sponsored. The propaganda work of the league has vastly improved.

Possibly the most spectacular consumer-protective development of recent years has been the rise of testing laboratories to assess the merits of competing merchandise. Stuart Chase and F. J. Schlink first brought popular attention to this field in their book, "Your Money's Worth," published in 1927. They demonstrated the inability of profit-seeking business to bring quality goods to the consumer at reasonable prices and noted the failure of the government either to specify quality standards or to give the consumer sufficient information to enable him to protect himself. Consumers' Research, which they founded, met with wide popular response, developing in seven years a subscription list of more than 50,000 and, despite the confidential features of its service, an audience much larger. The writer is reluctant to discuss Consumers' Research, since he is associated with an organization that might be considered competitive. But because of CR's important and pioneering role, it must be considered in an analysis of consumer movements.

Consumers' Research was a fresh idea; for a time even its sponsors scarcely knew what to do with it. The cooperatives, after some hesitation, sought to ally Consumers' Research with their cause. Only the individualistic tendencies of F. J. Schlink, dominant figure in Consumers' Research, prevented a close alliance. The crudeness of the early technical articles in Consumers' Research soon disappeared. By 1933 the publication was well considered by thousands of readers and thoroughly hated by advertisers.

It was at about this time that a new note was struck in Consumers' Research. It had previously been dedicated to one main objective—that of debunking false claims and analyzing branded products. Its director had, to be sure, clashed with the Bureau of Standards and with engineering groups. For a brief period it flirted with the idea of fostering a parallel organization to market tested articles on a cooperative basis, thus giving consumers an opportunity to put into practice the ideas which they had gleaned from the bulletins. This was finally rejected. In 1933 Consumers' Research opened a new chapter. It harshly condemned the Consumers' Advisory Board as blind to lessen consumer objections to the monopolistic trends in the NRA. Condemnations of fascist trends in capitalism appeared in the General Bulletin of the organization and in a book sponsored by it, "Partners in Plunder," by J. B. Matthews, a CR director. In contrast, its more recent turn to the right is well known. Matthews's later book, "Guinea Pigs No More," contains a sharp attack on labor organizations and Communists. His article in the Atlantic Monthly for December, 1936, upheld "private competitive enterprise" as the "best available servant of consumers' interests."

Thus it is difficult to appraise Consumers' Research. It has pioneered in consumer testing and has done a great amount of competent work. It has, however, been an isolated organization, with an eccentric director, a shifting personnel, and unpredictable policies. The strike at Consumers' Research in the fall of 1935 was the climax of years of conflict within the organization. As a result of the strike, it lost several of its leading staff members as well as many liberal supporters. The direct assault on the cooperative movement by J. B. Matthews in the Atlantic Monthly article referred to has not helped its relationships with that branch of the consumer movement.

The only other national consumer testing organization is Consumers Union of United States, launched in February, 1936, in New York under the direction of Arthur Kallet, author of "Counterfeit" and coauthor with F. J. Schlink of "100,000,000 Guinea Pigs," and Dewey Palmer, former head of the technical department of Consumers' Research. Working with Kallet and Palmer are many former staff members and technical consultants of Consumers' Research, together with a large additional number of technical authorities in various fields who have offered their aid to Consumers Union. The writer is an officer of this organization.

Consumers Union does not aim to furnish technical information of exactly the type which Consumers' Research has offered. A main purpose is to reach those on the lowest income levels. A special low-priced edition of the CU Reports is issued, and further reductions are made possible through group membership. In addition, it aims to establish a fairly close alliance with the labor movement by including in its bulletins whenever possible an assessment of the labor standards under which articles are produced. In twelve months of publication Consumers Union has built a membership of more than 40,000 and gained a wide audience for its monthly Consumers' Union Reports. Efforts to secure group subscriptions from labor and cooperative organizations have been successful. An annual Buying Guide is included in the year's subscription.

The mail-order cooperatives are the third type of consumer organization. Of these, Cooperative Distributors, of New York City, is the largest. It was launched in 1932 by E. J. Lever, a former vice-president of Consumers' Research, to sell tested goods by mail on a cooperative basis. From the start Cooperative Distributors proved an unruly child in the cooperative family. Its approach was unique and complex. It branched out in many fields, developing a testing laboratory, launching a publication, the Consumers' Defender, and selling goods over the counter as well as on a mail-order basis to members, non-members, and the consumers' clubs which it promoted. These consumers' clubs were organized not only to serve as distribution channels but also to act as agencies to bargain collectively for goods with local merchants. Cooperative Distributors has also fostered the maintenance of union labor standards in the factories from which it buys goods, and has sought to secure legislation for consumer protection.

The problems of this organization have been many. Its quite remarkable growth has been limited by the small investments of its more than 2,000 stockholder-members and by the dues which were for a time paid by its affiliates. Its many clubs have refused, often with justification, to conform to the pattern established by the parent organization. The enthusiasm of its management has frequently brought it into sharp conflict with existing cooperative societies and with the Cooperative League. It launched so many cooperative activities that for a considerable period it failed to fulfil convincingly its main job of mail-order selling of tested goods. Internal conflicts have developed. The organization has, however, an excellent central idea. Many of its problems are being cleared by its present management, and its relationship with the rest of the cooperative movement has distinctly improved. It is now affiliated with the national Cooperative League.

Buying clubs form a fourth channel of recent consumer effort. Such clubs have been springing up by the thousand. Some have been sponsored by the orthodox cooperative movement; some by Cooperative Distributors. Others have been launched quite independently by local groups which have sought to obtain a reduction of two cents in the price of gasoline or fifty cents on a ton of coal by centering their purchases on one dealer. (In most communities it is relatively easy to make such an arrangement.) Other buying clubs have been formed with private wholesalers, who have offered to sell goods in case lots to be delivered at the basement of one of the members. Despite their advantage in reflecting closely the needs of a local group, buying clubs are apt to be short-lived unless they are attached to some cooperative organization.

[The second part of this article will be printed next week.]

Defending Justice in Puerto Rico

BY ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

IN THE fall of 1935 five members of the Nationalist Party of Puerto Rico sought to make their way to a meeting which students at the Puerto Rico University were to hold to protest against certain remarks made by Pedro Albizu Campos, the Nationalist leader. The story is that the Nationalists were stopped by the police, that they shot at the police, and that, as a result of the fracas, four of the five Nationalists in the automobile were killed. It was said that they carried bombs and guns.

In February, 1936, Colonel Riggs, head of the insular police, was assassinated by two Nationalists. The assassins were seized and, while in the hands of the police, were shot. Although Colonel Riggs was popular with the Puerto Ricans and was himself a believer in independence, the cold-blooded murder of the two Puerto Rican "martyrs" aroused not only the Nationalists but great numbers of Puerto Ricans who opposed Nationalist methods. Americans thought of the murder of Colonel Riggs; Puerto Ricans thought of the murder of the two assassins.

Albizu Campos and other Nationalist leaders were charged with conspiracy to overthrow the government of the United States and later, in July, 1936, were convicted and sentenced to six years in jail. Governor Blanton Winship apparently felt it was necessary to deal with the Nationalists with a heavy hand and acted to suppress not only those who were militantly demanding Puerto Rican freedom but also a united front of groups opposed to the conviction of Albizu Campos. Parades and meetings of Nationalists and other protesting groups were prohibited. The Puerto Ricans take seriously their Organic Act guaranteeing the rights of free speech and assemblage, and resentment grew apace.

On March 21, 1937, the Nationalists announced that they would hold a parade and meeting in the town of Ponce. A permit was first given by the mayor of the town. At the last moment it was canceled. The insular police commanded by Colonel Orbeta, who was acting under orders of the Governor, prohibited the parade as it was about to start. The national hymn of Puerto Rico was played, the crowd cheered, the parade advanced. Suddenly there was shooting, and when it was all over, it appeared that the casualties were 20 killed—including those who died later, among whom were two police officers—and from 150 to 200 wounded, among whom were 6 police officers.

Governor Winship reported to Washington that several "divisions" of the so-called "Army of Liberation" had arranged a concentration in the town of Ponce; that a parade was forbidden; that nevertheless the Nationalists insisted upon proceeding; that when the command "Forward march!" was given, a Nationalist fired a shot killing a policeman on the left of the chief of police and another Nationalist fired a shot killing a policeman on the right of the chief of police; that shooting then broke out from all sides as well as from roofs and balconies where Nationalists were stationed; and that casualties resulted. He ended his report by commending the patience and consideration of the police.

The leading citizens of Ponce formed a committee of prominent citizens of San Juan and asked that they make an investigation. The proposed commission consisted of Emilio Belaval, president of the Athenaeum, who acted as secretary; Mariano Acosta Velarde, president of the Puerto Rican Bar Association; Lorenzo Pineiro, president of the Teachers' Association; Dr. Manuel Diaz Garcia, president of the Puerto Rican Medical Association; Antonio Avuso, editor of the Imparciale; Francisco M. Zeno, editor of the Correspondencia; and Davilla-Ricci, assistant editor of the Mundo. None of the commission were Nationalists. Request was made to the American Civil Liberties Union to appoint the chairman of the commission, and the writer was so appointed. The commission undertook to investigate not only the events in Ponce on March 21 but the general subject of civil rights and liberties in Puerto Rico.

Hearings were held at Ponce beginning Friday, May 14, and were thereafter adjourned to San Juan. Evidence as to what happened on March 21 was adduced not only from disinterested eyewitnesses but from a series of photographs which tell the story in incontestable fashion. Photographs show that the "divisions" of the "Army of Liberation" consisted of about eighty young men wearing black blouses and white trousers, about twelve girls dressed in white as nurses, and a brass band of about six pieces. The Nationalists, known as "cadets," carried no arms; the girls did not even have Red Cross kits.

A photograph shows the scene just before the shooting. About eighteen policemen, armed with revolvers, shotguns, and tear-gas bombs, stood in front of the line of these eighty boys and twelve girls; about twenty policemen armed with Thompson submachine-guns were in the rear; a number of armed police were on the street along the side; a crowd of men, women, and children stood across the way watching the parade. The Nationalists had brought their wives, mothers, and children along to see the parade. The evidence showed that there was no shooting whatever from any roofs or balconies, and this was confirmed by the district attorney of Ponce, Perez Marchand, who made the first investigation and who later retired as district attorney because, according to him, he was not given a free hand in his inquiries. One of the photographs shows a policeman actually firing at the crowd and other policemen drawing their guns, all in menacing posture. The police who were wounded or killed seem to have been caught in a cross fire.

The commission unanimously reported that the people of Puerto Rico have properly described the occurrence as the "massacre of Ponce."

I shall never forget the photograph of those cadets whom newspapers have described as "ruffians" and "gangsters," standing quietly with their hands at their sides waiting to be shot—defenseless but not one of them running away.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

No Swastikas at the World's Fair!

ONE of the very best arguments that I have heard for the reelection of Mayor LaGuardia is that if he is again put in the City Hall there will be no German exhibit at the World's Fair; it is said that Hitler will refuse to allow a German representation here if the man who said that he ought to be in a museum of horrors is still mayor. Joking aside, this is a matter of the utmost importance, one that might be giving sleepless nights to Grover Whalen and the other managers of the fair, especially as Mr. Whalen has himself political ambitions and would doubtless not be adverse to finding his way into the City Hall, after the expiration of Mayor LaGuardia's second term, as a result of his brilliant management of the fair. That there will be serious trouble if the Germans come to the fair I have no doubt. They will come with their swastika flags, which in itself is an insult to a large portion of the population of the metropolis and of the United States, and as propagandists for their cause and their mode of government. We shall have street parades, men in the Nazi uniform, speeches, lectures, demonstrations of the wonderful advance made by Germany in every field during the four years of Hitler's regime.

We have had a little example of what we may expect in a recent happening in Cleveland, Ohio, where an exchange visit of German children is going on. One hundred and fifteen arrived from Germany the other day and marched under the swastika flag from the station to the City Hall, where after being greeted by the Mayor they sang the Horst Wessel song. Of course these youngsters are ardent Nazis—they know nothing else—and the corresponding number of American children who have gone to Germany will doubtless come home stuffed with German propaganda and imbued with fascist ideas perhaps for life. It is incontrovertible that the Germans are as bent on Nazifying the world as the Communists were determined at the outset of the Soviet experiment to communize the whole globe. If there are not wholesale protests against a Russian exhibit at the fair, it will be only because our patriotic societies feel that the Russians are no longer to be feared.

As Senator Borah pointed out in a recent speech, the two systems of society, the fascist and the democratic, cannot live in peace and harmony. They are essentially inimical, and there will be no peace between them until one or the other goes down. Dorothy Thompson has put it similarly—that the light of democracy will overcome the darkness of fascism or vice versa. Hence in asking the Germans here to take part in the show we are inviting official representation of the country which every year spends millions of marks in propaganda for the overthrow of our institutions, which has a regularly appointed Nazi leader assigned to the United States to carry on the propaganda, whose followers appear in public in their uniforms and are beyond question a menace to the peace and order of the United States. If the Germans come to the Flushing exhibition, I shall expect great parades of protest, with the marchers carrying banners and images ridiculing or denouncing Hitler, precisely as they were carried in the parade on May 1. I know the arguments that will be brought against this—that the hatchet ought to be buried for this occasion, that we, as hosts, must behave in a gentlemanly and polite way, that having invited all the world we cannot discriminate against one country, that Mussolini, who has already accepted and by royal decree has fixed the amount of money to be spent on the Italian exhibit, is certainly not one whit better morally than Hitler, that the thing to do is just to let them come and not take them seriously.

But as I have pointed out before, this is contrary to the American spirit, contrary to the American tradition, and contrary to the right of the American people to protect their institutions. I believe that great numbers of people will boycott and picket the fair if the swastika banner flies there; if I should be around then I should wish to participate in the picketing. Will any Jew set foot in the German exhibit? Certainly no self-respecting Jew. Will any Jews be permitted in the German exhibit? That may be for Hitler to decide. It seems to me that no American who has any heart at all can afford to go into that building. If he thinks only of the thousands upon thousands of Gentiles who have been expelled from Germany and robbed of all their means merely because Hitler did not like their views on peace and other things, if he thinks only of what has happened in Spain—of the nearly 12,000 Germans sent into that unfortunate country, of the bombing of Guernica by German aviators, the greatest outrage of the whole bloody intervention—then he must refuse to have any traffic whatsoever with those who have done these things and defend them as right and proper. Many persons will similarly refuse to enter the Italian pavilion, but the Italian situation is neither as pressing nor as dangerous to us as are the Nazi doctrines. At least Mussolini has not openly declared, as has Hitler, that his whole policy is based on deceit, lying, and fraud—and ruthlessness, too.

Well, here's hoping that Mayor LaGuardia's presence will keep the Nazis away. Better yet, here's hoping that before the fair opens two years from now Hitler himself will have crashed.

BROUN'S PAGE

New Liberty Leaguers

LEGENDS die slowly in America. Long ago, before John D. Rockefeller was laid to rest, he had become a very old man who gave shiny dimes to children and even more glittering millions to universities and medical foundations. His personality had been wholly taken over into the domain of sweetness and light, and the earlier fighting days of the Standard Oil monopoly were all but forgotten. In somewhat similar fashion Henry Ford is very generally held to be an eccentric but wholly amiable collector of old fiddles and spinning wheels. Almost alone among industrialists Henry Ford has been able to create the illusion that he is a sort of medieval master of handicraft hailing all his employees by their first names and personally dropping in at every cottage with a Christmas turkey and a crock of apple sauce under his arm. It may be that Mr. Ford would truly like to play this role of the benevolent squire, but unfortunately he hasn't got a bicycle and could hardly complete the rounds of the hundreds of thousands who are on his pay roll.

Now and again some significant incident occurs to demonstrate the falsity of the picture of Ford set forth in the recent list of Fordisms. Although the good gray squire of Dearborn is often moved to talk of Wall Street and the capitalists, he knows the tricks of large-scale management a little better than any of his competitors. The labor-spy system has been developed to a high point in the Ford enterprises, and one of the chief responsibilities of the personnel manager, Mr. Bennett, has been to keep in being effective squads of strong-arm men. The recent beating-up of leaflet distributors at the River Rouge plant indicates that Ford's handymen can use brass knuckles just about as effectively as any other company thugs.

It was interesting to read an editorial in the New York Sun which spoke of the attempted C. I. O. "raid" on the River Rouge plant. "John L. Lewis's gangsters, who were accustomed to have their own way in affairs of violence, were thoroughly beaten," said the Sun editorial writer. It is unfortunate that editorial writers on the Sun do not even trouble to read the news accounts as they filter through into their own paper. There is no disagreement as to the fact that almost half of the small group which undertook to distribute leaflets consisted of women. And the same issue in which the editorial appeared carried an Associated Press photograph which showed six Ford employees trampling upon the prostrate body of a single C. I. O. organizer. It is also interesting to note that the gentleman who stands in the foreground of the picture seemingly prepared to kick the man who is down carries quite palpably in his back pocket a pair of handcuffs. And this is supposed to be one phase of a popular and wholly unfomented rebellion of the "loyal workers" against the "violence" of John L. Lewis and the C. I. O. organization.

In explaining the causes of the fracas in which ten or twelve women were kicked about the streets of Dearborn, Mr. Bennett said that the C. I. O. group was attacked by members of the A. F. of L. I think that he pays Mr. Green too high a compliment. I am aware that news dispatches from Cincinnati announce that William Green is now in a fighting mood, but when that mood seizes Green it is just about par if he manages to do as much as pound a fist upon a table. And yet it is significant that the personnel manager of the River Rouge plant should attribute the attack upon labor organization to the A. F. of L. It is symptomatic of the new role which Green and Frey and the rest have assumed. They are held to be the defenders of Fordisms and the whole economic philosophy of the bitter-end supporters of the open shop. The same New York Sun which gloated and chuckled over the fact that union women organizers had been kicked around the streets of Dearborn said very candidly in an editorial on the preceding day that the last hope of "free" industry lay in the efforts of William Green and the A. F. of L.

It is needless now to go into the disputed point as to whether the A. F. of L. chief attempted to ally himself with Sloan and sabotage the General Motors strike. He denied the story told by Lewis, but every bit of factual and circumstantial evidence which has been brought to light since points to its fundamental truth. For what reason did Green summon his cohorts to Cincinnati and call upon them to fight as they had never fought before? Was it to add a single man or woman to the ranks of organized labor? On the contrary, the whole plea of Green was that the A. F. of L. should undertake to disrupt and destroy the wave of unionism which is now sweeping the country.

As for John Frey, his utterances about Moscow control could not have been more blatant if they had come in a speech by Al Smith or any other leader in the Liberty League movement. John Frey has been balancing a red herring on the end of his nose for so long a time that it is almost impossible now to know where the smoked fish ends and Frey begins.

Among the American legends of which I have spoken is the curious myth that William Green is a labor leader. Surely no one can deny that in the last twelve months William Green has done everything that any man could possibly do to disentangle himself from all efforts for the betterment of American Labor. He is fighting minimum wages among other things on the ground that the minimum may tend to become the maximum. Mr. Green is vitally interested in the pay of one man who used to be a mine worker. The chief interest of William Green is to effect an economic set-up in which there will be no decrease in the salary of William Green, and for this purpose he is willing to work with Ford, Sloan, or anybody else who can help him maintain the status quo of his pay check.

HEYWOOD BROUN

BOOKS and the ARTS

Failure Story

PEDLAR'S PROGRESS. THE LIFE OF BRONSON AL-COTT. By Odell Shepard. Little, Brown and Company.
$3.75.

"GOD helps them that help themselves," said Poor Richard, but Bronson Alcott, in quest of God for eighty years, seldom thought of helping himself. Always in debt and usually without quite enough food, he did upon occasion search for a means of livelihood, but these moments were only, so to speak, lapses from which he soon returned to his reading and thinking, his search for promising "minds," his Conversations for "all who are interested in human destiny." And as Professor Shepard develops his excellent study, we realize that this was not the only commandment of Franklin's American ethics which Alcott broke. Was there one, indeed, he did not? "Plow deep while sluggards sleep," said the wily townsman, but for Alcott there was usually a conflicting event of somewhat greater importance—an incident, for instance, involving the subjection of the lower animals, or a talk with Emerson by the roadside, or a walking tour with Charles Lane. No, time was certainly not money to Bronson Alcott; was it not, rather, a symbol, a further manifestation of the divine and ruling spirit? In the other sense, the historical, there was simply no question of time, there was only the everlasting Now. If the lessons of the greatest teachers—Jesus, Socrates—were valid, then they were valid in New England in 1840, and Bronson Alcott set out not only to preach the Gospels but to practice them. If Franklin had another view of this ("Little strokes fell great oaks"), that view was the chief error of the reformers whom Alcott met, with their inability to grasp fundamental principles, their belief in inching along to paradise. They were content with the abolition of slavery. The real task, however, which could never be put off till tomorrow, was a universal spiritual enlightenment.

The usual penalty for breaking Poor Richard's precepts is worldly disgrace, and Bronson Alcott has generally been considered the eccentric and idle father of an illustrious daughter. It is Professor Shepard's thesis, however, that Alcott represents as basic an American ideal as Franklin. In the history of the American dream Alcott's failure story is as typical and doubtless as edifying as the success story of a Jay Gould or a Commodore Vanderbilt. Against the work of exploiting America's material resources, the conquest of power, the biographer places our older tradition of "radical idealism and heretical spirituality," the work of the soul. Through the history of Alcott and his friends—Emerson and Thoreau, Dr. Channing, Garrison; whom did Alcott not know?—Professor Shepard develops this argument, with a dramatic as well as a historic sense, and with so good a regard for both the personalities and the movements that his treatment of the New England scene must be considered a valuable supplement, in some respects a valuable corrective, to the most recent work of Van Wyck Brooks.

It is almost inevitable, however, that the biographer should sometimes fashion his interpretations to fit his thesis. Was Alcott, even if Fruitlands was short on common sense, the sanest man that Thoreau ever knew? One must consider

Henry Thoreau's version of sanity. Alcott's complete integrity may in fact approach a kind of pathology, just as his transcendental emphasis on the spirit may seem almost as disastrous as that complete emphasis on the material to which it was the reaction. Franklin had another view of this, too: "Experience keeps a dear school but fools will learn in no other." Yet if Bronson Alcott is a little more like Mr. Micawber and Parson Adams and a little less like Plato and Socrates than Professor Shepard will admit, it was nevertheless his chief distinction that, "doubting not that some arrangement would be made," he never learned and never wished to learn from experience.

MAXWELL GEISMAR

The Future of Social Security

SOCIAL SECURITY. By Maxwell S. Stewart. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.50.

THIS is a book for all American voters, who shortly will be called upon for opinions on the existing social-security laws, both federal and state. Maxwell Stewart has examined the present legislation and the conditions which led to its adoption. He has reviewed the corresponding developments in European countries. And he has outlined clearly the steps which may now be taken to strengthen the existing provisions for unemployment and old age and to extend protection to those who need health insurance and adequate medical treatment for which they cannot pay individually.

In the first place, he points out, unemployment must be recognized as permanent and not as an unexpected accident. Yet it is impossible with the existing distribution of income to provide for this risk through savings. Relief as a protection for the unemployed, in the author's opinion, has failed. Experience abroad and in the United States leads to the conclusion that insurance on an actuarial basis must give place to more comprehensive and more adequate social protection. "Unemployment is not really an insurable risk," and moreover, "no country actually clung to actuarial principles during the depths of the depression." Not only is this risk unpredictable in its extent, and therefore not susceptible of actuarial provision, but the large accumulation of funds either for old-age insurance or for unemployment is actually shown to be "a threat to the stability of the capitalist system." This arises out of the disturbance to the investment structure and also because the enforced savings out of pay envelopes increase the inequality in the distribution of income, which is a further threat to purchasing power. On the other hand, a social-security program supported out of current revenue would increase stability. If this analysis is correct, it would appear on the whole that the opposition to social protection for all workers as a right by those who speak from the point of view of capitalist interest has been misguided, since the actuarial insurance which they regard as preferable would only increase instability.

It is the author's final conclusion, then, that future legislation in the United States must assume that the argument for social security rests not on economic but on humanitarian grounds. The goal is neither insurance in its actuarial sense nor relief but comprehensive social protection. He finds the greatest encouragement for the achievement of such a goal in the present increasing vitality of the labor movement. The book ends with this statement: "It may be assumed that the future of social security in the United States, both in its broadest and its narrowest sense, is closely bound up with labor's struggle for new dignity and higher living standards."

The book is clearly written, and though not as vividly interesting as the human significance of the subject might make possible, it is an indispensable contribution to the development in the United States of clearer ideas on this new phase of the activities of government.

MARY VAN KLEECK

The Novel, No

THE NOVEL AND THE PEOPLE. By Ralph Fox. International Publishers. $1.50.

THE major premise of this book is that the direction of the novel ought to be changed. The minor premise is that the world ought to be changed. Both of these propositions are worthy of the most serious consideration, but they cannot be seriously considered at the same time. It is true that literature is a function of society and that society itself is a variable. But we must assume that the social end of this equation is fixed, before we can understand precisely how a novel is related to the life of its time. Realism, originality, and the other criteria by which we describe novels are simply attempts to express this relationship.

Two of Ralph Fox's opinions will illustrate the elusiveness of his method. Jane Austen is an unsuccessful novelist because she "tamely surrenders" to her environment. That is an intelligible charge, although scarcely a credible one. Flaubert, who cannot be accused of an uncritical attitude toward his milieu, fails too, because he is writing of circumstances which can inspire "only disgust." The novel, then, must give more than a thoroughly realistic account of society; it must present a realistic account of the proper sort of society. And it is not always easy to distinguish between a realistic account of the proper sort of society and the proper sort of account of a society which is not real.

Fiction is such an amorphous and flexible medium that it is vulgarly identified with its subject matter. Since criticism often accepts the identification, Marxism cannot be expected to dwell upon the distinction. Fox's book carries this assumption to its extreme—content and form, the past and its novels, are swept into an all-embracing condemnation. Maxim Gorki was less peremptory. His heritage and experience had convinced him that the realistic novel was more closely allied to his own values than to those of the civilization which produced it. "Bourgeois society," he declared, in an appreciation of Stendhal, "is constantly giving birth to writers who are impartial historians of their social class, who pitilessly depict its vices, its baseness, its greed, its cruelty, and the logical evolution of its decline and fall."

Fox saw the novel of the future as a kind of epic. Was he aware that a heroic literature has always implied a static society? Certainly his formula is more likely to sponsor a revival of the epic than a continuation of the realistic novel. "Socialist realism" is an Ersatz product which belongs in a category with Scotch woodcock, Punic faith, and Irish confetti. It may provide much in the way of local color and specific detail, but its psychology will be conventionalized and its structure mechanical. Like the epic, or perhaps more like the film, it must celebrate a theme or cover a subject. Fox's scenario for a novel about George Dimitrov is timely; its hero is beginning to complain to Russian writers in the aggrieved accents of the insufficiently panegyricized.

Problems of literary form are not to be settled by the importation of specious metaphysical terms. The concept of objectivity, when applied to a novelist, can have almost antithetical meanings—an empirical view of experience or an external technique of characterization. Proust is a subjective writer in the latter sense only, for his internal style proceeds from a skepticism as searching as Montaigne's. Thus philosophical objectivity is responsible for technical subjectivity in the modern novel. Conversely, those who are anxious to restore the novel to an external plane cannot do so unless they take for granted a set of standards, and until Marxism becomes the prevailing belief of the reading public, these standards will appear arbitrary and hence subjective.

The persistent weakness of radical thought is its tendency to regard the history of anything as a conspiracy in restraint of unlimited development. The strength of the reactionary position, from De Maistre to Pareto, has lain in recognizing that limitation is form. Failure to appreciate this results in seeing collusion among the great novelists of the past to keep certain plain truths from being told, or else in insisting that they lacked the means to say the things they somehow should have said. Sufficient unto a society is the literature thereof. As an institution, literature accumulates its own precedents, language, and discipline, so that its connection with life at large is specialized and often indirect.

But these are questions for those of us who have the leisure to be novel-readers. If Fox preferred social documents to masterpieces, if he sought to erect his likes and dislikes into historical principles, if he was occasionally the victim of his own metaphors, if we find his epistemology naive and his scholarship undigested, his generalizations hasty and his prophecies wishful, we must attribute these faults to the impatience of one who has tasted action. "The Novel and the People" had better be read as a credo rather than a work of criticism, for strong affirmations rather than sharp analyses. Ralph Fox's last action solved the contradiction of his last book. Change the world and the novel will take care of itself.

HARRY LEVIN

The Dreyfus Affair

THE DREYFUS CASE. By the Man Alfred Dreyfus and his Son Pierre Dreyfus. Translated and Edited by Donald C. McKay. Yale University Press. $3.75.

HERE is the story, for the first time fully told in English, and with some material unpublished until now, of the famous case that shook the world and almost disrupted France, the significance of which, applied to the burning problems of today, is as great as ever. From whatever angle one views it, the Dreyfus Affair reveals the highest values and the most profound dichotomies of individual and social life. For the innocent victim it was a twelve-year Calvary of physical and spiritual torture in which he somehow forged for himself the strength to live for his own rehabilitation and the sake of his family. It exemplified in its ramifications the utmost baseness and nobility of which human beings are capable, dragging into the open the secret corporate vileness that infests the bases of the imposing structures of patriotism and national honor, exposing the depraved alliance of anti-Semitism, clericalism, monarchism, and simple careerism. It involved men in the highest political, judicial, and military

★ YALE ★

The story of the world's largest coöperative movement

English Coöperatives

By SYDNEY R. ELLIOTT

Editor of Reynolds News, leading British coöperative newspaper

With public attention focused on coöperatives in Scandinavian countries, many people are unaware of the fact that Great Britain harbors the most impressive coöperative movement, both as to membership and volume of business, in the world. The story of the rise of this movement is a dramatic one and of great importance to every consumer in this country.

Illustrated. $3.00

On sale at all booksellers

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS

New Haven, Connecticut

★
and now the

PULITZER PRIZE

has been added to the distinguished list of honors for this book

THE FLOWERING OF NEW ENGLAND

★ By VAN WYCK BROOKS ★

A National Best Seller for 41 consecutive weeks—On every list of the "Year's Best Books"—Chosen for "the National Book Award as the most distinguished non-fiction of the year" by the Booksellers of America. Called by America's most distinguished critics "brilliant, alive, exciting, profound, fast-moving as a novel, a masterpiece, a classic!"

26th Printing • $4

DUTTON & COMPANY 107 Fourth Avenue, New York

places—ambassadors and heads of states, as well as writers, journalists, politicians, workingmen, spies—finally splitting France into two furiously hostile factions which cut across all former alignments, political, religious, social, and personal. It endowed prominent men with a new fame or a new infamy and sanctified or pilloried in history characters that might have remained obscure for good or evil all their days. Finally, though it ended in victory for Dreyfus and disgrace and suicide for his persecutors, though it was a great triumph for truth and liberalism, the same depraved forces are as strong in the world today as they ever were, probably stronger and more sinister.

Alfred Dreyfus was a young officer of Alsatian birth, whose family had long been ardently Francophile and whose brilliant record in the military schools had won him an appointment to the General Staff, an almost unheard-of distinction for a Jew. He was rich, happily married, at the threshold of an enviable career. The discovery, in 1894, of the bordereau, the famous letter in which Esterhazy announced to the German Ambassador that he was sending him certain French military documents, necessitated an investigation and a criminal. No one but Colonel Henry, Esterhazy's friend, knew who the real criminal was. It was he who directed the hunt toward Dreyfus the Jew, already resented by some of his colleagues. There was some hesitation, for Dreyfus's record was spotless and no motive was established, but this was quickly overcome. Forged letters, articles planted in the press, whispered denunciations quickly led to the secret court martial and conviction, the public degradation, and committal to Devil's Island for life.

But almost immediately Colonel Picquart, new head of the Intelligence Bureau, discovered Esterhazy's guilt and rushed to his superiors with the information. He made such a nuisance of himself that he had to be sent to the provinces on faked missions, discredited by more forgeries by the ever busy Henry, discharged from the army. But he cautiously divulged his secret to a friend; others began to hear rumors and to have doubts. Scheurer-Kestner brought the matter up in the Chamber; Esterhazy was openly denounced and indignantly demanded an investigation, knowing it would be a sham. He was acquitted. Zola's famous letter "J'Accuse!" burst upon the world and earned him a conviction for libel. The clamor on both sides grew formidable. Cavaignac, Minister of War, rose in the Chamber to prove Dreyfus's guilt by reading certain letters which were almost immediately proved to be forgeries, and the trail now led so unmistakably to Henry that he was arrested. He confessed and immediately committed suicide. There followed the resignation of Cavaignac while his speech attacking Dreyfus was still posted on all the hoardings of France, the resignations of Generals Boisdeffre and de Pellieux, the flight of Esterhazy to England, where he disappeared, dying long after in an obscure village under an assumed name, and then the granting of the appeal to have the Dreyfus case reviewed.

But the end was not yet. Three revisions were necessary before the complete innocence of Dreyfus was officially established in 1906 and he was publicly exonerated and reinstated in the army, as was Colonel Picquart at the same time. Tremendous efforts, political battles, feuds within feuds intervened. Jaurés, Anatole France, and many others sprang into the arena to combat the doctrine, now put forth by the anti-Dreyfusard patriots, of the "patriotic forgery," justified when the honor of the army was at stake. The Gaulois of December 13, 1902, remarked: "Even if he did not commit the treason for which he was twice condemned, does he not remain . . .

the initial cause of the terrible social and political disorganization which we now witness. This revolution, coldly conceived and methodically executed by his companions, will bear his detested name in history. It . . . will always be called 'Dreyfusism.' "

M. Pierre Dreyfus tells extremely well the history of the Affaire from 1894 to 1899; the memoirs of his father bring it up to 1906. Among the new material are a number of letters from Madame Dreyfus to her husband at Devil's Island. With simplicity and restraint M. Dreyfus, the son, conveys the suffering and the fortitude of these two, their efforts to make the home life normal for the children, before and after the father's return, the devotion of his Uncle Mathieu. There is also a reference to the posthumous Memoirs of von Schwartzkoppen, the German Ambassador, who in them recorded in full the evidence of Dreyfus's innocence which he did not have the courage to make public when living. There are still some unexplained mysteries connected with Henry and the impudent, dissolute, and Germanophile Esterhazy. Here is every aspect of that grim social drama that combined Dostoevskian elements with Greek fatalism and was a more perfect mystery story than any work of fiction, for what author would dare so to overwork the forgeries, the coincidences, the villainies, the heroisms, the political involvements, the psychological enigmas. But most important for us, it is an X-ray plate of the bare bones of the political and military life of the period and essentially typical of ours, well.

CLARA GRUENING STILLMAN

Tax Reform

FACING THE TAX PROBLEM. A SURVEY OF TAXATION IN THE UNITED STATES AND A PROGRAM FOR THE FUTURE. Prepared under the Auspices of the Committee on Taxation of the Twentieth Century Fund. Published by the Twentieth Century Fund. $3.

ORDINARILY taxes are regarded as a necessary evil. It is assumed that sound tax policy means a reduction in taxation, and that the country is going to the dogs if it does not achieve this objective quickly. No account is taken of the disposition of tax funds or of the great potential value of taxation as an instrument of social and economic control. The Twentieth Century Fund study not only explodes many of these popular myths regarding government revenues but sets forth a program for the reform of our tax system which for the most part is constructive and valuable.

The overwhelming burden of taxation about which we hear so much turns out to be, for instance, only $100 a year for each person in the United States. This includes all forms of federal, state, and local taxation. A few persons in the higher income groups pay very much more, but the majority of Americans pay somewhat less, even when indirect taxes are taken into consideration. Similarly, the familiar complaint that the ever-increasing volume of taxes threatens to throttle normal business activity appears to be greatly exaggerated. The study finds no fixed limit to the amount of taxation that can be borne by our economic structure. The amount would vary under different conditions, particularly in accordance with the manner in which the tax revenues were used. If the money were utilized so as to supply a portion of the community with the basic necessities of life, the limit would be very high indeed. Although the authors find that a sharply graduated income tax may discourage undertakings in which

A NEW VICTOR ALBUM

Nine Beautiful Songs!

KIRSTEN FLAGSTAD

Flagstad in Song

Hear the thrilling voice of the great operatic soprano who has taken the country by storm! Hear her with the naturalness of Victor Higher Fidelity recording and reproduction.

Die Ehre Gottes Aus De Natur (Creation Hymn): Gellert-Beethoven
 Ich Liebe Dich (I Love Thee): Herrosen-Beethoven
 Lykken Mellem To Mennesker (Alnaes) Et Hab: Grieg
 Im Kahne (In the Boat) Krag-Grieg
 Lullaby (Rossetti-Cyril Scott)
 When I Have Sung My Songs (Charles)
 Der Gynger En Bat Pa Bolge: Grieg
 Ein Schwan (A Swan): Henzen-Grieg
 Lys Nat: Grieg Album M-342, 5 records, $7.50

RCA Victor Record
 Players $18.50 up

RCA Victor
 Phonograph-Radios
 $69.50 up

NEW VICTOR HIGHER FIDELITY RECORDING OF THE BRAHMS SYMPHONY NO. 3 IN F MAJOR

Played by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra
 Bruno Walter, Conductor
 Album M-341, 4 records, $6.50

RCA presents the "Magic Key" every Sunday, 2 to 3 P. M., E. D. T., on NBC Blue Network

VICTOR RECORDS

The world's greatest artists are on Victor Records
HIGHER FIDELITY

THE SOVIET UNION

in its 20th year!

This year the peoples of the Soviet Union are observing their 20th Anniversary—marking two historic decades since the October revolution. Observers of world events can scarcely fail to include the U.S.S.R. in any European itinerary. Fast air, train and boat connections put Lenin-grad, Moscow, Kiev and Odessa within easy reach of European capitals. Short or long tours, with these cities as starting places, may include the cruise down the Volga, excursions in the picturesque Caucasus mountains, steamer voyages along the Black Sea Riviera to sunny Crimea and visits to the industrial centers and mechanized farm areas of the Ukraine. In addition to independent itineraries your travel agent will tell you about more than 100 special-interest groups being organized to see and study various phases of Soviet life. The climax of the season will be the Fifth Soviet Theatre Festival, in Moscow September 1 to 10—during which the capital's great theatres will present their foremost productions.

CONSULT YOUR TRAVEL AGENT

Select from the many itineraries available at inclusive rates of $15 per day first class, $8 tourist, $5 third . . . providing all transportation on tour in the U.S.S.R., fine hotels, meals, sightseeing and guide-interpreter service. For map of the Soviet Union and Booklet NA-6, write to INTOURIST, INC.

545 Fifth Avenue, New York

360 N. Michigan Ave.
Chicago

756 South Broadway
Los Angeles

considerable risk is involved, they discover no evidence that ordinary business initiative has been greatly affected by such taxation.

Great possibilities for the expansion of federal and local revenues are found to exist if the recovery movement continues unchecked. Merely as an illustration, the authors point out that a more steeply graduated federal surtax on incomes—ranging from 1 per cent on surtax net incomes of $4,000 to 75 per cent on incomes of over $75,000—would produce 50 per cent more revenue, on the basis of 1934 incomes, than the 1936 rates. If the exemptions were dropped to $1,000 for married men, $500 for single persons, and $200 for children, the yield would be increased another 35 per cent. A substantial increase—running up to a billion dollars annually—would also be possible in the case of the estate tax, and added revenue might be obtained from federal gasoline and tobacco levies, as well as from state income taxes.

Although not opposed to the use of taxation as an instrument of social control, the study warns against certain abuses in tax policy. It condemns the tariff, the taxes on chain stores, graduated corporation taxes which are levied on "bigness," and tax exemptions granted to institutions or groups in lieu of cash subsidies. It favors redistribution of income as a goal in tax policy, provided the redistribution is from the wealthy to the less wealthy, and points out that many of the indirect taxes are regressive in their effect. Serious difficulties are found in the old concept of tax "justice," and it is suggested that in the future the emphasis will be shifted to capacity to pay and the impact of taxation on the operation of the economic system.

The committee's recommendations for action are on the whole definitely progressive in their implications. Most important is the suggestion that the exemptions for the personal income tax be reduced from their present level to $1,000 for married couples and $500 for single persons, with provision that the federal revenue gains from the lowering of exemption be offset by a reduction in other taxes that now fall heavily on persons of low income, such as tariff duties and possibly the social-security pay-roll taxes. If an increase in government revenue is desired in order to reduce the federal debt, the committee proposes that the money be obtained primarily by raising the income surtax rates in the middle brackets—between $5,000 and $50,000. It also recommends an increase in the gift and estate levies. On the other hand, it would eliminate sales taxes as soon as possible, as well as the indefensible chain-store tax.

Without taking exception to these conclusions in principle, one wonders whether it is necessary to reduce the exemption as much as is proposed by the committee in order to achieve the financial benefits of a broader base. The committee admits that a reduction in the exemption would bring in eight or nine millions and greatly increase the administrative tasks of the Revenue Department. Nearly four million of these returns would be from families in the $1,000 to $1,500 class, a group which would contribute practically nothing in the way of taxes. The argument that the payment of a tax, no matter how small, is desirable as a means of increasing the average citizen's sense of civic responsibility fails somehow to carry conviction. The study points out, for example, that from fifteen to twenty million families are already paying an automobile license tax, but it does not show how this development in tax consciousness has been of any value, except possibly to pressure groups that are seeking to restrict governmental expenditures.

The committee's recommendation for the repeal of the undistributed-profits tax also fails to carry conviction, especially since it is linked with an impracticable suggestion that individuals be compelled to value their shareholdings each year and enter the gain or loss in their income-tax returns. To cite only one of many defects in such a plan, one wonders what revenue would have been available for the government from 1929 to 1933? Although the scheme might take the place of the undistributed-profits tax as a device for making certain that individual taxpayers pay a graduated tax on their earnings as shareholders, it would leave untouched the crucial economic problems arising from the tendency of corporations to plow under their income instead of distributing it as purchasing power. It is unfortunate that this rather fantastic suggestion, unconcurred in by the research staff, should mar an otherwise exceedingly useful and timely volume.

MAXWELL S. STEWART

The Second Empire

THE GAUDY EMPIRE. By Alfred Neumann. Translated by Eden and Cedar Paul. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.75.

FIRST of all, this is, I must hasten to say, a typical German book, with all the pathetic features which accompany every German attempt to understand foreign psychology. Once this essential fact has been grasped, it becomes easier to judge of the value of Herr Neumann's description of the brilliant days of the Second French Empire. In many points this description is an excellent one. But the book is too long; it is boring in its endless explanations of things which can only be explained by intuition; and it gets completely off the track when it launches into imaginative stories of imagined things. In order to form a just idea of such conversations as took place at Biarritz between Napoleon III and Bismarck, one must have moved among the surroundings in which they were carried on. We live in an age when statesmen and great writers arise out of nothing, like mushrooms after a summer rain, but even writers blessed with genius cannot know all the ins and outs of the political affairs of a period like the Second Empire, when such events were kept secret and never were thrown to the man of the street for him to make his breakfast of. One who has closely followed the variations in the thought of Napoleon III as revealed by contemporary memoirs cannot quite figure to himself that the Emperor would ever have told Bismarck during those sunny afternoons when they paced together the beach at Biarritz, that "the interests of Prussia and of France were identical." This is German ignorance of foreign psychology, and it makes mincemeat of Herr Neumann's conviction that he was writing a historical work.

If his book is not that, is it a historical novel? One would read it with greater pleasure if one were sure that everybody would consider it that. But a historical novel must have more incidents and more glamor, must not fall into speculative psychological surmises; the author must remember that "The Three Musketeers" and "The Reine Margot" have survived the writer who gave them to the world because, among other reasons, they are what a novel ought to be, romantic and thrilling. There is no thrill in "Gaudy Empire"; not even in the brief description of the pathetic close of a career so illustrative of the vanity of all things as Napoleon III's.

The best pages in the book are those dealing with the plot of Orsini and the Italian policy of the Emperor. The description of both the Empress Eugénie and the famous

TRAVEL

Travel in SELECT SMALL GROUPS

EUROPE

Guests in Europe. For students only. Student hosts and guides abroad. France, England, Holland, Belgium, six days in the Alps, choice of Italy, Central Europe and Scandinavia. Sailing June 30. 8½ weeks.

$659

EUROPE and RUSSIA

Public Housing. Leader: Helen Alfred, Director, National Public Housing Conference. England, Holland, France, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Poland, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark. Sailing June 23. 8 weeks.

$670

American Student Union Tour. Leader: James Wechsler. For students only. Social inquiry in France, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark, England. Sailing July 3. 8 weeks.

$499

RUSSIA

General Survey Tour. Leader: Robert Magidoff, literary worker in Moscow since 1935. Sailing July 3. 11 weeks.

$399

A Travel "Collective." Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. 11 weeks.

$543

Theatre Festival Tour. Leader: Will Geer of New Theatre League. 5 weeks in Russia including Theatre Festival. Sailing July 28. 7½ weeks.

$595

Julien Bryan's Sixth Annual Trip through the highways and byways of the Soviet Union. Sailing July 10. 9 weeks.

$694

†A Public Health Survey. Leader: John A. Kingsbury, co-author "Red Medicine." Program arranged by Commissariat of Public Health. Sailing July 10. 9 weeks.

$797

†Open Road Travel Seminar. Leader: Anna Louise Strong, author "The New Soviet Constitution," etc., just back from 15 years in Russia. Sailing July 4. 9 weeks.

$895

* Third Class Steamship Passage
† Tourist Steamship Passage

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

BOOK

The American University— a debate on principles

To Robert Maynard Hutchins' conception of a university as set forth in The Higher Learning in America, Professor Gideonse of the University of Chicago makes sharp reply in

The Higher Learning in a Democracy

by HARRY D. GIDEONSE

The debate centers on this question: What should be the proper relation between science and the humanities? Read this important contribution to the subject.

40 pages, bound in boards, 50c

At your bookstore, or direct from

FARRAR & RINEHART, 232 Madison St., N. Y. C.

TOURS TO THE SOVIET UNION

MISS THYRA J. EDWARDS—educator, social worker—National Minorities Tour—Sailing July
9th.

DR. EDWARD KALLMAN'S — only one of W. and
U. S. R., with plenty of leisure and free-lancing.
Sailing July 7th.

CULTURAL TOUR—led by Dr.
C. Coleman—writer

authority on International Relations (8 countries). Sailing
July 1st.

SOVIET RUSSIA TODAY TOUR
—Leader, Fred W. Ingvaldstad,
Lecturer, Educator, and World
Traveller. Sailing July 7th.

MR. MARTIN E. CORDULACK—
educator (U. S. S. R. and other European countries). Sailing
July 3rd.

Other Conducted and Individual Tours in Europe and the U.S.S.R.

TOURS TO MEXICO WORLD TOURISTS, INC.

175 Fifth Ave.

New York

ALgonquin 4-6656-7-8

AMERICAN WRITERS CONGRESS

Speakers—Ernest Hemingway, Senator Gerald P.
Nye, Archibald MacLeish, Earl Browder, Donald
Ogden Stewart, Congressman John T. Bernard
On LABOR — SPAIN — FASCISM

● Fresh from Spain — High Spots of JORIS IVENS' BATTLE FILMS

TICKETS—$5c, 55c, $1.10—at League of Amer. Writers, Phone
9-6959; Book Union, MU. 5-1454; Bookshops—
50 E. 13th St., N. Y., 1001 Prospect Ave., Bronx; 309 Sutter Ave., Bklyn., Putnam Bookstore, N. Y.

Carnegie Hall — Fri., June 4 — 8:30 P. M.

EARL BROWDER COMMUNIST or TOOL of WALL ST. (Stalin, Trotsky or Lenin) By GEORGE MARLEN

Author of THE ROAD

496 pp.—$1.00 Cloth—$1.50

Order from GEORGE MARLEN, P. O. Box 67, Sta. D, New York
LABOR BOOK SHOP RAND BOOK STORE SOCIALIST CALL
E. 12th St. 7 E. 15th St. 21 E. 17th St.

Nation readers are cordially invited to the
JUNE CONFERENCE

of the

LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY

Napanoch Country Club, Napanoch, N. Y.

June 18-20, 1937

Subject: "TOWARD A FARMER-LABOR PARTY"

SPEAKERS: Norman Thomas, George Soule, Congressman
John T. Bernard, Earl Browder, James B. Carey, Julius Hochman, Joseph Schlossberg, Murray Baron, Alfred Bingham, John J. Dillon, Arthur Huggins, John H. Bosch, and others.

For information write to

DR. HARRY W. LAIDLER

League for Industrial Democracy

112 East 19th Street, New York City

Countess de Castiglione are so inexact as to be beneath notice. One great fault of the book is that while it is frequently so drawn out that it becomes confused, it is yet much too short when it comes to the final catastrophe which destroyed the Second Empire. The author could have expanded this with profit, for he seems to have a better knowledge of it than of French society during the reign of Napoleon III. One does not understand what has made him ascribe such importance to Rochefort, whose fiery and unscrupulous temperament only came really to the front after the fall of the empire, and who first became a popular hero during the Third Republic. Before its advent he was looked upon only as an agitator.

"Gaudy Empire" is decidedly a partisan book; it aims to present a period of modern history from its own point of view, the German one, and to exploit the events of that period as a justification of things which it is still too early to evaluate. It lacks conciseness, and the writer would have done better to model himself after certain French authors in his appreciation of an age still wrapped in the clouds of social and political ignorance—for example, after André Bellessort, who has recently published "French Society Under Napoleon III." It is, as a critic said the other day, "a story of men and women of whom few people possess much definite knowledge." If Herr Neumann had possessed more, he would have given us a better book.

CATHERINE RADZIWILL

War Poem

FIVE MEN: A POEM. By Craddock Edmunds. Around-the-Corner Bookshop: Lynchburg, Virginia. $2.

LIKE Colonel Fenwick of Craddock Edmunds's narrative this is a poem full of "anger and action." Mr. Edmunds's concern here is with war: his purpose has been to objectify a universal folly in terms of individual conduct. The canvas is consequently a broad one and the colors dark almost without relief. Five men, strategically combined to embody as many different ways of life, are carried in parallels through an incident in the Battle of Rheims, while on yet another level the facts of their behavior are projected toward a fixed ethical concept. Count von Markert, a Prussian colonel of the old school, awaits the great offensive embittered by a sense of his unrecognized worth and with abuse for his bungling superiors. The English Colonel Fenwick, "clinging still to texts well learned in youth," eases a rebellious conscience by the process of supplanting the Sermon on the Mount with the excoriations of the prophets. Another and highly dramatic vehicle of contrast is afforded by the two younger men of the poem, Privates Michael and Helmut, whom the poet brings together with an effect of increasing tension and terror until the young Helmut obtains satisfaction in "that last, long, and most exquisite trembling Up to the bayonet to hand and flesh." Perhaps the most powerfully realized portrait of the five, however, is that of the American surgeon, Coles, who, on the brink of madness, serves as the poet's interlocutor and drives home the unhappy truth of the poem with a clinical simplicity that is the more deadly for its complete freedom from cant. In general, the blank verse moves with an energy that marks the style as peculiarly the author's own instrument, and the poem as a whole attains a memorable climax in the closing section. It is many years since the South has produced an achievement in sustained narrative verse as vigorous as "Five Men."

BEN BELITT

Letters to the Editors

The Struggle in Catalonia

Dear Sirs: I have just returned from several months in Spain. I was no sooner off the ship (the Normandie, May 18), than my attention was called to your issue of May 15 with its editorial entitled Uprising in Catalonia. I am shocked by the number of statements contrary to fact to be found in that brief article, the attitude expressed there, and above all that it appears unsigned and thus as the opinion of the editors of The Nation.

Permit me to point out a few of the misstatements:

1. "Anarchist irreconcilables supported by the P. O. U. M. staged a little civil war by attacking the Loyalist government." The attack came from government troops, not from the Anarchists and the P. O. U. M. Under the pretense of building up a "treasury guard," the Department of Hacienda organized picked troops for internal civil war, called the Carabineros, up to the number of 40,000. These it sent into Catalonia to disarm and replace the Catalonian safety patrols and border service. The latter posts have been in the hands of the Syndicalists since the first day of the military revolt and were a vital factor in stopping fascism in Catalonia. The Syndicalists resisted disarmament, much as the popular National Guard resisted disarmament by Thiers during the Paris Commune. The C. N. T. had entered the Catalonian collaboration government on the express condition that the patrols were not to be disarmed. Hence the move was in the nature of a coup d'état and did not even have constitutional warrant.

2. "Under their influence Catalonia printed its own currency," etc. The Catalonian nationalist autonomy movement does not spring from the Anarchists and Syndicalists. Rather one of the defects of these parties till recently was a tendency toward an abstract rejection of nationalism and the movement for autonomy.

3. "The factories in Barcelona have contributed little to the munitions supply." I am in a position to declare that the bulk of the war industries of Spain have been developed precisely in Catalonia, and it is the rest of Spain, with the exception of Biscay, that has "contributed little to the munitions supply."

4. "The dissident Anarchists and the

P. O. U. M.—including its Trotskyist wing—had created the utmost tension because . . . many arms shipments sent by Valencia found their way into private supply depots in Barcelona." First, the resistance was not led simply by dissident Anarchists but by the C. N. T. and F. A. I., and those condemning it were in the minority. Second, the P. O. U. M. is neither Trotskyist, as is generally stated, nor endowed with a Trotskyist wing. A few of its members are former Trotskyists who long ago broke with and were expelled by Trotsky. He has attacked the P. O. U. M. The latter in turn has expelled all avowed Trotskyites, who have a paper of their own which attacks the P. O. U. M. with all its feeble might. Why was the "wing" business dragged in, anyway? Third, "many arms shipments" were not sent by Valencia to Catalonia. The flow of armaments has been mainly the other way. One of the bitter complaints of the militiamen on the Aragon front, and it was universal, was that Valencia was withholding airplanes and tanks, the only things it could have shipped since they come generally from abroad, in order to force a purge of the Aragon troops. The Syndicalist press repeatedly demanded, "All long arms to the front." This was aimed at the Carabineros, or treasury "home guards." The Syndicalists repeatedly demanded an official investigation of the systematic sabotage of the arming of the Aragon front and the prevention of an offensive there, and the government repeatedly evaded the demand for an investigation. The only recorded case of equipment, other than small arms, "finding its way into private supply depots," was the case of ten tanks, not shipped from Valencia but built in Barcelona for the Aragon front, which were stolen on forged order, not by the P. O. U. M. or Anarchists or Syndicalists, but by the P. S. U. C., the official Communist Party in Catalonia. The theft is a matter of public record but no responsibility for it was fixed up to the day of my departure.

It is the view of the Syndicalists, Anarchists, and P. O. U. M. that since the bourgeois republic in Spain has twice given birth to fascist uprisings, it should not be restored again; that since the regular "non-partisan" army has rebelled and the workers' militias have defeated them, a unified workers' army should be developed out of those militias and not a new "non-political" army, blind instrument of its middle-class officers; that since the owners of land and industry have rebelled, their property should be socialized and the economic roots of future reactionary rebellions thus plowed under and removed; that since collaboration of the workers' parties with the bourgeois parties under Azaña led to the retention, first, of Sanjurjo till he revolted, and then of the Franco crowd till they revolted, Azaña should not again be rehabilitated so that the costly error may be repeated yet again. The coalition government (Popular Front) made possible the uprising of 1932, the reaction of 1934, and the uprising of 1936. The Syndicalists, the Anarchists, the P. O. U. M., and the overwhelming majority of the old-time trade unionists in the U. G. T.—except in those provinces, like Catalonia, where it was virtually nonexistent till after the July days of last year when it was constructed by the Communist Party and recruited large numbers of small shopkeepers, industrialists, office workers, government officials, and backward sections of the working class that had always opposed trade unionism—are determined not to return to the bourgeois republic. Not always clear about how to realize their aim, they are trying to get, and believe they are moving toward, a workers' front as against a people's front and a workers' government as against a bourgeois government and socialism as against capitalism.

It is noteworthy that the recent intrigues intended to eliminate the Syndicalists from the government were also aimed at Largo Caballero and the old leadership, the founders of the U. G. T., and that the new government includes neither U. G. T. nor C. N. T., and is headed by Dr. Negrin, under whose rule the treasury department developed the shock troops for internal civil war, the Carabineros.

The Nation may or may not agree with those views. But it has the obligation to state them fairly, to avoid confusing the issue by prejudice-arousing shibboleths like "Trotskyist."

As far as the writer is concerned, after several months of first-hand study in Barcelona, Madrid, Valencia, and many smaller towns and villages, and on two fronts, he is convinced that we have not yet heard the last of the Syndicalists, Anarchists, and P. O. U. M., and the sectors of the U. G. T. that are closest to them. Sooner or later they will hammer out, publicly or underground as necessity may dictate, the only possible leadership and program for the Spanish working class and the permanent defeat of fascism.

BERTRAM D. WOLFE

New York, May 20

[The following answer to Mr. Wolfe was written by Louis Fischer at the request of The Nation. The editorial to which Mr. Wolfe objects was based in large part on first-hand information in Mr. Fischer's possession. The Nation has steadily depended upon Mr. Fischer's personal experience and continuing contact with developments in Spain to supplement the material available in the press. While the details of the recent Anarchist-Popular Front conflict are somewhat clouded by the propaganda originating from both sides, the fundamental issues remain clear. Mr. Wolfe has expounded the extreme revolutionary view effectively, but he has failed to convince us (1) that at this stage the Spanish government should be a strictly working-class government rather than a coalition of all parties and groups willing to collaborate in resisting fascist aggression; (2) that the war could be directed successfully by a government simultaneously prosecuting a program of general collectivization, or fought by a citizens' army which was not coordinated under a unified command; or (3) that under the circumstances the Anarchists were justified in refusing to turn over their arms to the government.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Dear Sirs: In September and October, 1936, the Spanish Anarchists (F. A. I. and C. N. T.) insisted on admission into the Popular Front government. In November four of their leaders were included in Caballero's Cabinet. They thus joined with the liberal bourgeois Republican, Socialist, and Communist parties to prosecute the war and continue the social revolution. The obvious implication of their adherence to the Valencia government was cooperation with it.

Such collaboration is not comparable to the assistance which Socialist parties have in the past given bourgeois governments at war. Nor is there a parallel between the Azaña cabinets of 1932-33 and 1936 and the Popular Front of today. For Franco precipitated a revolution in Loyalist territory which is irrevocable, and Caballero and Negrin have facilitated and guided vast social changes. Seven and a half million acres of estates have been taken from their pro-rebel owners and distributed among peasants. Almost all large factories and many medium-sized industrial establishments have been seized by the state or trade unions or political parties or employees' organizations. No faction in the Valencia government has thus far opposed or impeded these steps.

The left Republicans, the Socialists, the Communists, and a part of the Anarchists differ with the dissident Anarchists and Trotskyists about something else. Is the lower middle class also to be expropriated, and should the sequestered feudal lands be taken from their new individual holders and cultivated collectively? The Popular Front maintains that the small shopkeepers and small peasants are profoundly anti-fascist. They represent no danger to the new Spain which is emerging, and if they did, they could easily be coped with. To antagonize them now would mean to throw them into the arms of the rebels at a time when to lose any supporters of the Popular Front might mean to lose the civil war. Similarly the government welcomes agrarian collectivization where the peasants themselves want it. But superimposed collectivization would make enemies of the peasantry and thus pave the way for Franco's victory. To push the revolution too far may mean to defeat it. Lenin did not collectivize in Russia in 1918.

The corollary of the Anarchists' entrance into the Caballero government was the acceptance of this principle, for you cannot work with the left bourgeois Republicans in city and village and at the same time seek to crush every vestige of the petty bourgeoisie by means of immediate and complete socialist revolution. This was not, however, merely a logical compulsion. A victory over fascism required the arrangement. When Mr. Wolfe advocates a workers' government as against a popular-front government he urges the dismissal of valuable allies who are at the front fighting enthusiastically against Franco. When he demands socialism tomorrow he means to drive out millions whose economic status would be destroyed. This "infantile leftism" would alienate potential pro-Loyalists in Franco country and, incidentally, intensify foreign hostility.

Despite Anarchist adhesion to the Popular Front, some Anarchists have nevertheless continued to dispossess small private tradesmen and to collectivize at the point of the rifle. We have had very convincing reports about the armed resistance which was thus provoked. James M. Minifie, among others, wrote about it in great detail in the New York Herald Tribune of April 28 and May 6.

To cope with the hostility which they themselves were creating and to prepare for an armed struggle with the Communists and Socialists which, sadly enough, the dissident Anarchists and their Trotskyist friends considered inevitable, these groups established their own arsenals. If Mr. Wolfe knows of only a single instance of arms seized, and that by the Socialist-Communist P. S. U. C., his information is one-sided, to say the least. I have heard of many more in which Anarchists were involved. Last autumn the government issued orders that all arms be sent to the front. Mr. Minifie writes about this too. Quoting a long Anarchist defense he says, "It is plain from their own account that the Anarchists at Cullera had not surrendered their arms." This was true in many localities. The battle fronts languished for lack of munitions which were held for use in the rear. From the autumn of 1936 until May, 1937, Valencia coaxed and argued. Then it put down its foot and demanded. Thereupon the Anarchists and Trotskyists took to the barricades. Herbert L. Matthews confirms this account of the sequence of events. "The Valencia government had to send troops to quell the uprising," Matthews wrote in the New York Times of May 23.

The trouble centered in Catalonia. Of course Barcelona has given more munitions than Madrid and other non-industrial towns. Barcelona is Spain's greatest metallurgical city. But it has given far less than it should have, and absolutely the volume was small. There is objective proof of this. The Aragon and Teruel fronts are really Catalan fronts held by Anarchists and should be directly supplied by Barcelona. Barcelona cannot produce airplanes or many cannon. But it ought to put out at least enough cartridges. Yet for months the brigades have stood at Huesca and Teruel without making any progress and doing little fighting. At times in these places there were not more than eight rounds of ammunition per soldier. Since December, when supplies increased, Anarchist units have frequently refused to go into battle. The so-called "Iron Column" had to be removed from the front in April for this reason.

Free Sample Copies for Your Friends

Help the progressive forces of America. Give us the names and addresses of friends who may enjoy a sample copy of The Nation.

When we mail the sample we should like to say that you are one of our subscribers, but if you prefer that we withhold your name, we will.

We offer the spacious coupon below for your convenience.

THE NATION,
20 Vesey Street,
New York City.

Send sample copies to the following friends.
You may use my name which is or ☐ I prefer to withhold my name.

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507 Fifth Ave. MUrray Hill 2-4221.

MANUSCRIPTS

MANUSCRIPT TYPING—MIMEOGRAPHING. Excellent work. Prompt Service. Reasonable prices. PHYLLIS NORTON, 160 E. 91 St. Phone ATwater 9-3100.

SITUATION WANTED

Personable companion, chauffeur, secretary, or what-not. Age 25, 6 ft., 168 lbs. No home complete without one. Box No. 918, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

Two College men making eight weeks' auto tour of U. S. and Mexico. Would like to contact other young men. Share expenses. Box No. 919, c/o The Nation.

Elderly man or woman for light work small poultry farm managed by University graduate and liberal. Box No. 920, c/o The Nation.

SUBLET OR SHARE

Knickerbocker Village 3½ room apartment, completely furnished, to sublet or to share with gentleman. WAdsworth 7-3826 (6-8 P. M.).

FOR RENT

Unusual studio cottage overlooking trout brook; fireplace, terraces, modern improvements, interestingly furnished. Secluded. Commuting distance. Phone Peekskill 2325W.

Cozy houses, concrete pool, acres of space, lawns, shade, fruit, woods, tennis, plumbing, reasonable, hour commuting. P. J. Kohler, Attractive bungalow, Stoneybrook Colony, Westport, Conn. All conveniences, swimming, tennis, handball, summer school for children. Berman, Topping 2-5017.

FOR SALE

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy
A Small COUNTRY PLACE
Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value
O. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2518-M

DO YOU WANT—

A house in Bermuda—a ranch in Wyoming—an apartment—a room
—an office—a secretary—a piano
—a lecturer—a tutor—a telescope
—a grandfather's clock—a bicycle—
All of these have appeared in our Classified columns.

We have more than 40,000 readers you, too, can reach. Call the Advertising Department, COrtlandt 7-3330 by Friday, so your advertisement may be in the next week's issue.

RATES:

62 CENTS A LINE OF 6 WORDS
MINIMUM 3 LINES

RESORTS

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:

116 Nassau St., Room 1014
BEekman 3-6345

WORKMEN'S CIRCLE CAMP

SYLVAN LAKE, HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
A progressive summer place for young and old
Children's Camp: Co-ed—boys and girls—ages 6-14 years. Intermediate Colony: Co-ed—boys and girls—ages 15-18 years.
All camp activities. Educational activities conducted with particular stress on the progressive character of the organization. A non-profit institution. Prices in Children's Camp, for members: $150 per season—$75 first half season—$80 second half season—$52 for two weeks.
Intermediate Colony—$32 for two weeks. For non-members—$1.00 more per week. Prices for adults: For members—$18-$24. For non-members—$19-$25.
For further information write or call:
175 E. Broadway, N. Y. Phone: ORchard 4-6000-2052

TRAVEL

TOURS CONDUCTED OR INDEPENDENT
To Western Europe, Palestine, Soviet Russia, Paris International Exposition,
and the Salzburg Festival
Ask for free literature
AMALGAMATED BANK
11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

HOTELS

MANGER

"One Price"

FINER HOTELS

EXCELLENT CUISINE

RATES
Rooms From	Double From
$3	$4.50

10% discount until September 1st allowed on transient rooms at Washington Hotels if this ad is presented. Write for Booklet.

WASHINGTON (34)

Hotel HAMILTON
ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
14th & K N.W. Phone DIst. 2580
HAY-ADAMS House
ALL BEDROOMS AIR-CONDITIONED
16th & H St. N.W. Phone Met. 2260
Hotel ANNAPOLIS
H St. Bet. 11th and 12th N.W.
Rooms from $2.00; Double $3.50
With Kitchenette if Desired
FREE PARKING AT WASHINGTON HOTELS

BOSTON

Hotel MANGER
The Wonder Hotel of New England
In North Station. Phone CAP. 2600
Radio in Every Room

NEW YORK

Hotel WINDSOR
58th St. & 6th Ave. COL. 5-2100

In their forced-collectivization activities and in other work at the rear the "uncontrollables" among the Anarchists have enjoyed the ready assistance of the Trotskyists. Mr. Wolfe objects to The Nation calling the P. O. U. M. Trotskyist, but he himself proves that it is. The P. O. U. M. was formed by the Workers' and Peasants' Party, led by Maurin, and the Trotskyist Communist Opposition, led by Andres Nin. The P. O. U. M. rejects the Fourth International. It has also invited Trotsky's displeasure by joining a Popular Front government in Catalonia. But during most of its history, as Mr. Wolfe shows, the P. O. U. M. has opposed the Popular Front, has favored collectivization in the midst of the civil war, and wanted socialism at once. If one adds all the connotations of its violent anti-Soviet attitude, despite all that Russia has done for the Loyalist cause, one has most of the elements of Trotskyism.

Reports from Spain indicate that the prominent Anarchist leaders were opposed to the Barcelona uprising and urged the "rebels" to desist. The hope of peace among the Loyalists lies in the victory of this cooperative policy over that of the "uncontrollables." It seems to me that this is no time for dissensions which play into Franco's hands.

LOUIS FISCHER

New York, May 26

Catholic Americana

Dear Sirs: Some time ago the maid of a friend of mine came home from church one Sunday looking very depressed. Upon being questioned, she said that the parish priest had told the congregation that no good Catholics should work for Jews, as all Jews were Communists and thus enemies of the church. Furthermore, he read out the names of those girls in the parish who worked for Jewish employers and said they should leave their jobs. Two weeks later this maid left my friend's home. Recently I was told of a woman who interviewed several applicants for the position of nursemaid for her child. Three of them said they could not work in a Jewish home. When asked the reason at least one of them said that the parish priest had said they should not. The Catholic church is not having a happy time in the land of Hitler, yet it seems to be adopting his methods. If communism is out to destroy the Bill of Rights of the American Constitution, the church seems to be stealing a march on it.

A READER

Brooklyn, May 10

Dear Sirs: Can you give some publicity to the organization of the Catholic church which is operating in the Chicago public high schools? It is called "Cisca," for Chicago International Schools Catholic Association. Meetings are held in the high schools and addressed by Catholic priests. Recently in Chicago the school board and Superintendent Johnson prevented teachers of civics from sponsoring student participation in a contest favoring the city-manager form of municipal government. Mayor Kelly and most of the school board are Catholic, and Superintendent Johnson, reported a convert to Catholicism, has been a willing instrument in their hands.

A HISTORY TEACHER

Chicago, April 24

Mr. Cardiff Vindicated

Dear Sirs: You may recall my letters referring to certain litigation the Washington Dehydrated Food Company has had with the federal Food and Drug Administration, a correspondence which grew out of a swipe you took at us in your issue of February 26, 1936. The government appealed the case to the federal District Court of Appeals at Kansas City. On April 24 the court handed down its decision sustaining the findings of the lower court, which, as you may recall, were to the effect that the government was entirely wrong in these seizures. You may desire to shed some tears in behalf of your bureaucratic friends on this defeat.

IRA D. CARDIFF

Washington, May 15

[The "swipe" to which Mr. Cardiff refers was printed in Ruth Brindze's column, Facts for Consumers. Miss Brindze spoke of a suit for "malicious persecution" brought by Mr. Cardiff against a food-and-drug inspector, and suggested that unfortunate results might ensue if administration inspectors were made personally liable for the performance of their official duties.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

No "Nix on Pix in Stix"

Dear Sirs: Through the notice given the film "Spain in Flames" in The Nation and through the adverse notice given it by the reactionary press, we became interested in the feature and played it May 11-13 at the Rex Theater in Thompson Falls, of which I am proprietor. The picture was well received by the audience and aroused some real thought. I cannot see why it was banned from Pennsylvania and Ohio. Out here in the sticks we seem to have a little more freedom of press and speech.

If I had my way I would show this "Spain in Flames" in every schoolroom in the country and to every religious and social organization working for universal peace. It is the greatest argument against war and fascism ever placed on the screen.

H. O. EKERN

Thompson Falls, Mont., May 21

CONTRIBUTORS

LUDWIG LORE, formerly editor of the New York Volkszeitung, conducts a column called "Behind the Cables" in the New York Post.

ROBERT W. HORTON is Washington correspondent for the Scripps-Howard Newspaper Alliance.

H. C. ENGELBRECHT, editor of World Events, is coauthor with Frank Hanighen of "Merchants of Death," the book which awoke Americans to the munitions makers' international.

E. B. ASHTON has lived for many years in Germany. He is the author of a recently published book, "The Fascist; His State and Mind."

G. ARBAIZA is a distinguished South American journalist who was at one time correspondent for the New York World. He is now at work on a book on pan-American relations.

COLSTON E. WARNE teaches economics at Amherst.

ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS represented the defendants in the Reichstag-fire trial and has been active in many other cases involving violations of civil liberties.

MAXWELL GEISMAR is on a year's leave of absence from the English Department of Sarah Lawrence College.

MARY VAN KLEECK is chairman of the Interprofessional Association for Social Insurance and director of the Department of Industrial Studies of the Russell Sage Foundation.

HARRY LEVIN is a Junior Lowell Fellow at Harvard University.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 12, 1937

NUMBER 24

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

661

EDITORIALS:

TOM GIRDLER'S DEFIANCE

664

THE DRIFT TO WAR

665

WASHINGTON IS A BATTLEFIELD

665

"THE NATION" IS SOLD

666

TAX-DODGERS ON PARADE

by Ernest K. Lindley

667

REPUBLIC STICKS TO ITS GUNS

by Rose M. Stein

668

SLAUGHTER IN CHICAGO

by Meyer Levin

670

GROWING PAINS OF MEXICAN LABOR

by L. O. Prendergast

671

INDIANA IDYL

by Joe Collier

674

CONSUMERS ON THE MARCH

by Colston E. Warne

675

AN OPEN LETTER TO NORMAN DAVIS

by Oswald Garrison Villard

677

THE DAILY WORKER

by Heywood Broun

678

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

NEW FORMS OF THE DANCE

by Paul Love

679

ROADS TO TRAGEDY

by William Troy

680

JUDICIAL SUPREMACY

by Charles E. Clark

682

A PARTHIAN GLANCE

by Harry Levin

684

FILMS: SALTWATER SETTING

by Mark Van Doren

685

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by  The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

★

THE DOCTORS ARE FINALLY BREAKING DOWN the Chinese wall that has separated them from the world of social reality. As we go to press the House of Delegates of the American Medical Association, meeting at Atlantic City, is considering a resolution indorsing public medicine. "The health of the people," says the resolution, "is the direct concern of government." The resolution seems to have a good chance of adoption. If it goes through, it will amount almost to a revolution in the attitude of the medical profession. As such it must be hailed with delight by progressives. The action of the A. M. A. is not hard to interpret. It has been evident to all doctors except those with blinders that the present organization of medical economics cannot possibly continue. Some form of social medicine under someone's control is inevitable. The doctors are now moving to make sure that it is a form not too dangerous to competitive practice, and that they have the major hand in its control.

★

THE PRESIDENT HAS AT LAST PUT HIS shoulder to the mired wheel of public housing. "Must legislation" is now called "preferred," but a housing bill is definitely on the list. Whatever the phrasing, Roosevelt can still make or break the Wagner-Steagall bill. Unfortunately he has raised trouble for himself and the public by referring the bill to the Treasury for approval or criticism. After weeks of delay Mr. Morgenthau has now proposed that it be drastically amended. He wants the government subsidy to be paid in one lump sum at the start of each project instead of being spread in small annual contributions over many years. On the billion-dollar program provided for in the Wagner bill this would require $600,000,000 in outright grants during the next three years, compared with the $47,250,000 which the present bill would call for. With economy the dominant mood of Congress, any such change in the bill would of course either kill it completely or drastically reduce the amount of housing that could be built. Mr. Morgenthau also wants the proposed Federal Housing Authority put in the Department of the Interior, where its control would be subject to change with each Presidential election, instead of given the independent status which the Wagner bill provides. On these crucial points no compromise is possible. Mr. Wagner is right and Mr. Morgenthau is wrong. We hope the President will make his own decision and promptly—in favor of the Wagner bill as drawn. This matter has been dragged out far too long already.

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY

★

UNTIL HE DIED GENERAL MOLA WAS THE "great strategist," the conqueror of Irun and San Sebastian. But now he will be remembered as the man who failed to take Madrid and Bilbao. When he was in direct command of the Madrid front his predictions that "we will be in the city tomorrow" never came off. Later, when he led the insurgent forces against Bilbao, the same boast steadily failed to materialize. In the report that he was killed by a time bomb set off inside the airplane in which he was traveling, there may be some truth. The fact that members of the ground crew at the rebel airport of Saragossa have been arrested for signaling to Loyalist airplanes and the report that there has been fighting among two factions of the Phalangists under Franco indicates the possibility of internal treason among the rebels. Meanwhile on the central front the Loyalists have recaptured several passes in the Guadarrama Mountains and crossed over into the plains beyond. This represents an important strategic advance as it allows them to take the offensive toward Segovia and Avila and diverts some of Franco's forces from Bilbao. At Valencia the Negrin government has been strengthened by the growing support of the U. G. T., the Socialist trade-union group whose allegiance had been problematical because of their loyalty to former Premier Caballero, and by the negotiations which the Anarchist C. N. T. has begun with a view to participation in the Cabinet.

★

MORE THAN 8,000 BASQUE CHILDREN HAVE so far been transported to France from the burning suburbs of Bilbao and nearby villages under attack. Some 4,000 were sent to England, 500 to Belgium, a like number to Holland. Another 500 have just landed in Mexico, brought over at the expense of the Mexican government. The United States still dodges the obvious obligations of humanity and hospitality. Under pressure from the American Board of Guardians, established to cooperate in the task of saving their children, the Department of State, through Under Secretary Sumner Welles, expressed its profound sympathy for the young refugees and then pointed out the many technical obstacles in the way of admitting to the United States the 500 children for whom visitors' visas are being requested. Mr. Welles implied that the Secretary of Labor had discretion in determining the eligibility of the children and insisted that the consular authorities in Paris would consider their cases in "the most humane and generous way possible under the law." Meanwhile nothing happens; except that protests against admitting the children are pouring in on Washington from Catholic societies and individuals and newspapers. Apparently the church authorities would prefer to have Catholic children exposed to the bombs of Franco and his Nazi allies than to the possible Loyalist sympathies of their American would-be rescuers.

JEAN HARLOW'S DEATH CROWDED THE STRIKE and war news not only out of the press but out of the minds of most Americans as well. That was the final triumph of a career whose brief meteoric course has done more than most others to light up the nature of the American character. For it was not only that Jean Harlow was the glamor girl of the screen, desired and desirable, a symbol of the more blatant charms that a rather blatant people values. More important was the reckless, open honesty, the downright assertion of personality, that broke through all the roles she undertook. She was not a great actress, although she had more ability than the critics were at first willing to concede to her. But she was a person whom the movie audiences felt they understood. She rose from the ranks to the big money in the only remaining part of our national economy where the career open to talent still draws its fabulous rewards. Her life was like a chapter out of John Dos Passos.

★

IN ENGLAND THE NATIONAL HARMONY which Mr. Baldwin so cunningly patched together for Mr. Chamberlain to inherit still holds the day—but only on the surface. While the princes of the church averted their eyes, the workingman's pastor performed the marriage ceremony for his one-time king and added the last unbelievable touch to the abdication drama which England is trying so desperately to pretend never happened. The new Premier got off to a bad start. All the plaudits given his speech (a gem of pure Baldwinese) announcing his withdrawal of the tax on excess profits cannot hide the fact that he has been roundly beaten on his first major measure and on his home grounds of the Exchequer. Protestations of fraternity and equality at the Empire conference cannot conceal the gap between the progressive dominions and Tory England, nor the unlikelihood of any agreement on tariff revision and on dominion contributions to English rearmament. In the labor field, while the bus strike has been ended and the threatened coal strike averted, the fundamental causes of conflict in both cases remain unsettled. And in dissolving its radical wing, the Socialist League, the Labor Party has won an empty triumph. For, within the party, members of the league will continue to fight for a more leftward orientation. But nowhere is the transparency of England's façade more apparent than in the newsreels of the coronation. They reveal a ceremony so artificial and hollow that all the publicity resources of a great empire could not pour life into it.

★

WE QUOTE FROM THE MAGAZINE TIME, which is not generally credited with having a pro-labor bias, a paragraph commenting on Henry H. Bennett's version of the encounter between "loyal employees" of Ford and the organizers of the automobile workers. Mr. Bennett, Ford's public-relations counsel, said specifically that "no Ford service man or plant police were involved in any way in the fight. . . ." Herewith Time's comment:

Unfortunately for Mr. Bennett's account as far as it concerned the beating of Organizer Frankenstein, there were too many witnesses. Newshawks reported recognizing Ford "service men" as the attackers, reported that these men had asked which were Frankenstein and Reuther. Also the Ford men were not quick enough to seize the plates of photographers. One group of camera men were chased in a car at 60 m.p.h. and took refuge in the Melvindale police station, where they were followed by three men who identified themselves as Ford service men. The pictures showed that Frankenstein and friends were given no amateur beating but a standard job of mauling including well-known gorilla tricks. One of the pictures disclosed a pair of handcuffs in the pocket of an attacker, and from the photographs it seemed likely that the Ford men would be identified. It looked very much as if that brutal beating might hurt Henry Ford as much as it hurt Richard Frankenstein.

Time, for once, has told.

★

NAZIS AND CATHOLICS ARE NOW OPENLY at war in Germany. Eleven Catholic priests were arrested last week in Munich, and street fights have occurred. The Nazi radicals are in earnest. The theory of the totalitarian state demands complete control over the youth of the nation. That is the heart of the struggle. The religious orders will probably be liquidated after the immorality trials, and the Catholic statistics showing how trifling is the proportion of immoral priests to the total number will do little good. The more courageous priests will continue to be arrested and will languish for years in concentration camps. What Goebels and Göring cannot brook is to have their sway over the minds of the young challenged by the Catholic youth organizations and the Catholic schools. They have however undertaken no easy task. The Catholic church is not like the Social-Democratic trade unions. It has a toughness of fiber; it feeds on martyrdom; it has survived persecutions before and emerged from them with greater strength. Meanwhile we cannot help asking, with President Frank Kingdon of Dana College, what the Catholics were doing when Hitler came to power. If they had then shown one-tenth of their present stubbornness, they would not now be called to martyrdom.

★

APPOINTMENT OF PRINCE FUMIMARO KONOE to succeed General Hayashi as Premier of Japan promises to give that country a more stable government than it has had at any time in the past six years. Because of his rank and background Konoe enjoys immense personal prestige with both the army and the civilian elements. As a ward and disciple of Prince Saionji, the elder statesman, he is known to be relatively progressive in his domestic policies. Although his "national union" Cabinet contains relatively few representatives from the dominant political parties, he is assured of support by practically all parliamentary groups. Ordinarily the elimination of political friction within Japan might be expected to contribute to happier conditions throughout the Far East. The selection of Hirota as Foreign Minister suggests, however, that this will not be the case. Hirota is closely associated with the extreme military clique; he was Foreign Minister and Premier during the period when Japanese policy was most irreconcilable toward China, and his appointment at this stage is interpreted within Japan as repudiation of Sato's relatively mild policies. Any danger that might exist in this tendency is largely offset, however, by China's increasing resistance. Tokyo is no longer the sole key to Far Eastern developments.

★

THE BATTLESHIP ALWAYS SEEMS TO HAVE AN alibi; at least one is always offered for it by those who still believe in that antiquated type of fighting ship. Thus when the insurgent Spanish battleship Jaime I was bombed and disabled by loyalist airmen, it was asserted by "experts" in the British Admiralty and in Washington that that did not count because the ship was very old and lacked modern deck protection against air attack. Well, now we have the case of the Deutschland, the first of the German "pocket battleships," which caused such a sensation in the Allied navies when it was launched. This is a fairly modern battleship, yet it was successfully attacked, twenty-five of the crew being killed and eighty-one wounded. The German government officially stated that the loss of life occurred when the men were at a meal in "an unarmored part" of the ship. An unarmored part of an impregnable modern battleship? We did not know that there was such a thing. The defenders of these monsters have pointed out that the ship lay at anchor. Well, ships have to lie at anchor even in war time. To this they reply that the air attack was unexpected, as is shown by the crew's being at table. But the Spaniards assert that their airplanes were fired upon by the ship. Unfortunately the facts may never be clearly established; and so the battleship per se is again saved—for the moment. But the fact is undeniable that bombs hit the ship and penetrated its decks and did horrible damage. And still we Americans are going straight ahead laying down two more battleships to cost $50,000,000 each.

★

APPARENTLY ON THE BASIS OF TOM GIRDLER'S lawyer's account of what an assistant postmaster in Niles, Ohio, had said about two union officials not allowing "irregular" mail to be delivered to a Republic Steel plant, Dorothy Thompson went off on an outrage flight on June 7. We must even assume that she took off from a headline in the Herald Tribune—C. I. O. Censors the Mail—since the story beneath it contained an editorial summary of an Associated Press version that put a quite different light on the "C. I. O. censorship" which kept Miss Thompson in the air for a column and a half. (A subsequent story in the Times carried a denial by Bert Flaherty, although the facts are still somewhat obscured.) On the way up Miss Thompson cast off liberal ballast with a generous hand. She believes, she said, in industrial unionism, and even in the closed shop. But she soon ascended into the higher regions of "law and order." She accused the C. I. O. in general of interpreting the Wagner Act to mean the legalization of "any method whatsoever" for forcing recognition, and in particular of censoring the United States mails. She failed to mention Mr. Girdler's blatant defiance of the Wagner Act. She denounced the Post Office for "capitulating to force" and taking sides in a labor dispute—although the Post Office Department is following a thirty-year-old policy in maintaining only normal deliveries in troubled areas. It is refusing to allow food to be sent by mail into the Republic plants just as it refused to accept such packages for delivery to sit-in strikers in Flint. Perhaps the high point in Miss Thompson's flight was reached at the end of a passage deploring the arming of policemen and the tendency of strikers to carry weapons of their own. "We shall never be able to disarm the police," she wrote, "until the moment when a man who spits in the face of a policeman goes to jail for it." Like Miss Thompson we deplore violence, though at this point Girdler's violence seems to us more menacing than union violence. We even think it might be a good idea if the man who spits in a policeman's face were sent to jail—at once, that is, instead of being routed through a hospital by a blow over the head or a shot in the back.

★

J. P. MORGAN HAS ADDED ANOTHER NUGGET to our understanding of government and law. "If the government doesn't know enough to collect taxes, a man's a fool to pay them," he blurted out red-faced to the ship reporters. The budgetary problem becomes thus a battle of wits between the community and the rich individual, with the latter always winning because law-drafting cannot possibly keep pace with the ingenuity of the legal mind for law-evasion. Mr. Morgan should be reminded that he has expressed exactly the social philosophy we have always associated with the big racketeers.

Tom Girdler's Defiance

LITTLE STEEL," under the leadership of a glorified company cop named Tom Girdler, has enlisted every form of violence and trickery to break the C. I. O. and if possible undercut Big Steel. United States Steel, acting on good advice, signed a contract with the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee; Girdler sticks to his guns, and with the help of the police he has so far brought about the death of seven people and the wounding of a hundred others in the Battle of Chicago. With the further help of Chicago's rabid press, he and his allies are now cultivating the fiction that an "inflamed mob" "attacked the police," that the "riot" was incited by outside agitators, that the strikers carried firearms, that the police were fighting for their lives, and that their beloved workers would go right back to their jobs if it were not for the "military blockade" maintained by the union.

Against this account, which follows a discredited formula, stand a few incontrovertible facts. (1) Not one of the policemen injured in the battle was shot; but the great majority of the strikers and sympathizers who were killed or hurt were struck by bullets and many of them were shot from behind. (2) The crowd was at least one and a half blocks away from company property. "Frank A. Lauerman, superintendent of public relations for the Republic Company," said the New York Times of May 31, "announced that the company planned to make no statement because the riot did not occur at the plant or on company property." (3) The dead, some of whom were labeled outside agitators because they could not be identified immediately, turned out to be natives of the area affected by the strike, and with one exception steel workers. (4) The photographs printed in the newspapers, as well as numerous eyewitness accounts, including that of Meyer Levin which we print on another page of this issue, give overwhelming evidence that the police attacked—and followed up the attack with wanton brutality. And Paramount News would hardly have "shelved" its reels of the incident for fear of inciting "riotous demonstrations in theaters" if they had shown strikers beating up police.

So far the tactics of Republic Steel have not decreased the effectiveness of the strike in which 70,000 workers in seven states are involved. It seems unlikely, however, that the struggle will be fought out on the picket line. The company has met Mayor Kelly's order to cease feeding and housing workers in its plants by moving them into the unwonted luxury of Pullman cars. We wish them pleasant dreams about the Pullman strike. Five railroads in the area, backing Republic, are asking state and federal officials and the courts to break up the union's "blockade" of steel shipments. In Washington at this writing a hands-off policy prevails. There is said to be no evidence to warrant intervention in behalf of the railroads, and the Post Office is so far considered safe from union censorship. The strikers' plea for Presidential mediation has been referred to the board, which says, however, that as yet no formal action has been instituted before it.

The union may be expected to institute such action shortly, for Mr. Girdler and his defiance offer a magnificent opportunity to the Department of Justice and the National Labor Relations Board of an Administration committed, verbally at least, to a peaceful equalization of political and economic power. Girdler represents everything in the way of ruthlessness and disregard of law that the New Deal has said it would not stand for. He admits having arms in his factories. He makes a blatant exhibition of his refusal to sign a union contract even if the union has a majority of its workers. He is fostering company unions in the form of "back-to-work" movements, and raising up vigilante squads. He has violated, probably, the Byrnes Act against the importation of strike-breakers. Philip Murray of the union charges that he has entered into an "unholy alliance" with other steel companies to prevent the enforcement of the Wagner Act.

The penalty for conspiring to evade a federal statute—as Miss Stein points out—is a $10,000 fine, two years' imprisonment, or both. The charge against Girdler should be investigated. If it proves true, we should be willing to spare Tom Girdler the fine, which he can best afford. To put him in jail for two years would greatly improve industrial relations.

The Drift to War

THE crisis which followed the shelling of Almeria has passed, like many preceding it, without plunging Europe into war. This would be cause for gratification if the concessions granted to preserve peace did not make more serious incidents inevitable. Hitler has shown the world, and the German people in particular, that he can order the bombardment of a foreign city in defiance of the League, of the Pact of Paris, and of all principles of humanity without rebuke from the democratic powers. Instead of summoning the Reich before the World Court or taking measures to check the assistance which it is giving the Spanish rebels, Britain and France have sought to conciliate the fascist powers with promises of "safety zones" and possible joint action against the Spanish government in the event of future attacks on German ships.

These tactics have been successful in averting an immediate war. But they have immeasurably strengthened the hands of the warmakers, and thereby increased the probability of an ultimate conflict. A glance at the succession of incidents by which Hitler has built up the prestige of his regime is sufficient to confirm this. Repudiation of external debts, the introduction of conscription, the remilitarization of the Rhineland, and withdrawal from the League involved no direct infringement of the sovereignty of a foreign nation. The shelling of Almeria was the first open attack on the territory of another country; yet Hitler got away with it even more easily than with some of his earlier coups. This cannot go on indefinitely. Encouraged by the passivity of the democratic states, Hitler or Mussolini is certain on some occasion to misjudge the extent to which the powers will retreat.

The capitulation of the democracies on the Almeria incident can only hasten this ultimate showdown. This was much more apparent during the days immediately succeeding the crisis than now. Italy and Germany both withdrew from the Non-Intervention Committee. Reports arrived of the landing of large numbers of German and Italian troops at San Sebastian. Mussolini announced that he would do his utmost to prevent all supplies from reaching the Spanish government. But now, temporarily at least, the atmosphere has cleared. The Italian Foreign Minister has accepted all but one of the British proposals for a new non-intervention agreement and Germany has taken a similar stand. They have agreed that both Spanish belligerents must give assurance of respect for the patrol ships and that safety zones shall be established at stated ports on both sides. But they refuse to accept the third point, which provides that the powers on patrol duty shall consult one another before taking any measures of reprisal. The British believe that this difference can be ironed out by the end of the week and the recreant nations once more safely assembled under the respectable cloak of non-intervention.

But the real menace remains. For beneath all the diplomatic wire-pulling evidence is piling up that Germany and Italy are determined to carry the Spanish rebels through to victory. The only consideration that may move Hitler from this policy is the possibility of purchasing a promise from England that it will give him a free hand in Eastern Europe. For this he would undoubtedly be willing to pay a considerable price, even to the extent of withdrawing his troops from Spain and abandoning the Berlin-Rome-Burgos axis. For there is no more reason to believe that Hitler is playing fair with Mussolini than there is to believe he would play fair with anyone else. His foreign policy is Machtpolitik, and the visit of Blomberg to Rome may well be regarded as a species of political blackmail—a threat held over England, which has reason to fear a German-Italian combination. But it would be folly for England to respond. Its only feasible course, even for the safety of its own empire, is to check fascist aggression all along the world front. Whether a Tory government will have the clarity to see that is quite another question.

Washington Is a Battlefield

WASHINGTON today is a battlefield, with four major engagements going on simultaneously. The court-reorganization struggle is far from settled, although for the moment it is dormant. The adjournment of the Supreme Court without final disposal of matters so far-reaching as the powers of the Securities Exchange Commission or the status of PWA loans to municipalities for power plants was a blunder of judicial strategy that must be chalked up against Chief Justice Hughes. The failure of the courts to keep up with their schedules and the way they have acted as a drag upon the Congressional program could not have been better illustrated than in these two instances, both involving crucial parts of the Roosevelt attempt to regulate the structure of capitalist power. When a new justice is appointed to fill Van Devanter's place, the cases will have to be reargued, and that means considerable delay.

The second battle is on utilities and it is closely related to the court struggle. One of the court's acts before adjournment was a refusal to grant the government's request that a power-company suit to restrain the TVA from going on with its operations be handled by the Supreme Court instead of being sent back to the Tennessee District Court. This means, in effect, that the valiant efforts of the TVA to untangle the legal snags that have tied up its operations for so long are once more doomed. President Roosevelt's message to Congress last week asking for the setting up of seven regional power agencies modeled on the TVA will therefore be no more effective than the courts allow it to be. Already the Committee of Utility Executives has launched several broadsides against the message and against the bills introduced by Senator Norris and Representative Mansfield to incorporate it in legislation. There can be no doubt that things are shaping up to a sharp struggle; but even if the Administration succeeds in getting a bill through, we may count on the lower federal courts to tangle it up for several years more while the country waits for concrete results.

The other two battles are on the wages-and-hours bill and the income-tax evasions. We shall hear a good deal in the coming weeks about the "fascist" character of the Black-Connery bill, about its attempts to regiment industry and place dictatorial power in the hands of five men. Undoubtedly a bill providing for a looser organization would be attacked for its looseness, as too vague a delegation of power by Congress. The fact is that the Republicans and the tory Democrats do not want a federal wages-and-hours bill of any kind. And they will fight to the death whatever bill is offered. As for the attempt to plug up loopholes in tax administration, as Earnest K. Lindley points out in his article in this issue, that is a program to which many in high places even within the Democratic Party will be sensitive. There is nothing surprising about the measure. It was long overdue, and any Administration that has the least spark of budgetary conscience would have to proceed vigorously against tax-dodgers in the upper brackets and their high-powered legal lieutenants. Here, where nothing can be said with any grace against the matter of the Administration's action, the cry will be raised against its manner; and Walter Lippmann's protest against "government by indignation" will gladden the hearts of the big-income group, which up to now has believed it had a monopoly of indignation.

The Nation has never been a Roosevelt partisan or swallowed the whole of the President's program. We think his court plan has been badly managed and should have been more thoroughgoing. We believe he might have been firmer in handling TVA policy. We have our fingers crossed as to whether the tax-evasion drive will be an isolated incident or part of a sustained policy of tax reform. We should have liked a more generous stand on relief appropriations. And we are still waiting to see what will happen on slum clearance and farm tenancy.

But one thing is certain. Mr. Roosevelt is today fighting a valiant battle for progressive legislation. He has no substantial support even within his own party; his real support and strength lie in the forces of labor. And he is fighting almost single-handed against a united front of reactionaries in both parties and a group of "liberals" who are reactionary in everything but name. He beat them in the election; they are now trying to wrest the fruits of that victory from him and the people by more devious and subtle methods than were possible in the campaign. Time and again in American history we have had reform Presidents who have flashed for a brief instant in the political heavens and then flickered out. Mr. Roosevelt, whatever else may be said of him, is not one of those. And that is why the big-income groups and their spokesmen cannot forgive him. That is why they hate him. He has violated the rules of the game of politics in a capitalist state: he has insisted upon progressive reform even after his second election, when it is no longer necessary as a political gesture.

"The Nation" Is Sold

WE PRINT herewith a statement from Maurice Wertheim announcing the sale of The Nation to one of its editors, Freda Kirchwey.

After some eleven years of connection with The Nation as a member of its Board of Directors I arranged its purchase from Oswald Garrison Villard in 1935 for the Civic Aid Foundation, a non-profit organization which I established and control. The paper was then in financial difficulties, and my object in purchasing it was to insure the future of this long-established and valuable organ of liberalism.

Since I had not the time to become the active publisher of The Nation but nevertheless desired to maintain its traditional independence, the Civic Aid Foundation turned over to the Board of Editors of The Nation on October 27 last complete control of its editorial policy. The circulation of the paper is now at its peak for all time, and I have nothing but praise for the devotion and work of its two older editors, Freda Kirchwey and Joseph Wood Krutch, as well as for its newer one, Max Lerner, who has contributed notably to this result. My thanks are also due to its business manager, Hugo Van Arx, for his unremitting and successful efforts in his field, and to the staff.

Of late, however, it has become increasingly clear that group control is not effective and that absentee ownership creates an anomalous situation. On occasions the editors have differed from the editorial associates, Oswald Garrison Villard, Alvin Johnson, and Heywood Broun, and I have often differed from views expressed in the paper. Typical of this was The Nation policy on the Supreme Court issue, on which both Mr. Villard and I felt constrained to write articles for The Nation differing from its stand thereon. Under the circumstances I have concluded that the best interests of the paper and its growing circle of readers would be served if centralized control by an active hand could be secured.

As the paper is now on a self-supporting basis, there have been many would-be purchasers. I believe, however, that its independent character and direction can best be preserved by placing control in the hands of its senior editor, Freda Kirchwey, who has had sixteen years of active association with it and who is, in my opinion, one of the truest liberals in the country.

I therefore offered her the first opportunity to purchase The Nation, and it is now my great pleasure to announce that on my recommendation the Civic Aid Foundation has today entered into a contract for the sale of the paper to her.

MAURICE WERTHEIM

The change of ownership takes place under promising auspices. Building on the solid foundation laid down in the last two years, The Nation, for the first time in its history, can confidently hope to continue to be self-supporting. The demand for an independent, vigorously liberal interpretation of events is greater than ever before. We welcome the opportunity to meet it and to go forward under our own power. The future is on the side of the independent battalions.

Tax-Dodgers on Parade

BY ERNEST K. LINDLEY

Washington, June 6

IF UNSEEN hands—of which many are frantically at work—can be prevented from applying the brakes, the Congressional investigation of tax avoidance and evasion should be the most interesting revelation of financial ethics and legal ingenuity in the upper brackets since the close of Ferdinand Pecora's Wall Street investigation. The potentialities of the inquiry are indicated by the denunciation that has been heaped upon it.

It is true that the parading of some rich tax-dodgers and their lawyers may be politically useful to Mr. Roosevelt. He has always been able to tighten up his loose coalition of supporters when he has been successful in focusing attention on the iniquities of the rich. He needs a unifying agent now. However, he has not had much luck politically with tax issues. His "soak-the-rich" tax program in the summer of 1935 exasperated Congress, and he made no political capital whatever of the undistributed-earnings tax in 1936. The attempt to prosecute Andrew Mellon was a boomerang. In the present instance the idea originated with the Treasury, not among the politicians in the Administration. And the Treasury wants it for extremely practical purposes.

The Treasury is hopeful that the investigation will whip up a great deal of indignation. This it wants to use for four purposes: first, to push remedial legislation through Congress; second, to stiffen the Department of Justice; third, to impress the courts; and, fourth, to hold within reasonable limits tax avoidance by devices which lawyers can contrive more rapidly than the law can be amended to stop them or which cannot be reached by statute without injustice to taxpayers who use the same devices for legitimate purposes.

Undoubtedly the view is widely held that a tax-dodging scheme is either legal, and therefore ethical, or against the law, and therefore within reach of the Treasury. The President's message anticipated the argument that if there are loopholes the Administration should persuade Congress to amend the law and not crucify taxpayers publicly for availing themselves of their privileges. One of the purposes of the investigation is to reveal that the facts are not so simple. Mr. Lippmann, for example, appears to think that the deduction claimed by a rich man for losses in operating his chicken farm is a "fake" loss which the Treasury can disallow. So it may seem at first glance to the ordinary citizen, and so it was contended by the Bureau of Internal Revenue until the federal courts decided to the contrary. By court decision a wealthy industrialist who owns a farm is a farmer, and he is none the less a farmer if he loses large quantities of money on his farm year after year. How do you propose to define by law whether a man is a farmer or is only gratifying a hobby? Or take one of the greatest sources of losses to the Treasury—the distribution of ownership within a family of property accumulated and managed by one member. In one instance dug up by the Treasury the head of the family distributed his property through as many as sixty-four trusts with a saving of $485,000 in taxes in one year. Congress is not likely to consider with favor such a fundamental violation of the rights of property as preventing the head of a family from distributing his holdings as he wishes among the members of his family. In the Treasury's view, the ideal would be to have all the income within a family taxed as the income of one individual.

For three years the Treasury has been narrowing and closing loopholes by regulations and with the aid of legislation. It wants more legislation. But there will always be a great volume of marginal cases difficult or impossible to cover by statute—more under corporation taxes than under individual income taxes. The volume of tax litigation is enormous. Perhaps a quarter of the cases that come before the Supreme Court are tax cases, and no small number of them are federal income-tax cases. And since property rights are involved, the tendency of the courts has been to favor the taxpayer.

The number of civil and criminal suits growing out of returns on 1936 incomes promises to be unprecedentedly high. The combination of higher taxes and higher incomes has given powerful incentives to try every new-fangled tax-dodging scheme that the lawyers can cook up. The taxpayer may expect to face a fight in the courts, but even an outside chance at victory is worth taking. In the case of the Bahamas Insurance Company cited by Secretary Morgenthau, the Treasury, once it had discovered the contrivance, convinced the taxpayers that they were in danger of being prosecuted for fraud and they offered a full settlement plus interest. The Treasury would like to spur the Department of Justice into criminal prosecutions of some of its most notable examples of tax-dodging by supposedly respectable people, but it counts on publicity through the Congressional investigation to act as a check. In short, it hopes to make tax-dodging unpopular, even among big taxpayers.

The strongest pressure to smother the investigation or keep it under strict control is coming from lawyers with Democratic political affiliations. A big part of the tax business always goes to the lawyers of the party in power. An extremely influential political leader is reported to be the lawyer who has done the biggest business in creating Bahamas corporations. Treasury officials appear to be eager to blow off the lid with complete political impartiality. Whether the joint Congressional investigating committee will be so indiscriminating cannot be predicted until its membership has been announced.

Republic Sticks to Its Guns

BY ROSE M. STEIN

Youngstown, Ohio, June 4

THE Youngstown-Cleveland-Chicago strike, involving some 70,000 steel workers employed by three corporations, centers largely around one individual. That individual is Tom Girdler, president and board chairman of the Republic Steel Corporation, and recently elected president of the Iron and Steel Institute. It is an open secret that the other two companies, Inland Steel and Youngstown Sheet and Tube, especially the latter, might have been persuaded to sign a union contract similar to the one signed by the various United States Steel subsidiaries had it not been for Tom Girdler.

By temperament, experience, and resolution Tom Girdler is an arch enemy of unionism. He was born and raised on a Kentucky farm, worked his way through college, and upon graduation entered a steel mill. This was back in 1902, when unionism in steel was being smashed right and left. He held minor supervisory positions with the Atlanta Steel Company and the Colorado Fuel and Iron Company, in both of which he observed the hard-boiled tactics of the steel barons and even improved upon them. In 1914 he became assistant superintendent of Jones and Laughlin's Aliquippa plant, where he remained for fourteen years and where he personally set up and supervised a reign of terror under which the workers were held in a state of virtual serfdom. In recognition of this achievement he was elected president of the company in 1928. When in 1929 the Cyrus Eaton and Mather interests consolidated a number of concerns with the old Republic Iron and Steel, forming the present Republic Steel Corporation, it was found that an iron hand was needed to weld together the various discordant elements, and Tom Girdler was hired to do the job. This phenomenal rise from poor farm boy to steel-company president has made him arrogant and disdainful of those below him in the economic scale. Workers are to Tom Girdler just inferior beings who do not know how to forge ahead. To allow them equal bargaining power with himself, head of the third largest steel producer in the country, strikes him as a preposterous idea. Even more preposterous, downright painful, is the very thought of having to bargain with outsiders.

Girdler was determined from the very beginning to give the C. I. O. a good fight. He is mortally afraid of a nation-wide union, thoroughly dislikes John L. Lewis, is more than a little jealous of Lewis's potential power, and hoped to clip that power by mobilizing a solid steel front against him. He was profoundly grieved by the desertion of two-thirds of the steel producers, who found it expedient to sign union contracts, but he is determined to go ahead with the fight single-handed if need be. Those close to him claim that he is quite obsessed with the idea of enacting in 1937 the role played in 1919 by Judge Gary. His tactics are of the Gary school—based on thugs and bullets. The union has positive proof that Girdler's agents are busy recruiting more thugs, and that they are ordering additional supplies of arms and tear gas from Federal Laboratories in Pittsburgh.

The first result of this policy was the Decoration Day riot in Chicago. Tom Girdler cannot escape responsibility for the attack and massacre of May 30 in which seven were killed and one hundred wounded. It would probably be naive to expect Chicago's corrupt political machine to institute a thorough investigation of the riot, but such an investigation might uncover some alarming facts. Union officials claim to know and to be able to prove that the 1,500 marchers who paraded in the direction of Republic's plant were armed with nothing more than American flags; that they neither intended nor anticipated trouble as attested by the fact that many of the marchers were women and children—one of the wounded was a lad of eight; that they were several blocks away from Republic property when the attack was made; that the marchers carried no firearms, proved by the fact that not a single one of the twenty-two policemen injured suffered from gun shots; and finally, and most significant, that the regular police officers used tear gas while those among the officers who used firearms were company-hired thugs dressed in police uniforms.

Plants of the Inland Steel Corporation and the Youngstown Sheet and Tube are entirely closed. That was agreed upon in advance. Republic alone is willing to assume the cost and risk of keeping some of its mills in operation. Out of a total of some 25,000 men employed in plants within the greater Youngstown area, which includes also Canton, Warren, and Niles, the highest estimate of those at work is 2,000. Approximately 1,000 more are at work in Chicago. This force is concentrated in the Warren, Niles, and Chicago plants, and in order to maintain it the company went to the trouble and expense of providing commissaries, sleeping quarters, and airplanes to carry food supplies. Spokesmen for the corporation are rather vague about the rate of pay the barricaded workmen are receiving. In 1933, when the Carnegie Steel Corporation, in the course of a brief strike, kept a crew inside its Clairton plant, the men were paid for twenty-four hours a day, although they worked only eight-hour shifts. It is hardly likely that Republic is able to buy its "scab" or "loyal" labor more cheaply.

The issue involved in the strike is very simple. The Steel Workers' Organizing Committee is demanding that the three companies sign a contract similar to the one signed by some 150 other steel producers, a contract, that is, which accepts the C. I. O. union as the bargaining agency for its own members. The union cannot retreat from this position without compromising its entire structure. The only alternative it can offer is that the issue be decided by a government-supervised election. To this proposal Republic Steel's reply, before the strike as well as now, is "Go ahead and hold your election. Get even 95 per cent of the votes; we still will not sign a contract." Under the circumstances gubernatorial intervention of the kind used in the automobile strike would be futile, assuming that Governors Davey and Horner could be enlisted to play the Murphy role. The primary need here is to convince Youngstown Sheet and Tube and Inland Steel that they are parties to the Girdler conspiracy, and to induce them to desert what Phil Murray calls "the unholy alliance." Left to paddle his own canoe, Tom Girdler might find the waters altogether too turbulent.

Such pressure would be decidedly in the interest of the general welfare, and the agencies naturally equipped to apply it are the National Labor Relations Board and the Department of Justice; the one because the Labor Relations Act is being violated, the other because the alliance comes definitely under the category of conspiracy.

In the course of negotiations prior to the strike, the Sheet and Tube Company was not altogether hostile to the union. At one time its representatives said they would be willing to sign a contract if the other independents could be induced to do likewise. Later they retreated from this position, telling three officials of the S. W. O. C. that they would accept the regular contract form in toto and abide by every one of its provisions, but not sign it. According to a decision handed down by the National Labor Relations Board on July 7, 1936, in the case of a St. Joseph, Missouri, stockyard firm, such refusal constitutes an unfair labor practice within the meaning of Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act. The board ruled that while an employer is not compelled to sign an agreement presented to him by representatives of his employees, where there has been a definite "meeting of minds" and "an understanding reached," such understanding should be incorporated in "a binding agreement," and refusal to do so is a violation of the law. This decision is directly applicable to the Youngstown Sheet and Tube case, where a "meeting of minds" took place, and the board should proceed at once to enforce it.

The Department of Justice, on the other hand, should carefully look into the activities of Republic Steel. There can be little doubt that Tom Girdler conspired, is now conspiring, and is enlisting others to conspire with him, to evade both the letter and the spirit of the National Labor Relations Act. The penalty for conspiring to evade a federal statute, as provided by the Act of May 17, 1879, is $10,000 fine, two years' imprisonment, or both.

Unless drastic action is taken, and the strike is promptly settled, there is every chance that there will be more violence and bloodshed, this time probably in the Youngstown area. The strikers are tense and jumpy, while the companies, especially Republic Steel, are doing everything possible to fan this tenseness into flames. An office has been opened in a downtown Youngstown bank building to sign up people who want to go back to work. Straw bosses and their wives are rounding up signatories, especially among the colored employees. Wives whose husbands are on the picket line are being offered $8 and $10 a day to help with the back-to-work movement. Company-union adherents are being deputized by the sheriff to maintain law and order. Stooges are busy circulating wild rumors about sabotage, and about desertion from union ranks. Whites are being aroused against Negroes, Americans against foreigners.

There is a sharp contrast between this atmosphere of impending trouble and the atmosphere of liberation and good feeling which prevails in the steel towns along the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Ohio rivers, where union contractual relations exist. In Homestead, where less than four years ago a member of the President's Cabinet could not find a meeting place, workers were debating at a meeting the other evening a proposed sitdown strike in one of the Carnegie-Illinois mills because the roller in one of the departments had not yet joined the union. "That is not a legitimate grievance for us to take up with management," argued the chairman, "because our contract does not provide for the closed shop but entitles us only to bargain for our members." The men conceded the truth of the argument, "but," they added, "we can't do our work right with a scab in our midst."

Braddock, Rankin, Duquesne, Clairton, McKeesport, to mention only a few steel towns, are working steadily and peacefully. The men are building their union, improving their bargaining machinery, setting up workers' education programs, and in some instances are nominating men from their own ranks for municipal offices in the coming election. In Aliquippa the union celebrated the signing of an exclusive bargaining contract on Decoration Day. One of the workers writes as follows.

We had the full cooperation of the local authorities in putting on the parade and mass meeting. We were given a permit for the parade and a motorcycle cop to lead us. All traffic was stopped while we marched. And afterwards the Aliquippa Gazette gave us a good news write-up. And of course we had a good turn-out; four or five thousand, . . .

The first grievance under the Jones and Laughlin contract arose out of a scuffle between two Negro workers. One of them came into the mill with a company-union button. "Don't you know the C. I. O. got exclusive bargaining?" asked the union man and unceremoniously tore it off. The foreman was about to lay off the union man when the entire department stopped work. The grievance was promptly settled by laying off both men for three days, only the union man got paid for one of those days. "My man," gloated the union adherent, "this is first time J and L pay me for doing nothing. C. I. O. sure is wonderful."

Peace, confidence, a holiday mood in one section; tenseness, fear, and murder in another. Between the two stand three stubborn companies, led by one stubborn individual, who very much prefers his $150,000 a year job to digging potatoes, and who is defending that job, and his anti-union policies, by means closely resembling those employed by Adolf Hitler and Francisco Franco.

Slaughter in Chicago

BY MEYER LEVIN

FIELD headquarters of the Republic Company steel strikers is a vacant one-time roadhouse known as Sam's Place, Dine and Dance. A long windowless room, backed by a kitchen now used to feed strikers; a side room containing a long bar on which soup, beans, and coffee are now served. The building looks toward the open prairie; four blocks away is a little street of shabby houses facing the Republic steel plant. Two automobile roads cross the prairie to that street. The police have closed the roads.

It is a fine, a perfect day. The yard outside Sam's Place is filled with shirt-sleeved men; a large number are spruced up for Memorial Day and have brought their wives and children. From the back of a truck speeches are made; again and again speakers point out that throughout the country the right to picket is no longer questioned. But this is Chicago.

A motion is made to picket peacefully outside the plant. It is carried unanimously. The line forms with two American flags at the head. It is a mixed crowd; mostly it has a kidding, holiday air. Scattered through it or walking alongside are scores of sympathizers and many merely curious citizens who have read about the picketing ban and have come out to see if it will be enforced. I recognize many university people. A kid eating a pop-sicle tags along with his father.

I look for weapons. Only a few days ago strikers had their heads smashed by clubs. Ahead of them now the marchers can clearly see hundreds of police spread out in a warlike front. Several of the strikers carry placards tacked to sticks that might be used as clubs. One carries a baseball bat. As we walk across the prairie, a few pick up stones, but they are admonished to drop them.

Walking through the high prairie grass three blocks to the police line, the people tend to scatter and the long column is broken. The leaders halt, and call for everybody to fall back into line. The march—it is really a walk—is resumed. There is a scattered singing of "Solidarity." Presently the front rank halts, face to face with the police. The leaders explain that their followers wish to exercise their constitutional rights, only yesterday guaranteed by the mayor, to picket peacefully.

"I'm only a cop, talk to the captain."

There are at least two police captains present, Mooney and Kilroy, but they do not come forward to speak to the strikers. Several moments pass while the boys in the front rank try to find the authorities. Meanwhile, strung back across the prairie, the procession quietly waits.

I work my way to the left of the line and come up closer to the police. I see several policemen with their hands on their revolvers. Behind the double line of police are patrol wagons and newsreel trucks. I can see a mass of men standing on a pile of material in the yard of the plant; these are scabs and company guards watching the show. The company had promised them a ball game for Sunday afternoon. A police captain walks to my end of the line, within six feet of me, and says in a conversational voice, "I warn you in the name of the law to disperse." Perhaps twenty people around me can hear him. Over a thousand are behind us.

What followed happened so fast that it is impossible for me to state, absolutely, the time order. It appeared to me that the police line concertedly advanced swinging clubs, that at the same moment a rock flew high through the air, over the police line, aimed at the yard of the plant. "The usual incident." The phrase flashed through my mind; and at the same moment I heard firing. A cloud of tear gas rolled like an immense pillow on the ground. I believed that the police were merely firing tear-gas cartridges. Instantly everyone turned and ran.

There was no firing at any time by the strikers. No policeman was shot, though the police accuse the strikers of firing. There was no "battle." The people fled. As I ran I turned and saw the police charging after us.

Meanwhile the shooting continued with the rapidity but not the rhythm of machine-gun fire. I still could not believe that the police were shooting bullets, since there had been absolutely no warning or provocation, and since it was apparent that the tear gas was sufficient to disperse the procession. A man came stumbling toward me holding his hands over his eyes. A woman ran by, her face distorted in pain, crying, "They gassed me." I attempted to guide the blinded man. "Don't worry, the effect will pass," I said, but he mumbled incoherently, "They shot me." I thought he was hysterical; a day later I read that a man had had both eyes shot out.

My mind still rejected the evidence of my senses. A man in a blue shirt dove into the grass in front of me. I thought, "He's scared they're going to fire, he's seen too many movies of soldiers lying prone, letting the bullets pass over them." Only later the peculiar flatness in the way he pitched forward remained in visual memory, and I thought, "Why, that fellow fell shot."

Starting to run again I heard a boy cry, "Pa, I'm shot." It was a kid of about ten. He was hopping, his left leg raised. His father, a stubby man, picked him up and ran on. I was just in front of them. Presently the man was exhausted. I took the boy from him. Cars, hastily volunteered, were already driving across the prairie and picking up the wounded. Two cars passed me, only in the third was there room for the child.

He was so utterly quiet while I carried him that I thought maybe he hadn't really been shot, maybe he was imagining. The firing continued all this time, yet even though I had seen cars full of wounded, I did not believe it could be gun fire; the atrocity was so swift, so overwhelming, that my mind could not accept it.

At strike headquarters the long, dark room was already crowded. Several men lay on the floor bleeding. One was on his side; his shirt and pants were torn, revealing expanses of skin covered with dark splotches. There were a few coats, a few chairs. On each cot there were two or three with bullet wounds; wounded on all the chairs. A tiny yellow kitten stepped carefully around puddles, daintily licking blood.

The room was strangely quiet; people talked in hushed tones. The mother of the boy I had carried had found him and was cursing endlessly in a low tone. A woman held up a bleeding hand and said, "I'm lucky, I'm lucky, the cop chased me, shooting all the time, and he just hit my hand." . . . I saw a man with a wound, a small red hole directly in the center of the abdomen. It was just a red spot and did not look serious. The next day I knew that abdominal wounds are almost always fatal. . . . Several university girls, spectators, were rushing frantically among the wounded applying first aid. Three physicians had appeared from among the crowd, but they were not equipped for a massacre.

We started mobilizing cars, rushing people to hospitals. I helped carry several men out to cars. My hands were sticky with blood. "First Aid" had been scribbled on signs stuck on cars. A driver pulled up with a car full of wounded. "I had one more," he said with contained fury. "His leg artery was shot. He's bleeding to death. We had him in the car. The cops came up and pulled him out. They said, 'We want one of these sonsa-bitches.' We told them the man would die without a tourniquet. We said give us two minutes to take him to strike headquarters for first aid. They tore him away from us and threw him on the floor of a patrol wagon." The next day, under the list of "dead, unidentified," was a "man with leg wound, apparently bled to death."

Forty, fifty bullet-wounded men had been brought into strike headquarters. A driver brought back a message from the Burnside Hospital. "The head nurse asked for twelve men, anybody, to help out." It was a tiny hospital, caught understaffed on a holiday. They needed orderlies to keep the delirious patients on their beds. I was among the twelve volunteers. We arrived at the hospital, found the doors guarded by police. They refused to inform the head nurse of our arrival. "Everything is taken care of, no help is needed," they repeated. One of us, a university research worker, got in with a newspaperman. The nurse gave him three cases to watch. Twice police and plain-clothes men tried to chase him out, though the nurse insisted to them that he was needed. We waited outside. The street filled with police cars. Four men, all bandaged, one limping, were brought out of the hospital by police and pushed into a patrol wagon.

We returned to Sam's Place. There was a call for volunteer blood donors from the South Chicago Hospital. In the car with me was a young man named French, a University of Chicago theology student, who had given blood at other times and knew he was of the universal blood type. We went to the hospital.

I watched the operations. One patient was the man I had seen on the floor. He was Anthony Tagliori, twenty-five, a Republic steel worker; the bullet, entering behind, had cut slantwise through his intestines. The man had a beautiful, powerful physique, a classic, sculptural head. He lived through the operation. "Peritonitis has already set in," the surgeon said; "he has one chance in fifty." He died two days later after a transfusion, the sixth to die. Meanwhile young French gave blood to a worker named Anderson. A bullet had entered his back and gone clear through. At this writing Anderson still lives; he is a huge, wide-shouldered man with a tremendous chest, but his chances are slim.

We went through the hospital. The wounds were in the back, in the shoulder, in the side, in the neck from behind—about 80 per cent shot from behind.

At midnight we were leaving the hospital. A policeman in the doorway was chatting sympathetically with a union man. "I worked at that Republic plant for two years," the cop said. "It's the lousiest, rottenest outfit in the whole United States." At that moment he turned and I happened to see his ammunition belt. About half of the cartridge spaces had been emptied.

Growing Pains of Mexican Labor

BY L. O. PRENDERGAST

Mexico City, May 15

ON THE eve of May 1, international day of labor solidarity, the Federation of Mexican Workers (C. T. M.) was split wide open. Three members of the executive committee walked out of the sessions of its fourth National Council charging that the council was illegally constituted, that bona fide delegates had been refused seats, and that Vicente Lombardo Toledano, general secretary of the C. T. M., was attempting to set up a dictatorship over the federation. After two years of triumphant advance in organization and political power, the united front is seriously threatened, and bitter charges and accusations are being exchanged by the leaders of the C. T. M. and the Communist Party, which is heading the revolt of the dissident organizations.

The C. T. M. represents the first united trade-union front which the Mexican working class has ever been able to form, and in it the Communist Party has been making its first large-scale experiment with united- and popular-front tactics. To expect that this joint endeavor, unsupported by any precedent or earlier experience, would meet with complete success was perhaps over-sanguine. The ultimate causes of the rupture are to be found partly in the general backwardness of the country, which is reflected in the organization of the working class, and partly in a clash of ambitions adroitly manipulated by interests ostensibly friendly but actually hostile to the labor movement.

The fascist threat contained in the famous Calles statement of June, 1935, awakened the entire labor movement to the imminent danger of losing all the rights so painfully acquired during the preceding thirty years. Labor's answer was the almost spontaneous formation of a Committee of Proletarian Defense, which functioned as the executive body of the united front until it gave way to the C. T. M. in February, 1936, at a congress called for that purpose. Included in the C. T. M. were such disparate and antagonistic bodies as the Communist Party, the essentially conservative railroad workers, the electricians of the Federal District, who had led a somnolent strikeless existence for twenty years, and the General Confederation of Workers and Peasants (F. R. O. C.) built up by Vicente Lombardo Toledano and his immediate followers after he split the C. R. O. M. of Luis N. Morones in 1933, taking with him a majority of its membership. Scores of other independent unions and local federations, including such powerful groups as the miners and oil workers, also participated. When the fourth National Council convened on April 27 last, it was attended by delegates from some 3,000 organizations with a total membership of well over 600,000, representing at least 90 per cent of Mexico's organized labor.

It would be silly to pretend that this enormous advance had been achieved by the efforts of labor alone. The political situation has been such that the Cárdenas government, facing the undisguised hostility of business, landowners, the church, and the conservative middle class, has desperately needed the support which only a united labor movement could give it. Unstinted government aid was therefore awarded to the C. T. M.'s organizing and educational activities, and Lombardo Toledano was soon generally supposed to wield as much power in the administration as a Cabinet minister.

The friendship for the Communist Party displayed recently by Lombardo has not been enthusiastically shared by the many minor leaders of the various regional federations, who are about as revolutionary-minded as their confreres in the A. F. of L. The willingness of the party to enter the united front and the C. T. M. and to drop its former attacks on Lombardo as an opportunist and "social-fascist" was partly due to its independent realization of the danger of open reactionary dictatorship in Mexico and partly to the new line of the Comintern. But the alliance was at best insecure. One of Lombardo's hardest tasks was to keep his followers, who had built up their own organizations over a period of years without Communist help and often in the face of bitter Communist attack, from kicking over the united-front traces as they saw what they had come to consider their own private reserves being encroached upon.

On the other hand, there is no evading the fact that the Communist Party, suffering from the lack of a theoretical guidance comparable to that in more advanced countries, was frequently guilty of faulty practice. Only recently emerged from the period of romantic—and often heroic—communism, which has been prolonged in most Latin American countries by illegal conditions, an undeveloped proletariat, and virtual isolation from the peasant masses, it was hardly fitted to make the most skilful application of the new line. On the trade-union front the party attempted to assume a leadership for which it was not yet prepared; on the political front the support for progressive democratic governments prescribed by the new tactic degenerated into an uncritical adulation of the President and a scramble for jobs—very Mexican reactions, perhaps, but not very Communist.

Friction originally developed over the party's attempt to utilize its inside track in the Ministries of Communications and Education to organize unions of government employees and school teachers under its own domination and introduce them into the C. T. M. The first serious signs of coming conflict were the complaints of the leaders of various regional federations to the National Committee (on which Communists held two posts) that the Communists were making a hash of C. T. M. discipline by subordinating the interests of the trade-union united front to their own narrower party loyalty. In many instances this was probably true, but it is only one side of the picture. The regional federations, as I have intimated, are not controlled by a lot of little tin saints. The C. T. M. inherited from the C. R. O. M. which it supplanted an unlovely collection of petty leaders who got their training and their appetites in the C. R. O. M. school. Corruption runs through the whole trade-union fabric of Mexico. It is no secret that the Mexico City Chamber of Commerce keeps a list of those regional leaders who can be reached, with their purchase price for settling strikes and for other services. The complaints of such "labor leaders" were thus quite possibly a roundabout way of saying that Communist influence in the unions was beginning to threaten their jobs; what they denounced as breaches of discipline and underhand maneuvers to oust them have been in many cases no more than attempts to expose their thieveries and sell-outs to the rank and file. (This is not to say, however, that the party is itself over-scrupulous about the company it keeps. Several of its fellow-rebels against the C. T. M. leadership who are being very self-righteous about "trade-union ethics and morality" are badly infected with the same disease, which is endemic in Mexico's labor movement and no respecter of ideological quarantines.)

As it became evident that the fourth National Council would witness a showdown, both sides began to gather their forces. The electricians and railroad workers made common cause with the party and the other disgruntled elements it was able to mobilize. At the council sessions the struggle centered around the Communist-controlled teachers' union and the question of seating the Communist-controlled delegates, most of whom came from state federations where the fight for supremacy had given rise to alleged irregularities. When a majority of the council voted down the doubtful credentials, three members of the National Committee—the two Communists and the general secretary of the railroad union—followed by the delegates of the electricians, the railroad workers, and nine other groups, withdrew, asserting that the council had been constituted in violation of the C. T. M.'s by-laws and that they would not abide by its decisions. The three committee members, having failed to return within the twenty-four hours given them by the council, have now been suspended. Both sides are claiming the support of a majority of the C. T. M.'s membership to justify the legality of their stand. In this battle of statistics the weight of evidence seems to be for the C. T. M. A careful sifting of the available figures indicates that between 160,000 and 175,000 have lined up behind the insurgents, while at least 350,000 have remained loyal to the National Council. It is clear therefore that the party led a minority into rebellion against the executive committee of the C. T. M.

There has been some effort here to distort the conflict into a supposed dispute over fundamental principles. The impression is being fostered in some circles that Mexican labor has at last awakened to the "Muscovite menace" and has patriotically thrown off the yoke of the Comintern, while in others it is being hotly maintained that reactionary and corrupt trade-union leaders have schemed to isolate the Communists from the workers and to check their influence. Neither version is the true one. The Communist issue was not the cause of the breach. All that was necessary was for some organized minority within the C. T. M., of whatever name, tendency, or political complexion, to make a determined bid for leadership at the expense of the incumbent officials. What is involved is a struggle for power, not a clash of ideologies or the supremacy of one tactical line over another. This is confirmed by the fact that the railroad and electrical unions, perhaps the two most conservative groups within the C. T. M., have been drawn into an alliance with the Communists because their non-Communist leaders wished to challenge Lombardo Toledano's strength.

Unity is more badly needed now than at any time since the C. T. M. was formed. The C. R. O. M., encouraged by the opportune return of Morones from the exile into which he was sent with Calles a year ago, has recently resumed active hostilities in the hope of rebuilding its shattered forces. In the last two months battles between cromistas and cetemistas have taken a score of workers' lives. Such incidents have a disastrous effect on public opinion, and President Cárdenas has strongly intimated that unless labor leaders can control their followers, the government will be obliged to take measures of its own to prevent violent outbreaks. Nor is this all. A steady drift toward the right has for some time been discernible in government policy. Nothing is being done to check the rising price level, which is making a mockery of the scant wage gains registered by the labor movement since 1934. The excellent analysis of the existing economic situation made by the C. T. M. several weeks ago has been ignored by the public officials to whom it was addressed. The agrarian program is visibly slowing down after its commendable achievements in La Laguna. There is increasing evidence that the administration has been bewitched by the current boom and will allow nothing to interfere with the hollow prosperity which is enriching a fraction of the population at the expense of the masses. A year ago President Cárdenas was hailing strikes as the means of preserving a just "economic equilibrium"; today they are distinctly less popular in official circles. If the oil workers' strike now in the offing comes to a head, it will apparently have to be fought without the backing of a united labor movement. No one stands to gain by the division in the C. T. M. except the employers, who are openly gloating over the nemesis which has overtaken "Tovarich Toledanoff," as the reactionary press fondly refers to Lombardo, and the politicians, who were beginning to fear the growing strength of the organization.

Restoration of unity now depends largely on the attitude of the insurgent minority. I have been informed that the Communists feel they were practically forced into their present position by their discovery of a plot to expel them; they preferred to leave of their own volition and in organized fashion. There is now no way of knowing if any such plot existed. Actually there have been no expulsions, only the suspensions of the three secretaries and of the electricians, who have publicly supported their delegates' action in leaving the council. The dissidents are free to return, according to the National Committee of the C. T. M., if they will recognize the validity of the council and its decisions. This may be a bitter pill to swallow, but unity ought to take precedence over pride. The coup against the Lombardo leadership has plainly failed; it has brought nothing but confusion and dismay into the labor movement. Only the prompt reconstitution of the united front can repair that damage.

Mexico City, June 5

Since the above analysis was written, the nation-wide oil strike has considerably altered the picture. The brief history of the Mexican labor movement records no strike which carries such wide implications as the present movement. Unfortunately, it is impossible here to give a detailed report of the conflict. Its most sardonic aspect has been the attempt of the oil companies to represent themselves as the benefactors of their Mexican employees, whom they call the "spoiled darlings" of the country's industry. Coming from a gang of sanctimonious bandits who in the past have stopped at neither fraud nor theft nor corruption nor wholesale murder nor subsidy of revolt to enable them to grab and hold the oil-bearing regions of Tampico and Vera Cruz, this is an unparalleled piece of impudence.

As official statistics have many times shown, the foreign oil companies, dominated by Standard Oil and Royal Dutch Shell and controlling 95 per cent of Mexican production, are operating here under highly favorable conditions. Taxes are considerably lower than in the United States; productivity is much greater; profits in relation to investment are enormous; and wages stand at about one-fourth the American level. Reliable calculations place the net profits annually sent out of Mexico to foreign shareholders at more than 75,000,000 pesos, a figure which does not take into account the profits later realized on crude oil, gasoline, and other petroleum products shipped abroad.

Whether the strike is eventually won or not (and at present it seems reasonably certain that a substantial part, at least, of the demands will be obtained in spite of the companies' frantic efforts to have the government break the strike), it has had a salutary effect on the labor movement. Again the lines are being clearly drawn in Mexico. The whole of the poorer population is openly or tacitly supporting the strike, while the entire bourgeoisie, even including what some Mexican "Marxist" theorists are fond of calling the "non-monopolist, anti-imperialist" bourgeoisie, is just as actively on the side of the companies. Rising above the existing internal conflict, the organized labor movement has taken the lead in the popular struggle against imperialism, and as a result of the strike will have sent out roots into new sectors of the population.

The Communist Party has apparently been awakened by the situation sufficiently to retreat from its recent position. El Machete, its official organ, carries a statement from the Central Committee calling for a cessation of hostilities between the C. T. M. and its dissenting faction and offering the services of the party as mediator between them. This statement is actually signed by one of the leaders of the insurgent group in his other capacity of member of the party's Central Committee, who is thus willing to mediate between himself and the C. T. M. It must be said that this is a rather clumsy attempt at peace-making, though it moves in the right direction. But a frank admission by the party of its error in having provoked the split would bring the day of unity much nearer. There are now signs that all is not well in the camp of the other schismatics; a revolt of the rank and file against the inept leadership of the railroad and electrical unions appears to be brewing. A general shake-up in the labor movement is not unlikely, and unity will probably be restored on the basis of the new alignment that emerges.

Indiana Idyl

BY JOE COLLIER

WHEN the boys go whirling around the Indianapolis motor speedway every Decoration Day, they do it, most of them, for coffee and cakes. Most of them know they can't win. They know, because they are shrewd judges of mechanical performance, that the cars they have managed to draw haven't a chance.

No matter how shiny those cars look, most of them are old. Kelly Petillo won the race in 1935 with a car that was built mostly of parts salvaged from other racers, with an occasional airplane part thrown in. He said afterward that for the last fifty miles of the race he was not certain whether the car would hold together. He won, took the prize money, and bought a new car. But the old car was not retired. It was given a new coat of paint, renamed, and passed on to a driver who was later killed in a dirt-track accident.

The reason for the presence on the track of far more old cars than new ones is that a racing car is specially built and when new costs approximately $11,000. In each year's race cars are entered that have been driven into the wall by drivers who were killed in the accident. One old-time driver this year was telling a reporter that he had driven more death cars than anyone else in the history of the race. As he was about to name them, an official of the American Automobile Association slipped up and spoke to the old-timer. The story was never finished.

The track management says no one ever died on Speedway Corporation property. They all died in the ambulance on the way to the City Hospital. The best estimates are that thirty-five have been killed in the track's twenty-five years. The Speedway Corporation won't say and newspaper morgues are incomplete. When an accident occurs, the National Guardsmen instantly surround the wreckage. They have on some occasions destroyed news cameras and beaten camera men to keep them away from the scene. Three hours later the Speedway Corporation furnishes to all papers its own pictures.

The Speedway Corporation distributes $60,000 in winnings to the thirty-three drivers and thirty-three riding mechanics, and their owners, backers, or employers. Other companies pay lap prizes—which brings the total winnings somewhat above that. To compete for this the car owners must pay $120 as an entrance fee. The drivers must pay $10 each for licenses. It was estimated that last year 160,000 persons paid an average of $3.50 to see the race. Before the race approximately 100,000 saw the qualification trials at 50 cents apiece.

Owners of land abutting on the north straightaway, far from the grandstands, have each year erected bleachers that would give perhaps a hundred persons a view of the race. These seats they have tried to sell for $1 each. Each year the state fire marshal or some other public official has declared the hastily erected bleachers unsafe and they have been torn down before the race. The fire marshal is also supposed to inspect the wooden stands of the Speedway Corporation, which are so near the track that a runaway car might set them on fire. One Indianapolis newspaper has for several years given its staff men detailed printed instructions what to do if a flaming car should ignite the stands. The inspectors, according to one report, walk through the stands, and when they kick up a rotten floor plank, order it replaced.

Old drivers say that fatigue or inexperience cause most of the accidents. "I won't drive back of a fellow I think is driving over his head," one of them said. "I drop back or I get ahead. Too much danger of piling into him if he spins or smacks the wall." But the only test taken by a driver completely new to the track and that sort of competition is to be clocked going a certain number of laps at each of several specified speeds, the last over 100 miles an hour. Drivers are required to carry small insurance policies with the American Automobile Association. That is all their dependents get if they are killed.

Two men risk their lives in each car—the driver and the riding mechanic. And the riding mechanic is all but useless in the race. He has two functions, and only two. He watches the right tires for signs of wear, and he massages the hands of the driver when they begin to get numb from the vibration of the car. But the riding mechanics are almost fanatically loyal to their drivers and would fight for them at the drop of the hat. They earn whatever the driver feels like giving them at the end of the race. It has been as low as $10. Two rode this year for nothing except the ride. Riding mechanics are recruited from speed-struck youngsters, or they are old, hard-bitten men who have done little but walk the tracks with engine waste in their hands.

There is a hospital on the grounds. No newspaperman is allowed in it during the race. Beside it there stands constantly, from the first day a car appears at the track weeks in advance of the race, an ambulance from the City Hospital, a tax-supported institution. The ambulance is staffed with City Hospital internes, paid by the city. The city Fire Department maintains apparatus there for weeks on end, paid for by the taxpayers and manned by firemen on the city pay roll. And the speedway is not even within the corporation limits of Indianapolis but in Speedway City. If a citizen of Speedway City asked the Indianapolis Fire Department to come out and extinguish a blaze in his home, he would have to guarantee the cost of the run before it was made.

A few years ago someone set up an X-ray machine at the track and offered, for $25 a print, to X-ray parts that went into the cars. The prints showed up defects in the metal and might prevent some crashes and save lives. But the car owners and drivers had to pay for the prints, and they found they couldn't afford it. That safety measure was soon abandoned.

Officials of the American Automobile Association and of the Speedway Corporation say that the race is a proving ground for new engineering ideas. They claim that balloon tires, the rear-vision mirror, and the straight-eight engine were born of the race. Firestone tires are exclusively used by the racers, filled with nitrogen instead of air. They are made one-fourth as thick as regular tires so that they won't get so hot. The tire men and the drivers have a standing feud. The drivers say that the sole reason for holding speed down is that tires wear out so fast. This year, for instance, the tires on one car wore to shreds in four pre-race laps at something faster than 125 miles an hour. Tire men insist that the product is infinitely better than that of a few years ago, and point out that only seven tire changes were made during the whole 1936 race. A thin gray line appears on the wearing surface of the tire when it begins to get thin, and the driver, when he sees that, goes for the pits.

At about 300 miles drivers get so tired that they can hardly bear it. One old driver said that he raced for 50 miles once crying like a baby. "I couldn't stop," he said, "and I was so tired. I wanted to go to the pits." Someone in the pits, he said, sensed the crisis and marked on a blackboard a huge dollar sign. "That was enough," he said. "It picked me up and I finished."

Almost no one sees the entire race. Some get drunk and wind up in the improvised jail under the stands. Some get drunk and lie on the grass in the sun. Some merely turn their box chairs with their back to the track so they can drink more sociably. The Indianapolis newspapermen and the timing officials are about the only persons besides the drivers who pay attention to the whole long grind. The newspapermen swear after each race that they will not be there for another.

Consumers on the March

BY COLSTON E. WARNE

II

IN THE first section of this article I discussed the various types of organization initiated by consumers themselves or established by social-minded individuals or groups in the interest of consumers. Other efforts to aid consumers have been government-sponsored. With the inception of the New Deal it became evident that a consumer "front" was needed to rally support for the recovery program. Business groups were dominating the Washington scene. Labor groups were seeking to secure recognition, if nothing more. The consumers were absent. The Consumers' Advisory Board was set up to fill the gap. At the beginning the board was headed by a benevolent society woman, Mrs. Mary Harriman Rumsey, who was flanked by a number of economists and sociologists, together with one representative of the consumers' cooperative movement. From the start this board was hamstrung. Its recommendations were not accorded a hearing. Its efforts to establish county consumers' councils were not given the appropriations necessary to place those councils on a firm basis. The councils tended to become the property of energetic clubwomen who often turned to local business men for guidance. In the AAA the Consumers' Counsel got off to a more effective start but was soon rendered less potent by the dismissal of Frederic C. Howe and Gardner Jackson, who had long been consumers' spokesmen.

Out of the wreckage of the NRA, however, some consumers' councils—now called Consumer Institutes—have carried on, have seasoned, and are looking about for new activities. Some have gone into the cooperative movement; others are becoming local pressure groups and are seeking to establish quality standards. A small part of the WPA appropriations has been routed into aid for certain of the institutes. Through the TVA, through the Resettlement Administration, and to some extent through the self-help cooperatives set up by the FERA, the cooperative movement has received financial and organizational assistance. The Bureau of Labor Statistics has also made a number of excellent cooperative surveys. Walton H. Hamilton and his able staff, who carried on through the NRA as residuary legatees of the Consumers' Advisory Board, were transferred to the Department of Labor as the Consumers' Division. This division, now headed by Thomas Holland, is marking time waiting for better days. Consumer efforts in the Department of Agriculture have been somewhat more successful. The Bureau of Home Economics has for some time had a consumer slant. The Consumers' Counsel of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration has been rendering good service. Its organ, the Consumers' Guide (issued free of charge), is a limited though useful magazine. In the summer of 1936 President Roosevelt, noting the widespread interest in cooperatives, appointed a commission to study European cooperatives. The report of this commission was recently made public.

Consumers have also emerged as pressure groups. We have long been familiar with the laudable work of the Consumers' League in seeking to establish minimum labor standards through "white lists" and legislation. The National League of Women Voters, the American Association of University Women, and the American Home Economics Association, all include consumer protection as a regular part of their activities. A Consumers' National Federation was formed in New York City in April, 1937, as a result of a conference attended by members of forty-three organizations.

What is new in the situation is the rise of organizations which picket meat shops in protest against higher meat prices or join with pickets of retail stores in the effort to secure better labor standards. In New York, Detroit, and other cities headline news has been made by the arrest of these consumer-pickets. Judges have not known quite what to do with them. Legislative committees have also been invaded by organized consumer groups. Even the users of telephones now talk of joining rate-protest organizations in certain cities. These protest movements have for the first time since the war become established on something of a mass basis, and workers' organizations are fast developing a consumer consciousness. The Pontiac Local of the United Automobile Workers recently announced that its 3,000 members would start a rent strike on June 1 if rents were not lowered. Their leaders said that rent increases had absorbed wage gains made by the C. I. O. automobile strike.

In expanding so rapidly in these directions the American consumers' movement has involved itself in numerous jurisdictional conflicts. Consumers' organizations have not fitted neatly into functional pigeonholes. They have overlapped. Their ideas have been conflicting. Should a consumers' organization form a buying club or should it open a local store? Ought it to engage in propaganda activities for political change? Should it insist upon the maintenance of labor standards? Should the testing organizations be attached to the cooperatives or separate? Is the government to be trusted as an agency to assist consumers? Varying answers have been given to these questions. The result has been heated conflict. Sponsors of the movement feel a natural reluctance to discuss these conflicts openly, yet they must be faced. Intelligent decisions must be made if the consumer movement is to gain a real foothold. Much of the overlapping and consequent quarreling among consumer groups must be eliminated. Objectives, too, must be clarified. Save for the isolation of Consumers' Research (which has severed itself from other consumers' movements by its anti-labor policies), grounds exist for much greater unity in consumer activity. The movement has suffered too long from dogmatic people who have become so concerned with fostering their own organizations that they have forgotten the role of the movement. It would be utopian to counsel complete unification. It is not, however, too much to hope that, with a field as broad as the United States and with most consumers only just awakening from long slumber, the movement might at least unite on some such program as the following:

(1) The unification of local consumers' clubs, which would serve as the center for protests concerning labor standards and prices, and which would also be educational agencies. The consumers' clubs would pool their local buying and would make real savings by "collective bargaining" with merchants of their town. If they felt the time propitious, they would open stores. (2) The support by the clubs and by individuals of a testing laboratory which would assist consumers, their clubs, and other consumer organizations in the discriminating purchase of commodities. Such a research organization must not only test those commodities immediately available through cooperative sources but touch a broad range of commodities used by individuals who have not yet secured the benefits of cooperative purchasing. Consumers Union will soon be in a position to furnish this service. (3) The use of government publications and such other assistance as may benefit the consumer. (4) The establishment of a national coordinating body of consumer organizations which would serve as a lobby for consumer measures. This body would bring together the cooperatives, the testing organizations, and the pressure groups of consumers to make their common voice felt in Washington.

Under this plan there would be no reason why a local club should not buy its groceries through the district cooperative wholesaler and its general supplies through Cooperative Distributors, and obtain through club rates its technical information on methods of further stretching the dollar from the reports of Consumers Union. It could also be in close association with the Cooperative League, and could discuss government findings in the consumer field. It would, in short, be part of a responsible nation-wide consumer movement.

[Part I of this article appeared last week.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

An Open Letter to Norman Davis

DEAR MR. DAVIS: You have again returned from a trip to Europe as our itinerant ambassador and have been welcomed with the award of the gold medal of the Woodrow Wilson Foundation, which you yourself, when president of the foundation, bestowed upon Elihu Root, Charles A. Lindbergh, and Viscount Cecil. The award is specifically for your services for peace and the betterment of international relationships. This distinction is the more interesting because, as you yourself stated, there has been and is today a serious deterioration in those relationships. You also said in your speech of acceptance that there were some hopeful signs of a realization that "if this is to be a world in which it is possible to breathe and live with any degree of freedom and security, it is necessary for nations to reverse certain suicidal policies which can only bring ultimate ruin upon themselves and upon the world." You dwelt upon the "many prohibitive restrictions on trade," coupled with an unprecedented increase in military armaments "which is reaching a stage of appalling magnitude."

Now that was absolutely true—at least as regards the appalling growth of armaments. Whether there are hopeful signs of an awakening in Europe as to where the nations are heading is not so clear to the lay observer. But what are we to think of your own statesmanship when the press reports, almost on the very day that the honor was bestowed upon you, that your chief recommendation to the Administration on your return to Washington was that we build at once three more gigantic battleships in addition to the two whose keels are soon to be laid? If this is not contributing gravely to the "unprecedented increase in military armaments," what else could? Your purpose, as stated in the press, was to let this be a warning to the other nations that the United States could build the largest navy, and so bring them to their senses about the folly of an international naval race. What a confession of failure and despair this is! In the first place, it is precisely the policy you have been urging upon our country ever since you began attending international conferences for naval-disarmament or naval-limitation treaties. As you yourself once said, you have believed that the United States must have a full pack from which to deal; that the way to get results was to show, when you sat down to the table to bargain, that you had a lot of cards in your hand.

But, dear Mr. Ambassador, what has been the result of this policy of bluff if not the greatest diplomatic disaster possible in this field? Limitation of armaments is at an end. The Washington treaty is ended. England is building a huge additional naval force, and we are saddled with by far the greatest navy in our history—our naval bill this year is to be about $525,000,000. Japan, too, is no longer bound by any restrictions; so that, deny it if you please, we are well along in a naval race against Great Britain and Japan, with Germany, Italy, and Russia tagging after. Is this one of the hopeful signs of a "growing realization" that "it is necessary for nations to reverse certain suicidal policies . . ."? You yourself are advocating that we take another great step toward suicide. Yet you said in accepting the Wilson medal, "You cannot have a peaceful world without economic and military disarmament." The way to disarm, Mr. Ambassador, is to disarm, not to arm!

That you have many precedents for your extraordinary attitude is true. Only a few years ago Stanley Baldwin declared that another rearmament race would drive several nations into bankruptcy and lead directly to war—not peace; and that if war came it would "bring down civilization as we know it." Yet in panic terror of the Italian fleet, and the German and Italian airplanes, he has now committed England to a $7,500,000,000 rearmament plan. All you statesmen are utterly at a loss what to do—except to arm more and more at the very minute when you are truly saying that more armaments mean suicide. Can you deny that this is a confession of complete bankruptcy? You statesmen are fond of declaring that the spineless pacifists would leave their countries defenseless. You arm them—for what? You have said it—bankruptcy and suicide. And you have no other idea how to rescue the world than to lay down more battleships in order to overawe somebody!

Well, fortunately not even the American navy or the Administration has welcomed this advice of yours, if the press is to be believed. The navy wants to wait until it has tested the two $50,000,000 battleships (each costs $50,000,000) before building three more, and the Administration, bent on "economy," isn't anxious to ask $150,000,000 for capital ships to be tied up in some harbor during the next war. It may even be that it has finally occurred to someone in authority that this sort of maneuver is thoroughly understood in other countries, even if the governments have not yet read the words just attributed to you about why you think we should do this. They can read and write in London, Berlin, Paris, Rome, and Tokyo.

Finally, one frank question: Looking back over the record of all the conferences you have attended, do you not think that we Americans would have been just as well off or a little better if we had stayed at home?

BROUN'S PAGE

The Daily Worker

ONCE upon a time it was a custom among New York columnists on off days to turn out a piece kidding the Daily Worker. Sometimes these essays would be pretty vicious, while on other occasions the joshing was amiable in its intent. I know because I have written both kinds myself. But in either case the attitude was based on the feeling that the Worker was not truly a newspaper even in the broadest sense of the term. Left-wing sympathizers themselves adopted a defensive attitude if you mentioned the Worker. They spoke of the difficulties of keeping it alive and said that capitalist critics could not possibly understand the true function of an effective organ of revolutionary propaganda.

There was something in that, but it was also true that a good many members of the staff had a chink in their Marxism. They possessed no portion of the journalistic ability of the Tribune's old foreign correspondent.

As a matter of fact, I have my doubts as to whether the Worker was an efficient piece of daily propaganda in its early days. Its appeal was pretty strictly limited to the regulars. It sold communism to the Communists. To the average American worker it was almost as bewildering and barren of sustenance as the Boston Transcript.

To be sure, from the beginning there were brilliant essayists. Mike Gold, for instance, was and is a superb columnist. But radical newspapers need news just as much or even more than reactionary publications. The Worker was strictly a house organ. Today it seems to me an excellent newspaper both in appearance and contents.

Naturally it does not interpret "fair play" as that quality is envisioned by the Chicago Tribune or Mr. Hearst's New York American. The news is not treated in a spirit of complete neutrality. But whether one disagrees in whole or in part with the ideas which the Worker seeks to disseminate, it has a distinct value as a paper of record in its coverage of labor news. Anybody who is interested in this vital field of events ought to read the Worker and the New York Times—its closest rival in this domain—every morning. Moreover, the two papers serve to some extent to counteract each other and furnish a balanced ration. The business departments of the two publications should get together and offer a joint subscription.

If I express an admiration for the Worker which I did not always feel, it may be said that perhaps my judgment is warped by the fact that I am treated much more kindly in its columns than was the case a few years ago. I doubt the validity of that explanation. Even to this day I think that one of its most effective cartoons was a drawing by Jacob Burck which was printed many years ago when I was running for Congress on the Socialist ticket.

I was pictured as a stout infant in a perambulator clutching a bottle plainly labeled "gin." Norman Thomas in a nurse's costume was wheeling me up Park Avenue and proudly saying to a passing dowager, "Isn't he cute? He's only six months old." It is possible, of course, that I have changed my ways and views somewhat since that day, although I have not entirely eschewed the martini, the Tom Collins, or the rickey.

I am somewhat abashed on occasion by pleasant words from the left because they are based on a conception concerning me which I think is fallacious. Only the other day I read a highly laudatory article in which I was praised for having been active in the Newspaper Guild, but the writer went on to say that I had seen the light quite suddenly and that before my conversion I was an indolent playboy who spent all my days and nights acting as court jester at the dinner table in the great houses of the rich and elect.

I wonder what houses he was thinking about? I used to go to Swope's at Manhasset, but it wasn't such a great house and I wasn't so very funny. At any rate I never saw any signposts along the highway which identified it as the road to Damascus.

But here I am talking about myself instead of writing on the subject with which I started. These are old failings which even guild membership cannot cure. Probably this could have been made a good deal shorter if I had said at the very beginning that competence and skill must be combined with good intention to effect a successful performance. This is not presented as a piece of revolutionary advice to radicals. After all, ineptitude seems to be punished more severely in Russia than in any other country.

A few years ago one might have wagged a reproving finger at American radicals and exclaimed, "I don't care whether the author is a good Marxist or not. His novel is terrible just the same. And that isn't a good play or a good dance even though it is intended to be proletarian."

Such criticism would not be particularly pertinent now because men like Odets and Steinbeck, just to mention two names, have proved that propaganda and art are not warring forces. All of which brings me back to the Daily Worker and the observation that it is far more effective as a radical organ now that it has become a good paper instead of a poor one. And the man who writes the snappy paragraphs for the sport page is serving just as much as the writer of the editorials. And the same goes for the creator of the comic strip and the health hints. The Worker has made itself part of the American tradition, and that isn't going to hurt its objectives either.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

NEW FORMS OF THE DANCE

BY PAUL LOVE

BUT for us, conscious beings, it is the units that matter, for we do not count extremities of intervals; we feel and live the intervals themselves." Bergson makes this point in his comparison of ancient and modern science, and it might well stand for a definition of the purpose of the modern dance. Ever since Isadora Duncan discovered the Greeks, the art whose medium is movement has attempted to lift itself out of the field of applied art into the field of the fine arts. To do so, a revolution in technique was necessary, and Duncan tried to initiate it through a return to the fundamentals of movement; as she tried to achieve a form by reviving the Greek chorus.

The ballet turned to the dramatic story. The emergence of the dance from extraneous divertissement to an art form in its own right was vaguely felt by dramatic critics during the early presentations of the Diaghilev Ballet. The delicate filigree of the classic "Les Sylphides" gave way to a stronger dramatic form that plunged deeper into human life. But the ballet could not bridge the gap between pure abstract movement and pantomime, and continued to mix the two haphazardly. (This unresolved conflict is the same that afflicted the Jooss Ballet in its recent "Prodigal Son," which was a decided let-down after its excellent "Green Table.")

Then, simultaneously in America and Germany, the gap was bridged by the simple, and likewise profound, realization that movement—not story, not music, not pantomime, but movement—was the substance of the dance. Technically, the previously isolated leg movement and symmetrical arm movement were fused by bringing in the use of the torso. Thus the members became part of a cohesive whole instead of isolated appendages. This final recognition, uncertainly felt by Duncan and Ruth St. Denis, of the body as an integer caused the creation of an entirely new vocabulary of movement. The ballet had been preoccupied with extremities of intervals and had denied the transitional movement between the two chosen points (poses). "But for us," the modern dancer was able to say, "it is the units that matter, for we do not count extremities of intervals; we feel and live the intervals themselves."

This recognition of the unit naturally provided the form for which the dance had been looking. We have had the good fortune to watch the definition, "Movement is the substance of the dance," groped for and finally placed inexorably in words. Under its impetus a new technique capable of expressing the complete man has been found and matured. That technique has searched for and found its principles, fusing the abstract and the pantomimic, and testing itself in short solo flights from which it moved experimentally into short group forms, leaving the "impression," the "mood," and the obnoxious self-expression and reaching out to larger concrete phases of human life. Every major work of the past two seasons has been in group form; all have battered against reaction and convention, and through the excitement and hypnosis of movement tried to comment, condemn, and reply.

Since the method of the modern dance is extremely malleable, partly from the rigidity of the ballet method against which it reacts and partly from the dynamic principle upon which it works, a final definition of new forms would be premature. Nevertheless, experimentation has progressed sufficiently to indicate some trends. Undoubtedly the strongest work to date is that of Doris Humphrey in her trilogy: "Theater Piece," "With My Red Fires," and "New Dance." The ability to build a forty- to fifty-minute dance entirely in sequential movement, without benefit of "story" or literal pantomime, and to retain an audience's unflagging attention over that period is in itself an accomplishment. The span of attention of an audience is relatively small. If Miss Humphrey is able to increase it by as little as ten minutes, she could receive no finer tribute.

"Theater Piece" is in cinematic form, presenting today's vicious competition in business, sports, the theater, and so on, against which Miss Humphrey moves as an isolated figure, forecasting the social unity that will eventually dispel this destructive force (subsequently developed in "New Dance"). I have used the term cinematic rather than dramatic because the latter does not account for the fluidity of dance movement or for the length of time it can cover within a short limit of actual time. "Theater Piece" is composed of "shots" in quick succession, presenting such diverse elements as a woman playing golf, an elementary triangle drama, a business director, a leg-show, a symbolic figure protesting, a race, a stenographer hunting her man. The arrangement of these "shots" and their collision is montage. I use Eisenstein's definition: "Montage is not an idea recounted by pieces following each other, but an idea that arises in the collision of two pieces independent of one another." Obviously, such a method is not hampered by logical time sequence or logical narrative sequence and therefore has a much wider scope and is capable of more profound expression.

"New Dance" is in symphonic form, close to abstract movement, and creates its effect by the succession of different parts similar to the "movements" of a symphony. It opens on an arena lined with spectators, in which the leaders state their themes. The purpose of the dance is to break down the wall between the leaders and the group and to build a social unity in which there will be both an underlying group feeling and, to prevent regimentation, an individual expression within that group. The various themes, based on the two main principles of movement, change of weight and breath rhythm, are stated in the Prelude by the two leaders. The woman then extends hers to the group of women in First Theme and Second Theme, and the man his to the men's group in Third Theme. These two partial unifications are completed by a fusion of the two groups in Processional. In Celebration, built on a fugue form and a square dance, the success of this fusion is joyously expressed. At this point too many dances on social themes stop, but Miss Humphrey saw fit to carry hers on to Variations and Conclusion, in which different individuals state their own themes in counterpoint to the basso sustenuto of the group. These are the clearest, most concise dances that have been achieved in extended form recently. "With My Red Fires," presented for the first time this season, combines these two forms in a single dance.

Two others deserve attention: Martha Graham's "Chronicle" and Charles Weidman's "Quest," both new this season. Miss Graham has not yet arrived at the theater form which will contain the long themes of which she is capable. After watching the smooth unbroken functioning of "New Dance," it was difficult to adjust oneself to the curtain waits in "Chronicle," especially since they did not seem necessary except for changes of costume and décor which might have been avoided. The dance, on an anti-war theme, opened with a solo by Miss Graham, Specter—1914, followed by a brilliantly executed but emotionally unmoving Masque which concluded the first section, Dances Before Catastrophe. Dances After Catastrophe opened with Steps in the Street, built on hushed, purposeless foot movements going back and forth endlessly. In its restrained understatement it was by far the most moving episode in the whole dance. This section was concluded with Tragic Holiday, which was theatrically effective but overformalized. The third section, Prelude to Action, was a brilliant technical display but created no forthright impact. Throughout there was a coldness of approach which led to the impression that the dance had been scientifically built rather than created from an inner compulsion. The formal design, verging dangerously toward neo-classicism, would have been empty without Miss Graham's own personal warmth suffusing it. At the present stage her compositions too often need her to give them life. Possibly it is this difference that John Martin intended when he called her our greatest dancer and Miss Humphrey our greatest choreographer.

Miss Graham is expert at vividly portraying various states of mind, and all of her best dances have been studies of a person or group at the peak of some emotional seizure. Her form has been the result of an exploration and summation of all aspects of movement pertaining to the particular emotional state with which she may be concerned. The other forms which she has used, such as the pre-classic dance forms—particularly the sarabande, and the pavane upon which Masque was built—seem too stilted for her larger purposes.

Charles Weidman is likewise picking his way through uncertain ground in his "Quest," relating the experiences of the artist in the modern world. Sections of this dance were in his best satiric manner, in which he remains unequaled, but others were excessively prolix. I still feel that he is more at home and gets better results in the purely theatrical field. In creating for the concert stage he is not subject to the restricted time limit and the fast tempo that govern the revue. He is best in the dramatic form he has employed in "Happy Hypocrite," "Bargain Counter," and others. "Quest" was most effective in the opening sections in dance pantomime, wherein the omniscient critics and the old harridans of patrons were pilloried. The last half lost much of its impact through the sudden, unexpected shift to the symbolic.

Besides these dancers, others have turned to the long form—among them Tamiris, Miriam Blecher, Anna Sokolov, Eleanor King, Lillian Shapero, Sylvia Manning, and Gene Martel. With these new avenues opened, the modern dance may be removed from its Sunday-evening cultism and brought into relationship with the arts and the modern world at large.

BOOKS

Roads to Tragedy

THE AGAMEMNON OF AESCHYLUS. Translated by Louis MacNeice. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

ION OF EURIPIDES. Translated with Notes by H. D. Houghton Mifflin Company. $3.

MR. MACNEICE is of the generation of Auden, Spender, and Lewis, and his translation of the "Agamemnon," as might be expected, is not unaffected by this fact. In the first place, he has benefited by the instruction of the previous generation—Yeats and Pound in their examples, Eliot in his theory that good translation does not hesitate to recreate its object in terms of a contemporary language and experience. The principal difference between Mr. MacNeice and his predecessors is that where they fell into anachronisms he quite deliberately steps into them. We are to take as thoroughly calculated effects the reference to Cassandra as "prisoner clairvoyante," to Orestes as a "tramp," and to the holocaust of dead bodies at the end as an "appetizer" for Clytemnestra's lust. But these particular floutings of the time-spirit are merely expressive of a general indifference to that special language which has grown up around Greek translation and for which there is no correspondence in any known mode of communication of man or beast. The same might be said of the preference for words like "guts" and "whore," of the blunt casualness with which ominous statements are frequently made, and of the toughness, amounting almost to gratuitous cacophony, of the rhythms. All this would be indicative of hardly more than a desire to harass the professors, in the manner of Ezra Pound, if there were not also something like a pattern or a drift in Mr. MacNeice's contemporaneity. Of this the clearest hint is given in Clytemnestra's description of her husband and brother-in-law as "those militarists"; and there is also the allusion to a "dictatorship of the state." It must be noted, too, that Mr. MacNeice uniformly translates by "rich" those words which in the Greek may mean fortunate, noble, or simply prosperous. When the last of these words is employed, as in the following passage, it is distinctly in the more limited English sense of economically well-off:

Prosperity in all men cries
For more prosperity. Even the owner
Of the finger-pointed-at palace never shuts
His door against her, saying "Come no more."

The juxtaposition of the word "owner" (which does not happen to be in the Greek) with "prosperity" tends to restrict the application of the latter to a particular type of welfare. More often, however, the drift is evident not so much in verbal manipulations and additions as in almost imperceptible stressings of tone within a whole passage, as in the Herald's long speech at the beginning. Here the unusually strong conviction of the verse, residing in the syntactical repetition and the sharp concreteness of the key images, makes of the common soldier's account of the Trojan war a piece of modern debunking quite unlike the simple complaint of the original:

If I were to tell of our labors, our hard lodging,
The sleeping on crowded decks, the scanty blankets,
Tossing and groaning, rations that never reached us—
And the land too gave matter for more disgust,
For our beds lay under the enemy's walls.
Continuous drizzle from the sky, dews from the marshes,
Rotting our clothes, filling our hair with lice.

Unquestionably Mr. MacNeice has pointed his translation around that antithesis which has come to be taken by more and more minds as the modern realignment of the tragic forces: his Agamemnon is a bloated capitalist on the model of Cecil Rhodes or Ivar Kreuger; his Clytemnestra a bored Mayfair hostess with a taste for blood-letting; and his chorus the seething modern proletarian mass. And to say this is really to pay his translation the highest compliment; for if translation is an art and not a self-deluded attempt at an impossible ideal, it must involve the deepest attitudes of the translator, and these are better frankly recognized than left smoldering beneath the surface of the mind. In this view an ancient text becomes hardly more than the raw materials for a creative assertion of values felt in the present; and everything depends on the strength and the clarity with which they are apprehended. Mr. MacNeice is no more faithful to Aeschylus than Fitzgerald or Murray or Professor Weir Smyth; but his translation seems superior to theirs for the very reason that he has not made fidelity his ideal. He has recharged the old play with the specific qualities of a specifically contemporary experience. And since we too are necessarily influenced in our response by our generation we cannot but feel that if this is not the best translation of Aeschylus it is at least the best that has appeared in our time.

What H. D. has done to the fragmentary and little-known drama by Euripides is, of course, quite a different matter. Belonging to a somewhat older generation which regarded the past less as a quarry than as a sanctuary, she has distilled the lyricism of the most lyrical of the Greek tragic poets to the point where it tends to vanish, like the thin line of print on her page, into the blue distance. If Mr. MacNeice's score is prepared for the revolutionary fifes and drums, this is a trans-

now ... You CAN HAVE THE QUALITY-PROTECTION AND SAVINGS OF A Consumers Cooperative

It has been estimated that $2.30 is spent in distribution for every $1.00 spent in production of goods! 100,000,000 families (in 43 countries) are successfully fighting excessive distribution cost through consumers' cooperation: the quality-protecting, value-rendering, money-saving method of distribution owned by the consumers themselves.

Today, wherever you live, you can benefit from cooperative purchasing. For Cooperative Distributors, in addition to serving purchasers over-the-counter, serves all the U. S. through Mail Order facilities! And Cooperative Distributors maintain a laboratory to protect consumers against inferior quality, and a union-made preference policy to support organized labor.

NOT "BARGAINS"...

Every-Day Values typical of thousands made possible by Cooperation:

CD TOOTH PASTE

Laboratory-tested for honest quality! Ingredients accepted by American Dental Association. Attractive package with brass rust-proof cap. 4-ounce can, 22c (4 cans, $1.00).

CD MOTH CONTROL

Laboratory-tested for honest quality! "Para" is most effective dry protection for use in trunks and tight closets. No after-odor. 1½-lb. can, 55c (3-lb. can, $1.00).

FREE!

Consumers Defender, magazine-catalog listing hundreds of values like these. You will want to avail yourself of the benefits and privileges of membership in CD. But even though you are not a member, you may buy through this rapidly growing Rochdale cooperative.

Consumers Defender MAIL TODAY! N-12

COOPERATIVE DISTRIBUTORS
30 Irving Place, New York, N. Y.
Gentlemen: Please send me, FREE, latest copy of CONSUMERS DEFENDER and literature describing your organization.

Name _____
Address _____ City _____ State _____

COOPERATIVE DISTRIBUTORS
AFFILIATED WITH THE COOPERATIVE LEAGUE OF THE U. S.

A WORLD SCOOP!

M. V. VODOPYANOV

THE PILOT'S DREAM

by Vodopyanov

Daring Soviet Union pilot who conceived the flight to the North Pole appears exclusively in the

SUNDAY WORKER

Every Week—

The hearts and imaginations of the world's millions were stirred by the Soviet Union's conquest of the top of the world.

Two years ago Vodopyanov wrote a novel, "The Pilot's Dream," projecting the flight now triumphantly concluded by Soviet heroes. Vodopyanov's dream has come true.

Here, in novelized form, in dramatic and pulse-quickenning "fiction," Vodopyanov accomplishes the flight in imagination, which he and his companions have now made in reality. Read this fascinating, exciting novel, which through special arrangement will appear exclusively for six weeks in the

SUNDAY WORKER

America's Leading Progressive Weekly Newspaper

On Sale at All Newsstands

Special 25c Offer

Mail the Coupon Now

THE SUNDAY WORKER,
50 East 13th Street, New York, N. Y.

I am enclosing 25c. Send me the Sunday Worker for six weeks beginning with the issue containing the first instalment of Vodopyanov's "The Pilot's Dream."

Name

Address

City..... State..... N

position for the flute. The romantic dream of Hellas is attenuated to its ultimate feminine refinement in a verse whose lightest syllable is made to seem like a violation of the silence. Like the whole romantic picture of the classical world, the effect is essentially static: even the look of the page suggests caryatid and Ionic order. What we have here is Greece through a temperament, that is, a style, and the style is both exquisite and charming, to use two of this poet's favorite adjectives. And since any style, even a less beautiful one than this, is a boon in a Greek translation, H. D.'s work is gratifying. But there is in this style too little of that contemporary awareness which makes for the fertile discords in a painting by Chirico or Picasso. It is hardly a proper style for drama, even for such splintered drama as this particular play.

Following the brilliant adaptations of Cocteau, Yeats's renderings of the Oedipus choruses, Messrs. Fitts and Fitzgerald's recent "Alcestis," and Francis Fergusson's "Electra," these translations give strength to the notion that we are witnessing a real revival of interest in Greek tragedy. To seek an explanation is immediately to be led into some perilous generalizations; and there is the fact that every age has its quota of translations. Perhaps the most that can be said is that here is evidence that the tragic sentiment is not only still very much alive but alive with a peculiarly emphatic force. If it has so far expressed itself only indirectly through translations rather than an original body of subject-matter, it may be that this is a necessary discipline and preparation in an epoch when even the essential pattern of tragedy has been pretty widely forgotten. This is the way that tragedy has always been reborn in the past; and this is the most encouraging aspect of the present vogue.

WILLIAM TROY

Judicial Supremacy

THE COURT DISPOSES. By Isidor Feinstein. Covici-Friede. $1.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE NATIONAL WILL. By Dean Alfange. Doubleday, Doran. $2.50.

THE American doctrine of judicial supremacy, among other results direct and indirect, has led to the making of books without number—many of them scholarly and excellent. Of these two, the first is the more interesting. It is frankly a polemic against the court, but its brief pages are packed with pungent, effective, and even brilliant political argumentation. The author has studied the standard authorities and the leading cases to good effect. (Both these writers, however, have apparently overlooked the important contributions of C. G. Haines.) Mr. Feinstein deftly characterizes cases with an apt sentence or phrase, inveighs against the court as "glorified proof reader" only comparing constitutional text with statute, shows how chance in the sitting of particular judges may profoundly affect constitutional doctrine, as in the minimum-wage cases, explains the revision of view and expansion of meaning of "due process" as the "third American revolution," argues that the court's first hundred years were both the "easiest" and the most liberal, thus properly emphasizing that the extreme of the judicial veto was not an outgrowth of the horse-and-buggy days, and finally places the court in proper perspective as concerns its much-publicized role of defender of individual liberties. In a chapter entitled The Hobgoblins Will Get You, he discusses the bugaboo of fascism, and the court as protector therefrom, and in pointing out the restricted effect of judicial review in supporting personal rights, hazards the view that the effort to visualize the recent conservative majority of the court as throwing up judicial barricades in defense of Earl Browder or Norman Thomas "requires ■ robust imagination." His conclusion is that reform must be sought in different ways, in fact, in all ways possible—as by change of personnel, limitation of the court's jurisdiction, specific amendments conferring national power, and amendment freeing the power to amend.

The other book, recipient of the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Award, is also satisfactory, though it covers familiar ground. Perhaps it is ironical that the author's ultimate conclusions are made in reliance upon Brooks Adams's "The Theory of Social Revolutions," published almost ■ quarter of ■ century ago. But after all, Adams's critique was, and still is, definitive and final. How modern is the sound of the following:

After many years of study of, and reflections upon, this intricate subject I have reached the conviction that though Mr. Roosevelt may have erred in the remedy which he has suggested, he is right in the principle which he has advanced, and in my next chapter I propose to give the evidence and explain the reasons which constrain me to believe that American society must continue to degenerate until confusion supervenes if our courts shall remain semi-political chambers.

Actually it is Brooks Adams, writing in the spring of 1913.

The present book is a semi-popular discussion of constitutional history, with analysis of many of the leading decisions, made for the benefit of the layman. The author's final judgment is the row hardly startling one that the Supreme Court is a legislative body which acts politically. In view of the extensive labors of scholars in the field, the book's chief value may well be as an illustration of the process of education of its author, and—notwithstanding recent pronouncements—perhaps also of the distinguished judges of award. We are told that this essay was chosen from among 250 manuscripts by a committee consisting of President Dodds of Princeton, President Moulton of the Brookings Institution, Dr. Canby of the Saturday Review of Literature, Dean Pound of Harvard, and Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Jr. One cannot cavil at the respectability of the choice, but in view of the excellent work appearing regularly in the law reviews of the country, one may perhaps wonder whether the professors and students are not overlooking the desirability of competing for such substantial prizes.

Many of the books which needed to be written on judicial supremacy have now been completed. The need of making available for the layman the researches of the scholars would seem to be filled. This is not to say, however, that there are not many parts of the field yet deserving of careful research. There is a possibility of brilliant promise in the tracing of the development of constitutional doctrine in the light of the personalities of the justices, along lines made famous by Parrington in his "Main Currents in American Thought," wherein he touched all too briefly on the making of constitutional doctrine. Such a study would require exhaustive search of biographical materials in family archives and elsewhere. Again, surprising as it seems, no complete objective examination has been made of the actual incidence of judicial supremacy—what it has meant, in specific instances, to the activities of government, how it has affected the course of legislation, or its effect as a potential threat to the representative assemblies—until just this spring Professor Edgerton of Cornell has broken new ground here in the Cornell Law Quarterly. Ventures of this kind, however, call for the most exhaustive and painstaking labors. One might suggest that

THE Nation

ANNOUNCES FOR EARLY PUBLICATION . . .

Closing in on Hearst

William Randolph Hearst, dean of yellow journalists, is trying to raise $35,500,000 by selling securities on the market. They must first, however, run the gamut of the Securities Exchange Commission. Mr. James Smith describes the convincing statements that have been filed with the commission by consumer, labor, and other groups to the effect that Mr. Hearst's enterprises are not good investments for the American public.

France Lives Dangerously

Democracy in France is threatened by fascist enemies from within and without. Alexander Werth, the Manchester Guardian correspondent in Paris, will discuss the alignment of forces in the light of his extraordinary knowledge of men and affairs in France.

Great Britain, Next Phase

In the first of two articles Harold J. Laski discusses the personalities and probable policies of the new British Cabinet headed by Neville Chamberlain. In the second he provides ■ comprehensive survey of the English labor movement which is now suffering from the effects of ■ leadership comparable in its backwardness to the A. F. of L. bureaucracy.

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year; Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

6-12-37

prize funds could well be used to stimulate, and to ease the pain of, such research, rather than to reward the reworking, however well accomplished, of ground already satisfactorily covered by able scholars.

CHARLES E. CLARK

A Parthian Glance

THE PRETENDER. By Lion Feuchtwanger. The Viking Press. $2.50.

POETRY, as Aristotle pointed out, is truer than history. The problem for the historical novelist is to make fact as plausible as fiction. Scott solved it by casting actual personages in the bit parts and making his hero an attendant lord or homme moyen historique. But it is dangerous to intermingle private destinies and public events; witness that long-suffering family of Noel Coward's whose domestic crises coincided so miraculously with the milestones of empire. The historical novels that remain novels are those in which the background is subdued, in which the echo from the cannons of Borodino is caught as it reverberates through the salons of St. Petersburg. Writing them is less a synthetic than an analytic process. Ordinarily the novelist tries to objectify his emotions in a series of situations. The historical novelist, starting from given situations, trusts to luck or ingenuity to impose significance upon them. He must hew to the outline and let the emotions fall where they may. He is the trick artist who is confronted with a set of random points and asked to produce a picture. The test of his skill is the indirection with which he connects them.

The points which determine the story of "The Pretender" have the advantage of being few and far between. Roman historians make only scattered reference to the false Neros who turned up in Asia Minor after the emperor's mysterious death, one of whom appeared as the figure-head for a Parthian revolt at the end of the principate of Titus. Thus Lion Feuchtwanger is free to develop another of those diplomatic fantasies in which he seems to specialize. He is a past master in all the tortuous ruses of red tape and jobbery, face-saving and back-stairs intrigue. His technique is old-fashioned, the texture of his novel is a little coarse, but the plot is shrewdly hatched. At his best, it has the ironic inconsequence of Stendhal—for example, in the romance of the military commander and the vestal virgin manquée. At his worst, it is our old friend Oppenheim dressed up in the toga praelectata. Sooner or later his fictitious circumstances are brought face to face with the fact that they never happened in reality and are therefore doomed to failure in the book.

At a time when the standard social and economic history of Rome betrays the bias of an émigré Russian archaeologist, an émigré German novelist is entitled to find certain modern implications in the imperial theme. Feuchtwanger's protagonist, the megalomaniac potter Terentius Maximus, is by design a shadowy and theatrical figure, obviously cut out to be the hollow and irresponsible symbol of leadership. Behind him stands a much riper character, the expatriate Senator Varro, whose impatience with the narrow proconsular administration precipitates the crucial outbreak. One is never quite sure whether the motive is six thousand sesterces or an international ideal, but the issues between East and West, between liberal cosmopolitanism and provincial nationalism, are sharply drawn. Varro's own council table becomes a diagram for fascism; he, the rich landowner, and his friend, the languid aristocrat King Philip of Commagene, gradually discover that they have lost their puppet to the conniving slave, Knops, and the crude soldier of fortune, Trebonius. The futility of his sacrifice is underscored by the compromises he is forced to make with everything against which he took up arms.

The historical novelist is necessarily a partisan of the Cleopatra's-nose theory of history. He has a vested interest in tracing the fates of nations to the vagaries of individuals. Feuchtwanger never manages to convey a sense of anything behind the movements he is describing, an awareness of the popular reasons for disaffection which he might have learned from Tacitus—rerum novarum cupidine et odio praesentium. The nature of his material permits him to dispense with catacombs and chariot races and the traditional impedimenta, but he cannot resist the temptation to end on a messianic high note. It is suggested, in faint but unmistakable undertones, that the Book of Revelations may profitably be read as a sequel to "The Pretender." Dr. Feuchtwanger offers a curious contribution to the Johannine problem; his John of Patmos is neither the so-called Presbyter nor the son of Zebedee but a retired actor who is not above making a return appearance in the least authentic of the Senecan tragedies. And, for the sake of the record, it might be well to add that he has reversed the position of the two claimants to the throne of Parthia. Artabanus IV, whom he seems to regard as a legitimate monarch, was only another pretender.

HARRY LEVIN

TWIN PINES

A Camp for Adults

New main house featuring individual screened sun porches and semi-private adjoining baths; comfortable bungalows. Sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, etc.

June rate, $25. For details, write
TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

The Workers University of MEXICO—invites YOU to attend its

Summer School Session

JULY 5 TO AUGUST 14

Let the representatives of Modern Mexico inform you about the problems of their country.

(Regular summer school subjects, also)

Write for free illustrated catalogue and full information to:

WORKERS UNIVERSITY OF MEXICO

Rosales No. 26

Mexico City

or to Mexican Consuls and agents of the National Railways of Mexico throughout the United States.

New York City representative

JOSÉ MIGUEL BEJARANO

156 Fifth Avenue

New York, N. Y.

(Ours is the only Mexican Summer School whose certificates are accepted and endorsed by the Department of Education of Mexico.)

FILMS

Saltwater Setting

MERELY as a document "Captains Courageous" (Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer) is of the first magnitude. It is not a document in the strict sense, being a "made" film. But when the producers declare that "never before, in a picture with a marine background, had such inspired, undaunted effort been called for on the part of producers, directors, and players, nor such expenditure of time and technical resource required," I can believe them. And nobody can doubt that the film was made in an ocean setting which furnished an equivalent of Kipling's scene even if it did not coincide with it. It makes little difference, perhaps, that the Pacific was used as well as the Atlantic—the waters off Los Angeles as well as those off Nova Scotia. The illusion is perfect that we are at the Grand Banks, and no more is necessary.

The illusion we have that we are among Gloucester fishermen for two hours comes partly from the background and partly from the actors. The background is, of course, the sea with its many varieties of surface and its unaccountable motions, and the two sailing ships, Captain Disko's and Captain Cushman's, most often before our eyes. The ships are magnificent, whether becalmed or flying; and the frequent bursts of applause at the sight of their high wild sails are justified. If this is less true farther on when Disko and Cushman are racing home to Gloucester at the peril of their lives, not to speak of others' lives, the reason is that the narrative has at last begun to take effect. If only because we have known the passengers for an hour and a half we can feel concern lest their rival skippers take fatal risks by scudding across too shallow waters or by holding their bows too boldly into the wind. But here is where the actors come in. We are more than acquainted with Disko (Lionel Barrymore), Cushman (Oscar O'Shea), Manuel (Spencer Tracy), and Long Jack (John Carradine); we have accepted them as individual fishermen, and indeed as individual human beings. The flying of the skippers is the best human thing in the film, unless Spencer Tracy's smile is that. Mr. Tracy as the angelic Portygee who saves the little hero's life and thereafter sings to him on deck by day or night gives one of the best performances in a year of good acting. And John Carradine is again the long, lean near-villain whom he of all men knows best how to impersonate.

For the story itself there is little to say. Kipling's he-mannery has never been palatable to me, and it is not so here, where if anything the direction has underlined it more heavily than Kipling did. The contrast between Harvey Cheyne's sybaritic land life and this stalwart life into which he drops from an ocean liner is too baldly stated to carry moral meaning—unless the moral is that we all should take to the Banks, and probably shall when we discover that there is not a single unattractive feature about them. The part of Harvey Cheyne, by the way, had to be made seven years younger in order to accommodate the presence in it of Freddie Bartholomew.

It is no fun to have to record that Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers, who have been descending since their first fine song-and-dance picture of not so long ago, have apparently struck bottom in "Shall We Dance?" (RKO-Radio), which is long and dull, and so infatuated with the senseless details of the story it tells as to leave little time for the principals to do what anyone has gone to see them do.

MARK VAN DOREN

When THE LITERARY DIGEST
says that

JOHN L. LEWIS

"considers Morris Ernst's The Ultimate Power is one of his reading 'musts';" it reflects the feeling of liberal readers and thinkers everywhere.

THE ULTIMATE POWER

by Morris L. Ernst

at all booksellers $3.00
DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

Nation readers are cordially invited to the
JUNE CONFERENCE

of the League for Industrial Democracy

at Napanoch Country Club, Napanoch, N. Y.

June 18-20, 1937

Subject: "TOWARD A FARMER-LABOR PARTY"

Speakers: NORMAN THOMAS, GEORGE SOULE, CONGRESSMAN JOHN T. BERNARD, EARL BROWDER, JAMES B. CAREY, JULIUS HOCHMAN, JOSEPH SCHLOSSBERG, MURRAY BARON, ALFRED BINGHAM, JOHN J. DILLON, ARTHUR HUGGINS, JOHN H. BOSCH, and others.

For information write to

Dr. Harry W. Laidler, League for Industrial Democracy
112 East 19th Street, New York City

A RARE BARGAIN for ART-LOVERS

Containing 240 beautiful full-page plates Any 6 Books, 88c—The 12 Books, $2.98

The Famous MASTERS IN ART SERIES

GOYA — HOLBEIN'S DRAWINGS — GIOTTO — WATTEAU — VERMEER — TURNER — TINTORETTO — RUISDAEL — ROSSETTI — RAEBURN — NATTIER — MURILLO — METSU — MANTEGNA — CONSTABLE — LIPPI — JAN STEEN — GHIRLANDAJO — FRANCIA — Duccio — de HOOCH — DAVID — CHARDIN — WATTS.

Twenty-four long-out-of-print, paper-covered books in the famous MASTERS IN ART SERIES. Size, 7 1/4" x 10".

FREE EXAMINATION OFFER ■ SEND NO MONEY

THE UNION LIBRARY ASSOCIATION, Inc. (Est. 1884) N-91
867-373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

Gentlemen: Please send for 5-DAYS' FREE EXAMINATION the books underlined:

Goya — Holbein's Drawings — Giotto — Watteau — Vermeer — Turner — Tintoretto — Ruisdael — Rossetti — Raeburn — Nattier — Murillo — Metsu — Mantegna — Constable — Lippi — Jan Steen — Ghirlandaio — Francia — Duccio — de Hooch — David — Chardin — Watts.

Upon delivery, I will deposit with postman $..... and a few cents postage. I have the privilege, if not completely satisfied, of returning the books for a complete refund of purchase price.

Name

Address

☐ CHECK HERE if you prefer to enclose full payment, thus saving delivery charges. (SAME MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE APPLIES.)

Letters to the Editors

Harvard's Civil War

Dear Sirs: Mr. Lamb's article on the "dismissal" of Messrs. Walsh and Sweezy from Harvard University, in The Nation of May 15, seems to me to serve a good cause badly because of its over-simplification of the problem. I am moved to protest because I agree that the "dismissal" was a mistake.

Mr. Lamb speaks of "dismissal." The inference which unwary readers will make is that the two men were forthwith fired. If President Conant, on whom Mr. Lamb wants to put the responsibility, was determined to rid himself of radicals, he was strangely inefficient. He need not have renewed their appointments at all, whereas he reappointed them for two years.

Mr. Lamb speaks of "budgets in the departments of history, government, economics, and sociology" as "frozen," the implication being that these departmental budgets were "frozen" in order to hamstring the social sciences. If Mr. Lamb will consult the official report of the university, he will discover that all departmental budgets are "frozen," that thirteen departments last year incurred deficits which the university had to meet from its general fund, and that as a consequence the general fund was dangerously reduced. The social sciences are not being financially "starved" (his phrase) to any greater degree than other departments.

Mr. Lamb states that President Conant is "not sympathetic with the social sciences." He may not be. I don't know. If the situation were reversed—if, for example, student concentration in the social sciences were about 1 per cent, as is now the case with the classics, and the classics were drawing the greater bulk of the students, I suspect Mr. Lamb would complain. But is President Conant notably unsympathetic with the social point of view? He has "asked a group of our faculty who are interested in the historical development—political, social, and intellectual—of this country to draw up a report on the possibilities of extra-curricular study in this field by undergraduates." "It seems clear," he writes, "that it would be desirable for every college graduate to have a knowledge of the cultural history of the United States in the broadest sense of the term." I find it difficult to reconcile the picture of an administrator notably unsympathetic with the social sciences with the picture of one going out of his way to acquaint college men with the "cultural history of the United States in the broadest sense of the term."

What is valuable in Mr. Lamb's article has to do with the status and future of younger scholars in the teaching profession. This problem, which is not peculiar to Harvard, must be solved, but we shall not solve it by reckless attacks upon university administrators.

HOWARD MUMFORD JONES
Cambridge, Mass., May 14

Dear Sirs: "Literature is not a social science; it is a cure for social science." The speaker, Professor Howard Mumford Jones, was addressing the Modern Language Association at its Richmond meeting last December.

Today Mr. Jones, the friend of the social sciences, rushes to the rescue of Mr. Conant, who is, Mr. Jones assures us, also a friend of social science. The proof? That Mr. Conant proposes to give the students in Harvard College extra-curricular instruction in American literature and history. No doubt as "a cure for social science."

Word comes from Cambridge that Mr. Jones is the only member of the committee on extra-curricular instruction in the cultural history of the United States who understood Mr. Conant to propose a program for amplifying the work in the social sciences and thus underlining the presidential sympathies with these social subjects. The members of the committee were drawn from the departments of American history and literature, and not from economics or political science. The emphasis was on the word cultural, and not on the words "in the broadest sense of the term," that is, by Mr. Jones's unique definition, pertaining to the social sciences.

It would appear that Mr. Jones is in the arena as the friend of all parties, since he is also in agreement that "the 'dismissal' was a mistake." To be sure, he nowhere advances any grounds for such agreement, a strategic move with which the sideline observer cannot quarrel. Fortunately, it is now possible to record him as lined up solidly with the administration, since Mr. Conant himself, in a statement mailed to the Harvard Board of Overseers on May 26, has for all practical purposes announced his agreement that there may have been a mistake, and that he will accept the services of a committee of nine professors, nominated by 131 junior teaching officers of the university interested in further investigation of the "dismissal."

ROBERT KEEN LAMB
Williamstown, Mass., June 5

Boycott of the Record

Dear Sirs: The Philadelphia Record has fallen under the ban of the Roman Catholic church in the Philadelphia diocese because of the paper's alleged pro-Loyalist attitude toward the Spanish war. First came letters of protest from the church and then stronger action in the form of a small pamphlet entitled "The Philadelphia Record Weeps for Catholic Martyrs." This was distributed at masses on Sunday, May 16, and is still being circulated in the diocese. Charging that the Record gives only the side of "the red government of Valencia," the pamphlet suggests that the recipients show it to the advertising managers of the stores where they shop and make a personal complaint at the same time to the proprietors. The parishioner is also urged to see that his neighbor gets one of the pamphlets and to spread them among members of parish societies. The booklet also recommends that Record circulation agents should have the door slammed in their faces.

The Catholic protest is issued under the auspices of an organization calling itself the League of American Democracy. Two of the leading lights of the society are the Reverend Joseph S. Hogan, S.J., professor of philosophy at St. Joseph's College and High School; and the Reverend Richard McKeon, dean of the school, which is conducted by the Jesuit fathers. The school is the central distributing point of the pamphlets. Thus far 14,000 of them have been given out. Father Hogan, who is understood to be the author of the pamphlet, has been conducting a one-man crusade against communism here by way of the lecture platform, radio, and correspondence columns of the newspapers. His brother is the president of Fordham University. To date the Record has made no reply to the

SCHOOL

THE COMMUNITY SCHOOL

2059 Bedford Ave. Brooklyn, N. Y.
BUckminster 2-9700

A Low Tuition, Progressive School. Coeducational, Ages 4-13. Enriched Curriculum, Child Psychologist. Reservations for 1937-38 Now Accepted.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507
Fifth Ave. MUrray Hill 2-4221.

FOR SALE

FOR PARENTS ONLY

We have built four beautifully complete modern homes on Lounsbury Road, Croton-on-Hudson, especially for families whose children will attend the Hessian Hills School.
These homes are situated on the slope of a wooded hill overlooking the magnificent Hudson . . . near the School and the Croton shopping center, with 50-minute express train service to Grand Central Station.
They have 4 to 8 rooms, 2 to 3 baths and all modern conveniences. Each house has nearly an acre of ground fully landscaped. Owners will share the privileges of a large private lake.

You can buy one of these exceptional homes by paying as little as $81.50 per month over a period of years, with low taxes and nominal insurance costs.

For each family we will pay the tuition of a child for one year at the Hessian Hills
School.

For details of this most unusual offer, inquire at the property, or

WESTMANTON REALTY CORP.
55 Fifth Avenue, New York
ALgonquin 4-5730

VACATION FUNDS Will Buy
A Small COUNTRY PLACE

Year Round Pleasure—Enduring Value
C. RICK, Crompond Rd., Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. 2515-11

SUMMER RENTALS

Unusual studio cottage overlooking trout brook; fireplace, terraces, modern improvements, interestingly furnished. Secluded. Commuting distance. Phone Peekskill 2325W.

Attractive bungalow, Stoneybrook Colony,
Westport, Conn. All conveniences, swimming, tennis, handball, summer school for children.
Berman, Topping 2-5017.

Westport, Conn.—Stonybrook Colony, charming house, suitable for two families. Modern conveniences—tennis, swimming, children's camp. PEEnn. 6-8858.

Monsey, N. Y. New Cottage, all improvements
—Summer Colony. Children's counsellor free.
Swimming, tennis, handball. Commuting. Golf nearby. $375 season. ESplanade 7-7314.

New modern bungalows, 3 and 4 rooms. Hollow Brook Road. Inquire: Roxy Fruit, Peekskill, N. Y. Tel. Peekskill 750.

Including lake, entertainment, athletics, $35 per person for season. Meals, $2 per day. Tall Timbers, Lake Mohegan, N. Y.

Farm Cottage, four rooms and bath. Furnished, all improvements. $300 for season.
Phillips-Lipman Fruit Farm, Washington
Crossing, N. J. Mercer Co.

SUBLET

2½ rooms, completely furnished—large, cool
(Cross ventilated)—new building. June 23 to Sept. 1. GR. 7-6246.

Furnished two room apartment. July and August—$50 a month. Reply in writing to
L. Tulchin, 54 W. 74th St., Apt. 412A,
N. Y. C.

RESORTS

BIGGEST DOLLAR VALUE IN ALL
VACATION LAND!

Now you can enjoy a never-to-be-forgotten vacation at COPAKE at these attractive low rates:

JUNE from $30 Weekly
JULY & AUG. from $32.50

Write for Illustrated Booklet "B"

COPAKE

The Island Paradise
ON BEAUTIFUL LAKE COPAKE
CRARYVILLE, N. Y.
N. Y. 116 Nassau St. . . BE. 3-5590

The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit
CAMP MILFORD

KENT CONN.

Opens June 18th

A modern adult camp on beautiful lake . . . in heart of Connecticut Hills. All outdoor sports; splendid entertainment: 8-piece orchestra. Delicious meals.

June rates $25—Daily $4.00

July and August $29.50
weekly rate.

Week-End Rate $5 Per Day

Railroad fare $1.65 one way

Write for booklet
11 West 42nd St.
PEnn. 6-7842

BARLOW FARM

Candlewood Lake, Sherman, Conn.
Modern conveniences, tennis, etc.
$3.50 a day—$18 weekly

For information N. Y. MAin 4-8276, evenings

TRAVEL

TOURS CONDUCTED OR INDEPENDENT
To Western Europe, Palestine, Soviet Russia, Paris International Exposition, and the Salzburg Festival
Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 UNION SQUARE, N. Y. AL. 4-1500

ROOM WANTED

Gentleman wants large room in high class apartment with private Jewish family. Broadway Section between 110-150 St. Box No.
921, c/o The Nation.

SITUATION WANTED

Candidate Ph.D. (economics) part or full time employment. Expert knowledge Russian, German; experience editing, translating. Box
No. 922, c/o The Nation.

WANTED

LAW SCHOOL OR COLLEGE STUDENTS willing to volunteer services in interesting work for summer months, address American Civil Liberties Union, 31 Union Square West,
N. Y. C.

Would like to have a girl, aged 11-13, to spend summer vacation with my daughter age 11 at my country home. All activities will be under my personal direction. Write Draw R. Norwalk, Conn.

Young lady as counsellor in a summer resort to take care of from 4 to 10 children. Must have camp experience, college graduate. P. O.
Box 7, Armonk, N. Y.

RESORTS

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE

Ideal for Honeymooners

Special Rates

Up to JUNE 26th

$25 weekly

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

Warrensburg, N. Y.
City Phone: VANDerbilt 3-9875

IN HEART OF ADIRONDACKS Honeymooners
Paradise

MOON
HILL Lodge

LOW JUNE RATES
All Activities this month
Hotel Accommodations
Country Club Activities
Enjoy Golf, Tennis, Riding,
Boating, Bathing, Unsurpassed Cuisine (Dietary Laws). Write for Booklet N.
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.,
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N. Y.: 45 W. 45th St.
MEDallion 3-5450

ON SCHROON LAKE

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine

New Low Rates: $25.00-$27.50-$30.00

Write for Booklet

Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO NEW HAMPSHIRE

SWIM, FISH, PLAY

or rest in the salt air and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp
Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.

A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1¾ hrs. from New York. $3 per day. $18 per week. Station, Derby. P. O.
Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts.
25 minutes by train, 50 by car. Golf, tennis, handball on our premises; riding nearby. Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364.

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP—CAPACITY
30. JEWISH AMERICAN MEALS. SPECIAL
JUNE RATE $16.00. BUSHKILL, PA.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings.
Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing.
Pleasant Valley 2741 RATE $17 in June

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George.
$20.00 and $21.00. Tel 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

SCHOOL CAMP

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK

A camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen of whom the keynote of happiness is creative activity with a social environment developing responsibility and comradeship.

For reservations and further information write:
JAS. H. DICK

protest or to editorials criticizing its stand which are appearing regularly in the Catholic Standard and Times, official publication of the church in the Philadelphia diocese.

I thought the present incident might interest you since, to my knowledge, it is the first overt action taken by the Catholic church in this country to strike at a newspaper on the issue of the Spanish war.

JOSEPH M. THOMPSON
Upper Darby, Pa., May 28

A Champion for The Nation

Dear Sirs: Cyrus H. Eshleman accuses The Nation of having become an obedient organ of tyranny and terrorism because you approve of the Wagner Labor Act. In my estimation The Nation has always been ahead of the times. Certainly, anyone who doesn't approve of the Wagner Labor Act is way behind the times. It is a pity that the leaders of this magazine can't run the country. If your kind of farsightedness is tyranny, keep it up!

J. FRED L. SIMPSON
Savannah, Ga., May 27

A Rebel Turned Loyalist

[The following letter is reprinted from the April issue of the Spanish weekly Juventud, published at Paris.]

Dear —: When the rebellion started I was doing my military service at Melilla. For five months I remained there, taking part, because I had to, in the massacre of all those who were suspected of being faithful to the republic.

One night at Majadahonda I was sentry at an advance post. Behind the parapet a corporal and two men were sleeping. At one o'clock I had to send one of them to the officer who was about half a mile away. After sending the messenger I told the other soldier to light a fire while I went to see if the other sentries were still awake. As the others could not see me in the fog, I seized the occasion to escape.

I marched all the next day, weakness and fatigue nearly overcoming me. I had not eaten for two days. In the evening I arrived at Torreladones, where I slept in a stable. The next day I met a friend who told me that he belonged to the U. G. T., and that he came from Majadahonda. When I realized that he was one of us I told him my troubles, and seizing me by the arm he took me to his home and gave me food. While I was eating, his brother communicated my arrival to the sanitary post. A short time later he came back with a lieutenant. We clasped each other warmly by the hand and went together to the Comandancia of Galan, where I was welcomed heartily by the comrades. I felt that I was beginning a new life: there hunger, thirst, cold, misery—here good treatment and freedom.

JOSE FERNANDEZ GRACIA
Valencia, March 24

The "Dictionary of Slang"

Dear Sirs: Mr. Genzmer's review of my "Dictionary of Slang and Unconventional English," in your issue of April 24, was both generous and discriminating; and it is in no carping spirit that I accept several of his implied challenges and answer several of his queries.

I may have, indeed I know I have, in a few instances, omitted to mention an American origin; but my delimitations of British Empire usage (for example, "mad money," "stick up") are, I am certain, correct; indeed, I know most of them personally.

It is sometimes difficult to distinguish between genuine slang terms and mere idiosyncratic neologisms, yet I think that I have succeeded tolerably well. I have at least excluded these trivial coinages whenever I knew or was fairly sure that they were such. Dr. Genzmer's examples are unhappily chosen: "Athanasian wench" was common in convivial London; "confiscate the macaroon" (considered worthy of notice by Professor Ernest Weekley) had quite a vogue some years ago; "arrested by the bailiff of Marshland" was once so very colloquial that it verged on the proverbial. Your reviewer and your readers may rest assured that nothing was included without close scrutiny.

ERIC PARTRIDGE
London, May 21

Doctors for Elk City

Dear Sirs: Our organization, naturally, was extremely interested in Mr. Rorty's article on the Elk City Cooperative Hospital. Having just returned from a short visit there, I should like to take the opportunity to concur in everything that Mr. Rorty says.

Dr. Shadid has demonstrated that the cooperative type of voluntary health association can, in rural areas and under tremendous difficulties, set up a workable, helpful plan. At the present time Dr. Shadid is hamstrung because he cannot get the type and number of doctors he needs. Will those interested in furthering this type of work communicate with me at this bureau, 5 East Fifty-seventh Street, New York. We particularly desire to find doctors who would be interested in going to this or a similar set-up.

KINGSLEY ROBERTS,
Medical Director, Bureau of Cooperative Medicine
New York, May 29

CONTRIBUTORS

ERNEST K. LINDLEY, when he was Albany correspondent of the New York World, contributed to The Nation in 1930 an article on Franklin D. Roosevelt, then Governor, in which he predicted the Governor's election to the Presidency in 1932. As Washington correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, Mr. Lindley has followed Mr. Roosevelt's career as President with interest and sympathy. He is the author of "The Roosevelt Revolution: First Phase" and "Half Way with Roosevelt."

MEYER LEVIN, a Chicago journalist, has been appointed head of the Citizens' Rights Committee to investigate the Memorial Day riots at the Republic Steel plant in Chicago.

ROSE STEIN, author of "M-Day," has kept in close touch with labor developments in the steel industry.

L. O. PRENDERGAST, a journalist now living in Mexico City, has on various occasions interpreted Mexican events for readers of The Nation.

JOE COLLIER is a reporter on the staff of the Indianapolis Times.

PAUL LOVE has been dance critic of the World-Telegram and has written on the dance for various other publications.

WILLIAM TROY is a member of the English faculty of Bennington College.

CHARLES E. CLARK, dean of the Yale Law School, is coauthor of "The Law and Legal Institutions" in "Recent Social Trends" and author of many specialized studies in legal problems.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 19, 1937

NUMBER 25

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

EDITORIALS:

SETTLING STRIKES: LAW AND REALITY

THE DOCTOR'S DILEMMA

WINSHIP MUST GO

"THE NATION'S" FUTURE

WASHINGTON LOOKS AT STEEL

by Thomas L. Stokes

SPAIN: A SOCIALIST VIEW by Norman Thomas

STANLEY BALDWIN STEPS DOWN

by Harold J. Laski

SPAIN'S HOMELESS MILLION by Leland Stowe

WILL THE SEC WRECK HEARST? by James Smith

SOCIAL CREDIT: TROUBLES IN ALBERTA

by Donald Leslie

MR. HEARST ASKS FOR HELP

by Oswald Garrison Villard

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

DRANG NACH OSTEN by Julian S. Bach, Jr.

TOMB FOR THE TWENTIES by Mark Van Doren

FABLE AND PROPHECY by Dorothy Van Doren

CLAUDE KITCHIN VINDICATED

by Oswald Garrison Villard

OUR NIETZSCHE by Eliseo Vivas

SAVING DEMOCRACY by Carl Joachim Friedrich

RECORDS by B. H. Haggin

689

692

693

694

695

696

698

700

702

703

704

706

707

707

708

709

710

711

713

The Shape of Things

★

IT WAS NO SURPRISE WHEN THE SENATE Committee on the Judiciary reported the President's court bill unfavorably. For weeks the warring camps within the committee had fought each other with press statements and publicity handouts. The committee report itself, signed by ten of the eighteen members, must be seen as the latest of these maneuvers on the battle ground of public opinion. As we studied it we found it less the work of a committee reporting back to its parent deliberative body than a political broadside, studded with vague stereotypes and filled with often nonsensical fears about the future of our government. The only group that has reason to be happy over the report is the Republican National Committee, and the fact that Democratic Senators have had a considerable hand in the writing of it only serves to reveal more sharply the cleavage within the party. We should be surprised if the report changes any votes, either within or outside the Senate. We may expect that august body to settle down now to a long process of trench warfare, with Senatorial courtesy definitely suspended during the period of hostilities. The final line of defense for Senator Wheeler and his forces will be the filibustering brigade, while the hot Washington summer will help the President. It is no secret now that Mr. Roosevelt will be willing to accept something less than the six additional judges he asked for. It is no secret also that the Senate "liberals" who opposed the measure originally because of their zeal for a constitutional amendment have now entirely forgotten that they ever mentioned so dangerous a topic.

★

BILBAO MAY, BY THE TIME THESE LINES ARE read, be the scene of the most critical fighting of the Spanish war since Madrid was in danger. Franco knows that if he does not capture the city now his whole game is up. Its loss would be a heavy blow to the Loyalists on several counts. It would release a large body of rebel troops for the other fronts; it would sway England to some extent, since Bilbao is the principal port for British trade and mining concessions; and it would help to repair Franco's severely shattered morale not only in British eyes but also in those of Mussolini and Hitler. The report from Rome that the two fascist dictators are giving their Spanish comrade, Franco, a final chance and have planned the raising of a new army of 100,000 Moors and Spaniards backed by

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH
MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROWN ALVIN JOHNSON
OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

fascist armaments, officers, and technicians, has an authentic ring, despite its obvious exaggeration. It shows again how complete a farce is the pretense of fascist "non-intervention," and it points the way to atrocities beside which the bombing of Guernica and the shelling of Almeria will seem petty. While Bilbao is evacuating its women and children at about 4,000 a day, principally on the road to Santander, the city is sure to be stubbornly defended. And whatever the fate of Bilbao, the essential strength of the Loyalist government, which lies in its popular support and its heroism, is unimpaired. The new offensives on the Aragon and Cordoba fronts are fresh proofs of that strength. What Mussolini and Hitler are probably aiming at is to improve Franco's tottering fortunes sufficiently so that a "peace" formula will be considered that will allow the fascist dictators to retire from their disastrous Spanish adventure without too drastic a loss of face.

★

A MASS PETITION TO THE GOVERNOR OF Alabama and to the state prosecutor is about to be circulated by the Scottsboro Defense Committee asking that the boys be set free, and the week of July 1 to July 6 has been designated as national Scottsboro week. We hope every organization and individual interested in common justice will get behind this move and roll up a list of signatures that the state of Alabama cannot ignore, for there is at least a chance that the mass pressure which has kept the boys alive for six years can now actually bring about that much-to-be-desired ending to the case. Haywood Patterson's fourth conviction has just been upheld by the Alabama Supreme Court; the other eight defendants go on trial again in Decatur on July 6. It is clear to those who have watched this dreary spinning out of race prejudice that the cases will continue to go from state court to federal court and back again until all constitutional issues have been exhausted and the local court has at last found ways to make its convictions stick. Yet even in Alabama it is admitted that the case against the boys has been shown to be highly doubtful. There is the further fact that Jackson County, where the cases have been tried, has exhausted its resources in the attempt to send the boys to the electric chair. In general Alabama is said to be "tired" of the Scottsboro case.

★

IN THE MONTGOMERY, ALABAMA, ADVERTISER of June 12 there was published an editorial which in its first half defended the newspaper's unyielding support of the state's past conduct of the Scottsboro case and in the second half suggested that a "decent compromise" be made, "... since nothing worth while can be gained by the state in pressing its prosecutions to the bitter end." The Advertiser, to be sure, makes no specific recommendations, and "compromise" is an ugly word in connection with the Scottsboro defendants whose lives have been placed in jeopardy, practically if not legally, over and over again for the same unproved crime. The Advertiser does note the fact that the boys "committed whatever crime they may have committed in extraordinary circumstances and against two women who by all accounts never before had put a high premium upon their virtue." And the editorial concludes, "Enlightened public opinion in Alabama will, in the Advertiser's opinion, applaud any official concerned who now strikes out for an honorable, fair, and just settlement of these messy cases." In our opinion an honorable, fair, and just settlement is the one set forth in the petition we have mentioned—that the boys be set free. Such a settlement would, among other things, immensely increase the prestige of Alabama throughout this country and in the far corners of the world where the fate of the Scottsboro boys has come to be the touchstone of American justice.

★

WHILE HOME-TOWN MAYORS ENLIST THE local legionnaires and make red, white, and blue speeches about the right to work for the lords of Bethlehem, Republic, and Youngstown Sheet and Tube, labor is calling out its own reserves. The C. I. O. has an entente cordiale with the railway brotherhoods; Lewis has called out several thousand workers in seventeen captive mines owned by Bethlehem and Youngstown in an attempt to cut off their coal supply; the C. I. O. now threatens to tie up Great Lakes shipping in order to stop the supply of ore to the steel companies that continue to defy their organized workers; and Van A. Bittner has suggested that 600,000 United Mine Workers might be called upon to do their bit in keeping coal away from the struck steel plants. Mr. Lewis also rolled into place a battery of facts to show that William C. Potter of the Guaranty Trust Company and Eugene Grace of Bethlehem are offering inducements to Republic Steel to continue resisting the demands of the union for a signed contract in the hope of "breaking" the C. I. O. and also of preserving Bethlehem's present advantage over other steel companies in the matter of wages. Meanwhile Governor Davey's efforts at mediation have met with no success. The Wagner Act has been invoked against Inland Steel, and the Senate Civil Liberties Committee began investigating the Memorial Day massacre in South Chicago—the eighth victim has now died. Elsewhere labor is on the offensive in strikes designed to capture a greater share of the profits of recovery or to extend its organized strength. Concurrently the rivalry between C. I. O. and A. F. of L. mounts, with the Lewis forces gaining. The Brewery Workers' Union was the first A. F. of L. affiliate to refuse to pay an assessment to the federation's war chest to fight the C. I. O. And major defections in membership from the federation to the C. I. O. have taken place or are pending.

★

THE AMERICAN NEWSPAPER GUILD WENT C. I. O. at its annual convention in St. Louis. It also voted to take in other "white-collar" employees in newspaper offices, and thus became an industrial union. It was reported that the Guild now has a membership of 11,112 as compared with 5,716 last year; under the industrial-union policy, the next year will see a much greater increase both in membership and in signed contracts, which now stand at forty-seven. For the rest, the Guild convention put itself on record as favoring a WPA job for every able-bodied man in the country who needs one; it backed enlargement of the Supreme Court, along with a constitutional amendment "putting basic rights beyond the reach of judicial quibble"; and recommended labor legislation designed to guarantee collective bargaining. On the whole the newspapermen in St. Louis revealed an enlightened attitude to the problems of the day which their bosses might well emulate.

★

THE SUM OF SOVIET EXECUTIONS INCREASES.

Eight generals have gone to their death as traitors and left behind them a deep dismay which shows itself in every press dispatch from Moscow and even in the cautious statements of diplomats. Coming as a climax to more than a hundred executions of persons, many of them high officials and old revolutionaries, charged with a wide variety of crimes against the state, the death of the generals has created a new wave of rumor and speculation. Every one of the accused was a man of military repute. None was primarily a politician. Tukhachevsky in particular had been looked up to as an almost legendary hero. It can hardly be argued even by opponents of the Stalin regime that the government might be attempting to gain credit in the eyes of the bourgeois world by exterminating revolutionary extremists. On the contrary, the international effect of the trials is bound to be unfavorable. Already Germany is insinuating that the Russian army is not to be depended upon and that France struck a bad bargain in the Soviet agreement. Already diplomatic gossip is hinting that the British government will more openly favor Berlin and will try to draw France away from its Soviet connection. The recent executions have, in fact, provided a field day for the enemies of Moscow at a time when Soviet policy in Europe needs all the friends it can find.

★

THE MYSTERY THAT STILL OBSCURES THE

earlier trials undoubtedly accounts for the suspicions that surround the present one. Certainly the official explanation is in this case the most plausible. In the absence of facts only speculation is possible, but it is not hard to believe that Soviet officers were involved in a plot planned and executed from Berlin in support of Hitler's announced ambitions in the Ukraine. For many months rumors of close relations between high officers in the Red Army and the Reichswehr have been widely repeated, and correspondents point out that most of the convicted generals came from the Baltic states, hotbeds of Nazi propaganda.

★

MUSSOLINI'S TERRORIST CAREER HAS REACHED

a climax in the assassination of Carlo Roselli and his brother at the hands of fascist agents in Paris. Not since the murder of Matteotti by Mussolini's blackshirt gangsters in 1924 has Italian fascism dared so brazen a political crime, or one of such importance. Carlo Roselli was not just another émigré, eating his heart out in the French capital. He was the determined leader of the world's anti-fascist Italian forces. Against disheartening odds he had built up a powerful organization which maintained amazingly its underground contacts in Italy. Mussolini might pride himself on having sealed Italy against the world, but one import he could not prevent was that of news from the outside, and one export he could not prevent was news which revealed the weaknesses of the Italian regime. Two recent instances were the disclosure of Mussolini's censorship orders to the Italian press, which we discuss below, and the steady flow of letters from Italian prisoners captured by the Spanish loyalists to their families at home—a flow which the Italian anti-fascists in Spain did their best to expedite. Mussolini had reason to suspect Roselli of being involved in both these activities. It was his paper, Giustizia e Libertà, which first published the press censorship orders; and Roselli had just come back from fighting in the International Brigade in Spain. The only way that Mussolini knew to meet the danger that Roselli represented—the danger of the truth—was to lure him, with his quite unpolitical brother, into a trap and kill them both. Roselli's organization was effective because it was built on workers, peasants, and intellectuals, upon a new generation that no longer mourned the Italy of the past but fought resourcefully for the Italy of the future. If Mussolini thinks that by killing Roselli he can destroy this organization, he is self-deceived.

★

DICTATORS ARE EXCELLENT JOURNALISTS—

in reverse. Mussolini's censorship orders to the Italian press from January 5 to May 10 have been published abroad, and they make far more interesting reading than the flabby and flamboyant fare dispensed to the people of Italy. To the shrewd observer they offer material for a reconstruction of Italian policy during that period. To the plain citizen in a democratic country they are at once a warning and a revelation of the enforced mass ignorance and delusion that lie just around the fascist corner. Take, for instance, the news from Spain:

January 18. Don't publish any news of bombardments of inhabited centers by the Nationalists in Spain, and, above all, refrain from mentioning Italian or German aviators.

February 9. Don't picture the military situation of the Spanish reds as disastrous. Be less optimistic.

March 5. Absolutely suppress any news of the arrival in Naples of wounded volunteers from Spain. . . .

Above all, "Dun't esk!"

★

SURELY THE HALF-BRAINED MILLIONAIRE, whose story enthralled the American Medical Association convention at Atlantic City, is a figure fit for an epic of contemporary Americana. An unsuccessful business man, he underwent an operation which left him minus one lobe of his brain. In consequence he was minus also the faculties of sensitivity, perception, and discrimination with which the ordinary four-lobed individual is burdened. He no longer worried, he no longer could feel embarrassment, he no longer nagged his wife, he never became tired, he lost all self-consciousness; in short, he developed, as the doctors described it, all the characteristics necessary to success in business. He could sell anybody anything—and did. In no time at all he made a million dollars. What the press delicately styled a "remarkable" feature of the case was that his intelligence declined in direct proportion as his riches increased. This should be of interest to Mr. Roosevelt. With the scientific evidence now at his disposal he will, we feel sure, change his attitude toward millionaire tax evaders to one of kindly sympathy. For tax evasion can doubtless be shown to be simply a pathological weakness of the lop-lobed.

Settling Strikes: Law and Reality

SETTLING strikes is a tough and tangled business. We only wish that it were as simple as it is sometimes depicted. Scratch your favorite columnist almost any one of these mornings, and you will discover a fervent crusader against the Wagner Act and a deep skeptic about the National Labor Relations Board. Scratch an editorial on Order or Anarchy? or The Industrial War, and you will find an indictment of the "one-sidedness" of the Wagner Act and the need for annexing to it all sorts of repressive labor legislation in order to correct its "bias." If we are to believe the capitalist apologists, all that is necessary in dealing with the strikes that surround us is an adherence to the law-and-order ideal, a whiff of tear or emetic gas, and a set of laws making it clear to labor that it has duties as well as rights.

If this were true, the daily thunder from the editorial sanctums of the newspapers would be the beginning and the end of wisdom. With a godlike assurance that sits well on thunderers, the editors dismiss the progress of decades of labor legislation with a phrase, and resolve complex issues of labor law with a flourish of the pen. Nor are they alone in this assurance. There is a tendency in labor circles as well to talk as if the Wagner Act, like the Dalai Lama, embodied some divine and messianic spark; as if it could serve as a cure-all for the ills of industrial struggle. All of which, on both sides, is not only nonsense but dangerous and mischievous nonsense to boot. There is no magic in the Wagner Act by itself which will or should make out of it a complete code of industrial relations.

The realists on both sides know this. You will not find among them either the dismissal of the act or the excessive dependence upon it that you find among the more naive capitalist and labor apologists. They have a perfectly understandable, hard-bitten, and pragmatic way of approaching the act. Some of the employers, of whom Myron Taylor of United States Steel is the archetype, have decided to accept the present arrangement as a necessary evil, and get over with it and on to the business of making profits. Of this conciliatory group, some are frightened to death of Lewis and are hastening to sign agreements with A. F. of L. unions; others respect the ability of the C. I. O. leaders and have decided that the future of American labor organization lies with them. There is another group of employers, however, who have decided to fight the Wagner Act in every way, direct and devious, that is at their command. While pretending lip-service to the letter of the act, they are actually sabotaging it at every turn. To this group belong Republic Steel, Youngstown Sheet and Tube, and the other steel independents. It is they who are now resorting to the stratagem of pretending a willingness to bargain collectively with the steel unions, but refusing to reduce their agreements to writing. It is they who are shooting tear gas through the interstices of the Wagner Act. And behind them is a concerted drive of the smaller manufacturers, organized in the United States Chamber of Commerce and the Manufacturers' Association, who regard the present steel strike as the decisive battle in the new unionization movement.

The labor realists, on the other hand—and the C. I. O. leaders are nothing if not realists—take an equally hard-headed attitude toward the Wagner Act. They know that a law on paper cannot in itself achieve for them their demands: those demands can be achieved only by economic action in the field—organization, education, strikes. They welcome the Wagner Act because it does more than any other law has done in American industrial history to strip the capitalists of their enormous advantage and give labor at least a fighting chance. But they know that they can only make use of that chance if they fight.

It is that, more than anything else, that explains some of the seeming contradictions in the present steel strike. Many people ask, Why did not the steel unions immediately invoke the Wagner Act before they went out on strike? Why did they not call for an election under the Labor Board? The answer, of course, is that they were wholly unsure of having a majority at that time. The present strikes are not only revolts against the industrial tyranny of the Girdlers and the Purnells; they are also organizing strikes, calculated to unite the workers to the point where the Wagner Act can operate effectively. It is foolish to talk of collective bargaining until men are organized to bargain collectively with the already organized aggregates of capital. To those who ask why the Wagner Act empowers only the workers to invoke it and does not give the same power to the employers, the answer is clear. To give the employers this power would be to place in their hands a weapon for smashing any organizing drive before it even had a chance to get started. As soon as an employer saw evidences that his workers were organizing, he would invoke the Wagner Act and call for an election: and that would be the end of it. In short, legal and economic action complement each other in the industrial struggle. One begins where the other leaves off.

The sharpest legal issue that the Republic and Youngstown strikes have raised is whether the employer is compelled under the Wagner Act to reduce the collective bargaining agreement to writing. The employers, and their newspaper henchmen, profess to be completely certain that a written agreement is unnecessary. Like the now lamented Lawyers' Committee of the Liberty League, they have gratuitously provided the courts with an answer beforehand. In acting with such assurance, they are seeking to make a mockery of the Labor Board. The fact is that the federal courts have not yet passed specifically on this issue. The Labor Board has, however, given clear indications, in a whole line of administrative rulings, that when the issue is specifically presented, its own answer will probably be to require the reduction of the agreement to writing. In an early case (that of the Pierson Manufacturing Company) the Labor Board said, "Only a written agreement can give both parties the sense of certainty and security which is essential to lasting industrial peace." In 1934 in the National Aniline and Chemical case the board asserted that "if an employer assents to . . . proposals, the resulting agreement, unless reduced to writing, will be so unpractical of enforcement and so fruitful of disputes concerning terms that an insistence by an employer that he will go no further than to enter into an oral agreement may be evidence . . . of a denial of the right of collective bargaining." On July 7, 1936, the board held in the St. Joseph Stockyards case that the Wagner Act imposes upon employees the duty of embodying any understanding reached by genuine collective bargaining in a binding agreement for a definite term. The decision did not explicitly order a written agreement, but from its whole tenor (it quoted the National Aniline decision) it is obvious that such was what the board had in mind. For if a real meeting of the minds has been effected, a written agreement is a logical consequence. It is an insurance against later evasion and a guaranty of responsibility. And surely the employers who have been calling for more responsibility in labor relations should welcome such a guaranty.

The fact is that we are in the early stages of the fashioning of a new body of labor law. We have already, in the rulings of the National Labor Relations Board, a growing body of administrative decisions on labor relations under the Wagner Act—a body of decisions which is admirable in its ability and its scrupulous fairness. Publicity is given to the cases in which labor unions have won their demands, but little is said about the large number of instances in which labor complaints have been thrown out. The final word, under our system, lies with the Supreme Court. The Wagner Act decisions have settled many issues, but by no means all. We are sorry to see so careful a commentator as Arthur Krock of the New York Times write in his column that Chief Justice Hughes "stated with exactness that no employer is required by the Wagner Act to make a wage agreement." We assume Mr. Krock refers to the Jones and Laughlin decision. But unfortunately what the Chief Justice "stated with exactness" on this point was clearly a dictum, not a necessary part of the decision of the court and not taken as such. The rulings of the board itself, moreover, have been consistently broader than this dictum would tend to indicate.

The point may be slight, but it is symptomatic. In the present state of labor law, it is best to await the rulings of the Labor Board and the decisions of the Supreme Court, and to keep one's eye on the economic realities of the labor struggle.

The Doctor's Dilemma

THE net results of the American Medical Association deliberations at Atlantic City have turned out to be quite different from the impression made by the first newspaper reports. The record of the convention as a whole shows that narrow economic self-interest still dominates the policies of medical officialdom. Whatever recognition was given to the government's direct interest in the health of the people was dictated more by a desire of the doctors to feather their own nests than by concern over the economic problems of the public. The doctors want to get something quite specific out of the government for themselves: compensation for treatment of the indigent. For some years past a drive to this end has been carried on in medical circles—even though nothing has been said about reducing the high fees which have been justified as compensation for free treatment of the poor. One of the proposals of the New York delegation, which did not make the headlines, was perfectly frank about it. "The immediate problem," it said, "is provision of adequate medical care for the indigent, the costs to be met from public funds" (italics ours).

But it is not the indigent who suffer most from the organizational shortcomings of American medicine. It is the wage-earners and the middle-bracket families, whose heavy and unexpected doctors' and hospital bills have become a pressing national issue. The only possible solution of this problem is insurance in some form—payments of relatively small amounts made regularly into a fund which supplies medical care, or from which the bills are paid when illness occurs. But the A. M. A. remains as hostile as ever to any such proposals. The Board of Trustees' report, indorsed by the convention, said that the action taken at Atlantic City "does not constitute in any sense of the word indorsement of health insurance, either voluntary or compulsory, as a means of meeting the situation." Groups of enlightened doctors and patients who set up such plans will presumably be persecuted by organized medicine in the future as they have been in the past.

Apart from this implied condemnation of health insurance in any form, the final record shows very little action by the convention to meet a problem that challenges immediate and decisive action. The deciduous teeth of the New York resolution were carefully extracted in the report that was finally adopted. Even the qualified support of the extension of public-health activities—provided local doctors indorse them—was dropped. The House of Delegates did not openly demand government compensation for treatment of the indigent nor did it give its official sanction to the responsibility of the government for the health of the people. It merely offered to make its "records, reports, source material, and experience" available to any governmental or other qualified agency . . . contemplating the development or operation of plans for medical care"—to what end can easily be guessed.

The emasculation of the New York delegation's demand that treatment of the indigent be paid for by the government shows that those in control of the convention see in it a new doctor's dilemma. If the doctor calls on the government to help him by meeting these costs he admits the direct interest of the government in the health of the people. But how then can the doctor consistently oppose the most obvious way in which the government can be of help to the public—through the provision of some system by which people of small and moderate means can budget their medical bills? The doctors cannot have it both ways. If they grasp one horn of their dilemma they will more easily be impaled upon the other. But in the long run a sound system of health insurance would be for their own interest, as official medicine in Great Britain has freely admitted. Unfortunately American medicine has been as slow to recognize its long-range interests as have the industrialists. By fighting off reasonable measures such as health insurance and voluntary group-payment plans the organized doctors are paving the way for more drastic forms of state control and more extreme action by the exasperated consumers of medical service.

Winship Must Go

THE pot of discontent still bubbles ominously in Puerto Rico. Fourteen young men have just gone on trial in connection with the massacre at Ponce on Palm Sunday. Governor Winship in a report to Senator Tydings has denied the chief charges arising from the inquiry into the Ponce killings described by Arthur Garfield Hays, chairman of the investigating committee, in The Nation of June 5. Pedro Albizu Campos and seven Nationalist Party associates were immured the other day in Atlanta penitentiary for conspiring to overthrow the government of the United States, and eighteen hours later—on June 8—some unidentified men in a car fired a dozen shots at Robert A. Cooper, the district judge who sentenced Campos.

The fire under the pot is the intense desire for freedom and civil rights that animates the Puerto Rican masses. Torn though the island is by political differences and social discord, unable to agree on a single measure of independence or autonomy, the one overwhelming popular impulse is to end the repressions associated with American rule.

In commenting on the Hays inquiry two weeks ago we said that the report had asserted that civil liberties were dead in Puerto Rico. This statement brought a quick reply from Ernest Gruening, Chief of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions, who pointed out that the report had used words exactly contrary. We accept the correction and express regret that our comment was written from a résumé of the report before the full text reached us. But it is perhaps significant that the résumé conveyed an impression fairly summarized in our quoted words. And it is equally significant that the report's statement that civil liberties still exist was but a mitigating fragment in a general bill of infringements of those same liberties. Let us quote a few pertinent lines from the conclusions of the Hays document:

1. The facts show that the affair of March 21 in Ponce was a "massacre."

2. Civil liberties have been repeatedly denied during the last nine months by order of Governor Blanton Winship. He has failed to recognize the right of free speech and assemblage. Force has been threatened toward those who would exercise these rights.

3. The Ponce massacre was due to the denial by the police of the civil rights of citizens to parade and assemble. . . .

4. The regulation of the University of Puerto Rico . . . is designed to curb academic freedom and should be canceled.

5. The people demand and have a right to free speech, free assemblage, and to petition by parade for a redress of grievances. . . .

The commission does not want this report to be interpreted to mean that civil liberties are dead in Puerto Rico. The mere fact that this commission has held public meetings both in Ponce and San Juan is an indication to the contrary. There has been a free press; there have not been prosecutions for criminal libel. The claim of discrimination in work because of men's views is not sustained by evidence, although suspicion is still there. . . . Civil rights are never dead until they die in the hearts of the people. Governments do not make liberty; the people do. . . .

The answer of the Governor of Puerto Rico on this point is not to our minds convincing. He flatly denies all abrogations of the people's rights by the authorities and makes the broad statement that in his belief "there is no place either in Latin America or in the continental United States where civil liberties have in reality been given wider scope." He stresses the violent methods of the Nationalists and the need of repression. The Nationalists are undoubtedly extremists; they have resorted to acts of terrorism from which they must be restrained by force and they must be disarmed if they possess dangerous weapons. But surely this necessary police job should be accomplished without the hysterical violence that resulted in the slaughter at Ponce.

The truth is that in spite of good intentions and large public works the authorities have alienated a great proportion, perhaps a majority, of the Puerto Rican people by administrative measures which outrage their pride and their intense belief in personal freedom. Civil liberties may not be stone dead in Puerto Rico; but they have been amputated and mutilated. We do not pretend that the basic troubles of the island can be cured by the simple act of protecting those liberties. But we are certain that the long, complex process of social and political reform will be facilitated by such a measure of appeasement. To achieve even this elementary step one immediate change must be made. Governor Winship must be removed.

"The Nation's" Future

THE NATION has been sold twice in the last two years. The first time was in the spring of 1935, when Oswald Garrison Villard, owner since 1918 and editor from 1918 to 1932, sold the paper to Maurice Wertheim. This week The Nation has again changed owners, coming into the hands of one of its editors, Freda Kirchwey. The occasion tempts us to a few reflections on the source of the journal's strength, of that quality which remains unchanged through changing times. In the seventy-two years of its existence, first as an affiliate of the New York Evening Post, later as an independent journal, The Nation has spoken the opinion of its editors. This was as true under the individual direction of Oswald Garrison Villard as under the group control of a board. It was true under the ownership of Maurice Wertheim. The persons who have directed the destiny of the paper have recognized the crucial facts that people can only write well what they believe and that editorial opinion hammered out by a group of like-minded persons is usually better than that of any one of them. This double-barreled policy is not always a simple one to carry out. It calls for a subtle combination of tolerance and pugnacity. Agreement reached through mere acquiescence is as feeble as agreement forced by bulldozing. Only the honest effort of minds to meet produces potent editorial thinking.

While Mr. Villard was editor, The Nation passed through a time of strenuous testing. The last year of the war, the fateful months of treaty making, the revolutionary upheavals in Europe, the years of post-war corruption and reckless expansion in American life, the predestined plunge into economic depths—all these forced The Nation and the men and women who made it to mighty efforts of clear vision and sanity. Throughout those years Mr. Villard acted as editor in the best liberal tradition. He was steadfast in his opinion but equally committed to the democratic method. He was a constitutional rather than an absolute head. And under his direction the character of the paper emerged more and more clearly. Looking back, we should describe it as courageous and outspoken and free from guile; well informed and catholic in its interests; moral and sometimes naive; sharp and challenging in attack and rather lacking in constructive program; positive and free in its manner of expression. It was radical without being dogmatic or even wholly consistent. Above all it was independent; it spoke its collective mind completely; it had no overt or unspoken commitments except to the shaping of a decent social order.

Financial independence and independence of opinion too seldom go together in journalism. The more militant the paper, the less has been its chance of financial security. The Nation was no exception to this rule, although its losses were surprisingly small in proportion to its budget. Throughout those years losses were met, and The Nation sustained as an independent journal, largely through the courage and personal sacrifice of the editor and the help of a few steadfast friends. Cynics referred to the liberal journals as the "deficit group," but the term concealed many virtues, among them faith and hope and charity.

In 1932 Mr. Villard turned over the direction of The Nation to its editors in order to follow a no less active career as writer and speaker, continuing to contribute to the paper a weekly page of comment under his own name. Did the character of The Nation change? Some of its old readers thought so, but neither the circulation nor the general run of correspondence reflected any marked difference. The election of Franklin D. Roosevelt presented new problems, demanded more careful analysis and sympathetic criticism than the do-nothing conservatism of previous administrations. The rise of Hitler crystallized and brought into focus the desperate maladjustments of post-war Europe. In addition the editors were faced with problems of internal adjustment, editorial and financial, under a strictly cooperative regime. But The Nation for two years achieved a state of self-support reached only once before in its history—in 1928.

Maurice Wertheim had for many years served, with other liberals, as a member of The Nation's board of directors. He had advised the editors during the period following Mr. Villard's retirement. When after two solvent years a deficit again loomed in 1935, Mr. Wertheim offered to buy the paper and help it to its financial feet. He did this in full agreement not with the editorial policy of the editors but with the more fundamental policy of independent editorial control. Through the Civic Aid Foundation he owned but refrained from operating the paper. He contributed financial help and advice and occasionally a timely dose of skepticism. And under this generous treatment the paper flourished.

The times helped too. Never in our experience has the demand for clear-cut, radical analysis been so great. Liberalism itself has achieved a new respect, especially among its former left-wing opponents. The example of fascism in Europe and a half-conscious dread of similar repression in the United States has led even the more dogmatic radicals to seek salvation in democratic method and liberal approach. And liberalism itself has taken warning and toughened its defenses against the day of testing. As a representative of radical democratic thought, of realistic liberalism, The Nation has drawn in thousands of new readers who have become friends and advocates.

Maurice Wertheim's reasons for deciding to sell The Nation were expressed in his statement in last week's issue. He differed from our policies; and he believed that editorial and financial control should be combined, that absentee ownership was anomalous and unsound. The sale was agreed upon, announced, and has this week been consummated. We are grateful to Mr. Wertheim both for his help and for his decision to sell. We believe that militant liberalism has come of age and can pay its own way. In our opinion the necessity of self-support can only heighten editorial initiative and that quick sense of the public mind that creates live journalism. The Nation intends to support its own views by its own efforts. One of our most venerable friends, Henry W. Nevins, has adopted as his motto words which we do not hesitate to appropriate for The Nation in the years ahead—"The older, the bolder."

Washington Looks at Steel

BY THOMAS L. STOKES

Washington, June 13

STEEL still sits, a bird of uneasy omen, above the Administration's door. Summer finds President Roosevelt and the National Labor Relations Board plagued and confounded by the persistent refusal of three Midwest independents—Republic Steel, Inland Steel, and Youngstown Sheet and Tube—to sign a contract with their workers, a refusal which has provoked and prolongs bitter and bloody industrial warfare. The situation is further complicated politically by the recurrent smoke screens sent up by the companies to obscure the issues from the public. The most noxious is the "freedom-of-the-mails" issue raised by the Post Office Department's denial of the use of the mails for strike-breaking, now the subject of a Senatorial inquiry.

As this article was written, President Roosevelt was under renewed pressure to intervene and attempt to bring about a solution. John L. Lewis called for federal intervention to restrain Tom Girdler, chairman of Republic Steel, "before he turns the steel district into a bloody shambles" and suggested also that state governors be induced to close the mills until the strike is settled.

Meanwhile the National Labor Relations Board laid the groundwork for a legal test on the question of requiring a signed contract under the Wagner Act. The Labor Board has at last found a morsel upon which it can try its teeth. It has issued a complaint against Inland Steel charging violation of the act. It alleges that negotiations with the workers were in bad faith, that the company did not and does not intend to enter an agreement, and that therefore the company is guilty of violation of the act even though the terms proposed by the Steel Workers' Organizing Committee are acceptable.

The NLRB thus skirts about the vexing question of whether there must be a signed contract, but this complaint, set for hearing June 21 at Chicago, is expected to become a test case on that point which will take the Wagner Act through the courts again and up to the Supreme Court for clarification of the statute. It is that for which the Labor Board is preparing. The way was opened for action by the complaint filed by the workers. Inland offers good proving ground as it is estimated to be about 80 to 85 per cent organized. Meanwhile, the Labor Board and the Justice Department have investigators in the field seeking other grounds of action.

The confusion still existing over the question of when a collective-bargaining agreement is an agreement, as well as over phases of the Wagner Act—recognized as a vague document when passed—readily explains the insistence of President Roosevelt on Supreme Court reform and his caustic criticism of the high court for closing its door and dispersing. The recent Supreme Court decision left many questions unanswered. The bosses of little steel squat before what they think is a loophole and thumb their noses at Washington.

As the legal machinery lumbers into action, the politicians gnaw on the "freedom of the mails," the latest of red herrings. This was the contribution of Republic Steel. The story is being exploited in all its details, with all sorts of interpretations placed upon the trick of Republic lawyers who took packages of food to post offices at Niles and Warren, Ohio, and got the expected refusal to shuttle the supplies by mail service through picket lines to beleaguered loyal workers.

The dapper and energetic Senator H. Styles Bridges of New Hampshire caught the red herring on the fly and flung it into the Senate. Enraged reactionaries pounced hungrily upon it. As a result, the Senate Post Office Committee is currently engaged in what we call a "preliminary inquiry" that may blossom into a full-fledged investigation of goings on among the little brothers of steel.

For as government is constituted in the New Deal, these red herrings are no longer taken at face value. Administration lieutenants are alert and eager to detect whether they stink as well as shine in the moonlight. Senator Joe Guffey of Pennsylvania rose to this occasion. He was quick with a counter-proposal to do a bit of investigating of tactics used by the companies against their workers. He asks whether they have sequestered machine-guns and, as he calls it, "other war paraphernalia." He would inquire into the "moral conduct of both parties." And, finally, he wants to know whether the companies are violating the Wagner Act. Senator Guffey has permission to call his own witnesses. Under capable Administration guidance this investigation might be very valuable in throwing light on some unsavory practices of the independents.

Grover Cleveland is being dug out of his innocuous desuetude as a Democratic symbol and extolled anew by Republicans for using United States troops to open the railroads for the mails—and thus break the Pullman strike. No one, however, has mentioned the subsequent report of Cleveland's special investigating commission which condemned the Pullman Company and way back there in the hard-boiled nineties suggested that employers should recognize trade unions, both for their own good and that of the workers.

Mr. Girdler and his colleagues in the strike have been castigated by Senator Guffey, who said, "Honest men do not hesitate to reduce to writing and to sign their names to an agreement previously reached in verbal discussion. . . . They say that under the Wagner law they do not have to sign a contract. I say that the obvious intent of the Wagner law, once an agreement has been reached, is to sign such an agreement. It is true that specifically the Wagner law provides for collective bargaining; that is, the company must meet with representatives of its workmen and seek to reach an agreement. It is possible that an agreement cannot be reached in certain situations. Obviously, where there is no agreement there can be no signed contract. But in the present instance these steel companies that have brought strikes to the nation's number one industry say they will accept the agreement. They have reached an agreement. But they will not sign."

Portrait of Tom Girdler

The NLRB has assumed that signing of a contract, in the event an agreement is reached, is a natural and necessary conclusion to collective bargaining. A year ago it ruled on the general question in the St. Joseph Stockyards case, in which the company was willing to negotiate on all matters but declined to enter an agreement. The board said: "The act imposes upon employers the duty to meet with the duly designated representatives of their employees, to bargain in good faith with them in a genuine attempt to achieve an understanding on the proposals and counter-proposals advanced, and, finally, if an understanding is reached, to embody that understanding in a binding agreement for a definite term."

Spain: A Socialist View

BY NORMAN THOMAS

THE train from Valencia to Barcelona pulled into the station on time. It was a glorious morning on one of the most beautiful seacoasts in the world. Our friends met us with the bad news that early that morning Barcelona had been bombed; that no military objective had been achieved, and no public building hit, but that much devastation had been wrought in residential districts and perhaps a hundred lives lost.

We visited first one of the working-class districts most damaged. What we saw and heard was pretty much a repetition of what we had seen and heard in Valencia when German or Italian fliers had bombed it twenty-four hours earlier. The principal emotion of the people was anger. If Hitler, Mussolini, and Franco think that these attacks are destroying the morale of the Spaniards, they are entirely mistaken. The dictators have not put enough planes into the Spanish war to destroy great cities as they destroyed Guernica. Foreign aviators can rain sudden death or a living horror worse than death upon sleeping Spanish cities and the women and children in them. But they cannot conquer Spain.

Yet this murder of women and children is the background for that bombing of the Deutschland which had such grave international repercussions. I do not profess to know for certain whether the German or the Spanish version of that incident is correct. In no case was Hitler justified. He took his despicable retaliation by bombarding Almeria, a city in no way responsible for the act of aviators over the harbor of Palma. He asked for no adjudication of fact and no reparation before he thus brutally avenged his "honor." The European press, and for all I know the American, in discussing this whole affair largely lost sight of the fact that, as every Spaniard along the Mediterranean coast knows, Majorca is in Italian hands, and that it is the base for attacks like those on Valencia and Barcelona. The men and women gathered among the ruins of their own or their friends' homes were not cursing their Spanish foes in a civil war but the German and Italian "assassins," whose attacks may not even have been known to Franco until after they occurred. For a rough parallel imagine that during our American Civil War the English had occupied Nantucket and Martha's Vineyard and (supposing aviation to have been then developed) used them as a base for night attacks upon Boston and New York.

I dwell upon this because perhaps my chief impression of Spain is the degree to which this accursed war is a war of the fascist dictators. Before me as I write are two books; one, Spielhagen's collection of documents showing Nazi complicity in Franco's revolt; the other, the Spanish White Book, which overwhelmingly proves the case against the Italian military units which fought at Guadalajara. This is only part of the evidence that Germany and Italy are making war on Spain.

The fascists' claim that they fight only against "Russian intervention" or "Spanish bolshevism" is utterly false. Russian aid to Spain has been very valuable, but it has been definitely limited in amount and was not begun until after German and Italian intervention was an established fact. As for "bolshevism," Spanish Communists are so thoroughly subordinating every revolutionary consideration to the winning of the war that there is a Spanish jest to the effect that if a man is too conservative to join the left Republicans, he joins the Communists.

Indeed, it was for us a grimly ironic experience on coming out of Spain to read in certain of the English and French papers new talk of Spanish "anarchy" or "bolshevism"—the learned editors were very careless in their interchangeable use of the words—as a result of the Deutschland incident. Of "anarchy" in the popular sense of disorder and violence there is amazingly little in Loyalist Spain.

I went with two American newspapermen and two Spaniards, a guide and a chauffeur, to the Teruel front. Twice in rather thinly populated mountain country we had trouble with the car; both times we Americans visited farmhouses while our chauffeur caught a ride in a military car to the nearest large village in search of an inner tube. Our hosts reported not only that all was quiet in their village, but that it had been quiet even in the early days of the Franco revolt when churches were often fascist fortresses and committees of the revolutionary workers were sometimes responsible for considerable violence. Their priest, they explained, was a good man and a worker, so he was not hurt.

The civilian population in Spain is at work. The cities show more than the normal activity. Schools are in session, trains run, and trams also, despite some trouble about fuel. When we first went to Barcelona there were still barricades in the streets, after the disturbances early in May, but the people went about their normal business, and I walked with officials from place to place with far less fuss and show of actual or potential force than in some other countries where there is no war.

Of anarchy, or anarcho-syndicalism, in the exact sense there is more in Spain than in any other country. And it has certainly not been proved that Anarchist philosophy and methods of organization work sufficiently well for present-day society in times of war or peace. Plenty of stories, some of them funny and some of them serious, can be told of Anarchist methods in Catalonia and at the front. The Communists and other enemies of the Anarchists charge that their ranks contain hundreds of racketeers and fascists. Yet I received the distinct impression that many of the best elements in Spain, as well as, perhaps, a few of the worst, could be found in the C. N. T. Certain it is that in the early days of Franco's revolt it was the C. N. T. together with the U. G. T.—the latter generally Socialist in philosophy—that saved Spain from Franco; and the rather considerable work of collectivization which has been done has been almost entirely the achievement of the labor unions and not of the political parties. The general testimony was that these unions are now doing a surprisingly good job in running many factories, stores, hotels, and transport lines.

Unquestionably the grim business of war requires a far more unified and disciplined army and a far more centralized government than Spanish Anarchists or the extreme Spanish regionalists like. That army is being built. I saw something of the process under a very high type of commander at the Teruel front. He was doing more than building an army. He was fighting illiteracy, and he was keeping something of the revolutionary fraternity between officers and men without sacrificing discipline.

Supplies far more than man-power are the problem for Loyalist Spain today. Once, perhaps twice, the International Brigade saved Madrid and rendered other invaluable service, but today it is not men, except highly trained specialists, which the Spanish government needs. It is, of course, to a considerable extent, arms and ammunition. It is such everyday necessities as milk and wheat and soap. There is a shortage of these things, but Spain is by no means starving, and I judge that the problem of feeding the civilian population as well as the army is serious only in Madrid and Bilbao. Spain has every reason for pride in the way it has been able to care for refugees—men, women, and especially children.

The Spanish are a brave, sometimes violent, but essentially non-warlike and non-military people. They want peace. Over and over they said to us, "Come and see us when our country is not cursed by war." They do not want peace badly enough to yield to Franco, and it will be a tragedy if the final victory over Franco requires their militarization. The best-informed opinion that I could discover, both in Spain and in France, is to the effect that the victory over Franco would soon be won if Mussolini and Hitler would discontinue their active support. A bona fide withdrawal of all foreign soldiers, volunteers or regulars, would be overwhelmingly to the advantage of the Loyalists, and it would give them the chance, which in their hearts all Spaniards want, to settle their own problems.

We Americans should of course continue and increase the kind of aid that the North American and medical-aid committees are giving. But our greatest service will be to bring whatever practicable pressure we can upon the fascist dictators to stop their war. Now that our country has gone in for "neutrality," it is clearly the duty of the President, the Congress, and the people to consider by what right we continue to trade with Germany and Italy if they continue their present war on Spain. In Paris, just before I sailed, I read in Time (May 24) that twelve out of eighteen rightist planes temporarily interned in France were of American make. I raised this question at the American embassy, which expressed grave doubts of the accuracy of the story. It is a matter which must be looked into by lovers of justice.

Sooner or later, I repeat, unless the fascist dictators greatly increase their present efforts in Spain, Franco will be defeated. During the two months that I was in Europe I observed a marked shift in English and French sympathy in the direction of the Loyalist government. In so far as the British government is concerned, I am afraid that its slight shift in sentiment is at least partly born of its conviction that a Loyalist victory will not, after all, mean the triumph of social revolution. Certainly there is a disquieting tendency in Spain to put the winning of British favor too much in the foreground of domestic planning.

As matters stand, it is quite true that the first task in Spain is to win the war. If Franco should win, it would be impossible to exaggerate the consequences to Spain and the world of that triumph of reaction. War or no war, the building of a happier new society requires the cooperation, not the alienation, of the peasants. In that society there must be freedom of religion. I think that the Roman Catholic churches, which outside of the Basque country are now closed, can and will be opened in adequate number whenever there are definite assurances that the church will act as a religious body and not as a landlord or as a major counter-revolutionary force.

But Spain's woes have sprung primarily not out of the monarchy which has been abolished, or out of fascism which has not yet been established, or even out of clericalism, but out of the old order, partly capitalist and partly still feudal, which the workers have already taken long steps to alter. If these steps are retraced, or if they are checked by some unsatisfactory compromise in the name of winning the war, there may perhaps be temporary peace, but it will not be long before a new and violent struggle will break out. Even a temporary peace satisfactory to the dominant groups in England and France may be at the price of a quasi-military dictatorship in Republican Spain. I do not say this because I have turned Anarchist, or because I support the P.O.U.M. (temporarily allied with the Anarchists, whose positive program is not theirs) especially in its more recent policy; the contrary is emphatically the case. I say it because I was disquieted not to find a more definite economic and social program in the new Cabinet's policy or among the leaders of the parties which support it.

Caballero's downfall was probably due in part to his shortcomings as an executive, of which his critics make much. The new Cabinet seems to have a very genuine popular support based on the hope of greater vigor and efficiency in the war. While I was talking with Señor Negrin, the Prime Minister, he was called to the telephone and on his return told me that the majority of the council of the U. G. T. had voted support of his government. He also said that he had private assurances of support from some of the Anarchist leaders. It is certain, however, that no one in the present government represents as completely as did Caballero the aspirations of the workers who originally were responsible both for checking Franco and for advancing the social revolution.

But perhaps I am borrowing trouble. We friends of Spain with our limited knowledge have no right at long range to try to dictate her future. If in the modern world the future is to be a happy one, it must be in comradeship with the workers of other lands. Spain is not in a strong enough position to achieve socialism within her own borders against the active hostility of the capitalist world. Nevertheless, the Spanish government and the Spanish workers should not be subjected to the dictation of any nation, be it Russia, England, or France.

Certainly our immediate task is to give the wisest and most generous help we can to Loyalist Spain in its struggle against fascism. More than any one factor which I discovered in Europe, it has been Spanish resistance to fascism which has checked its onward march and given new hope to lovers of true democracy. To aid Loyalist Spain is not an act of generosity; it is a debt of honor.

Stanley Baldwin Steps Down

BY HAROLD J. LASKI

London, June 1

MR. BALDWIN has gone with all the fanfare of trumpets that modern publicity can devise. An earl now, and a Knight of the Garter, he retires to a dignified leisure at the highest point his reputation has reached. With him go Mr. MacDonald—already half-forgotten by the public—and Mr. Runciman, of whom it is perhaps simplest to say that he has spent the last six years in action intended to show how mistaken and futile were the principles he expressed in nearly a generation of previous political life.

The new government is not, in essentials, any different from the old. Mr. Chamberlain differs, no doubt, very considerably from Mr. Baldwin. Precise, unsensitive, narrow-minded, unimaginative, he will carry on the work of reaction without that touch of organized simplicity which was so distinctive a trait in his predecessor. There will be no real change in policy under his direction, but the left will learn, far more incisively than it did under Mr. Baldwin, that "national government" is the British capitalist's alternative to fascism.

Most of the old team goes on, though there has been some shuffling of offices. Sir John Simon goes to the Exchequer. Partly, I think, that is the result of hard bargaining; he wished to mark himself out as the second man in the government. Mr. Chamberlain, after all, is sixty-eight. Mr. Duff Cooper, having made a mess at the War Office, is transferred—even the London Times cannot understand why—to the Admiralty. Sir Samuel Hoare, who is a careful administrator, goes to the Home Office; Mr. Hore-Belisha, who has at least a zest for publicity, goes to the War Office, where his special gifts will be valuable in that recruiting campaign in which Mr. Duff Cooper so notably failed. Mr. Oliver Stanley, having filled two Cabinet posts without energy or distinction, is now given a third opportunity at the Board of Trade; and Lord Stanhope, who is pleasant without being remarkable, becomes Minister for Education. Ramsay MacDonald leaves his son in office as a legacy; and Lord de la Warr and Dr. Burgin are brought in to preserve the balance as it stood in the Baldwin Cabinet. Both having become Tories in all but name, their promotion implies no real change. Mr. Chamberlain keeps Mr. Eden and Lord Halifax; they, with Sir John Simon and Sir Samuel Hoare, are likely to be the effective inner Cabinet.

Drawing by Bert Hayden

What, of course, really matters is the resignation of Mr. Baldwin. I think his exit will in a brief time make a considerable difference to the status of the government in the country. He had the power to cast a spell over both the House of Commons and the electorate. What was his secret? In foreign affairs, at least, his record is a grave one. Manchoukuo, Abyssinia, Spain—he bears a heavy responsibility for each of these. He helped to wreck the disarmament conference; he has cooperated in the virtual annihilation of the League. His public professions of faith to great international ideals have been compatible with actions each of which has been a major incident in their betrayal. In domestic policy the warm advocate of social reform and industrial peace, he has no single important statute to his credit in the first realm, while in the second he has cooperated in legislation attacking the trade unions, the cooperative movement, the unemployed, and, in the Sedition Act, the means of free expression. The man who won the last general election on a platform of peace proceeded without warning to the largest rearmament program in British history; and he cheerfully confessed to the House of Commons that he concealed his intentions from the electorate because he feared defeat if he avowed them.

Mr. Baldwin was not a simple man, though he liked to pose as such. In one sense, indeed, he fulfilled Bagehot's definition of the ideal statesman—he was an extraordinary man of ordinary opinions. His hold on the British mind has been exceptional; only Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Lloyd George have rivaled it, in their very different ways, in our time. Not very energetic, trusting his intuition rather than seeking the reason of things, skeptical of the really first-rate man, wholly traditional in his major assumptions, how did he manage to retain power for fifteen years? He was in office twice as long as Mr. Asquith, and three times as long as Mr. Lloyd George. Man after man challenged his supremacy in the Tory party—the press lords, Mr. Churchill, Sir Robert Horne, Mr. Amery; he defeated them all without difficulty. What has been the secret of Mr. Baldwin's ascendancy?

First and foremost, I think, his remarkable intuitive insight into the Britain with which he was dealing. It was a tired Britain, unprepared for, even afraid of, any major innovations. It shrank from the burden of thought about fundamentals. With Russia on one side, with Italy and Germany on the other, the price of radical reconstruction seemed to most men too high; and in any case the left never inspired them—look at the record of the two Labor governments—to believe that this was possible. Mr. Baldwin at 10 Downing Street was an assurance that the old ways would go on. He seemed to the man in the street to keep the ship of state on an even keel. He was always genial, never remote, spoke his thoughts simply, was, within the framework of his assumptions, as honorable as anyone in politics, shrewd in handling men. The extremists of his own party never captured him. He had the great art of speaking his conservatism in liberal accents. He knew, as few men have ever known, how to appeal to the indifferent voter who does not desire disturbance. He used the great platitudes of conventional life as his platform; and millions voted for him in the belief that when they chose him they were securing the continuance of national habits. Above all, he knew how to play the great game of politics in such a way that he always gave the appearance of being an amateur making his way among professionals. Mr. Baldwin made himself a legend, and out of it grew the sense that he was entitled, as no other figure in politics, to respect and affection. That was a triumph it is difficult to exaggerate. It is, also, a triumph achieved by no other figure in the post-war years in Great Britain.

How deep it went was shown by the abdication of last December. Whether one agrees or disagrees with his policy on that occasion, one cannot, I think, deny that he was the only man in Great Britain who could have fulfilled it successfully. His critics could make no headway against him. He held the House of Commons in the hollow of his hand. He staked his whole existence against the most popular prince of modern times, and so organized the issue that he had an overwhelming public sentiment in his favor. That was a triumph of character the like of which British politics has not seen in my lifetime. It illustrates, as does no other incident, the hold Mr. Baldwin had on the popular mind. And to depart from the scene at the moment when the glow of the achievement is at its full—when, so to say, it was he who was crowned the other day in the Abbey—shows the insight of the man abundantly. Never again will his stature be so high. He goes universally respected. He leaves all the problems to his successors.

That is the clue through which alone a proper assessment of Mr. Baldwin can be made. The bills have yet to come in for the policies of which he has been sponsor. He has defeated any serious attempt at industrial or social reconstruction. His transformation of Great Britain into a protectionist country, added to his move toward a closed imperial economic system, makes the future of the staple export trades a grave problem for future statesmen. He has killed both disarmament and collective security as the price of maintaining a temporary peace; we have still to learn how many men must die because Mr. Baldwin preferred the old balance-of-power politics to the new League system. In a word, he has maintained the old habituations by postponing all questions of adjustment to the urgencies of a new world. His skill has been that men have been persuaded to gratitude for that maintenance. A few years from now the perspective of Baldwinism will, I predict, look utterly different from its contemporary appearance. The judgment then, I believe, will be that in a period which offered immense opportunities for creative adventure, Mr. Baldwin deliberately put them on one side. He preserved a superficial national unity by evading the problems the nation has sooner or later to face. He kept the peace by a systematic surrender of the opportunity of dealing with the causes of war. He was a caretaker, rather than a constructor. It was his advantage that he dealt with a Britain that he was able to persuade to shrink from confronting the cost of constructive effort.

I do not deny for a moment that his has been a very considerable feat. Fifteen years ago Mr. Baldwin was hardly known in Great Britain; he retired as a national institution. The difficulty of his retirement lies in the fact that Mr. Chamberlain has none of Mr. Baldwin's healing touch. We are moving toward a period of labor unrest and intensified international crisis. Mr. Chamberlain does not understand the first, and the assumptions upon which he approaches the second belong to that habit of power-politics which, as the years before 1914 made clear, is incapable of resolving its problems. Mr. Baldwin can say with Sir Robert Walpole—whom in a way he curiously resembles—that "there have been ten thousand men killed this year in Europe and not a single Englishman." One wonders whether Mr. Chamberlain will be able to say as much on the day of his retirement. If he finds himself a war minister, the key to the conflict in which Great Britain will be involved will, I feel confident, be found in the international policies of the post-war years, for which the major responsibility belongs to Mr. Baldwin.

Spain's Homeless Million

BY LELAND STOWE

AT LEAST 5 out of every 100 Spaniards are homeless today because of the fascist invasion of Spain. Another way of saying this is that, according to Valencia's Ministry of Public Health, there were 1,250,000 war refugees in Loyalist territory alone at the beginning of April. This means 1,250,000 uprooted, helpless, penniless, and hungry human beings out of a total population of 24,000,000. Transpose these figures into an equivalent ratio for the United States and the result is eloquent. One need only suppose that artillery and aerial bombardment had driven 6,500,000 trans-Mississippi Americans into the states east of Old Man River; that the nation was fighting with its back to the wall; that federal funds were exceedingly limited and outside help almost non-existent; and, finally, that no WPA or other governmental agency existed with which to succor the 5 per cent of our population in acute distress.

It is almost impossible to appreciate the magnitude of the refugee problem in Spain, as it is incredible that the outside world has scarcely raised a finger to alleviate the suffering. A few facts should be enlightening. Last January the province of Valencia was flooded with 160,000 refugees in addition to its normal 926,000 inhabitants; Ciudad Real had 112,000 refugees to 427,000 inhabitants—was supporting every fifth person as a war derelict; Catalonia had its population swollen by 350,000 persons; in Murcia one out of every seven persons was a refugee. The situation in Albaceta and Almeria was almost as serious, while the lowest total in thirteen other provinces was 32,000 refugees in Castellon above a normal population of 306,000. Since January these figures have increased by tens of thousands.

Such a brief summary may prompt the query, With the enemy at its gates what has the Valencia government been able to do for this horde of uprooted humanity? The facts have been assembled by two Paris lawyers, Marc and Marie-Louise Jacquier, in a report published by the International Bureau for the Right of Asylum and Aid to Political Refugees. Organization of refugee aid has developed in three steps. A Refugees' Committee was formed last October on a national scale. By a decree of January, 1937, the functions of this body were assumed by the Ministry of Public Health and Social Aid. Finally, in February, the provincial committees were replaced by the "Offices of Stages," which are administered through the Public Health Ministry. With this improvised organization the Loyalists' refugee-aid activities have fallen into four groupings: evacuation of endangered civilian populations, registration of refugees, transportation and distribution of refugees in different provinces, and provision of lodgings and sustenance.

To handle the refugee army extraordinary efforts have been required. An individual card system has been established whereby the homeless are catalogued and provided with identity cards for presentation at federal or municipal shelters or at private homes. Army barracks, convents, hotels, public halls, and abandoned villas have been converted into refuges. In Madrid two large refuges have been used for evacuation purposes, one housing 1,500 persons and the other as many as 4,000. In Barcelona the huge Montjuich stadium has been equipped with dormitories, shower baths, and an infirmary and can shelter 6,000 persons in emergencies. Valencia is now completing the Marguerita Nelken Refuge in addition to a children's shelter near the railroad station. Refugees are accommodated in two ways: they are settled in colonies or are billeted with private families. The latter method has imposed a tremendous burden upon Spanish homes, for several hundred thousand refugees have been taken in, fed, clothed, and "adopted for the duration of the war." A February decree provides that each family shall feed and house at least one refugee. Of course the average Spanish family exists upon a bare subsistence level; yet there has been no protesting or grumbling.

A large number of guarderías, or colonies for children, have been founded in the various provinces. Clothes, food, and medical care are especially necessary for the homeless youngsters. In this work municipalities contribute according to their means, in addition to federal and private aid. In and near Barcelona a number of model children's colonies have been established. Almost everywhere the members of the staff are volunteers and unpaid.

This rescue work for homeless children demonstrates clearly that the self-respecting Spaniards are caring for their own to the limit of their capacity. The Basque refugee children, therefore, constitute a special case. In Bilbao there is no alternative to consigning the children to charity abroad. Strangely enough it was not until the first of these had to be carried away to safety that the outside world began to realize that the Basque refugee problem is merely a small fraction of the great problem throughout Spain.

What has already been done for the Spanish refugees by their own government and their own private citizens has passed almost unnoticed amid the thunders of the war, but it is an inspiring and noble story. The brutal fact remains, however, that 1,250,000 older men and women, mothers, children, and infants are objects of charity in Spain and may go hungry tomorrow. They need aid from abroad, urgently and without stint. In 1914 the world's heart responded swiftly to the plight of the Belgian people. What cruel irony that Spain's human derelicts should awaken no such outpouring of generosity!

Will the SEC Wreck Hearst?

BY JAMES SMITH

THE Hearst newspaper empire may be wrecked by the Securities Act of 1933. The act requires that companies selling securities disclose their true financial condition without concealment of relevant facts. The Hearst organization, overloaded with debt and possessing tangible assets whose balance-sheet totals are negligible, is trying to bail itself out by selling $35,500,000 of debentures to the public. In early March Hearst registered $13,000,000 for Hearst Magazines, Inc., which owns the Cosmopolitan, Good Housekeeping, and other periodicals. Three weeks later a registration statement was filed covering $22,500,000 for Hearst Publications, owner of many of the Hearst dailies. The Hearst issues, under the provisions of the Securities Act, had to remain on exhibition twenty days before they could be released for sale. Meanwhile, omissions and falsifications were sought by the SEC. Their public offering is still pending. Protests to the SEC followed quickly upon the registration of the issues. They deal with irregularities in Hearst's finances and with the effects on his business of his fascist news and editorial policies, his labor relations, and other matters.

An analysis of the registration statement of Hearst Magazines, Inc., was made and sent to the SEC by Paul Kern, Civil Service Commissioner of New York City, and Bernard Reis, author of the recently published "False Security." The brief declares that when a magazine company sells securities, the "investor has a right to assume that the moneys to be thus procured will be used for the acquisition of new profitable assets connected with its operations, working capital, or the liquidation of liabilities of the magazine business," and that "the conduct of the business previous to the issue was of such a nature as a reasonably prudent magazine publisher would have conducted." Since this is the natural assumption, established in law, says the brief, deviations should be clearly described. Otherwise "a magazine publisher could use the proceeds for the acquisition of a yacht."

The brief shows that practically all of the $13,000,000 is to be used for purposes foreign to the ostensible business of the company and that this fact becomes discernible only after close scrutiny; the conclusion is that the provisions of the registration statement "unquestionably verge on legally actionable fraud." Citing much legal precedent, the brief says:

A statement is not legally accurate merely because a careful accountant or expert may find it so. It must be accurate to an investor of "ordinary prudence." This long and involved registration statement, with its cross references, footnotes, and complexities, is not accurate to the ordinary prudent investor unless it succinctly summarizes the use of the funds to be obtained. . . .

The authors go on to point out that the statement, to be legally accurate, would have to "contain a prominent disclosure" of such facts as these: that part of the proceeds were to be used for the purchase of Hearst's British estate, St. Donat's Castle; that a building was being purchased from the New York Evening Journal at a price $500,000 higher than the appraised value in order to relieve the Hearst Magazines of a contract which, in essence, required that it pay the Journal's rent; and that over a three-year period the surplus of Hearst Magazines had been greatly depleted through the payment of dividends (to Hearst) in excess of earnings.

Dealing with the same facts, the Labor Research Association stated to the SEC that no business management actually responsible to its company would countenance such operations unless there existed a "contract, verbal understanding, or working agreement between management of Hearst Magazines, Inc., and the parent companies under which the earnings and capital of the registrant are diverted to the parent companies." Failure of the registration statement to mention such an agreement, it was charged, constituted a "material omission in violation of the Securities Act of 1933." Pointing out from facts contained in the registration statement that diversion of company moneys to parent companies and to the top parent, William Randolph Hearst, was not the exception but the rule and routine, and that debt claims against parents appeared likely to grow without limit, the Research Association concluded that "the value of the present securities can be judged only after the financial condition of the parents has been disclosed." Since Hearst is the final borrower, this would include him.

Whether through the intervention of the SEC or otherwise, the existence of the equivalent of such a working agreement was disclosed when the second issue, the $22,500,000 Hearst Publications debentures, was filed. An obscure footnote said:

The company, its divisions, and its subsidiary have . . . been under a common ownership and executive management with other Hearst companies, and all have been operated from a practical standpoint as though they were branches or divisions of a single business, to an extent that intercompany advances and exchanges of working-capital funds have been a common practice; joint facilities, commodity, features, news, and other services have been conducted in some instances without contracts and on non-uniform bases of charges therefor, and lessor and lessee relationships have not . . . at all times measured occupancy benefits.

Such an admission obviously makes even more essential the disclosure of the whole set-up as demanded by the Labor Research Association. Otherwise an organization might segregate its best assets in a single corporation, which alone would issue securities and whose condition alone would be disclosed, even though the proceeds were diverted to other units about which the public would be told nothing. This hypothesis fits the Hearst case.

Protests were not limited to the financial condition of the Hearst organization. The American League against War and Fascism in a carefully documented thirty-five-page brief told the commission of the existence of the boycott against Hearst. "Since such a boycott obviously limits the possible expansion of the registrant," reads the brief, "the American League against War and Fascism respectfully requests that the Securities and Exchange Commission require that the registration statement and the prospectus state that such a boycott exists." It also asked that the release of the securities for public sale be delayed until organizations boycotting Hearst had been given the opportunity so to testify in public hearings, as permitted under the act.

The claims made by the Good Housekeeping Institute were denied by the Consumers Union. The institute tests household articles and upon some places its "Certificate of Approval." Articles not receiving such approval are forbidden the advertising pages of the magazine. The Consumers Union listed scores of articles which had been subjected to cease-and-desist orders of the Federal Trade Commission or placed on the black list of New York City without loss of the privilege of advertising in Good Housekeeping.

As a labor union, the American Newspaper Guild avoids such issues as Hearst's financial irregularities, his fascist policies, and his false advertising claims. However, after Hearst Publications had admitted that there was but a single Hearst organization, in which separate companies were mere "branches," the Guild Reporter pointed out that this laid Hearst open to the demand for a single union contract covering all the newspapers. To date such demands had been countered by the assertion that wage scales of one paper had no bearing upon those of others. Since assets and working capital are admittedly shifted about at convenience, this claim is no longer tenable.

Without consulting the Guild, one of the central trade councils in New Jersey called the attention of the SEC to the heavy strike losses sustained by Hearst in Seattle and Milwaukee. Pointing out that other papers lacked Guild contracts, it contended that the registration statement must note this fact and call to the investors' attention the possibility of similar strike losses in the future.

The effect of these and other protests, if successful, may bankrupt the Hearst companies. The organization needs its $35,500,000 quickly. However, bankruptcy may be avoided. Hearst himself has been credited with possession of a large personal fortune. Failing to sell securities to the public, he may at least return to the companies the large sums extracted by such methods as appropriation of surpluses in the form of dividends and sales of real estate to the newspapers. Another possibility, although equally remote, is that Hearst will make full disclosure and that the public will still buy his securities.

Meanwhile the attack upon Hearst holds significant lessons for labor unions and organizations dealing with anti-social corporations. Both for new and already listed securities they are within their rights in demanding that companies disclose tear-gas costs and payments to spies and strike-breakers. They might insist upon disclosures to the investor of consumer boycotts. Demands for union recognition and the strike losses that might result from refusal should certainly be shown, and specific information about suits by the National Labor Relations Board should be required.

Social Credit: Troubles in Alberta

BY DONALD LESLIE

PREMIER Aberhart of Alberta, head of the first Social Credit government in the world, is the central figure in a controversy that grows in bitterness as the months pass. Alberta has had for eighteen months a government pledged to a program of Social Credit, but that economic theory has not yet been translated into fact. Mr. Aberhart's supporters regard him as a sincere, honest, and capable leader struggling to bring about a new economic order which shall provide "Social Credit dividends" every month. They see him thwarted in his efforts by the greed and obstinacy of the "possessing" classes, with orthodox finance as the chief obstructionist. The opponents of Social Credit call the Premier a humbug, a demagogue, a seeker after power.

It has been a troubled eighteen months. All sorts of things have been tried—"prosperity dollars," for instance, which were issued last year with the assurance that if only the people of Alberta would accept these quite illegal substitutes for currency (of course the illegality was not mentioned), every unemployed man in the country would be put to work on road construction and the necessity for relief payments would be eliminated. The scheme collapsed and has been officially abandoned. Last year also a number of complicated codes were set up to govern a variety of businesses and trades. Somewhat after the fashion of the NRA, these codes aimed to bring about a needed reform in the conduct of business. Examinations were held, licenses were issued, and fees collected therefor, but the codes were abandoned when the first court challenge revealed that it would be impossible to enforce them. The fees have not yet been refunded. The basic theory of Social Credit stresses the necessity of supplying purchasing power to the entire population to balance and absorb production. Increased taxes of course decrease purchasing power. The government, however, has been forced by the pressure of immediate necessity to collect more revenue. Nor has this come from the well-to-do only; the 2 per cent sales tax, for example, affects everybody.

William Aberhart, in the days when he was still a high-school principal, was appalled by the condition of financial servitude to which great numbers of Albertans had been reduced. Low prices, glutted markets, mortgages given in boom times, unpaid and compounding interest, vanishing savings, failing hope—a story too well known, sadly enough, to require much telling—aroused his pity and strengthened his determination to find a solution. He believed that Social Credit offered a way out. When as Governor he could not give immediate effect to Social Credit, he passed two measures to deal with the financial burden. One reduced to a maximum of 3 per cent the rate of interest which the province would pay on its bonded indebtedness. The other provided that all debts, and this especially affected mortgages, which had been incurred prior to July, 1932, should be subject to a new set of conditions, regardless of the original contract. The principal as of July, 1932, was to be reduced in the amount of all the payments, including interest, which had been made since that time. The balance was to be divided into ten equal amounts, to be paid in ten annual instalments, without interest, beginning with 1937. It meant the abolition of all interest on incurred debts from 1932 until 1946, and it extended the time of payment.

These two acts raised a fury of opposition in financial circles, while among persons saddled with an overwhelming burden of debt they kindled hope once more. Both acts were challenged in the courts, and owing to the division of jurisdiction between federal and provincial governments, both were disallowed. The verdict is to be appealed. Meanwhile a temporary moratorium is in effect to prevent foreclosure or recovery actions until the government can devise another method of dealing with the debt question.

During the recently adjourned session of the legislature the government proposed a licensing measure which would confer upon it very wide powers. A transport board was to be set up to issue licenses for trucking and to regulate trucking rates. Licenses were also to be required of business men, office, mine, and factory workers—everybody, in fact, except farmers and casual laborers. Fees were to be collected and penalties to be inflicted upon anyone daring to earn his or her living without government permission. It is difficult to see what these proposed measures, savoring strongly of fascist control, have to do with Social Credit, and protests arose as soon as their details were made public. Resolutions were passed describing them as "unwarrantable invasions of personal liberty which place every individual completely in the control of the state and stultify his freedom of conscience." It would be ironic if the people of Alberta, after electing a Social Credit government in their search for economic freedom, should lose their freedom of employment.

After holding office for eighteen months without being able to put Social Credit into operation, Mr. Aberhart in March addressed to his usual Sunday radio audience an explanation and a challenge. He blamed the organized powers of finance and the press for the delay. He reaffirmed his belief in the possibility of setting up Social Credit if the people would continue to back him. The response was surprising. An insurgent movement, led by Dr. H. K. Brown, within the ranks of the Social Credit members of the legislature obtained sufficient numerical support to impose its demands upon the government. Protesting that Mr. Aberhart had no intention of bringing in a measure to give effect to Social Credit, the insurgents blocked the budget proposed by the government for the ensuing fiscal year until something should be done. This budget was of the most orthodox type, providing for the paring down of expenditures and the collection of a still higher revenue and contemplating an inevitable, though reduced, deficit.

After much wrangling and uncertainty a temporary compromise was effected. One-quarter of the budget was voted, sufficient to last the government for three months; a Social Credit Act was passed; a commission of house members was empowered to search for three "experts in Social Credit" to administer the act. The licensing bills were held in abeyance; the government's measure for dealing with debt was held up; the moratorium was prolonged; an invitation was extended to Major Douglas, the originator of Social Credit, to come to Alberta in person and put his theory into operation; and the legislature adjourned until June 7.

Meanwhile the issues between the Social Credit adherents of Premier Aberhart and the Social Credit insurgents are being argued in the constituencies with much passion and confusion. The opposing political parties—Conservatives, Liberals, United Farmers, and Labor—are considerably cheered by this split in government ranks. An effort is being made by the People's League to consolidate into one unified force those elements in the electorate which oppose the party now in power.

It is difficult to foresee what will happen. One may perhaps guess. The People's League will need something much more constructive than mere dislike of Social Credit and a promise of return to orthodox finance to gain support at the polls in the event of an election. The insurgents probably will not press their opposition to Mr. Aberhart if by withholding support for the budget they can force him to give effect to the Social Credit Act. Mr. Aberhart is less sure of support in the constituencies than he was in 1935 when the forces of Social Credit were undivided; resort to an election would therefore be a gamble he may not care to risk. Unless defeated by a majority in the legislature, the government still has three years to hold office.

The majority of the people in Alberta, who voted Social Credit into power in 1935, want to find out once and for all whether this hitherto untried theory will work or not. Apparently they are soon to know.

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Mr. Hearst Asks for Help

ONCE more William Randolph Hearst has turned to the public for aid to carry on his publications. In 1928 and 1929 he induced the public to buy nearly forty million dollars' worth of securities which he personally guaranteed. Later, after the depression had begun, he sold fifty million more to the public and his employees and did not have to guarantee their repayment. Some of these bonds are coming due; Hearst's companies have not the money to redeem them; and so he is asking investors for $35,500,000 more—$13,000,000 for Hearst Magazines, Inc., and $22,500,000 for Hearst Publications, Inc. If the public swallows the bait again, there will be $125,000,000 of other money than Hearst's in that monstrous edifice of interrelated corporations which he controls, almost as involved a bit of financing and ownership of ownership as the corporation pyramids erected by Samuel Insull. Except for one thing it is probable that Hearst would be helped out again. That obstacle is the Securities and Exchange Commission in Washington, created to safeguard the investing public from blue-sky financing.

If the SEC should authorize this additional Hearst financing, it might as well go out of business. I do not see how it possibly can sanction it, for a more unblushing proposal has surely never come before the commission. The whole financial set-up is so complicated that the proposed issue should be rejected on that ground alone. The application is ninety-three pages long; no individual investor could possibly understand the involved language and financing unless he were a banker or an investment expert. Let us take one example: of the $13,000,000 to be obtained for Hearst Magazines, Inc., $1,900,000 is to be used for the repayment of bank loans which had to be guaranteed, before Hearst could obtain them, first, of course, by Hearst Magazines itself; secondly by its parent company, the Hearst Corporation, Inc.; thirdly by the latter's parent company, American Newspapers, Inc.; and finally by Hearst himself. Originally, as Charles E. Hughes brought out years ago when campaigning for Governor of New York, these companies within companies were created in order to protect Hearst from legal liability for his reckless and slanderous statements. Now they are doubtless closely related to income-tax questions and to the difficult financing of this huge, unwieldy, and in some cases unprofitable group of magazines and dailies.

When we come to examine in detail what some of the money intended for Hearst Magazines is to be used for, the unblushing effrontery of the whole proposal becomes clear. Thus $1,461,471.19 is to go for the purchase of stock of an English company, the National Magazine Company, Ltd., which is controlled by Hearst in the usual involved, wheels-within-wheels manner. The stock is to be sold by Hearst's American Newspapers, Inc., already cited. Now what are the assets to be purchased from the latter? They are beyond belief: (1) net tangible assets of the National Magazine Company, Ltd., of $189,676.75; (2) the good-will of this company, which has lost more than $45,000 a year for the last three years; (3) the excess of the cost over the par value of the National Magazine Company's investment in the Connoisseur, a magazine which has lost $15,000 a year during the past three years; (4) the good-will of this same Connoisseur and of the Good Housekeeping Restaurants, whose losses for the last three years total $9,500 not counting depreciation; and (5) most astounding of all, St. Donat's Castle and estates and Bradenstoke Abbey and land, all located in Wales, of a book value of $1,323,351.24. A castle and an abbey, the good-will in some unprofitable restaurants and magazines, and the net tangible assets of National Magazines, Inc., all jumbled up together to be unloaded on investors for the sum of $1,461,671.19! Have I adequately characterized this transaction? I think not.

Let us go a step farther. St. Donat's Castle was bought for or by Hearst in 1925 for £24,694 (approximately $120,000). It was subsequently "rehabilitated" by Hearst and so ruined that there were indignant public protests at the desecration of this historic castle. It was turned over to the National Magazine Company, and the Hearst statement before the SEC declares that "use of it is made from time to time to promote good-will for the publications of the National Magazine Company, Ltd." Moreover, the indenture securing this bond issue specifies that neither the registrant nor any subsidiary "will expend any money for restoration or alteration of this property, though reasonable amounts may be expended for necessary maintenance and repairs" (italics mine)!

This breaks all flotation records. The public is asked to give money to purchase a castle in which Hearst and his family may, as in the past, live and entertain in order to influence persons to give advertising and other aid to the limping magazines of this company! Publicly endowed toadying and bootlicking! Hearst was never known to be other than lavish in his entertaining. Would not he decide what were "necessary maintenance and repairs"? And it is seriously contended that the burden of running this property should be lifted from Hearst and placed upon a company which has only $189,676.85 of actual tangible assets.

I can only say that if this proposed public financing goes through, we ought to make public apologies to the brothers Insull and give them the thanks of Congress.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Drang Nach Osten

HITLER'S DRIVE TO THE EAST. By F. Elwyn Jones.
E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

DR. SCHACHT'S cagey economic penetration having provided an opening, the Austro-German agreement of last July was utilized by Hitler as a step toward the re-creation of a Mittel Europa; Vienna was to be the spearhead of the drive which would bring the Balkans into the Nazi corral. Beginning in 1933 the Germans imported extensively from the economically dependent Balkans. Large Balkan credits were soon built up and "frozen" in the Reichsbank, and the Balkan nations were then informed that they could only liquidate their frozen assets by buying German industrial products. Otherwise the credits would remain "frozen," or—as a final argument—the blocked Reichsmark would be devaluated. It was a neat financial trick, and it worked so well that last June Dr. Schacht pulled his trump card: "Use your blocked Reichsmarks to buy German arms."

The countries capitulated in turn. In Yugoslavia Dr. Schacht's plan was assisted by the damage which sanctions against Italy had done to Yugoslavia's considerable export trade. Germany "undertook to import 60 per cent of the Yugoslavian goods normally taken by Italy, and within a few months Yugoslavia had 21,000,000 Rm. credit blocked in Berlin." And although the Comité des Forges and Skoda had already armed Yugoslavia up to the hilt, Dr. Schacht eventually managed to get at least $9,000,000 worth of semi-military orders from Belgrade. Two-thirds of the "frozen" Greek credits have been spent on German arms, although the Italian and British tenders were both lower. Bulgaria was easy prey. With 64 per cent of her export trade and 53.5 per cent of her import trade in Nazi hands, most of her "frozen" credits went for German arms.

Mr. Jones proceeds to a brief and arresting survey of the new Balkan dictatorships. The mailed fist of General Metaxas has made the government of Greece about the most stringent dictatorship in Europe. Police power is arbitrary. Metaxas has frankly told the press that "liberty is a fiction." The labor movement has been suppressed—or rather "nationalized"—and the electoral system abolished. Local mayors, for example, are now "selected" by the central government. In Rumania, since the overthrow of the M. Titulescu, the liberal and Francophile Foreign Minister, the Nazis have found the going rather easy. Army officers have succumbed to Nazi influence, and the peasants and students are increasingly anti-Semitic. Corneliu Codreanu's fascist and anti-Semitic "Iron Guard," composed of fanatics and terrorists, was openly supported by certain high officials and financed, in part, from Berlin. A military league has ruled Bulgaria since 1934. It was supported by Professor Tsankov's "social" movement, which was in turn backed by Nazis. Last July two Tsankov ministers were included in the Bulgarian Cabinet. For many years Yugoslavia has been held together by a strong, military central government. But while Nazi economic penetration has been considerable, Yugoslavia's position is undecided. The court is reactionary and the Foreign Minister pro-German, but the fascist bloc in Europe is frankly revisionist, and Yugoslavia is desperately anti-revisionist.

Such is Mr. Jones's brief sketch of the latest Nazi edifice. It is imposing but full of cracks. Yugoslavia has lately turned back toward Italy, France, and England at the expense of Germany. In Greece unrest is increasing. Sure neither of the army nor the navy, General Metaxas relies increasingly on his augmented police force. But Greeks and police are notoriously fickle and, like the "Republican Guards" of 1926, may turn against their creator. A Popular Front is being secretly established, and three-fourths of the university students are said to be anti-fascist. In Rumania the nationalism of King Carol and his more liberal ministers has been aroused by Nazi effrontery, and the new decrees against the Iron Guard and other fascist organizations mark a more liberal trend. Moreover, the important French and British economic interests will not be passively pushed aside by further German penetration. As for Bulgaria, it "has no desire to be dominated entirely by Nazi Germany. In October, 1936, the Bulgarian government made this clear by the dismissal of its two Tsankovist Ministers."

But the strongest forces against further Nazi infiltration are just beginning to function. The Balkan Entente, with the partly interlocking Little Entente and the new Yugoslav-Bulgarian pact of friendship, may conceivably form a stout weapon of common resistance to any foreign meddling. Furthermore, the cooperation between Italy and Germany is "in secondary interests," and underlying it is their "veiled opposition in primary interests." The current revival of international trade, moreover, has strengthened the internal position of all the Balkan and Central European governments and placed them in a more favorable bargaining position with regard to Dr. Schacht. Finally, with the British rearmament program nearing completion, the British are playing a more forceful role in Continental politics.

Mr. Jones concludes with a plea that England lead Europe "in the direction of collective security within the framework of the League." Many Englishmen may object to this, and Mr. Jones's epilogue—one hastens to admit—is a bit emotional. But the body of his book is meaty, realistic, and highly informative. There are few books on the subject, and Mr. Jones is one of the few writers in contact with the leading anti-fascists and radicals working underground in Central Europe and the Balkans.

JULIAN S. BACH, JR.

Tomb for the Twenties

AFTER THE GENTEEL TRADITION. AMERICAN WRITERS SINCE 1910. Edited by Malcolm Cowley.
W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

MR. COWLEY and eleven other critics review in this volume the literature of America between what they call the genteel tradition and now; between, that is, the birth and the death of a literary movement which, struggling to exist in the second decade of the present century, had already passed its prime by 1930. It will be remembered that the latter year was the occasion for many obituaries of the ten which had preceded it. Mr. Cowley's volume is merely the last of those obituaries, and doubtless the best. Its twelve critics, all of them able, bury a great many books with well-directed blows of a single spade. For they have a single point of view—the only one which to any of them seems possible—and if it occurs to none of them that this also may pass, there is after all nothing remarkable about the fact, which has been familiar for centuries. One can even suspect that most of them would acknowledge the transitoriness of their truth with a melancholy pleasure. They are committed to history, and love to date the deaths of things, including perhaps their own. One can imagine them designing a tomb for their point of view, and saving the design as a critical guide for such young spirits as shall come after and be as little satisfied with the thirties as they themselves are with the twenties. The literature of a decade is for them something to be swallowed and digested as a whole; food for its time and for no other; a gesture that has served.

What they have to say about the literature of the twenties is pointed by Mr. Cowley in his opening and closing remarks, but it is said clearly enough in every chapter. The era of Theodore Dreiser, Upton Sinclair, Willa Cather, Van Wyck Brooks, Carl Sandburg, Sherwood Anderson, H. L. Mencken, Sinclair Lewis, Eugene O'Neill, James Branch Cabell, Robinson Jeffers, Edna Millay, and Ernest Hemingway was liberating—and therein valuable—but it did not go far enough. These authors liberated themselves from the genteel tradition, but once alone with themselves they were confused as to what should happen next. For they were still lacking in the one thing which for our twelve critics is essential: they had no relation to society, or rather they had been born too soon to have the right one. They were middle-class people who had rejected their class without finding another one. So they went off into their various hiding places: Willa Cather and O'Neill into religion, Brooks into the problem of the individual writer and finally into descriptive literary history, Mencken into billingsgate, Lewis into panic and revulsion, Cabell into sheer trifles, Jeffers into his hawk-haunted tower, Hemingway into the bled veins of dumb animals, and so on. A chapter on John Dos Passos by Mr. Cowley and another one on Thomas Wolfe by Hamilton Basso are thrown in at the end to show that there is hope for the future, since both of these writers, it appears, possess the happy secret of keeping "open and unclogged the channels that ought to flow between the lives at the base of society and the literary consciousness." The words are Newton Arvin's and the context is Carl Sandburg, but they will do.

The thesis explains much, and explains it brilliantly; Lionel Trilling, Robert Cantwell, Louis Kronenberger, Peter Monroe Jack, and John Peale Bishop have published essays here which should be standard for years. Yet their very unanimity will inspire a perverse reader to look for alternative theses. What is being explained, of course, is the decline of several reputations. The tendency of most reputations to decline is, I suppose, not much of a thesis, since it can be stated in half a dozen words and associates itself in the mind with such commonplace facts as change and fashion and natural death. At any rate it suggests itself as something that might have prevented a good deal of the intellectual strain present in some of these essays; though at the same time it would have prevented some excellent prose. And about this business of the hiding place—either for an author who has lost his original power or for one (it may be merely this) who in his maturity has grown tired of being significant, representative, organic to his times, and what not, and like many another graying man insists on devoting his last days to himself. It has happened before. Shakespeare's final plays are a riot of magic and make-believe; Milton hid his head in autobiography; Tolstoy took to writing tracts. Such behavior may be reprehensible, but I do not know that it is more so than age and death, or that friend and enemy whom we call change. And it actually has produced good works: "The Tempest," "Samson Agonistes," "How Much Land Does a Man Need?" Or so it can seem with the passage of time and the conquering of our disappointment that the authors of these masterpieces did not continue their close contacts with every current thought.

It is not so much, then, or is it at all that our dozen historians are wrong. They are often in fact very shrewdly right. It is rather that they cannot possibly be as wise as they sound, wisdom in literary history being so extremely rare and having to wait so long upon its proofs. As for their criticism, the pressure behind it upon all authors to find at once the correct social attitude or die is a little terrifying. There are, nevertheless, two grains of comfort in the volume for anyone who is not yet ready to jump. Mr. Cowley announces the permanent death of William Dean Howells in apparent ignorance of the fact that Howells foresaw no literature for the twentieth century except under socialism, and said so. And Hamilton Basso calls upon Thomas Wolfe to "submit to the rigid discipline of his craft" if he cares to survive. That is the only reference in the whole volume to the superstition that writing is among other things an art. But it is a reference.

MARK VAN DOREN

Fable and Prophecy

TRUMPET OF JUBILEE. By Ludwig Lewisohn. Harper and Brothers. $2.50.

IN A symbolic prologue Mr. Lewisohn dramatizes the struggle of man in the Western world today. He presents a Christian whom he calls Peter, a Jew named Jehuda, and an infidel, a Saracen of course. The infidel—who is also Mr. Lewisohn's particular devil—is a revolutionary, although he may also be a fascist. To Mr. Lewisohn there is no difference. The struggle between these adversaries is not a three-cornered one, however, for Peter and Jehuda fight side by side to uphold man's spiritual nature, his love as an individualist for liberty, his desire to create as well as pray, against the totalitarian state with its deadly monotony, its lack of imagination, its cupidity, its cruelty. But before Peter and Jehuda join hands they must discover what they are: Peter must know himself for a Christian, Jehuda must acknowledge himself a Jew. If the infidel defeats them, as he has in the past and may again in the future, they will at least know what they are dying for.

To illustrate his fable Mr. Lewisohn takes his reader to Germany in 1933. The anti-Semitic terror is rising. Kurt Weiss, the lawyer, has an Aryan partner and many Christian friends; he has hardly ever thought of himself as a Jew, nor has his wife, who is perhaps three-quarters Gentile. They are Germans, cultivated, intellectual, honorable, law-abiding. But Kurt Weiss, before he is shot in the head, knows the extremes of Nazi brutality; his wife and child are permitted to flee, first to Paris, then to America. They discover that the Jews they meet in those countries are desperately eager to deny their Jewishness. And their lives are hollow, unsatisfying, unhappy. These American Jews want to forget the Nazi terror, they want to pretend that all is well with them, that they are no different from their neighbors, that they are Americans—just as the German Jews wanted to believe that they were Germans. But the infidel is just around the corner, and in a prophetic look ahead that takes the reader some ten years into the future, Mr. Lewisohn describes the coming struggle and indicates for believers their salvation.

Mr. Lewisohn is well known as a novelist of power and imagination. Now and then he indulges in too many adjectives, but his style is for the most part pure and penetrating. There can be no quarrel with his description of Germany today. We know it as he knows it. Its brutality and stupidity would be incredible except that they are true. But long steps into the future are always dangerous. To many persons Mr. Wells's Utopias are boring when they are not silly. Mr. Lewisohn, writing history in 1948—and in his epilogue much farther in the future than that—runs the risk of losing those readers who have not had his particular brand of revelation. The only world we know is the one we live in; we interpret the past in terms of the present; the future is mercifully dark. Man may eventually experience the breakdown of civilization; but if the Dark Ages come again, they must come in their own way and in their own time. Mr. Lewisohn would of course admit this. But he would add that man should be prepared, by knowing his God again, to meet them with courage, wisdom, and a high heart. It may be so. Meanwhile, ■ ■ member of that race which has produced both jesters and rabbis said: "If I don't feel it, I don't feel it." Revelation comes or it is denied. More perplexing still, the revealed truth of today may be the apocrypha of tomorrow. And finally, if one more distorted proverb is not too many, you may lead a man to the bread of life but you cannot make him eat.

DOROTHY VAN DOREN

Claude Kitchin Vindicated

CLAUDE KITCHIN AND THE WILSON WAR POLICIES. By Alex Mathews Arnett. Little, Brown and Company. $3.

PROFESSOR ARNETT has excellently portrayed Claude Kitchin of North Carolina, one of the bravest and most sterling figures of the days leading up to America's entry into the World War. Indeed, Professor Arnett does not exaggerate when he terms him "one of the ablest statesmen of his time and one of the most honorable and courageous of all time." No man in our whole history was more severely tried as by fire. He went down to defeat and premature death with serenity and courage despite the bitter injustice of the attacks upon him. Because he, unlike hundreds of others in the House of Representatives, remained true to his beliefs and refused to yield to the arrogant demands of President Wilson and the warmakers, he was lynched by almost all the newspapers of the United States with a barbarity, ■ mendacity, a deliberate falsification unsurpassed in the records of our press. No incident of the last quarter-century of our journalism would make an honest editor or writer hang his head lower unless it were Hearst's contribution to putting us into the war with Spain.

Not only did the newspapers indulge in incredible vilification of Mr. Kitchin—the New York Herald (deservedly deceased thereafter) printed an "interview" with him every word of which was invented, and editors all over the country based editorials on it, while the Herald refused to print one word of retraction or correction—but they made a determined effort to lie and howl down every man in public life who dared to be true to his conscience if it told him to oppose our entry into the war. If it were in my power I should make this book required reading in every school of journalism in the

Which Camera Should You Buy

Can you get as good pictures with a $10 camera ■ you can with ■ $50 one?

Should you buy a miniature camera ■ ■ large one?

Which is better—the Contax ■ the Leica?

The first of two reports on cameras, appearing in the current issue of Consumers Union Reports will help you to answer such questions as these. Non-miniature cameras, including both American and foreign makes, are covered in this report. The second report, which will appear next month, will cover miniature cameras.

As in reports on other products, comparisons of the quality and value of outstanding makes (including Kodak, Agfa, Leica, Contax, Graflex, and other cameras) will be given and the Best Buys of each type and in each price range indicated by name. Read these reports before deciding which camera to buy. They will give you the guidance of experts in the selection of ■ camera. They can save you money and help you get better pictures.

House Dresses ■ Radio Tubes ■ Flashlights ■ Sanitary Napkins

Other reports in this issue give you the results of tests made ■ competing brands of house dresses, radio tubes, flashlights, sanitary napkins, shoe whiteners, and canned peaches and canned tomatoes—with ratings, in terms of brand names, ■ "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Coming in Next Month's Issue—Ratings of the 1937 refrigerators.

A $3 Investment Which Can Save You $50 to $300

Membership in Consumers Union, which brings you twelve issues of Consumers Union Reports and ■ 240-page Buying Guide, costs but $3 a year ($1 for the abridged edition covering only the less expensive types of products). Information from many of Consumers Union's 40,000 members indicates that the regular use of these Reports and the Buying Guide can save the average family sums ranging from $50 ■ year to $300 and over.

Membership can be started with any of the following issues: SEPT.—Shoes, Tires, Whiskies; OCT.—Dentifrices, Gins, Electric Razors; NOV.—Radios, Wines, Children's Shoes; DEC.—Vacuum Cleaners, Fountain Pens, Blankets; JAN.-FEB.—Men's Suits, Cold Remedies, Shaving Creams; MAR.—Autos, Face Powders, Flour; APR.—Shirts, Cold Creams, Gardening; MAY—Trailers, Washing Machines, and the first of a series of articles on the causes and treatment of constipation. Mail the Coupon Today!

WITH YOUR MEMBERSHIP

A 240-PAGE

BUYING GUIDE

containing ratings of over ■ thousand products, by brand name, as "Best Buys," "Also Acceptable," and "Not Acceptable." Get this Buying Guide by mailing coupon NOW!

To CONSUMERS UNION OF UNITED STATES, Inc.

55 Vandam Street, New York, N. Y.

I hereby apply for membership in Consumers Union. I enclose:

- ☐ $3 for one year's membership, $2.50 of which is for ■ year's subscription to the complete edition of Consumers Union Reports;
☐ $1 for one year's membership, 50c of which is for a year's subscription to the limited edition of Consumers Union Reports. (Note: Reports on higher-priced products are not in this edition.)

I agree to keep confidential all material sent to me which is so designated.

Signature

Address

City and State.....Occupation.....N-6

United States and in every college class in American history. No book we have had since Walter Millis's "Road to War" has brought out more clearly how a country may be misled into a war with which it has no concern. Moreover, it is a valuable addition to the historical record of the United States in the World War. If Mr. Kitchin's family had placed on his tombstone the line "Killed by the American press for being true to America," it would but have told the truth. Of course, if he had not been hounded into his grave at fifty-four ("He was as much a casualty of the war," wrote his home-town daily, "as any soldier killed on the battlefields of France"), he would have lived to see the most complete justification of the stand he took and would today be one of the most highly respected and beloved of American political leaders. He would have had the satisfaction of reading that 70 per cent of a poll taken by the Institute of Public Opinion upheld in 1937 his view in 1917 that our entering the World War was a dreadful, an utter mistake. More than that, he, like Bryan, would have seen the measures he urged in 1915-17 in a storm of calumny, written on the statute books in our new neutrality law—forbidding Americans to travel on belligerent ships save at their own risk, laying an embargo on munitions, and the like.

Professor Arnett has set all this forth not brilliantly or as dramatically as might have been done, but earnestly, painstakingly and with every desire to be just to all sides. He has also brought out admirably the other phases of Claude Kitchin's public activities—his genuine financial statesmanship, his mastery of taxation, his devotion to the cause of low tariffs, his efforts to prevent profiteering,—all the things which won him the respect and admiration of all who came into close contact with him. Professor Arnett is much more kindly to Woodrow Wilson than this reviewer could have been. I have found only one serious error and that is his statement that the Lusitania "was carrying great quantities of highly explosive munitions in her hold." This is altogether wrong. Dudley Field Malone's report as Collector of Customs shows that she carried only small-arms ammunition which might or might not have been set off by the explosion of the torpedo. Two matters of great historical value have been brought into the light by Professor Arnett, the first a letter from John Bassett Moore reviewing, after nearly twenty years, the armed-ship controversy. At the time he "could not help wondering whether there was any limit to our credulity and subserviency to England." Now he still feels that "by the position actually taken, the United States was committed, while professing to be neutral, to maintain a belligerent position."

The other matter on which Professor Arnett sheds important light is the famous "sunrise conference" at the White House between Wilson and Congressmen Champ Clark, Harry Flood, and Kitchin in April, 1916, at which the President announced his determination to go to war against Germany at once. The time of the conference has always been in dispute as well as what happened. But to the testimony of the late Gilson Gardner and others Professor Arnett has now added a letter of Kitchin's to C. H. Claudy of Washington which leaves us no doubt that the conference took place in April, 1916, and that the President "seemed anxious to go to war with Germany immediately." Mr. Wilson cooled off when told that all three men—the Democratic leaders of the House—would fight any such proposal on the floor of the House, and pretended neutrality for another year, when the hue and cry made it possible for him to dragoon what was at heart an unwilling Congress into voting for the war.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Our Nietzsche

THE PHILOSOPHY OF NIETZSCHE. THUS SPAKE ZARATHUSTRA, BEYOND GOOD AND EVIL, THE GENEALOGY OF MORALS, ECCE HOMO, THE BIRTH OF TRAGEDY. The Modern Library. $1.10.

HUNTINGTON WRIGHT tells us in his introduction to this Modern Library "giant" of Nietzsche that no other philosopher since Kant has left "so undeniable an imprint on modern thought." But there are several considerations which militate against the acceptance of this statement. One is that it is hard to think of any truly original discovery of Nietzsche's which has had deep-reaching influence. A second refers to the enormous amount of nonsense one has to wade through before one can come upon any valid insights. A third reason why we must disagree with Mr. Wright lies in Nietzsche's utterly false conception of the role thought plays in directing the course of history. Having his roots in the subsoil of German idealism, he believed that poets were the creators of value. Later he assigned this role to the philosophers, and to himself in particular. But Nietzsche neglected to tell us by what practical means his great transvaluation was to be brought about. Today we know that neither poet nor philosopher creates values. What they respectively do is to express and clarify them. In one sense both activities involve creation. But unless the values so expressed or clarified refer to existing communal, not private, needs, they remain inert.

This does not mean that Nietzsche is an unimportant figure in modern thought. He was a very subtle "literary psychologist." And he still remains a prerequisite for full moral maturity. For if he does nothing else, he washes one clean of soggy, pietistic reverence. But Nietzsche fulfils more important functions. There was in him, wrapped up in a great deal of sheer sadism, a very powerful and sincere drive toward excellence. He craved tension, and self-fulfilment through difficult effort. He hated the laziness and the philistine good-fellowship which, hiding frequently behind the pretense of liberal democracy, permits vulgar and mediocre men, by pandering to the worst demands of the crowd, to gain positions of influence. Is this irrelevant to our contemporary world? Not at all, for at least a part of the appeal of Hitler and Mussolini is that they offer what their followers, not knowing anything better, take to be an opportunity for heroic self-fulfilment, the need for which our liberal democratic leaders do not seem even to suspect.

These points, and others for which there is no space, need emphasizing today, particularly since Nietzsche has been adopted by the Nazi barbarians. It is one of the ironies of our world that men for whom Nietzsche would have felt a profound disgust should claim him for their own. Nietzsche might have fallen for their sword rattling and at times even for the wholesale murder to which they are addicted. He was probably deprived of tin soldiers as a child, and in spite of his own unhappy military experience as a young man, retained throughout his life an essentially immature conception of the value of war. But he would not have had any use for the totalitarian state. The type of discipline, the order of rank of which he dreamed in his best moments were for free men, not slaves. Further, though he was himself to no small degree an actor, Nietzsche had a deep revulsion for political histrionics, and Hitler's and Mussolini's operatic posing and vulgar logorrhea would have turned his stomach. Lastly, we all know what a deep contempt he often expressed for the anti-Semites. He was a good European. And he would not have tolerated the parochialism of the barbarians. But be that as it may, there is much in him which we can use and they can never claim for themselves.

ELISEO VIVAS

Saving Democracy

POLITICAL AND ECONOMIC DEMOCRACY. Edited by Max Ascoli and Fritz Lehmann. With a Foreword by Alvin Johnson. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THIS volume, in which many of the fundamental issues confronting contemporary democracy are reconsidered, grew out of discussions held by the Graduate Faculty of the New School for Social Research in 1935-36. While each member has made his individual contribution to the book, the editors wish to have the whole work looked upon as a "collective effort to understand the problems of democracy by a group of men who have experienced at personal cost what the eclipse of democracy means." It is a unique document in that it merges the special scholarship of men and women in different fields in a united endeavor to evaluate anew the potential future of democracy.

The first half of the volume is concerned with the economic difficulties which modern industrialism has created. Such subjects as economic planning (Gerhart Colm), trade unionism (Alfred Kähler), labor arbitration (Frieda Wunderlich), and cooperative associations (Karl Brandt and Horace M. Kallen) receive special attention. It is the firm conviction of the authors that democracy is compatible with and capable of dealing with the tasks which contemporary economic life presents. But in order to do so democracy has to be developed and expanded. In these days when the "crisis of democracy" is on everyone's lips, it is refreshing to see stress laid upon the fact that we should be concerned with building democracy rather than merely with maintaining it. Too many people at the present time are altogether too ready to look upon democracy as an achieved ideal which requires no more than preservation.

It is clear that this group of thinkers is not willing to admit that the conflicts of economic interest in contemporary society are so deep that nothing short of a regime of violence, a dictatorship in behalf and in the name of somebody or something, will do. They attempt to show, each in his own sphere, that important changes might be effected within the governmental pattern of a democratic society which would go a long way toward dissolving the present conflicts. There are, of course, significant differences of opinion. Some of the writers are more inclined to place confidence in general efforts, others in specific regulatory devices. In the field of economic planning Colm argues that comprehensive planning is incompatible with the maintenance of democratic life, because of the impossibility of persuading the property-owners to accept expropriation "lying down." But more limited and specific efforts, amounting to what Colm calls planned intervention, are conceivable. "Planned intervention, if it is to work with, not against, modern technical conditions, must proceed from mere restrictive measures to positive actions for establishing economic equilibrium." In looking upon such positive actions as "interventions" the author shows his liberal bias. Intervening with what? The "natural" functioning of economic life? The price mechanism? Social justice is a more real goal than economic equilibrium.

When THE LITERARY DIGEST
says that

JOHN L. LEWIS

"considers Morris Ernst's The Ultimate Power is one of his reading 'musts'," it reflects the feeling of liberal readers and thinkers everywhere.

THE ULTIMATE POWER

by Morris L. Ernst

at all booksellers $3.00
DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

*To honor the Americans who have died . . .
To help the Americans who live . . .*

In Spain's Front Line Trenches

MASS RALLY

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 23—8 p.m.

Auspices: Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Battalion

HEAR

ROBERT MINOR (Now en route from Spain)

JAMES W. FORD (Recently in the trenches)

SAMUEL STEMBER (Commander Lincoln Battalion, just returned from five months on Jarama Front)

Guest Speaker: WILLIAM FLAHERTY—Father of
3 fighters in Battalion

Chairman: PHIL BARD, formerly with the Lincoln Battalion

This Meeting Will Be Broadcast in Spain

THE HIPPODROME—43rd St. & 6th Ave.

General Admission 25c

Contribute NOW to the $25,000 Independence Day Shipment to Spain

FRIENDS OF THE ABRAHAM LINCOLN BATTALION
125 West 45th St., N. Y. C.

I enclose $—— as my contribution to the Friends of the Abraham Lincoln Battalion.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

VISIT
STUDY ENJOYMEXICOTHE
WORKERS UNIVERSITY
OF MEXICOSUMMER SCHOOL SESSION
July 5 to August 14

COURSES IN ENGLISH AND SPANISH

STUDENTS MAY LIVE IN PRIVATE HOMES

TERMS:

6	} WEEKS	$25	} TUITION
4		$18
2		$10

Information cheerfully given by

WORKERS UNIVERSITY OF MEXICO

ROSALES 26

MEXICO CITY

or by Mexican Consuls and Mexican Railway Representatives
throughout the United States

Write for Free Illustrated Catalog

JOSE MIGUEL BEJARANO

United States Representative

156 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

A New National Party in1938 or 1940?WILL 1938 OR 1940
SEE THE FORMA-TION OF A NEW LIBERAL POLITI-CAL PARTY ON A NATIONAL SCALE?

THE PROGRESSIVE, weekly newspaper successor of the old LA FOLLETTE'S MAGAZINE, believes there is sufficient interest in the third party movement RIGHT NOW to seek the advice of its readers on the subject and is conducting a contest for the purpose of choosing a desirable name for a new party.

GOV. PHILIP F. LA FOLLETTE of Wisconsin, on the third anniversary of the birthday of the Progressive party of Wisconsin on May 19 declared:

"The Progressive party has just begun to fight. It looks forward to a national existence and to a national realignment. The time is close at hand for the formation of a new political alignment in the nation which will defeat the reactionary forces of America just as the Progressive party has defeated the reactionary forces in Wisconsin."

READ ABOUT THE NEW PARTY MOVEMENT
IN THE PROGRESSIVE. A SPECIAL 10 WEEKS
FOR 20 CENTS OFFER FOR NEW TRIAL
SUBSCRIPTIONS IS BEING MADE NOW.

SEND ■ CENTS TODAY TO
THE PROGRESSIVE, DEPT. N, MADISON, WIS.

While the economic sections of this book abound with specific suggestions for change and adaptation, the political chapters are more interpretative in nature. Parliamentarism (Simons), parties (Ascoli), bureaucracy (Brecht), law (Ascoli), leadership (Saloman), public opinion (Lederer), nationalism (Mayer), and foreign policy (Simons) are analyzed in turn, the essential positions being stated and developed. One wonders whether these tools of modern democracy are really destined to remain as stationary as these essays would lead one to believe. They are certainly striking illustrations of how much more difficult it is to invent in the irrational realm of politics than in the rational sphere of economics. The observer's detachment is complete in Hans Speier's able essay on social stratification. "In a democracy of universal suffrage the ease with which social plights are presented as political issues makes for a relatively high degree of political instability. But this instability can be reduced by democratic consensus, that is, by mutual respect for political rights." This thought leaves the reader to whatever hope in the natural goodness of man he can marshal. Yet it is probably true enough.

In a concluding essay on the substance of American democracy Alvin Johnson does not gather up the several threads of the preceding analysis but rather furnishes the foundation for hope which is so urgently needed as a complement to the scholarly detachment of science. In moving sentences he recalls the irrational bases of the American democratic spirit, the jury system providing civic experience and education in the meaning of law and justice, the town meeting, and the broader movements of Jeffersonian, Jacksonian, and Lincolnian democracy. It was not and is not, he rightly insists, a matter of definitions and clear-cut arguments but a complex of impulses more or less trained and of experience more or less substantial deep in the heart of the individual democrat. Perhaps he does less than justice to genuine democracy in Europe; for was it not Rousseau who spoke of the real constitution of the state, which is not graven on tablets of marble or brass, but on the hearts of the citizens? And is not democracy as felt and real a thing, and indeed more ancient, in Rousseau's homeland, Switzerland? Democracy and the democratic spirit are more universal, and the American heritage is not unique. But it is mighty, and one is grateful to Alvin Johnson for pointing out to those who would despair of the future how readily a social institution adapts itself to new conditions once it has incorporated itself in the tissue of life.

"The anti-democratic forces are powerful, but they were powerful in the days of Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln." To clear the way for such creative adaptation of a living tradition is a noble task for the scholar and scientist. "The forces must grow out of the people itself . . . [but] it is the mission of scholarship to hold fast to the underlying substance [of democracy] through all the process of change and to discover the new forms . . . that men of good-will shall not fall into despair over losses that are only such in seeming, or waste themselves in clinging to obsolete forms from which the substance of democratic life has migrated."

CARL JOACHIM FRIEDRICH

CORRECTION

The price of "Social Security," by Maxwell S. Stewart, published by W. N. Norton and Company, is $3, not $3.50 as stated in The Nation of June 5.

RECORDS

WE know music only as it is performed; our idea of Tchaikovsky, in particular, is the one we have from performances which have converted his drama into melodrama, his intensity into hysteria; and this overstatement is now the standard by which mere statement is found inadequate. Noses, I hear, are being turned up at Ormandy's performance of the "Pathetic" Symphony with the Philadelphia Orchestra on Victor (five records, $10); it is being found inadequate compared with Koussevitzky's old Victor performance. But the difference between statement and overstatement may be heard in what the two conductors do with the middle section of the second movement (2¼ inches from the first groove on Ormandy's fifth side, 2 inches on Koussevitzky's)—in the effect of the slow tempo that Koussevitzky adopts at this point without any direction from Tchaikovsky. And a similar difference in effect, produced in the same way, is to be heard in a passage in the first movement (⅔ inch on Ormandy's third side, 1/16 earlier on Koussevitzky's), of which Koussevitzky hammers out the conclusion at a pace twice as slow as Tchaikovsky's Allegro vivo. As a matter of fact, there is tremendous excitement in the music as Ormandy plays it—the right kind of excitement, created by the nervous alertness and tautness of the performance instead of the usual frenzy, like the flash of lightning as compared with the rumble of thunder. Contributing to this effect are the refinement in splendor, the elasticity and lightness in manipulation of even the greatest sonority, which are new in my experience of Ormandy's work. Add one of the finest of recording jobs; and you get a set worthy of the superb pages in this work.

There are the same brilliance and nervous excitement in Strauss's "Don Juan" as played by the London Philharmonic under Fritz Busch (Victor: two records, $3); the recording is excellent but a little noisy and harsh with a steel needle. The performances of the Adolf Busch Chamber Players in Bach's Suites Nos. 3 and 4 (Victor: five records, $7.50) are again a source of amazement and delight (Busch's solo performance in the famous Air of No. 3 excepted); they are excellently recorded; and two movements of the neglected No. 4 are finds: the fugue in the Overture, and the Bourrée. Kreisler's String Quartet, played by Kreisler, Petrie, Primrose, and Kennedy (Victor: four records, $8), is the idiom of the little salon pieces in extended form—in other words, tripe.

On Victor single records Marian Anderson's beautiful voice and musicianship continue to be devoted to minor matters: two Finnish folksongs, "Summer Night" and "The Little Shepherdess," and Sibelius's setting of "Come Away, Death" ($1.50); the recording of Caruso's singing of "O Paradiso" and the Flower aria from "Carmen" is a little noisy, but the voice is recognizable and marvelous ($2); McCormack's style in Händel's lovely "Where'er You Walk" makes up for a dryness of voice that becomes unpleasant in Händel's "Caro Amore" on the reverse side ($2); Miliza Korjus's remarkable soprano is heard to advantage in Martha's aria from "The Czar's Bride," and in the Hymn to the Sun from "The Golden Cockerel," which suffers from an atrocious orchestral accompaniment in Hungarian cafe style ($1.50); and Margherita Perras exhibits an accurate but unattractive voice and no style to speak of in two arias from "The Abduction from the Seraglio" ($1.50).

B. H. HAGGIN

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation

SEEING

RUSSIA with EXPERTS

General Survey Tour. Leader: Robert Magidoff, literary worker in Moscow since 1935. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks

$399

A Travel "Collective." Leader: Dr. Joshua Kunitz, journalist, now living in Moscow. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks

$543

Theatre Festival Tour. Leader: Will Geer of New Theatre League. Five weeks in Russia, including Theatre Festival. Sailing July 28. Eight weeks

$595

Europe and Russia (auspices American Student Union). France, Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Russia, Finland, Sweden, Denmark, England. Sailing July 3. Eight weeks

$499

All Steamship Passage Third Class.

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor
8 West 40th Street New York
Cooperating with Intourist

3rd Annual

TAMIMENT LABOR CONFERENCE

CAMP TAMIMENT, PENNSYLVANIA

New York Office: 7 East 15th St., ALgonquin 4-3441

Subject: "Labor's Demands on Industry and Gov't"

Speakers:

Gov. George H. Earle
Hon. Thomas Kennedy
Hon. Edw. F. McGrady
Louis Waldman
Judge Ferdinand Pecora

Senator Jos. C. O'Mahoney
Prof. William Z. Ripley
Mrs. Anna M. Rosenberg
Mayor Jasper McLevy
John T. Flynn, others

June 24 to 27—$4 a day—deluxe extra

Send Reservations with $2 Conference Fee to New York Office

TWIN PINES

A Camp for Adults

New main house featuring individual screened sun porches and semi-private adjoining baths; comfortable bungalows. Sand beach bathing, boating, fishing, tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, etc.

8-Day Weekend—July 4th, $13.50 up

TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE

S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

Going Away?

To assure regular delivery of The Nation, subscribers are requested to give us three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new. Report your change of address to the Circulation Department, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

BURLINGAME

PUBLIC LIBRARY

Letters to the Editors

The American Writers' Congress

Dear Sirs: Some weeks ago I received an invitation to the Second American Writers' Congress, held in New York, June 4-6. I read the statement of the aims of the congress: to mobilize American writers against fascism and to enable left-wing writers to discuss their common problems. These seemed to me wholly admirable objectives, and I sent in a dollar and became a delegate. Your readers might be interested in my experiences.

I am ardently opposed to fascism, and I assume that all the other participants in the congress, whose anti-fascist directive was stated quite clearly, shared my opposition. The logical question before the congress, it would therefore seem, was not, Is fascism to be fought? but rather, How is fascism to be fought? As is well known, the Communist Party has one answer—the popular front in defense of democracy. But the Socialist Party has another—the class struggle against capitalism. The existence of this deep divergence of opinion among radicals expresses itself in every field. To writers it poses questions as to the freedom with which the critic who is sympathetic to the building of socialism should comment on Soviet art and letters, the relationship of the writer to political parties, the attitude of writers who accept the people's front in politics toward revolutionary literature—must they shift their allegiance to liberal-democratic literature?—and the reason why left-wing literature today has not come to more impressive fruition.

My politically sophisticated friends warned me that the congress was merely a maneuver of the Communist Party, and that I was naive to expect any such discussions—since discussion implies the possibility of disagreement. But the call to the congress made no mention of adherence to the Communist Party political line as a prerequisite for participation. Indeed, it stated: "We are not advancing these ideas as fixed theories that have to be accepted on pain of intellectual excommunication. On the contrary, we believe that they should be discussed among writers as freely and widely as possible." No such discussion took place. The congress assumed an a priori agreement on Stalinist policies," despite the failure of the call to mention any such thing and despite the fact that the signers of the call were practically all non-Communist liberals.

The congress was one long "pep talk," reminiscent of the rallies I used to attend at Phillips Exeter Academy on the eve of the annual football game with Andover. In this case, Andover was replaced by fascism. A great many intensely earnest people told us over and over that we must lick fascism, but as to the strategy—that was entirely up to Quarterback Stalin. Anyone who criticized his tactics was a Trotskyite wrecker and assassin (read: "lacking in school spirit").

At the opening session a well-known littérateur named Browder launched a venomous attack on Trotskyism and its "liberal stooges." I suppose I am one of the latter since, while not entirely convinced of the correctness of Trotsky's line, I am critical of Stalinism. Mr. Browder was prolific in epithets for such as me—"innocents . . . seekers after truth . . . gentle souls . . . sentimentalists and muddle-heads." This gratuitous political attack on a minority of the delegates to the congress threw a queer light on the nature of its "united front." The victims had no spokesman that evening, or in the rest of the meetings. A Republican, a Farmer-Laborite, and a Communist were invited to address the opening session. But no Socialist appeared on the speakers' platform, then or later.

The remaining two days of the congress were devoted to sessions limited to delegates. Innocuous, non-controversial papers were read. A refined lady in a jaunty hat gave a history of Italian literature in the best ladies' club manner; Malcolm Cowley presented a "Time Marches . . . On!" sort of summary of recent literary events, Albert Rhys Williams told us that billions of books are published in the U. S. S. R.; Henry Hart was of the opinion that publishers are out to make money and have little real feeling for literature; and almost every one warned us in convincing detail that fascism is inimical to culture. After every paper, a discussion period. But, alas, there was little discussion. This seems to have disturbed some of the more innocent sponsors of the congress.

As the congress dragged on, its superbly simple strategy became increasingly clear. At Friday's mass-meeting, when no rebuttal was possible, Browder attacked the critics of Stalinism. During the next two days' sessions, when discussion was possible, the speakers confined themselves to purely factual talks or to statements of truths so obvious as to permit no dissent.

What is one to think of a "united front" congress of anti-fascist writers which includes Thornton Wilder, Ernest Hemingway, Carl Van Doren, and Marc Connelly and excludes Edmund Wilson, Louis Hacker, Lewis Corey, Sidney Hook, Benjamin Stolberg, and James T. Farrell? (Mr. Farrell seems to have been invited, but for some reason didn't think it worth attending.) Indeed, what is there to say except that for such a writers' congress the "united front" is, as these names indicate, indefinitely extensible on the right but on the left is strictly limited to the Communist Party?

It is not necessary to dwell on the hypocrisy of a congress which pretends to be creating a united front of anti-fascist writers while actually excluding and even slandering a considerable group of eminent anti-fascist writers. This exclusion has nothing to do with fascism, communism, or democracy. It is simply that these writers, with whom I am proud to ally myself, are critical of the present bureaucratic regime which is distorting socialism in the U. S. S. R., and critical of the policies of its American branch. Again and again, in public and in private conversation with the leading spirits of the congress, it was made quite clear to me that radicals with my heretical views about Stalinism were not welcome. One of them cut short my criticisms with, "Well, if you don't like it, stay away." I submit that this is not an intelligent way to build up a united front of American writers against fascism.

DWIGHT MACDONALD

New York, June 8

P.S. The Congress wound up by electing as president for next year the well-known left-wing writer, Donald Ogden Stewart.

[Next week we expect to print a letter from a correspondent who also took part in the American Writers' Congress but whose reactions to it were more favorable.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

RESORTS

ROUND LAKE LODGE

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf, and other sports

OPENING JULY FIRST

By Reservation Only Limited to 30 Guests

Special Opening Rate
of $15 for 3-day Fourth of July weekend

P. O. BOX 297 TELEPHONE:
MONROE, N. Y. MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be sent at your request

The Vacation Buy of the Year

COPAKE The Island Paradise on Beautiful Lake Copake, Craryville, N. Y.

Nationally selected as the Ideal Camp. The only camp with all lake front. Modern Bungalows with every convenience and private showers. Magnificent 18-hole championship golf course. 12 fast tennis courts. Hand ball. Saddle horses. Aquatics. Unsurpassed food and entertainment.

N. Y. Off.: 116 Nassau St. BE. 3-5590

$100 WORTH OF VACATION ENJOYMENT FOR $30

THE PEOPLE, YES!

THEY CHOOSE THEIR OWN
TYPE OF VACATION AT

COOKS FALLS LODGE

Handball, Tennis, Rowing Free
Private Swimming Pool
Entertainment, etc. Make reservations

COOKS FALLS LODGE
COOKS FALLS NEW YORK

New York Office:
250 WEST 57th STREET
Telephone: COLUMBUS 5-3690; Room 1307

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE

Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing.
Pleasant Valley 2741 RATE $17 in June

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks, One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL

11 West End Ave. SHEEPSHEAD 3-3000
37 Minutes from Times Square
Live at this modern fireproof hotel away from noise.
SINGLES $8 WEEKLY UP

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.

"Send for Booklet"

A charming, unpretentious modern adult camp and 165-acre New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- 4 Ping-Pong Tables
- Unexcelled Cuisine
- Dancing to a Fine Orchestra

JULY RATE $24.50 PER WEEK
$4.00 per day

Phone: President 3-8649

The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit
CAMP MILFORD

Opens June 18th

A modern adult camp on beautiful lake . . . in heart of Connecticut Hills. All outdoor sports; splendid entertainment: 8-Piece Orchestra. Delicious meals.

July 4th Week End:
3 Days $16.50—Daily $6
July and August $29.50
weekly rate.
Week-End Rate $5 Per Day
Railroad fare $1.65 one way
Write for booklet
11 West 42nd St.
PENN. 6-7842

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women
ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine
New Low Rates: $25.00-$27.50-$30.00

Write for Booklet
Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEBORO NEW HAMPSHIRE

Lake Candlewood Orchards

60 miles from New York, near Danbury, Conn.
A BIT OF MAINE COUNTRY BROUGHT CLOSE TO NEW YORK

A Quaint Pre-Revolutionary Farm. Completely renovated. Splendid Accommodations. Jewish-American cooking.

ALL SPORTS ON PREMISES

Write for reservations to Lake Candlewood Orchards Sonya Snowe
Brookfield Conn. Manager

SEA GATE'S finest house, waterfront, quietest location, extra large rooms, most with private bath, excellent cuisine. Spacious grounds. Rates reasonable. Weekend parties accommodated when possible. For reservations please communicate ATLANTIC LODGE, 4909 Beach 49th St., ESplanade 2-9847.

VERA YANPOLSKY'S REST HOUSE: Stelton, N. J. Individual diets served—solarium sun baths—outdoor showers—Lake bathing—nurse masseuse—teacher for children on premises. Children $12, Adults $16 (June rates $14).

FEW GUESTS, Berkshire Foothills, 200 acres. Excellent meals: Restful, Quiet; Modern Conveniences; Fishing, Swimming; $20 Week, $3.50 Day. Mrs. Gardner, Ancramdale, Columbia County, N. Y.

RESORTS

COLORFUL
CONGENIAL
COMFORTABLE

Ideal for Honeymooners

Special Rates

Up to JUNE 30th

$25 weekly

ECHO LAKE TAVERN

Warrensburg, N. Y.

City Phone: VANDERBILT 3-9875

IN HEART OF ADIRONDACKS Honeymooners Paradise

MOON HILL Lodge

LOW JUNE RATES
All Activities this month
Hotel Accommodations
Country Club Activities
Enjoy Golf, Tennis, Biding, Boating, Bathing, Unsurpassed Cuisine (Dietary Laws) Write for Booklet N. Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir., Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y. N. Y.: 45 W. 42nd St. Medallion 2-1111

ON SCHROON LAKE

OPENING JUNE 19TH
LAKE CHODIKEE LODGE

HIGHLAND, N. Y.

Exceptional facilities for athletics and all sports under direction of competent staff. Private lake. Fine food. Hampshire Players Group; also M. E. Krieger, lecturer.

Rates $27.50 to $32.50. Special Low June Rates

Write for Booklet

1202 Kings Highway, Brooklyn ESplanade 5-4130

LOU KASS—LOU ROTHBLATT, Directors

SWIM, FISH, PLAY

or rest in the salt air and sunshine of romantic Gloucester. Camp Annisquam—where young people keep young. Send for booklet.

A. RESNICK, Dir., Gloucester, Mass.

REITER HOUSE

LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y.

Telephone: Mahopac 414 Elev. 1,000 Ft. In the mountains . . . yet only 50 miles from New York City. Dietary laws strictly observed. All outdoor sports.

RATES $22 UP

City Information: LACKAWANNA 4-5997

VINEYARD LODGE

Ulster Park, N. Y.

"Garden spot of Ulster County"

Where peace and tranquility reign supreme. Modern hotel midst beautiful orchard, vineyards and woodland. All sports, solariums, swimming, social activities. Rates $16 up. J. Rosenthal, Kingston 3430.

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1 1/4 hrs. from New York. $3 per day. $18 per week. Station, Derby. P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

KUTAY'S RIVERSIDE CAMP—CAPACITY 30. JEWISH AMERICAN MEALS. SPECIAL JUNE RATE $16.00. BUSHKILL, PA.

TRAVEL

Vacation Tours

To Mexico, California; also Europe, Palestine & Russia. Space still available on July 3rd sailing of Dr. Cohen's Group and other sailings.

Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 UNION SQ., N. Y., ALGON. 4-1500

CHILDREN'S CAMP

PIONEER YOUTH CAMP

Rifton, N. Y.

In the Catskills

■ BOYS AND GIRLS SIX TO SIXTEEN ■

Fourteenth consecutive of progressive camping. Happy, healthy activities in cooperative community of seven separate groups. Exceptional staff. Creative use of environment rich in historical background.

Arts
DramaticsMusic
CraftsSports
Swimming

Non-profit-making non-sectarian

Rate for 9-week $175

Shorter vacations be arranged

Special rates on application members of all unions

Inquire at

PIONEER YOUTH OF AMERICA, INC.

219 W. 29th St., New York, N. Y.

Po. 6-3055

RECORDS

100,000

European Recordings

Announcing an extraordinary of 100,000 Parlophone,

Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous records comprise the of the world's finest music. A selection to gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c 75c per record. Values $1.50 $2.00. orders. Catalog.

GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc., 18 E. 48th St., New York

LANGUAGES

Language Phone Sets

Bought, sold, rented, exchanged. Language Service, 507-5th Ave. MUR. 2-4221.

SUMMER RENTALS

Attractive bungalow, Stoneybrook Colony, Westport, Conn. All conveniences, swimming, tennis, handball, summer school for children. Berman, Topping 2-5017.

SUMMER COTTAGE FOR RENT: Five rooms, electricity, water, brook, 300-acre farm, 115 miles from city. $150. To rent to family with children. ST. 9-0992 or MILVY, West Shokan, N. Y.

Cozy houses, concrete pool, acres of space, lawns, shade, fruit, woods, tennis, plumbing, reasonable, hour commuting. P. J. Kohler, Box 185, Congers, N. Y. Tel. Congers 261R.

Berkshire Hills—Charming bungalow; also 8-room house or rooms with housekeeping, completely furnished, all improvements. Wienstein, Canaan, N. Y., or Riverside 9-2932, evenings.

Lake Winnepesaukee, 5-room cottage with surrounding porch on small individual island, mountain view. Outboard motor boat, canoe. Privacy and solitude. July 3-August 18, $135. Prof. Feise, Echo Island, Wolfboro, N. H.

Charmingly furnished cottage, all improvements, moderately priced. Easy access to city. All sports in Free Acres. For information: Topping 2-1204.

Mohegan Lake. Furnished housekeeping rooms in secluded, quiet, artistic res. beside stream on 300 wooded estate; city conveniences. For 6 adults only. Season $100 each. Dr. West Farms, Mill Street.

FOR SALE

HUNTINGTON, L. I., Farm-estate, acres (more available), old remodeled farmhouse; every convenience; 6 bedrooms and 2 baths, screened porches; wonderful shade trees; pine-wood lot, evergreen nursery; farm equipment, asparagus bed, apple orchard; schools, clubs, beaches nearby; bargain at $20,000. See it and make an offer. Box 923, c/o The Nation.

Woodstock, N. Y. Beautiful hillside lot, nearly 4 acres, magnificent views, large evergreens; quiet, refined section, about 7 miles from Woodstock center; double garage convertible 4-room cottage; gravity spring water, electricity; 330 ft. frontage, good road; ideal for writer, artist, summer or year round; $1500; very easy terms. Owner, Box 47, Station F, New York.

American Isolation

Dear Sirs: In the issue of May 1 Oswald Garrison Villard, speaking about neutrality for the United States, strongly advocates keeping your country out of any future war. Who would not wish to keep his country out of war? The real problem is how it can be done.

Fascism is a challenge not to democracy but to the failures and weaknesses of present-day democracy. One of these failures is the indifference and unwillingness of the United States to cooperate in solving the problems of Europe and of the world. The German and Italian peoples, not to speak of others, have certain grievances. The powers which are satisfied and have the greatest slices of the world's good things are unwilling to share these with the "have-nots," just as the super-wealthy are probably unwilling to share their riches with the under-dog. This kind of thing breeds intense nationalism, and intense nationalism breeds wars. The democratic powers, including America, should get together and find out what these grievances are before it is too late.

AUGUSTUS VINCENT

Geneva, Switzerland, May 28

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $5; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address well the new are required for change of address.

SITUATIONS WANTED

College graduate, young lady, honor student, history, economics major, taking masters; 3 yrs. office exp., typist; varied intellectual interests; moderate salary, interesting position, future; anything. Box 924, c/o The Nation.

Very young man, dancer, needs part time work while continuing study modern, ballet; efficient, references. Box No. 925, c/o The Nation.

Young Man, 26, Experienced Research Secretary, Literary Assistant, Stenotypist, Typist, Chauffeur's License. Any Position. M. Korsun, 337 E. 18th St., N. Y. C.

HELP WANTED

Russian or Russian Jewish cultured person capable of meeting and tactfully dealing perspective clients wanted. Box No. 927, c/o The Nation.

CAMPING—BOYS

Co-educational progressive camp has vacancy for boy of 13-15; partial scholarship may be arranged. Box 930, c/o The Nation.

Summer Camp, private family; can accommodate 4 high school boys. Golf, tennis, swimming, home supervision. Reasonable. Box No. 931, c/o The Nation.

CONTRIBUTORS

THOMAS L. STOKES is Washington correspondent of the New York World-Telegram.

NORMAN THOMAS, leader of the left wing of the Socialist Party and three times Presidential candidate, has recently returned from Spain, where he interviewed Loyalist leaders.

HAROLD J. LASKI, professor of political science at the London School of Economics, has just emerged from a heated political controversy in England which resulted in the dissolution of the Socialist League of which he was a founder. He will retain his membership in the Labor Party as a leader of its left wing.

LELAND STOWE, for nine years Paris correspondent of the New York Herald Tribune, is now on its editorial staff in New York.

JAMES SMITH is the pseudonym of a securities analyst.

JULIAN S. BACH, Jr., is a young American who has been studying in England and Europe. He has begun a journalistic career with some articles on a trip through the Balkans.

DONALD LESLIE describes himself as a Scot, a resident of Alberta for thirty years, and "verra respektit."

WANTED

Wanted—to sub-lease for summer, 1-1½ room apt. Must be reasonable. State full particulars. Box No. 928, c/o The Nation.

Couple to share lake bungalow. Golf, Tennis. Adult camp activities. Box No. 932, c/o The Nation.

Young lady wishes to join radical group to Mexico during summer by boat or train. Box No. 926, c/o The Nation.

Young man, good mixer, social director for modern country hotel accommodating 80. Salary and commission. Box No. 929, c/o The Nation.

SUBLET

Comfortably furnished 2 attractive rooms and complete kitchen—suitable for 3; refrigeration. July and August, $65 per month. J. Gray, 123 E. 34 St., WLC. 2-6727.

3 rooms completely furnished. Modern elevator building. West 12 St. July 1 to Labor Day. WAt. 9-4119.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62 cents a line

Minimum three lines

THE Nation

VOLUME 144

NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JUNE 26, 1937

NUMBER 26

CONTENTS

THE SHAPE OF THINGS

717

EDITORIALS:

THE FALL OF LEON BLUM

719

ROBINSON ON RELIEF

720

THE UPPER BRACKETEERS

721

GARNER TURNS ON F. D. R. by Thomas L. Stokes

722

BEHIND THE FRENCH CRISIS

by Alexander Werth

723

C. I. O.: FAR WESTERN FRONT

by Richard L. Neuberger

725

JAPAN'S DILEMMA by Eliot Janeway

726

A LETTER F. D. R. OUGHT TO WRITE

by Oswald Garrison Villard

729

SOME SLEEPING BEAUTIES by Heywood Broun

730

BOOKS AND THE ARTS:

THE SUPERIOR VIRTUE OF THE OPPRESSED

by Bertrand Russell

731

TORRENTS OF SPRING by Philip Rahv

733

"THERE IS A WORLD DIMENSIONAL"

by Eda Lou Walton

733

EDUCATION OF A MAVERICK

by Oswald Garrison Villard

734

CAFE PHILOSOPHY by Arthur Livingston

735

SWEET BEULAH LAND by Stanley Young

736

KING INTO OFFICE BOY by Lindsay Rogers

737

MODERN GOVERNMENT by Jane Perry Clark

739

Editors

FREDA KIRCHWEY JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MAX LERNER

Associate Editors

MARGARET MARSHALL MAXWELL S. STEWART

Editorial Associates

HEYWOOD BROUN ALVIN JOHNSON

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Publisher

FREDA KIRCHWEY

Hugo Van Arx, Business Manager. Walter F. Grueninger,
Circulation Manager. Muriel C. Gray, Advertising Manager.

Copyright, 1937, by The Nation, Inc.

The Shape of Things

✱

MEDIATION, MARTIAL LAW, AND DIRECT Presidential intervention have made their appearance in the steel strike since we last went to press. The first session of the board of mediators appointed by Secretary Perkins proved fruitless when Tom Girdler and Frank Purnell emerged from a seven-hour conference still refusing to consider a signed contract. Fortunately their plan to reopen Youngstown plants was scotched when Governor Davey imposed martial law to preserve the "status quo." Without question his action prevented a bloody riot, and President Roosevelt was wise in extending moral support by his request to the companies that they refrain from opening their plants. Governor Davey followed the example of Governor Earle of Pennsylvania, who had already declared martial law in Johnstown in order to prevent open warfare between "outraged" citizens and strikers from both steel mills and coal mines who are also outraged. Governor Davey's orders included the disarming of all persons not peace officers. This order would apply to both vigilantes and those union members who feel constrained to get out the family rabbit gun. So far, so good. But the state and federal governments should also enforce the systematic disarmament of the steel companies, whose caches of machine-guns and tear gas are a genuine menace to public peace.

✱

THERE MUST ALSO BE GRAVE CONSIDERATION of what happens when fully armed police go berserk and use as moving targets women in their Sunday best and children with holiday ribbons in their hair. The description of the suppressed Paramount news film tallies all too well with the eyewitness account by Meyer Levin which we printed two weeks ago. The sadists dressed up as policemen whom that film reveals must go to jail; the film itself must be released to the general public. Tom Girdler and his cronies boast of "public support." We should be glad to let the American public decide whether Tom Girdler's precious "principle" which keeps him from signing a contract is worth the ten lives that were sacrificed in Chicago on Memorial Day.

✱

A FEW DAYS AGO THE SHIFTING CROSS currents of European politics found a focus in the announced visit of Von Neurath to England. A new crusade was under way to accomplish an old purpose—

PUBLIC LIBRARY

the alignment of Britain with Germany and the alienation of France from the Soviet Union. And a new method was obviously about to be employed: ingratiating was to be substituted for threat and bluff. The pre-Hitler polish of Von Neurath was to replace the Nazi-agent methods of Von Ribbentrop. The moment was opportune. Internal difficulties in France, the Soviet executions, and the obviously conciliatory temper of the new British government were three excellent cards in Hitler's hand. Now, as we go to press, the methods are suddenly reversed. The visit of Von Neurath has been canceled. "The situation created by repeated red Spanish attacks on German warships" requires his presence in Berlin. And to Von Ribbentrop is intrusted the job of bringing about "immediate, forceful action" by the chief non-intervention powers—Russia being omitted. The velvet glove is thus peeled off before it has suffered any wear; and a new international crisis is prepared in Berlin.

★

WHAT EVENTS BROUGHT ABOUT THIS change? Chief among them, undoubtedly, is the alleged torpedoing by Loyalist submarines of the German cruiser Leipzig—the "attacks" referred to in the statement above. The Valencia government has denied the charge in most vigorous terms, denouncing it as a "vile maneuver"; but whether it is true or not may prove of small moment. The Germans obviously intend to assert the incident and then blow it up into a full-fledged crisis. The German press, an exact gauge of official purpose, announced the attack in huge spread heads calling for immediate reprisals; Hitler rushed back to Berlin from a rest on the Rhine; the Von Neurath visit was canceled; and the demand for action was made. Undoubtedly the more radical Nazi elements, Hitler included, have been chafing for action ever since the Deutschland incident; the barbarous reprisal on Almeria was considered inadequate vengeance. If the submarine attack really occurred, it would probably be sufficient to outweigh all caution and moderation. If the attack is an official invention, it may serve to hide other reasons for aggression even less fit for publication. The final fall of Bilbao and the probable consolidation of Franco's hold on the rich region around it may well have inclined the Germans to a renewed interest and a more aggressive policy in Spain. In either case, an incident and a quick appeal to the non-intervention powers is expected to serve Hitler's purposes better than the more conciliatory methods represented by Von Neurath. Whether the tactic will succeed depends ultimately on Britain. The first reaction of the Foreign Office is annoyance. It is one thing to plan gentlemanly deals with the gentlemanly Von Neurath but quite another to find the arrangements canceled without warning and then be expected to help snatch Hitler's chestnuts out of the raging fires of Spain.

★

WITH THE FALL OF BILBAO THE SPANISH picture takes on sharper contours. Italy is openly claiming credit for the rebel victory, and is hailing it as the Italian triumph that wipes out the disgrace of the Guadalajara rout. The forces that finally battered down Bilbao's defenses were the forces of Germany and Italy—the hundreds of Heinkel and Junker bombing and pursuit planes that rained down death on the Basque soldiers and civilians and valiantly shot down the refugees streaming out of the city; the German artillery that shelled the city continually; the Italian infantry, conscripted for a war not theirs. Such was Franco's "triumph." He owes it, however, not alone to the ruthlessness of his fascist allies, but also to the so-called Non-Intervention Committee, which faithfully patrolled the coasts to keep out all aid for the Basques while it allowed hundreds of German planes and tens of thousands of Italian troops to stream in and bolster Franco's last desperate bid for power. Nothing in recent history can equal the travesty of international justice which the Non-Intervention Committee presents, or the sheer gall and brazen assurance with which the fascist dictators have alternately browbeaten and hoodwinked Anthony Eden. The Loyalists are by no means beaten. They have the man power, the resources, and the morale with which to win; they have built up an excellent army, and they have the mass of the population behind them. The real danger is continued foreign intervention, carried on under the cloak of the Non-Intervention Committee.

★

THE PAST RECORDS OF GERMAN DIPLOMATS make interesting reading; and they are instructive, too, as a gauge of Nazi methods and intentions abroad. A new German consul general, Baron Manfred von Killinger, has been appointed at San Francisco; he arrived in New York secretly last week nine days before he was expected, eluded the ship reporters, and is now safely ensconced in his new post. The Baron was a U-boat commander in the World War and later became a member of the reactionary Erhardt Marine Brigade and Erhardt's right-hand man. He was prominent in the equally notorious "Organization Consul," known as O. C., a secret league of former officers organized in protest against Germany's surrender at Versailles. It was members of this league who assassinated Matthias Erzberger in 1921 in revenge for his conciliatory attitude in the armistice and peace negotiations. Von Killinger was tried with a group of others for complicity in that fateful murder; but in spite of revelations of reactionary plots and terrorist activities in his organization he was acquitted for lack of evidence of the particular crimes charged against him. His path led logically into the National Socialist camp and he soon became leader of a Nazi outfit in Saxony, the Wiking Bund. Since the advent of Hitler, the Baron has followed a consistent course. As Nazi Commissar for Saxony he urged the formation of kidnapping bands working across the Czechoslovak border to wipe out, as the press put it, "Marxist, democratic, and Jewish plague spots in Bohemia." During Hitler's blood purge in 1934 von Killinger, then Premier of Saxony, landed in a concentration camp. Hitler released him, but in March, 1935, he discharged him from his office "with thanks for his services" during a phase of disaffection with the aristocrats. Hitler's gift to San Francisco is more than a mere Nazi agent and putschist, however. He is also an author. Among his contributions to world literature are two volumes with the engaging titles "The S. A. in Word and Picture" and "Serious and Cheerful Incidents in Putsch Life." The appointment of this man bears out the analysis of Nazi intentions in the United States made by E. B. Ashton in his article on Ambassador von Dieckhoff in The Nation for June 5.

*

WE QUOTE HEREWITH AN EXCERPT FROM the extremely interesting report of the Committee on Jurisprudence and Law Reform of the American Bar Association, a report unanimously adopted by the association at its annual meeting.

It seems to your committee that the most important subject for inquiry in this connection is the composition of the Supreme Court of the United States. The great extension of federal legislation to many subjects with which formerly it did not deal and the many questions of difficulty arising out of the war have thrown a heavy burden upon that court. This burden could be relieved in one of two ways:

1. The right of appeal to the Supreme Court could be materially limited.

2. Provision could be made for increasing the number of the justices of the court to eleven, besides the Chief Justice. Six justices as now would constitute a quorum (Judicial Code, p. 215). The concurrence of five should be necessary to render a decision.

The latter method would enable the court to be in session almost continuously, and thus to dispose of a much greater amount of business without impairing uniformity of decision. . . .

All of which is respectfully submitted.

EVERETT P. WHEELER, CHAIRMAN, HENRY W. TAFT,
THOMAS J. O'DONNELL, H. B. F. MACFARLAND,
J. F. LOUGHBOROUGH, ROBERT P. SCHICK, RANDOLPH
BARTON, JR., TORE TEIGEN, WILLIAM HUNTER,
JOHN R. HARDIN

This report was made and adopted in 1921. It may therefore seem a bit dated to some of our readers; but we are sure it will seem fresh to that school of thought which holds that what was bad enough for John Marshall is too good for us.

*

NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN BY LOSING A BATTLE has won a campaign. His abandonment on June 1 of his National Defense Contribution (NDC) which had the unique fate of being bitterly opposed both by the moneyed interests in the City and by the Laborites, was one of the most gracefully executed retreats in British parliamentary history. The new NDC that now rises from the ashes of the old bears a stern visage for the British capitalists. Instead of being a tax on recent excess profits, aimed chiefly at the war industries, it is a 5 per cent tax for the next five years on all business profits over £2,000 a year. Added to the existing income tax of 25 per cent, it will mean virtually a 30 per cent tax rate—the steepest in British public finance since the last year of the World War. This is "Tory socialism" with a vengeance. But the British financial groups can scarcely complain. First, because in offering extreme unction to the earlier proposal they announced their readiness to bear "a simpler tax with a larger yield"—and Mr. Chamberlain has taken them at their word. Second, because Mr. Chamberlain's government is their government, his purposes their purposes, and the military force he is building up will be used to protect their interests and power. There is method in the fortitude with which the British ruling class bears its tax burden.

The Fall of Léon Blum

THE fall of the Blum government has rescued Blum himself from an intolerable position. What its effects will be, however, for the Popular Front, the fortunes of French labor, and the international situation far transcends M. Blum's own fate.

The logic of Blum's strategy in accepting defeat without a harder fight is not far to seek. He is surrendering power, at least temporarily, with the same adroitness with which he has carried it for over a year. Even the Senate obstructionists had evidently not expected the Cabinet's decision to dissolve. Blum's intent is clearly to place the onus for the fall of his Cabinet on the Senate reactionaries, stand by while a new government seeks to guide French destinies without trade-union support, and when it has floundered beyond its depth, to come back with increased prestige. It is a perilous strategy, but Blum's success during his year in power would have been impossible without such audacity.

Last March M. Blum asked his colleagues in the Popular Front for a breathing spell for the nation. He has instead granted the breathing spell to himself. He found himself in a real impasse. He had survived the successive crises of the sitdown strikes, the Spanish war, the deflation of the franc, the Clichy massacre. He had passed valuable hours-and-wages legislation, helped the workers get collective-bargaining agreements. He had nationalized the munitions industries, relaxed the grip of finance capital upon the Bank of France, and almost succeeded in getting a new press law. He had purchased these reforms by a rigorous discipline over labor, an ineffective Spanish policy, and a tax program that bore heavily on the cost of living. Above all, he had incurred the deep hatred of France's "200 families" and the 314 old men in the Senate. The economic conflicts that lay behind this program and finally combined to force Blum's fall are described on another page of this issue in an article written before the crisis by Alexander Werth.

It was the steady campaign of the capitalists which led to the flow of capital out of France and depleted the country's once plentiful gold reserve. A treasury deficit of nine billion francs was in prospect for the current fiscal year, and even the indirect taxes to which Blum had finally consented would not have met the deficit. Blum had been placed in the position of having to shun on the one hand the orthodox capitalist remedy of removing restrictions on capital and thus attracting back the migrant capital. He had on the other hand been unable to force through a drastic Socialist program of commandeering capital by nationalizing the banks and controlling the processes of capital accumulation. He was compelled to steer a middle course which satisfied neither group. After finally getting the assent of the Communists and trade unions last week, he found the Senate obstruction too great; and without forcing the issue to a vote of confidence, he chose to dump the baby into the lap of the Radical Socialists. He met failure at the very point where every labor government must face its sharpest crisis—on the financial front, where at least the tolerant cooperation of the capitalists is needed unless the government is ready to take revolutionary action.

In a parallel way the new government is bound to meet its sharpest crisis on the labor front, when it seeks to cope with the problem of wages, prices, and labor organization, and when it needs the tolerant cooperation of the trade unions. At present writing the new government has not yet been formed, but the indications are that it will be Radical Socialist, with the aid of the center parties. Blum will probably do his best to keep labor in line and avoid demonstrations and strikes. But to maintain labor discipline within a Popular Front government is one thing; to maintain it while labor's enemies are in power is quite a different thing. Jouhaux, the head of the C. G. T., is on record as having said, "If the government is overthrown, the trade unions will not accept the verdict." The temper of the workers may be judged by the smashing defeat of the fascist Jacques Doriot in the parliamentary by-election the day before Blum fell. They are unlikely to stand by passively while the gains they have won with so much difficulty are being destroyed. Thus if the new government departs too drastically from Blum's policy, there may be serious trouble. If it stays close to Blum's policy, the Popular Front will get some of the fruits of power without the responsibilities of office. The dilemma is a serious one, and neither Chautemps nor anyone else attempting to form a government is to be envied.

Robinson on Relief

TODAY the millions on relief are doubly the disinherited. The rising productivity of labor and the increasing population will tend to keep constant the present total of 7,000,000 unemployed. But in the blazing light of recovery this mass of permanent unemployment has come to be regarded as merely a minor obstruction to a view of permanent prosperity. Hopkins, with his persistent and intelligent forecasts of the unemployment problem, has become Cassandra to an Administration pledged to raise the standard of living. President Roosevelt's glowing fireside talks about a better life for the "submerged third" are matched in Congress by an inadequate demand for $1,500,000,000 for relief; and even this modest request had been subjected to fierce attack in the Senate, while those enlightened individuals like Maury Maverick who would approach the relief and unemployment problem in terms suitable to its magnitude are voices crying in the wilderness.

The consideration of the relief bill happened to coincide with the stampede of the Solid Southern Senators off the Roosevelt reservation; and Senator Robinson, for once, was able to give full play to his genuine attitude toward relief, an attitude which is enlightening in connection with his aspirations to the Supreme Court. The most vicious as well as the most shortsighted line of opposition is the horse-and-buggy drive to reduce relief to a subsistence dole and push the whole problem back into the holes of local relief, where it is hoped it will be hidden from the national view and cease to be a drain on the federal purse. This was the motive of both Senators Byrnes and Robinson in advocating that local governmental entities be required to pay at least 25 per cent of the cost of all new WPA projects. "A time of prosperity," said Senator Robinson blandly, "is the time to put our house in order." And to his school order means cutting down relief arbitrarily when at least 7,000,000 persons are still unemployed, putting those on relief on the unproductive dole instead of setting them at wealth-creating work, and in general slashing purchasing power and preparing for a future disaster to the national credit that will make the present budget, deficit and all, look like the picture of health. Fortunately the Administration forces in the Senate, led by Barkley of Kentucky, were able to defeat both the Byrnes and Robinson amendments.

As it stands, the relief bill means drastic cuts. Harry Hopkins, when he testified before the Senate appropriations subcommittee, stated that $1,500,000,000 would cover relief needs on the assumption that the rolls were reduced by business recovery from 2,200,000 to 1,640,000 people during the next fiscal year. But with curious logic the people are to be dropped before the business recovery takes place; according to figures given out by Senator La Follette, 427,359 will be dropped by July 15—and no one pretends that they have other jobs to go to.

What these cuts will mean in terms of food and shelter in a period of rising prices can be imagined. They will also mean a definite cultural setback in so far as they curtail the arts projects which have been one of the most distinguished as well as one of the least expensive contributions of the New Deal. These projects have the right to survive. The least of their virtues is that they have enabled artists, writers, musicians, and actors to make a self-respecting living at their own trade. In the three years of their existence they have enriched the life of the American community to a degree not to be measured in dollars and cents. They have also made valuable contributions to the several arts. It was irony enough that these activities began only because the country was passing through its severest depression. It would be an even greater irony if this genuine cultural advance were to be slowed up because prosperity has come back.

The Upper Bracketeers

HENRY MORGENTHAU, Roswell Magill, Elmer Irey, Herman Oliphant, and their associates in the Treasury are now engaged in an anatomy lesson before the joint Congressional committee on taxation. They are revealing in their testimony the complete structure of tax evasion. They are offering a surgical dissection of the capitalist mind at its moment of greatest tension—the moment when taxes have to be paid.

David Lawrence has charged the President with demagoguery and a desire to foment class hatred in his campaign against the big tax evaders. Much of the resentment against the President in the upper tax brackets proceeds from a belief that he has become "a traitor to his class." For how could treason be more crucially displayed than by violating one of the sacred unspoken (except by Mr. Morgan) rules of the capitalists—that where the government is concerned, it is cricket to get away with what you can? Whether Mr. Roosevelt is that sort of traitor we leave for a court of honor of his own class to determine. But as for the charge of political shenanigans, we see nothing in it. The simple fact is that receipts from income taxes have fallen far short of the Treasury estimates made in the January budget. This is not the fault of the estimates: anyone who knows the Treasury mind knows that above all else it fears to be caught in an over-optimistic estimate. It is rather the fault of the last campaign. The campaign struggles generated among the upper bracketeers a hatred of the national government unparalleled since the Southerners' hatred for Lincoln. What more natural than that a Big Enterpriser, frustrated by Roosevelt's sweep, should have sought revenge by an uncommonly avid collaboration with his equally resentful tax lawyer?

Mr. Roosevelt and Secretary Morgenthau in their statements cover much the same ground. They list the eight most popular devices for tax dodgers: the foreign personal holding corporation (the "Bahama corporation"), the domestic ditto, the Bahama insurance company, the incorporated yacht or country estate, the fake write-off of interests and losses, the multiple trust for relatives, the intra-family partnership, and the pension trust. For tax lawyers and government experts these are a twice-told tale. But for the common man the list will furnish a revealing insight into the way his betters utilize the law to enjoy the fruits and avoid the responsibilities of government expenditures. In Mr. Roosevelt's phrase, here is "civilization at a discount."

No one has yet disputed the facts of the indictment. Its truth is underlined by the haste with which many of the millionaires under scrutiny, caught red-handed, are offering to pay up the taxes they sought to dodge, plus interest charges, in order to escape the publicity which the Congressional committee insures them. Three questions of enduring interest, however, remain.

One has to do with the distinction currently made between tax evasion and tax avoidance. Evasion, it would seem, is the use of the devices enumerated above with fraudulent intent. Avoidance, we are told, is merely a hard-headed Yankee insistence upon paying the government as little as is legally possible. To our mind the debate over this distinction is an empty one. From a legal view, as Justice Holmes pointed out, the only question is whether you have kept on the safe side of the law or been caught on the unsafe side—and that depends on who the judges are that ultimately make the decision. From an ethical standpoint, there would seem to be little to choose between fraud and guile in the upper brackets. A cynic might say that fraud is when you are caught and guile is when you are not. Our own statement would be that there are clear cases of fraud and clear cases where the taxpayer has stayed within the spirit of the law; but that the Treasury's concern is with the cases where the tax dodger has deliberately used the letter of the law to make a mockery of its spirit.

The second question is more serious. Secretary Morgenthau referred, in his statement to the committee, to the unequal contest that the Treasury was waging, pitting the 2,800 field agents of the Internal Revenue Bureau against 45,000 tax attorneys and accountants. What is involved here is not only the tried ingenuity of the American tax lawyer in getting around the law. More tragic for democratic government in a business economy is the fact that even if the Treasury succeeds in plugging the law's loopholes it is necessarily waging a losing fight. Suppose that the joint committee recommends funds for hiring more revenue agents: the Treasury will find that it is only turning out more experts than the upper bracketeers will be able to use in the tax dodging of the future. For the Treasury is a sort of training school in tax manipulation. As soon as a young official learns the ropes under the government, he is caught up by business men who can afford to pay him handsomely for his knowledge.

The final question concerns the place which the campaign for tightening up on tax collection will have in the total tax program of the Roosevelt Administration. It is significant that the Administration has had "tax trouble" ever since it came in. In 1933 there was the Pecora investigation of the Morgan income-tax payments, which showed an intimate tie-up between the Morgan firm and many high Administration officials who were on the Morgan "free list." In the spring of 1935 there was the Mellon tax case. In the summer of 1935 the surtax rates on incomes in excess of a million were stepped up, after stormy Senate hearings, but the Administration inheritance-tax proposal was defeated. In 1936 there was the turmoil over the corporate-surplus tax. In 1937 we have already had the government tax prosecutions of du Pont and Raskob. And now the campaign against the army of tax dodgers. Many will interpret this record as proof that the Administration is out to soak the rich. To us it is rather the record of a government that is trying, as no previous government has tried, to distribute the incidence of taxation with some concern for the capacity to bear it. But we find also that it is acting in the face of immense odds, stubbornly and bitterly opposed at every turn, and without the benefit of a clearly articulated philosophy of taxation.

Garner Turns on F. D. R.

BY THOMAS L. STOKES

Washington, June 20

YOU can get all sorts of reasons around here why Vice-President John Nance Garner, just when things were getting hot in Congress for his "boss," as he calls the man in the White House, bundled himself and his wife into their long official limousine and started across country to that far-distant border metropolis known as Uvalde.

It is one of those mysteries that Washington loves. It is the sort that Mr. Garner himself loves. People say, among other things, that the Vice-President left in a huff, that he was thoroughly displeased with the course into which President Roosevelt was steering the New Deal—though this course, aside from the Supreme Court plan, had been charted publicly long ago. This is all true as to the Garner temper and mind. To those who have watched "Jack" Garner operate, under cover and openly, for many years, the logical explanation is that the Vice-President knew when he left—even though he had announced such a visit weeks ago—that stories immediately would appear that he was sore about the way the President was running the government. The stories were written. Futile was his own belated denial that anything was wrong between him and the President. He had done the trick, one of the neatest seen about here in a long time.

He selected the proper psychological moment. Feeling was bitter over the Roosevelt court-reform plan. Senators and House members were getting weary of going around in a circle—as they were being forced to do because the President held back his legislative program behind the court bill. When he began to feed them his program, starting with the involved and complicated—for the Congressional mind—wages-and-hours bill, they saw mountains of worry piled up before them for months ahead. Suddenly they forgot the overwhelming mandate of last November, became fatigued of well-doing, and were ready for the siren voices of those who would adjourn Congress and let them go home, on the old excuse that they would come back next year "refreshed" for further reforms.

Jack Garner's departure crystallized a lot of ill feeling which he, in his furtive way, had helped to nurture from the anonymity of the Vice-Presidency. The long smoldering revolt broke into the open. Others were encouraged to grumble. The inevitable warfare between old-school conservatism in the Democratic Party, largely lodged in the South, and the New Deal was exhibited to the public gaze.

Things began to happen which of themselves served to throw light on past events. The Vice-President's automobile had not been long gone from the pavements of Washington before his "front man" and agent in the Senate, "Jimmy" Byrnes of South Carolina, opened his fight against the Roosevelt relief program with the proposal to make the states and localities pay 40 per cent of the cost of work-relief projects. This coincided with other adverse developments for the Administration. The Judiciary Committee majority, including seven Democrats, came forward with their report damning the Roosevelt court-reform bill in language skilfully embroidered by the master-hand of Senator Borah of Idaho. The President resented the strong personal rebuke. His friends passed the word to the committee minority to issue a report defending him. But none heeded. Senator Ashurst of Arizona, committee chairman and supposed champion of the measure—though actually nothing of the kind—finally broke a mysterious silence to telephone reporters and ask facetiously: "Whatever became of the President's court-reorganization bill?" Its death was being plotted deep in the night in a series of quiet and intimate little dinners sponsored by the wealthy Democratic Senator Gerry of Rhode Island, to which were invited conservative anti-court-reform Democrats and also Republicans—even including John D. M. Hamilton, now virtually useless as far as the Republican Party is concerned.

Again there were reports that the court plan was to be shelved. The seriousness of the Congressional dilemma became manifest when the President at a press conference struck right and left, and sought to appeal to the public over the head of Congress with a restatement of his objectives for the common masses. The next day the White House announced that great jamboree—or "love feast" as it was cynically called—on Jefferson Island, where the President in three days of good fellowship could meet and talk with all Democrats in Congress who were willing to go to the retreat in Chesapeake Bay.

Then, alas, faithful Joe Robinson, who had earned the title "good soldier" by staunchly supporting measures which, in the bottom of his rough conservative heart, he did not approve, deserted the ship and joined Byrnes in the plan to have localities pay part of the relief bill—25 per cent Joe suggested. Jimmy acquiesced in the reduction. Jack must have chuckled to himself in far-distant Texas.

The Garner cabal was bearing its fruits. That such a cabal long has existed is no secret in Washington. Its headquarters are off the Senate lobby, where of an afternoon the Vice-President and his cronies gather to swap yarns, pointed up with sly legislative suggestions. Jimmy Byrnes is most often there.

Its first open skirmish came earlier this session when Jimmy suddenly rose during consideration of the Guffey coal bill and offered an amendment condemning sitdown strikes. This was intended to embarrass the labor allies of the President. The Vice-President was behind it. Basic in the open rift now developing is the Administration's friendship for labor. The reason can be found in the "Congressional Directory" biographies of Southern leaders, which show that most of them were born and reared and now live in small towns where the issue is seldom allowed to appear. It's the old conflict between the bourbon Democracy of the agrarian South and the mass democracy of the big industrial cities North and East. That they have worked side by side under the New Deal thus far is a miracle. The test of strength is fast approaching. It may come on the question of whether Congress remains here to enact the Roosevelt program this session.

As he ponders his legislative problems President Roosevelt often must think of the cost of the block of votes which Jack Garner threw into his pot at Chicago in 1932 to clinch his nomination.

Behind the French Crisis

BY ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris, June 9

THE Deutschland incident was a serious blow to the equanimity of Paris, where it was thought that everything would be nice and quiet for at least a few months—both internally and externally. The Exhibition opened two weeks ago, and even those who had treated it as "a national humiliation" realized that, in spite of delays and countless difficulties, there was an exhibition after all, and even a very fine one; that there was already enough for visitors to see to fill up two or three days; and that in two or three weeks' time everything would be practically finished. In the last weeks crowds of foreign tourists have been coming to Paris; many of the hotels are completely booked till October; and it began to look as though the great illusion of European peace and prosperity and of that international solidarity which, as we are told every day, the great Paris Exhibition symbolizes could be successfully maintained for five or six months. Spain, no doubt, was a nuisance, the petit bourgeois thought to himself, but, after all, Spain was stewing in its own juice, and nobody seemed to be either winning or losing, and it was said that Germany and Italy were becoming tired of the whole show and that with luck it might fizzle out somehow without bringing on any new complications. There was also a widespread conviction that Germany and Italy were in great economic difficulties, that they could not fight a war, that they were frightened of British rearmament—the greatest new peace factor in Europe—and that, in short, 1937 might pass without any major explosion. The next few weeks will show whether this relative optimism was justified, and whether the new developments in Spain will not destroy it.

The Blum government has now been in office for a year. I need not describe all that it has done in the way of social reforms; as everybody knows, it did more during its first eight months in office than any other French government before it. Its principal reforms were collective contracts, holidays with pay, the forty-hour week—reforms which were accompanied by a tremendous growth of the French trade-union movement—the Office du Blé, the reform of the Bank of France, the nationalization of war industries, and compulsory arbitration. There has been a large increase in wages; there has been devaluation, and also a great rise in prices and costs of production. This increase in prices and costs is the weak spot in the armor of Blum's New Deal; it continues to have an adverse effect on France's export trade and on her public finances, and may ultimately precipitate another big financial crisis. This may in any case be difficult to avoid if, as seems probable, France is obliged to borrow in 1938 another 35 or 40 billion francs. After five years of intensive borrowing, her borrowing capacity is naturally much weaker than that of England and the United States. And yet borrow she must if she is to keep her armaments at a safety level.

In a speech the other day Blum admitted that it was "almost paradoxical" for France, already overburdened with military expenditure, to enter upon a vast program of social and labor reform. Yet that is what has been happening in France in the last year. Already in February it became clear that the two could not continue at the pace that had been set if the currency was not to be wrecked; and since military expenditure could not be cut, some of the social expenditure, particularly public works, had to go overboard. Hence the "pause." The problem could have been solved by autarchist or semi-autarchist methods—to which several trade-union leaders, who placed great store on public works, were distinctly favorable—but it would have meant the end of the policy of economic and financial "liberalism" embodied in the Three-Power Declaration of September 25, and it would have shaken France's financial and political relations with the United States, and especially with England. And England gave Blum a serious warning against solving his difficulties by resorting to exchange control.

The decisions taken on March 6, with their concessions to the banks—including a curtailment of the public deficit by 6 billion francs, from 32 to 26 billions—in return for which they agreed to make the 10½-billion defense loan a success, were the most important episode since devaluation in the evolution of Blum's "New Deal." The "financial liberalism" dear to the heart of London was saved, and Blum imagined that even if his concessions to orthodox finance were a retreat they were not a surrender; and he claimed that the "pause" was not in contradiction with the program of the Front Populaire.

He was horrified to find that the working class was taking his retreat with very bad grace. The hostile reaction of the more extreme elements of the working class was symbolized in the Clichy riots, which broke out ten days after Blum's "surrender," on the very day of the startling success of his National Defense loan. For two months the relations between the government and the working class remained very strained; and toward the end of April the C. G. T. leaders, startled by the violent temper of their rank and file and afraid of losing their grip on them, broke almost into open rebellion against the government. Léon Jouhaux made a number of angry speeches in which he summoned the government to provide 10 billion francs for public works and declared that in the revolution which was in progress in France the working class was not yet playing the important part in the management of the affairs of the state to which it felt entitled. It seemed as if the C. G. T., with its five million members, was claiming the role of a super-government which could dictate its will to the democratic government of the republic. People in Blum's immediate entourage felt very bitter about it, and complained that the Blum government had done more for the working class than any other government had done—"and now look at the way they treat it."

Blum rejected the more extravagant demands made by the C. G. T.—particularly the 10-billion-franc loan, which he said was financially out of the question; and it seems that the C. G. T. leaders realized that they had gone too far in their pressure on the government. The Radicals were becoming restless, and M. Campinchi, their leader, angrily declared that if France abolished the "sacred rights" of capital, it did not mean that she would put up with the "sacred rights" of labor; and that the claim made by certain trade unionists that the C. G. T. be given a labor-market monopoly was intolerable in a free country. "The idea that only a person holding a C. G. T. membership card may get a job is fascism of the worst sort," he said. Jouhaux hastened to reply that the C. G. T. had never really asked for such a monopoly, but that it was necessary to control the enlistment and dismissal of labor in view of the grossly unfair and illegal discrimination against union labor of which only too many employers were guilty. This was true in a sense; and Blum promised to set up an impartial organism which would control enlistments and dismissals, in order to check abuses coming from both sides.

The C. G. T., surprised by so sharp a rebuff not only from the government but also from the Radicals and the greater part of French opinion, lowered its pitch, and since then Jouhaux, together with Blum, has been preaching moderation to the rank and file. On May 28 he said that the working class, in gaining new rights, must also be aware of its greater responsibilities toward the state.

It looks as though the danger of major labor disputes had been averted for some time. Although the cost of living has gone up steadily since last year, prices have tended to become stabilized, and thanks to successive wage increases and the various labor reforms, the working class is in the main still better off than it was a year ago. The automatic extension by six months of the collective contracts which expire in the near future—an extension for which a bill has been tabled at the Chamber—should also help to ward off trouble during the "Exhibition truce." What is more, the working class cannot deny that in spite of the "pause" the application of the Front Populaire reforms already passed is progressing: thus the application of the forty-hour week has been extended to almost every trade, and the nationalization of the war industries has been extended in the last month to the Schneider and Hotchkiss works, two of the most important armament firms in France.

Even so, there are a few trades which are thoroughly discontented, and chief among them is the building trade. The building trade is hard hit, and since the men at the Exhibition feared that once it was finished they would be out of work, political agitation, ca'canny, and other difficulties—including some serious outbreaks against the use of non-union labor—were inevitable. The curtailment of the public-works program on March 6—a program which the Exhibition workers thought was to guarantee them new work when the Exhibition was finished—was largely at the root of the trouble, and has tended to turn the Exhibition into the playground for all forms of labor extremism. Only a few days ago the building unions again uttered a threat to occupy the Exhibition if they were not guaranteed reemployment within two months. The Exhibition workers have been assured that everything will be done that is "humanly possible" to find them work, but from their point of view that is not quite sufficient.

This is one of the big problems with which the Blum government is faced. Another, even greater, problem, to which Blum referred on May 28, is the fall in output. "Trade unionism," he said, "must not be the synonym of underproduction and laziness." For a large number of reasons production in France is tending more and more to lag behind consumption; with the result that prices may again increase, and that the adverse trade balance may grow. The Blum government is asking for plenary power in tariff matters. Much will depend on how it will use these powers if it gets them. Will it lower tariffs in some cases to send down home prices? Will it in other cases raise them so as to protect home wages and reduce the adverse trade balance, even at the cost of increasing internal prices? In any case, the problem of output per hour, and of output in general, is the biggest one with which the Blum government is faced at home. Will it solve this problem? The answer to this will also be an answer to the all-important question whether the forty-hour week can in the long run be a success.

C. I. O.: Far Western Front

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Portland, Oregon, June 11

DELEGATES representing 120,000 workers in the fir and cedar and pine forests of the Northwest listened intently. Abe Muir, international vice-president of the Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners, was making the American Federation of Labor's last desperate attempt to prevent the secession of the largest union west of the Mississippi River. William L. (Big Bill) Hutcheson, the carpenters' international president, was 350 miles away in the logging town of Omak; he had not accepted a challenge to come and defend his organization but had sent his lieutenant instead.

Muir's voice nearly broke as he reached his peroration: "I warn you that you are being misled and duped by Communists and Communist sympathizers." The silence of his listeners was shattered. "Show us! Show us!" they shouted. Someone cried, "Prove it!" Harold James Pritchett, wiry thirty-three-year-old president of the Federation of Woodworkers, was on his feet. "Any man is pretty badly off when he gets around to using the red scare and the Communist bogey," he said, "and a labor leader is ten times worse off."

A few minutes later a lopsided vote ordered a referendum among the federation's 120,000 members on the question of affiliating with the Committee for Industrial Organization. Pritchett declared he would stake his position on 75 or 80 per cent of his membership favoring the C. I. O.

The director of the C. I. O., John Brophy, left Portland jubilantly after the woodworkers had decided to hold a referendum. It is virtually taken for granted among the adherents of both the C. I. O. and the A. F. of L. that the loggers and the sawmill and timber workers will follow John L. Lewis. Since the days of the "wobblies" they have headed the progressive and radical labor forces in the Northwest. The Woodworkers' Federation itself was formed last year to place lumber strictly on an industrial-union basis. It includes men who fell firs in the high Cascades and men who carve furniture in workshops and factories.

The secession of the woodworkers will leave the A. F. of L. in the Far West greatly depleted in financial resources and political strength. What cotton is to the South and automobiles are to Michigan, lumber is to Washington, Idaho, Oregon, and northern California. Three years ago Harold Pritchett and his five children were existing on a federal relief allotment of $47 a month in British Columbia. Today he leads more men than any other labor official west of the Mississippi, and by the end of the year he expects the Woodworkers' Federation to have at least 200,000 members. He thinks the woodworkers have a potential membership of more than 1,000,000. In dozens of mills and camps Pritchett has challenged Bill Hutcheson to meet him in open debate and explain why these men should stay in the A. F. of L. Hutcheson never shows up.

The A. F. of L. meanwhile faces another big defection on the Pacific coast. The Maritime Federation of the Pacific in convention here this week unanimously recommended that its 40,000 members vote to join the C. I. O., and a referendum was ordered on the issue. Harry Bridges announced that a rank-and-file vote on the C. I. O. issue would be held immediately among the 22,000 long-shoremen under his leadership. The result of this referendum is practically a foregone conclusion. The 6,800 members of the Sailors' Union of the Pacific already have gone on record in favor of bolting the A. F. of L.

Closely connected with these developments is the report that Bridges will be made C. I. O. director in the Far West. When Brophy was here, it was Bridges who acted as his guide and adviser. This seems to indicate that Lewis is determined to overlook possible red-baiting and other liabilities for the sake of aggressive and militant leadership. Bridges is portrayed in numerous newspapers as an agent provocateur of revolution—and an alien one at that. The attacks upon him were accelerated a few weeks ago after he spoke at the University of Washington and prophesied the ultimate end of the employing class. "The employer and the employees," he said, "have nothing in common." The sharpness of the conflict in the West was symbolized in the reaction to Bridges's speech by the one A. F. of L. leader who may be able to hold the wavering line of craft unionism along the Pacific Coast. Dave Beck, shrewd and pudgy vice-president of the Brotherhood of Teamsters, termed it "plain communism," and then went on to appeal to the business men and industrialists for assistance in combating the C. I. O. Some of the finest individuals in the world, Beck declared, were employers. He also indulged in fulsome praise of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce. "There is nothing but the finest working relationship between us," he asserted. "I want to work with them, and the people I represent want to work with them."

With the exception of Beck, the Western leaders of the A. F. of L. have scarcely put up even perfunctory opposition to the march of important key unions into the C. I. O. Beck, however, has already demonstrated the technique by which he will seek to stop the advance of industrial unionism. He speaks before innumerable groups, such as the American Legion and the Rotary clubs, talks more conservatively than the representatives of the Law and Order League, and the open-shop Seattle Business Chronicle frankly refers to him as an "exploiting capitalist." Back of Beck's verbal barrage is the famous "beef squad" which has made him the boss of Seattle for the past two years. In May the rank and file of the newsboys' union in Seattle revolted and showed alarming C. I. O. tendencies. The brutal beatings which they suffered at the hands of Beck's bruisers were described by Justice James T. Ronald of the Superior Court as "so shameless and disgraceful as to parallel the lawlessness witnessed at times in certain saloons in pioneer days." The warehousemen's division of the longshoremen would have won a department-store strike in Portland this month had Beck and his "beef squad" not ordered the teamsters to walk through the picket line. Rank-and-file teamsters who rebelled at the command were summarily set right on the situation. When teamsters in Oakland refused to march past longshoremen pickets at a warehouse, Beck hurried south and suspended their charter. In both Seattle and Portland teamster-controlled Central Labor Councils threw out the warehouse workers affiliated with the longshoremen. All along the Pacific seaboard Dave Beck has been functioning on the theory that if the C. I. O. is to be stopped in the West, it will be by "beef squads" and suspensions and picket-line penetrations and employer alliances.

The labor struggle in the Far West is a political as well as an economic combat. Under the influence of the C. I. O. the Commonwealth Federations of Washington and Oregon have abandoned the slogan "Productions for Use" in favor of a more moderate economic program, and the emphasis has been shifted to the building of a popular front against fascism. C. I. O. leaders like Bridges and Pritchett want a program which will keep reactionaries out of public office; they frankly admit they would rather take a chance on a mild liberal like Murphy of Michigan than run a Farmer-Labor candidate and risk electing an extreme conservative who would use troops during strikes and labor disputes. In all probability the C. I. O. and A. F. of L. forces will split next year over the gubernatorial candidate in Oregon.

How long the American Federation of Labor can remain an economic and political power in the West without the lumber workers and the maritime unions is a question which will be answered this year. With these groups gone, it will be largely an organization of teamsters, and it will not even be that if Bridges has any success in the daring and hazardous adventure of chartering C. I. O. teamster unions—a project he is said to be contemplating.

Japan's Dilemma

BY ELIOT JANEWAY

I
UNTIL a few months ago it was feared that nothing could stop Japan's military expansion in China, or her economic expansion in the markets of the five continents. But now Japan appears suddenly to have reformed. She has announced her willingness to compromise in China. Perhaps the most concrete sign of her changed attitude is her recent concession in the silver controversy. All last year Japan stubbornly refused to comply with the new Chinese law nationalizing all domestic supplies of silver—this measure in large part enabled China to overcome the financial panic of 1936. But Japan has finally agreed to turn over to the Central Bank of China all of her Chinese silver stocks, which are estimated to amount to 9,000,000 yuan. Moreover, Japan will surrender her silver "on terms similar to those applicable to other foreign banks," an enormous climb-down from customary Japanese demands for privileged treatment from the Chinese government. Japan's retreat is bound to remove an important obstacle to Chinese recovery. Certainly its psychological importance as a blow to Japanese prestige is enormous. Moreover, Japan is actually in need of silver and is importing it steadily. Her compliance with Chinese demands therefore reflects a really changing situation in Asia.

The lull in Japan's offensive against China may be explained by the severe economic crisis which recovery throughout the rest of the world has perversely caused in Japan. Recovery outside has restored raw-material prices to their pre-depression levels, and thereby struck a deadly blow at Japanese prosperity. For the power of Japan's armed forces and the profits of her magnates hinge alike upon her ability to obtain raw materials cheaply. In effect, the rise of raw-material prices has already operated against Japan as a kind of unplanned but international application of sanctions. The sheer expensiveness of the raw materials necessary to her military and economic offensives has punished her more cruelly than the fiasco of formal sanctions did Italy in 1935.

Japan's export victories during the depression years were primarily victories for her cotton, woolen, and rayon textiles. Textile exports have provided her with much of the revenues she has needed to supply her armed forces on the Asiatic mainland and to develop her heavy industries at home. But her textile industry is almost wholly dependent upon imports of raw materials—raw cotton, raw wool, and pulp. The end of the depression in these three commodities has suddenly precipitated a violent textile depression in Japan. In 1926, when raw cotton sold for 17.5 cents a pound, Japanese competition was still a negligible factor in the world textile market. But when cotton sank to its depression low of 5 cents a pound, the manufacturers of New England and Lancashire—who could buy their cotton just as cheaply—were clamoring for relief from "Japanese underselling." Today, with cotton up again to 12 or 14 cents, Japan has all she can do to supply her mills. What the recovery in raw-cotton prices has cost Japanese cotton manufacturers is shown by the following figures: in 1931, 143 square yards of cotton cloth were exported in payment for every 100 pounds of imported raw cotton; in 1933, 200 square yards; and in 1936, 235 square yards.

A recent letter to the Wall Street Journal reflects the straits of the Japanese industry. The author, a partner in a well-known New York brokerage firm, was on his way to the Far East at the time of the West Coast shipping strike. The strike had of course held up the shipment of cotton to Japan. And according to this experienced witness, Japanese mills had been operating on so small a cotton reserve that the strike all but caused a cotton famine there. Now if the Japanese had been in funds earlier in 1936 they would have filled their warehouses with every available bale of American cotton. Many American manufacturers did precisely this in order to protect themselves against the rising price. But the Japanese have been, and still are, compelled to operate on a hand-to-mouth schedule. And now they must pay the prevailing market price for their cotton. In desperation they have been turning to the inferior but less expensive brand of cotton produced in India; cotton imports from India exceeded those from America in 1936. They have also been sinking vast sums in the promotion of ambitious cotton-cultivation schemes in China and Korea. These attempts to become independent of the world cotton market will admittedly take years; the Korean program will be completed in 1952.

Wool has run parallel to cotton. The 1926 average price of wool at Boston was 46 cents a pound. During the depression, when Japanese exports first became a world factor, wool fell to 14 cents. The March, 1937, price was again 44 cents, or 2 cents less than the 1926 average. With raw wool at this price the Japanese woolen industry has run into trouble. The manufacturers estimated their 1937 needs at 1,000,000 bales of raw wool. But the authorities, fearful of the drain upon Japan's limited foreign exchange, granted them a quota of only 800,000 bales; this was subsequently increased to 840,000 bales. The "manufacturers allege," says the London Statist, "that . . . they will now have to curtail their mill operations below those of last year." A decline in production must in turn be followed by a decline in exports. And a decline in exports means a decline in foreign-exchange receipts. But the foreign-exchange situation has already called forth import restrictions. Thus the circle is completed.

Rayon manufacturers have encountered the same problem. Japan must import some 90 per cent of the pulp consumed by her rayon mills. In 1932, when the Japanese rayon offensive was still getting under way, only 102,000 metric tons of pulp were imported. In 1936, when the industry had reached maturity, it imported 331,000 metric tons. But its 1932 pulp bill was only 15.3 million yen, while its 1936 bill came to 67.1 millions. Pulp imports had roughly trebled in volume; their cost had more than quadrupled.

To complete Japan's misfortune, the only raw material which has failed to participate in the general recovery movement is silk—formerly Japan's chief export staple. The 1926 average price was $6.19 a pound. The depression cut the price to $1.10, and to date it has not recovered to $2. Moreover, it is doubtful whether silk will reach $2. Preliminary estimates of the spring cocoon crop point to a 10 per cent increase in output—a familiar depression tragedy. Also, Italy and China are each expected to produce a greater silk crop this year. Japan's silk customers, anticipating an increase in silk supplies and a consequent fall in prices, are understandably displaying no great eagerness to buy at present prices. The continued depression of silk prices is particularly unfortunate for Japan because her greatest silk market is in this country. And with silk sales here yielding her a disappointing return in dollars, her purchases of American goods become increasingly difficult to maintain. Yet maintain them she must, for in addition to cotton she must buy here about 50 per cent of her pulp, 63 per cent of her oil (oil prices are rising too), and large quantities of materials for the manufacture of armaments.

The rise in the price of raw materials—with the lone exception of silk—is therefore the first of the factors which have caused the current Japanese crisis. The second is the failure of Japanese textile exports to participate in the general revival of world trade. In fact, the revival of world trade has actually resulted in a setback for cotton goods, the most important section of Japan's textile industry, exports of which last year declined in volume and in value. In 1937 this decline should grow more marked because of the quotas and restrictions being imposed against Japanese textiles in a number of countries.

Depression conditions were ideally adapted to the needs of the Japanese textile industry. Raw materials were cheap, and there was no need to invest cash in accumulating stocks for future use. Since the future price was bound to be lower than the present, it was profitable to delay each purchase as long as possible. Moreover, the manufacturers in the countries whose markets Japan was invading were unable to stabilize the price of finished goods. Demand was limited, and costs could not be cut beyond a certain limit. The Japanese manufacturers had only to offer goods at still lower prices, and the American or Peruvian manufacturer, as the case might be, shut his mill rather than produce at a loss. The Japanese industry, profiting from cheaper labor, more modern machinery, and lower interest charges, functioned perfectly in a falling market. The recovery has changed all that. Prices have risen so much that Japan's low production costs are no longer decisive. And since the principal textile markets suffer from a shortage, prices are still rising in complete disregard of Japan's now frantic attempts to cling to the markets she has won in recent years. She can do little in the face of the restrictions against her textile exports being imposed at the instigation of competing manufacturers.

The Philippines provide a case in point. Considerable publicity has been given to recent Japanese inroads there. But in January of this year "the volume of orders placed in Japan was much reduced as a result of higher prices [Japanese prices rose 30 to 40 per cent] and the inability of Japanese mills to provide prompt delivery." Another illustration is afforded by Australia, Japan's chief source of raw wool. Japan's inroads into Australian textile markets had been sensational, but Japan and Australia have recently engaged in a bitter trade war from which Japan has emerged the loser. During the next eighteen months the volume of Japanese exports of cotton goods to Australia will be 18 per cent less than they were in 1935, and rayon exports will be 23 per cent less. It is true that the new quotas represent a considerable advance over the 1932 figures, but in 1932 Japanese exports had not yet provoked a trade war. Moreover, with raw-wool prices rising and armament bills mounting steadily, Japan cannot be content to see her export quotas reduced below their 1935 value. Her increasing financial difficulties demand, rather, a substantial increase. The Australian agreement is accordingly a grave Japanese defeat.

Brazil is another market of great importance to Japan. During the depression, partly because of Japanese demand, Brazil greatly increased her cotton crop, Japan paying for her purchases of cotton and other Brazilian raw materials with textile exports. Recently, however, Brazilian capitalists, and American capitalists as well, have undertaken to increase the native textile output, and with such efficiency that Japanese goods are now being challenged by Brazilian products not only in Brazil itself but throughout the whole of Latin America. Thus another profitable source of raw materials is disappearing for Japan, who cannot afford to trade one way with any country, however valuable its raw materials.

In Egypt Japan's boom ended earlier. As the result of a 40 per cent tariff imposed by the Egyptian authorities at the end of 1935, Japan's cotton-goods exports to Egypt fell 35 per cent in 1936, and her rayon exports 50 per cent. Egypt is of course a large-scale producer of raw cotton. A final example of the obstacles now rising everywhere before Japanese textile exports is offered by Iraq. For 1936, "in cotton piece goods . . . Japan . . . practically displaced Lancashire. . . . As to rayon, Japanese supplies amounted to . . . $1,500,000 out of a total of $1,925,000." But at the turn of the year Iraq signified her "intention to return to England for her piece-goods imports." A dispatch to the Manchester Guardian Commercial explains that "as a result of recent restrictions against Japan by the Iraq government the price of Japanese goods has gone up 50 per cent . . . [and] Japanese firms cannot today effect immediate shipments." This instance is typical.

In the market where she can least afford to lose purchasing power, the United States, Japan has just suffered a staggering defeat. During the depression Japanese cotton-goods sales in this country had grown sensation-ally. From a mere 2.8 million square yards in 1932, they had leaped to nearly 75 million square yards in 1936. By January 21, 1937, furthermore the Japanese had already contracted to sell here 155 million square yards of cotton goods—double last year's figure; in 1936 Japan sold more than this amount in only three countries.

Japan's invasion of our cotton-goods market was, however, summarily stopped as a result of the agreement signed at Osaka on January 21 by representatives of the textile industries of the two countries. While the agreement permits Japan to fill orders up to the 155 million square yards she already has on her books, it reduces her 1938 market in this country by one-third of this—although with the provision that if Japanese sales here do not reach the quota maximum, 1938 shipments may compensate for the difference.

The coincidence of rising import costs and falling export revenues netted Japan a trade deficit of 130,000,000 yen in 1936. On top of this, "the first two weeks of this year alone saw an excess of imports over exports of almost 70,000,000 yen"—more than half the entire 1936 trade deficit. To a certain extent this may be discounted as seasonal; Japan's first-quarter trade deficit is usually greater than her annual trade deficit. This year, however, the first four months have shown a deficit fully 49.9 per cent greater than that for the same period in 1936. This increase cannot be discounted as purely seasonal. It reflects the colossal increase in the demand of Japan's armament industries for imported raw materials and the growing embarrassment of her textile industries, which in large part have been expected to finance the rising costs of imports. Yet today more than ever, with production and Treasury indebtedness mounting hand in hand, Japan needs a favorable trade balance, or at least a greatly reduced trade deficit. For unless Japan can pay for raw-material imports, it is utterly useless for her to build armament and semi-armament factories designed to be run on materials purchased abroad. As a matter of fact, there is reason to believe that Japan expected a period of negligible trade deficits as recently as last year—when, actually, the 1935 trade surplus was turned into a deficit. The Oriental Economist, a financial publication of great authority, went so far as to estimate that Japan's 1936 trade deficit would be only 4,000,000 yen instead of the actual 130,000,000 yen, and that 1937 would again produce a surplus.

Finance Minister Yuki recently announced that Japan would begin to finance imports by gold payments. At the end of March, accordingly, 50,000,000 yen in gold was shipped to this country. But Japan's gold reserve is only 540,000,000 yen, and, to quote the London Financial News, "Japan, as a country which seems to anticipate war more strongly than any other country, owns hardly anything but this gold as a reserve for such an emergency." Since March imports have risen so rapidly that the Japanese government has had to ship another 177,000,000 yen in gold to this country, although the original gold allotment for export during the entire year was only 130,000,000 yen. The acceleration of gold exports clearly underscores Japan's inability to foot the bill for the armament program demanded by her military.

Clearly, then, the answer to the question, Why have the Japanese military relaxed their demands on China? is to be found largely in the economic crisis into which world recovery has plunged Japan.

[Part II of this article will appear in an early issue.]

Issues and Men

BY OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

A Letter F.D.R. Ought to Write

John Smith, Painted Post, New York

Dear Sir: Your letter of June 10 is one of many hundreds inquiring about my position in regard to certain recent labor happenings. I have chosen to reply to it because you also ask if Arthur Krock of the New York Times is justified in saying that my silence on these questions is "a studied policy," and you ask, "a studied policy of what?" I take this opportunity to set you and Mr. Krock right and to tell you and everybody else just where I stand on some recent anxiety-creating developments in the labor situation.

Let me say at once that I am entirely opposed to lawlessness on either side in labor disputes. I hold it criminal for employers to use force to break strikes, to hire professional thugs from those abominations the so-called "strike-breaking agencies," to stir up trouble where there was none. I hold it equally reprehensible and still stupider for labor to use force to achieve greater rewards and better living conditions. I well know that labor often says, "We must meet force with force; we must defend ourselves against the brutalities of employer-owned police by similar tactics." I deny that absolutely. I go farther. I believe that whatever may seem to be the justification for reprisals, every time labor violates the law or seeks to take it into its own hands, it does itself tremendous harm. It alienates supporters, sloughs off friends, and strengthens those employers who resort to corruption and trickery, to brass knuckles, clubs, and tear gas. Both sides become anti-social, hostile to an orderly public life, when they declare that the end justifies the means. Neither side has the right to violate the law. Neither side can assert that two wrongs make a right. Within the framework of the law we can adjust our differences. If the laws favor one side or the other we can alter them promptly, just as we have made many, many new laws and altered many old ones since I became President. But at bottom we must maintain respect for our courts and the civil authority. Without that we are well on the way to the chaos of utter lawlessness.

No one will accuse me, I am sure, of being unfriendly to labor or indifferent to its needs and aims. Under no other Administration has labor made such strides. Never before has collective bargaining been written upon our statute books. Never before has so great an advance been made for labor as that which is embodied in the Wagner Labor Act, the Social Security Act, and other legislation to which I have affixed my name. I have the right, therefore, to criticize labor when in my judgment it deserves it. I do so now. I say that picketing which by force keeps out of factories people who have the right to enter them is not picketing but violent blockading. As such it is entirely beyond the law governing picketing. I am opposed to sitdown strikes because the sitdown is the forcible taking over of other people's property without their consent.

And when labor or capital seeks to prevent the United States mails from being delivered, it is guilty, in my judgment, of a criminal conspiracy. You also ask my opinion of the withholding of mail by the Post Office from blockaded and besieged factories. I regret that this has happened, and I have made it clear to the Post Office Department that because it has lacked courage it has appeared to take sides and that that must not be. A department which boasts that neither heat, nor cold, nor rain, nor snow deters it from delivering its mail cannot afford to be frightened off by picket lines. The next time this happens we shall resort to armored trucks and, if need be, United States guards. Neither labor nor capital has the right to suspend the legitimate functions of this government, and neither will be permitted to do so as long as I am in the White House.

Perhaps you will wonder why I have not said these things before. Frankly I had hoped that it would not be necessary for me to speak out. I have recognized the extraordinary character of the present labor crisis. Labor is readjusting itself to new conditions and is naturally aroused when it comes into head-on collision with reactionary employers determined not to yield their hitherto complete economic supremacy. I had hoped that its new leaders would not permit their men to get out of hand and that the men themselves would exercise self-control, be conscious of their responsibility to their leaders, their cause, and the public. But this has not always happened. Indefensible local strikes have been called; pulling the switches which threw a whole valley into darkness was treason to workers everywhere. In no fewer than 195 communities industries were crippled, homes and hospitals deprived of electricity, essential services stopped. I should like to say to the misguided men who thus abused their power, just after they had won a remarkable victory over their employers, that that action did an injury to the cause of the workers from one end of the country to the other, everywhere strengthening the forces of reaction; especially as there was no grievance whatever to palliate the act.

When this happened, it was, needless to say, impossible for me to remain silent. I could not lay myself open to the charge of playing politics or of cowardice in order to gain a political advantage.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

BROUN'S PAGE

Some Sleeping Beauties

LIBERALS, blown-in-the-bottle liberals, are fond of saying that their every action is guided by high principle and that under no circumstance would they ever stoop to mere opportunism. That sounds well and it may be true, but unfortunately it carries its corollary, which is equally veracious. This may be expressed simply in the aphorism, "Once a liberal always a sucker."

I am not talking, of course, of shrewd and spurious politicians who are lightning-change artists in the matter of putting on or taking off the cloak of liberalism and getting back into their tights. I speak of the much more dangerous breed of liberals who know not what they do. Since practical politics is a sordid game, these gentlemen take pride in their impracticality. As a result, liberals are constantly being used to help the purposes of sinister groups. A little befuddlement will make them serviceable to any cause, and befuddling a liberal is far simpler than rolling off a log.

It would be idle to deny that a few of the liberals who leaped into the fight against President Roosevelt's court proposals were utterly sincere. Because of their sincerity and deserved reputation for honesty of purpose they were used as shock troops by the Old Guard. The words of such men carried great weight, and while they were talking the boys in the back room cooked up their plot and may be in a position to put it over.

It must be apparent by now, even to a liberal, that the drive against the Roosevelt plan has become a piece of camouflage behind which reactionary forces are assembling to sweep away every semblance of the New Deal. This fact has not only been admitted but proudly proclaimed by such organs of the Republican Party as the New York Herald Tribune. And the proudest boast is that the alliance for reaction is bipartisan. Never have any Democrats received such praise from the opposition as is now being showered on the seven Senators who turned against the platform on which they were elected.

It has been said that the majority report of the Senate Judiciary Committee reads more like an impeachment proceeding than a report. There may well be significance in this. There are a great many Democrats who would be delighted to impeach Franklin D. Roosevelt, if that were possible, and put John Nance Garner in his place. The astute Mr. Krock of the New York Times has pointed out the analogy between the present situation and the revolt of the Republican reactionaries in 1920 which led to the nomination of Warren Gamaliel Harding. Plenty of Hardings can be found within the Democratic ranks, and the bourbons of the party would like to have one in the White House by 1941 at the very latest.

The present drive aims not only to stop the entire Roosevelt progressive program but to scrap what has already been accomplished. Real liberals are not in favor of this vast swing to the right. They can say with justice that Mr. Roosevelt's approach to court reform was far from ideal. And yet I have always felt that there was soundness in the gambler's answer in that very ancient wheeze. You may remember he was warned that the wheel on which he was about to risk his dollars was not above reproach, and that he replied, "What the hell! It's the only one in town." Mr. Roosevelt's plan in regard to the Supreme Court may have its faults, but it is the only one available.

A few months ago there was a great deal of talk by some very reactionary people that a clarifying, or even a broadening amendment would be all right with them. Some even went to the length of asserting that they fought the scheme of additional justices chiefly because they desired some more fundamental plan to protect progressive legislation. Many weeks ago I ventured the opinion that no amendment whatsoever would have any chance if the Roosevelt plan were killed. It isn't killed yet, but it would be foolish not to admit that it has been stopped dead in its tracks. And in that situation is it so that the old fervent amendment boys are rushing forward with their plans? You have only to read the newspaper headlines to realize that nobody has peeped about an amendment in months. And if anybody does, no attention will be paid because the Tories feel that they have won the fight to preserve the status quo.

Again it is well to remember that even the most ardent foes of the major portion of the President's plan spoke in friendly fashion of some of the minor elements. There was articulate agreement that the lag between the passage of a law and its test before the High Bench provoked much hardship and confusion. The provision for hastening such cases up to the court of last resort met practically no opposition. And yet in its report the majority of the Senate Judiciary Committee has no kind word for any part of the plan. The reason is hardly mysterious. Those who represent the large interests love the law's delays.

Mr. Roosevelt said that one of the difficulties in the path of an amendment was the bottle neck provided by those small states which could by combination defeat the will of a very large majority. His theory has been made good. The Senators from the rotten boroughs make up the band of last-minute converts which has made the reactionary drive possible.

It is difficult to convert a liberal. I merely ask those who have unconsciously aided in a great betrayal to look at the record. Liberalism will never be a useful force in America until the children of light have made up their minds that they must be at least half as smart as the children of darkness. Oswald Garrison Villard please note.

HEYWOOD BROWN

BOOKS and the ARTS

THE SUPERIOR VIRTUE OF THE OPPRESSED

BY BERTRAND RUSSELL

ONE of the persistent delusions of mankind is that some sections of the human race are morally better or worse than others. This belief has many different forms, none of which has any rational basis. It is natural to think well of ourselves, and thence, if our mental processes are simple, of our sex, our class, our nation, and our age. But among writers, especially moralists, a less direct expression of self-esteem is common. They tend to think ill of their neighbors and acquaintances, and therefore to think well of the sections of mankind to which they themselves do not belong. Lao-Tze admired the "pure men of old," who lived before the advent of Confucian sophistication. Tacitus and Madame de Staël admired the Germans because they had no emperor. Locke thought well of the "intelligent American" because he was not led astray by Cartesian sophistries.

A rather curious form of this admiration for groups to which the admirer does not belong is the belief in the superior virtue of the oppressed: subject nations, the poor, women, and children. The eighteenth century, while conquering America from the Indians, reducing the peasantry to the condition of pauper laborers, and introducing the cruelties of early industrialism, loved to sentimentalize about the "noble savage" and the "simple annals of the poor." Virtue, it was said, was not to be found in courts: but court ladies could almost secure it by masquerading as shepherdesses. And as for the male sex:

Happy the man whose wish and care
A few paternal acres bound.

Nevertheless, for himself Pope preferred London and his villa at Twickenham.

At the French Revolution the superior virtue of the poor became a party question, and has remained so ever since. To reactionaries they became the "rabble" or the "mob." The rich discovered, with surprise, that some people were so poor as not to own even "a few paternal acres." Liberals, however, still continued to idealize the rural poor, while intellectual Socialists and Communists did the same for the urban proletariat—a fashion to which, since it only became important in the twentieth century, I shall return later.

Nationalism introduced, in the nineteenth century, a substitute for the noble savage—the patriot of an oppressed nation. The Greeks until they had achieved liberation from the Turks, the Hungarians until the Ausgleich of 1867, the Italians until 1870, and the Poles until after the war were regarded romantically as gifted poetic races, too idealistic to succeed in this wicked world. The Irish were regarded by the English as possessed of a special charm and mystical insight until 1921, when it was found that the expense of continuing to oppress them would be prohibitive. One by one these various nations rose to independence, and were found to be just like everybody else; but the experience of those already liberated did nothing to destroy the illusion as regards those who were still struggling. English old ladies still sentimentalize about the "wisdom of the East" and American intellectuals about the "earth consciousness" of the Negro.

Women, being the objects of the strongest emotions, have been viewed even more irrationally than the poor or the subject nations. I am thinking not of what poets have to say but of the sober opinions of men who imagine themselves rational. The church had two opposite attitudes: on the one hand, woman was the Temptress, who led monks and others into sin; on the other hand, she was capable of saintliness to an almost greater degree than man. Theologically, the two types were represented by Eve and the Virgin. In the nineteenth century the temptress fell into the background; there were, of course, "bad" women, but Victorian worthies, unlike St. Augustine and his successors, would not admit that such sinners could tempt them, and did not like to acknowledge their existence. A kind of combination of the Madonna and the lady of chivalry was created as the ideal of the ordinary married woman. She was delicate and dainty, she had a bloom which would be rubbed off by contact with the rough world, she had ideals which might be dimmed by contact with wickedness; like the Celts and the Slavs and the noble savage, but to an even greater degree, she enjoyed a spiritual nature, which made her the superior of man but unfitted her for business or politics or the control of her own fortune. This point of view is still not entirely extinct. The other day, in reply to a speech I had made in favor of equal pay for equal work, an English schoolmaster sent me a pamphlet published by a schoolmasters' association, setting forth the opposite opinion, which it supports with curious arguments. It says of woman: "We gladly place her first as a spiritual force; we acknowledge and reverence her as the 'angelic part of humanity'; we give her superiority in all the graces and refinements we are capable of as human beings; we wish her to retain all her winsome womanly ways." "This appeal"—that women should be content with lower rates of pay—"goes forth from us to them," so we are assured, "in no selfish spirit, but out of respect and devotion to our mothers, wives, sisters, and daughters. . . . Our purpose is a sacred one, a real spiritual crusade."

Fifty or sixty years ago such language would have roused no comment except on the part of a handful of feminists; now, since women have acquired the vote, it has come to seem an anachronism. The belief in their "spiritual" superiority was part and parcel of the determination to keep them inferior economically and politically. When men were worsted in this battle, they had to respect women, and therefore gave up offering them "reverence" as a consolation for inferiority.

A somewhat similar development has taken place in the adult view of children. Children, like women, were theologically wicked, especially among evangelicals. They were limbs of Satan, they were unregenerate; as Dr. Watts so admirably put it:

One stroke of His almighty rod
Can send young sinners quick to Hell.

It was necessary that they should be "saved." At Wesley's school "a general conversion was once effected, . . . one poor boy only excepted, who unfortunately resisted the influence of the Holy Spirit, for which he was severely flogged. . . ." But during the nineteenth century, when parental authority, like that of kings and priests and husbands, felt itself threatened, subtler methods of quelling insubordination came into vogue. Children were "innocent"; like good women they had a "bloom"; they must be protected from knowledge of evil lest their bloom should be lost. Moreover, they had a special kind of wisdom. Wordsworth made this view popular among English-speaking people. He first made it fashionable to credit children with

High instincts before which our mortal nature
Did tremble like a guilty thing surprised.

No one in the eighteenth century would have said to his little daughter, unless she were dead:

Thou liest in Abraham's bosom all the year
And worships't at the temple's inner shrine.

But in the nineteenth century this view became quite common; and respectable members of the Episcopal church—or even of the Catholic church—shamelessly ignored Original Sin to dally with the fashionable heresy that

. . . trailing clouds of glory do we come
From God who is our home:
Heaven lies about us in our infancy.

This led to the usual development. It began to seem hardly right to spank a creature that was lying in Abraham's bosom, or to use the rod rather than "high instincts" to make it "tremble like a guilty thing surprised." And so parents and schoolmasters found that the pleasures they had derived from inflicting chastisement were being curtailed, and a theory of education grew up which made it necessary to consider the child's welfare, and not only the adult's convenience and sense of power.

The only consolation the adults could allow themselves was the invention of a new child psychology. Children, after being limbs of Satan in traditional theology and mystically illuminated angels in the minds of educational reformers, have reverted to being little devils—not theological demons inspired by the Evil One, but scientific Freudian abominations inspired by the Unconscious. They are, it must be said, far more wicked than they were in the diatribes of the monks; they display, in modern textbooks, an ingenuity and persistence in sinful imaginings to which in the past there was nothing comparable except St. Anthony. Is all this the objective truth at last? Or is it merely an adult imaginative compensation for being no longer allowed to wallop the little pests? Let the Freudians answer, each for the others.

As appears from the various instances that we have considered, the stage in which superior virtue is attributed to the oppressed is transient and unstable. It begins only when the oppressors come to have a bad conscience, and this only happens when their power is no longer secure. The idealizing of the victim is useful for a time: if virtue is the greatest of goods, and if subjection makes people virtuous, it is kind to refuse them power, since it would destroy their virtue. If it is difficult for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven, it is a noble act on his part to keep his wealth and so imperil his eternal bliss for the benefit of his poorer brethren. It was a fine self-sacrifice on the part of men to relieve women of the dirty work of politics. And so on. But sooner or later the oppressed class will argue that its superior virtue is a reason in favor of its having power, and the oppressors will find their own weapons turned against them. When at last power has been equalized, it becomes apparent to everybody that all the talk about superior virtue was nonsense, and that it was quite unnecessary as a basis for the claim to equality.

In regard to the Italians, the Hungarians, women, and children, we have run through the whole cycle. But we are still in the middle of it in the case which is of the most importance at the present time—namely, that of the proletariat. Admiration of the proletariat is very modern. The eighteenth century, when it praised "the poor," thought always of the rural poor. Jefferson's democracy stopped short at the urban mob; he wished America to remain a country of agriculturists. Admiration of the proletariat, like that of dams, power stations, and aeroplanes, is part of the ideology of the machine age. Considered in human terms, it has as little in its favor as belief in Celtic magic, the Slav soul, women's intuition, and children's innocence. If it were indeed the case that bad nourishment, little education, lack of air and sunshine, unhealthy housing conditions, and overwork produce better people than are produced by good nourishment, open air, adequate education and housing, and a reasonable amount of leisure, the whole case for economic reconstruction would collapse, and we could rejoice that such a large percentage of the population enjoys the conditions that make for virtue. But obvious as this argument is, many Socialist and Communist intellectuals consider it de rigueur to pretend to find the proletariat more amiable than other people, while professing a desire to abolish the conditions which, according to them, alone produce good human beings. Children were idealized by Wordsworth and un-idealized by Freud. Marx was the Wordsworth of the proletariat; its Freud is still to come.

BOOKS

Torrents of Spring

WHITE MULE. By William Carlos Williams. New Directions. $2.50.

IT IS a fine thing that Dr. Williams's "White Mule" has at last been brought out in book form. Dr. Williams, though among the most bracing and original talents in American letters, has never received the recognition so frequently accorded to those who denature and conventionalize the new attitudes and techniques launched by people like himself. That he is detached from all efforts at popular appeal goes without saying. Kenneth Burke once said of Williams that he was engaged in "discovering the shortest route between subject and object," but the reader, unfortunately, having become accustomed to the fatigue induced by long detours, has come to regard the short cut as an aberration of literary faddists.

Williams is too hardy a frontiersman of the word to permit himself the idle luxuries of aestheticism. There are too many things to be seen and touched, too many cadences of living speech to be listened to and recorded; and his novel is as busy doing that as his poetry. What happens on the most ordinary level of American living is the theme of this narrative of a man, his wife, and their two children. Like the spokes of a wheel all the episodes in the book radiate from the first chapter, called To Be, which describes the birth of the second child and its first few days in the world. As in a microcosm the author's creative credo is embodied in this chapter, so instinct with natural piety and pure in its virile tenderness, so alive with sensory detail recreated in language that is swift, bare, tonic, and elated by its closeness to the object. Such plain and humble subject matter is characteristic of Williams, who has a passion for the anti-poetic, which he sees as the solvent of the unreal in art. Moreover, it is this very quality which causes his elements to move with such simple grace and which releases in him a sensibility of springtime that in itself becomes the source of a new poetics. In this sense, if a good deal of modernist writing represents a vision of the end of the world, Williams's distinct strength lies, conversely, in calling forth a vision of its beginnings. And this would explain why he has been able to work within the modernist medium without sharing its decadence.

The novel as a whole, however, is not content with the perception of facts and the feeling of them. There are certain problems, obviously, that the aesthetics of neo-primitivism cannot encompass. Continuing in a different vein the intense search for America that marked his prose work "In the American Grain," Williams employs his characters as instruments to register with unwonted sensitiveness the peculiarities of the American scene. Joe Stecher, the foreman of a printshop, is an Alsatian who came to America in early youth, and his wife, Gurlie, is Norwegian. As foreigners, they are acutely aware of the contrast between the old world and the new and singularly perceptive of American qualities. Gurlie is so rife with the natural humors of a wife that she emerges as a veritable goddess of the home, but since it is an American home she is constantly urging her husband to get into the game, beat the other fellow, and make money. Joe's principal motivation, however, is his pride of workmanship; he is the pure artisan, the man who has not yet been alienated from the product of his labor and who thinks of money as the reward of labor and nothing else. Hence he takes a middle position between employer and worker. He is assailed by vexatious questions, such as are the unions merely businesses or do they represent a higher principle of social justice? Yet essentially he regards both sides in the struggle as interfering with the efficiency of production. Ambition stirs him, and despite himself he gradually becomes more and more involved with the employers. As this is only the first book in what promises to be a series, it is premature to predict the eventual resolution of Joe's beliefs.

It is interesting to observe that Williams too, like most American writers, has not escaped the political baptism of our decade. Patently, there is a correspondence between Joe Stecher and himself. Joe's philosophy of workmanship also defines the relation of Williams, a writer who is primarily a craftsman, to the literary trends of recent years. It is not difficult to see how to him the conflict of classes in literature might seem to be interfering, and perhaps gratuitously so, with the clean functioning of the written word. He would naturally be affronted by the automatism with which the phrase springs to the lips of the political fanatic. Hence, not the least of the tasks he has set himself in his work is the discovery of an attitude toward society that will prove compatible with his creative methods as a writer.

PHILIP RAHV

"There Is a World Dimensional"

HART CRANE. THE LIFE OF AN AMERICAN POET. By Philip Horton. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

IT IS well that a young critic, Philip Horton, and not one of Hart Crane's many literary friends undertook to write his biography, for Crane's life, like Poe's, is a tragic study of frustration. A friend would have written with a predominantly personal bias; Horton, working from letters and documents, presents his materials objectively and impersonally. He treats the poet with reverence but without sentimentality, and he has no ax to grind. This biography is consequently a dignified analysis of a complex and tortured mind.

Crane was an extraordinarily sensitive person affected by every conceivable personal and social force. Neither his middle-class family nor the period into which he was born afforded him security. He believed, nevertheless, that "there is a world dimensional for those untwisted by the love of things irreconcilable." Like Whitman he placed entire faith in an ecstatic and mystic love. But in daily life he was a strange and very difficult person for companionship. He sought complete identity with humanity and with the physical world, but everything in his life tended to isolate him and to increase his defense of extreme individuality and egotism. Finally even his faith in his own powers went, and he committed suicide.

Mr. Horton has been able to obtain from Hart Crane's mother and family all the important letters and records. He has obtained, too, letters from many New York writers who knew Crane well. Those to Gorham Munson, for example, begin while Crane was in his late teens. Waldo Frank, Malcolm Cowley, Allen Tate, Laura Riding, Slater Brown, and others have doubtless contributed to the author's fund of information. Horton has also been given access to papers containing early versions of many of the poems we now know as Crane's finest work. Indeed, he dates carefully almost all the poems. Probably many other letters of Crane's will still be found, and many other interpretations will be made of some of the materials at Horton's command. But in general this biography is authoritative. It does Hart Crane justice, and that is saying a great deal.

As a child Crane was subject to strange neurotic attacks. From the age of seven he was completely aware of hysterical struggles between his parents. His own life became the battle ground of two persons entirely mismatched. His mother was emotional and far too inclined to throw herself on her son's mercy. His father, the typical American business man, was more than harsh with a son whom he could not make into another business man. The result was that Crane was denied until too late any financial security whatsoever. He was forced in the most important years of his life to beg and to borrow, to seek any kind of work he could get. He wrote copy for advertisements when poems were teeming in his mind. In New York as a boy and later as a young man in his twenties he often knew himself to be dependent on the hospitality of his literary friends. The middle-class morality and standards which he accepted were in complete conflict with his acknowledged sexual abnormality and his inability to earn a living. The society in which he grew up denied his idealistic mysticism. First betrayed by his father, he was later inevitably to feel himself betrayed by friend after friend.

The twenties in America scintillated with literary battles to little purpose. The younger writers either thrived on competition or retreated from it to Europe, where they made a last stand against their own age and its materialism in their "little" magazines. In time they joined the revolutionary school of writing or were left solitary in their ivory towers. Crane disapproved of the exodus to Europe. He did not join literary schools. Influenced most by the Elizabethans and the modern French poets, he took from his reading whatever most stimulated him creatively. He was unspoiled, for he had not gone to college. All was fresh to him—language and its magnificent and subtle expressiveness, the stimulating new designs evident in modern painting and modern music.

Nevertheless, the attempt to conquer his own medium and at the same time to support himself was too difficult a task for him. He came early to rely on drink for stimulus in writing when he was overtired by work or worry. He talked divinely but too much. Even the friends who encouraged his pranks and follies fled from him and left him desolate. He had taken, moreover, the opposite direction from that of the leader in poetry, T. S. Eliot, for he was concerned with building a whole myth for America when most poets were writing of the disintegrations of a culture. His wholly individual point of view and his difficulty in synthesizing his vision with his real scene caused him to be misunderstood. Critics were very harsh, and Crane was sensitive. Finally, believing that he had come to the end of things, he leaped overboard on the return trip from Mexico, where, too late, he had been sent on a Guggenheim fellowship. This was in 1932, during the depression. Hart Crane, returning home without a job, believed himself too much the individualist to accept the current political cure-alls. He was, however, I firmly believe, the one poet of his period who might have found his greatest poetic convictions substantiated, his mystic faith posited, by the Marxian philosophy. In his psychology and in his financial situation he was alien to his own class. Had he lived to know himself the voice of a great movement, he might have become the first poet of revolutionary belief.

Philip Horton's last chapters are devoted to a very level-headed analysis of Crane's poetry. The earlier versions of the poems prove how wrong academic criticism of Crane may be—how wrong, in fact, even so acute a critic as R. P. Blackmur has been. Crane worked with words as an artist does with color and design, moving pieces of poems from one composition to another, shifting phrases for better effect and association. For him poetry was plastic. Horton is right about Crane's method of realizing his own meaning through sound and association of image rather than through idea. Music and words aroused him to ecstasy. He played the phonograph constantly while he composed. Words and phrases came very unclearly at first; then, as they were written down, their significance cleared and mistakes could be corrected. But revision for Crane meant the reexperiencing of the original emotion; he had constantly to throw himself back into the strange mood of a poem's inception. At times he wrote with speed and great intensity. Two comparatively brief intervals saw most of his great poems composed. The weaker sections of "The Bridge" were written when Crane was mentally ill. As for "The Broken Tower," the one masterpiece of the last year of his life, it was thought of at least a year before it took final shape in his mind. I have a letter from Crane dated January, 1931, in which he writes, "Give my greetings to Léonie Adams and tell her that I think her poem 'Bell Tower' makes me long to do something half so perfect as its delicate and yet majestic overtones achieve." I mention this because of disagreement about the date of the poem's composition.

EDA LOU WALTON

Education of a Maverick

A MAVERICK AMERICAN. By Maury Maverick. Covici-Friede. $3.

THIS Maverick American has put his personality into his autobiography with remarkable fidelity. In general it is the personality of a typical American—I had almost said "from the frontier"; but one thing that Maury Maverick will not stand for is to have Texas called the frontier. With that state his people have been identified for a long time. It was his grandfather who, by refusing to brand his cattle, put the family name into current English usage as an adjective. He has in his ancestry everything that the average American of the South likes to boast about, and he tells you about it with his tongue in his cheek. He sees through it, knows that it is bombast and fustian, and yet revels in it.

It is an extraordinary story that he has to tell, and though he tells it with unsparing self-condemnation, the narrative is chock-full of humor, sarcasm, and a characteristic delight in the frank exposure of humbug. The most moving part of the story is the part concerned with his war experiences; this would be wholly touching if it were not full of humor from beginning to end, humor to arouse the envy of a Charles Lever. Never was there a military career more delightfully recorded; never were the stupidities of our army life and the folly of our participation in the World War better shown up than by this erstwhile commander of a machine-gun company. It may not be generally known that when he reached the firing-line, his men, his fellow-officers, and finally he himself were one after the other wounded or killed—and for eighteen years afterward a bullet in his spine made it impossible for him to have one waking moment without pain. When he first went to Washington a Capitol policeman arrested him for drunkenness because he could not walk steadily! Finally, the Mayos sawed off pieces of five vertebrae and took out a spinal-cord tumor. The moral for him is characteristic of the man, and here it is: "It is a damned outrage that a poor man can't go to a doctor. Mayo's fee was low. Their work was far more than satisfactory. But why can't every man be operated on when he needs it? Why should people watch their children die? Why should a man in moderate circumstances have to die because he hasn't got the money for an operation and hospital expenses?"

It is also characteristic of him that although he was making $18,000 a year between his salary as a tax-collector and returns from his business, he dropped it all in the middle of the depression to ride the freights with hobos in order to study what was happening to the victims of the great disaster. He found that the men and women, though helpless and broke, were not professional hobos: "They had no views; neither had they resentment. They did not know why they were hungry and unemployed, and they did not seem to care. They did not even discuss solving their problems. . . ." Of course he went to work to make the lot of these people, at least when they came into his town, bearable. He founded a freight-car colony, only to find that it didn't work as soon as these pitiful people got money. Every time that he touches human nature he learns from it, and that is one of the engaging things about the man and about the book. You feel that because he does go out and meet human nature halfway he is growing all the time. If his book is a delightful jumble, it is because he has found life a jumble, and he has recorded it as he has lived it and seen it.

It was an impudent undertaking, this writing of his autobiography by a man who is just at the outset of his career. It smacks somewhat of the Chauncey Depew who presented his own monument to his birthplace and then made the dedicatory address at the unveiling. Yet I have to admit that the autobiography is absolutely warranted. In his first term Maverick made himself one of the foremost figures in Congress; in his second he has had what he considers the high honor of introducing in the House the President's own Supreme Court reform bill. If San Antonio knows what it is about, it will send Maury Maverick to Congress as long as he can stand up, and then send him in a hammock or on a litter.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Cafe Philosophy

INVERTEBRATE SPAIN. By José Ortega y Gasset. Translated by Mildred Adams. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

THE general content of Ortega's "Invertebrate Spain" dates back to the 20's and therefore has only an indirect bearing on the present military rebellion in Spain, for which it supplies landscape and background. As regards the background one must point out that, for all of impressions to the contrary, Ortega is not a thinker. His thought structures, large or small, consist mainly in finding a verbal name for the thing, and then explaining the thing in terms of the logical implications of the name. Such thinking can pass as thought only in circles in which rationalist and scholastic methods remain as yet untouched by the historical method and the methods of science proper.

This comment applies to Ortega's study of Spanish "particularism" in this volume. Why is it that in Spain regional differences are so sharp and, when they come into action, so bitter? Why also are horizontal scissions and schisms equally clean-cut and impassable? Why is a general a general and not

"I HAVE READ OTHER AUTHORITIES ON SEXUAL AND MARITAL RELATIONS," WRITES A READER, "BUT THROUGH ITS DEEPLY INTELLIGENT HELP, AND SHEER, PRACTICAL, DOWN-TO-EARTH COMPLETENESS—

THIS BOOK OPENED MY EYES"

Here, for once, in plain language that cuts through generalities, are answers to hundreds of questions like these:

- What is the truth about most marriage failures—and how can failures be avoided?
- What are the causes and remedies of sexual inequality?
- How can frigidity be overcome in the mate and responsiveness re-awakened?
- How is sexual sensitivity increased—or reduced—in the mate?
- What is a practical technique for developing and preserving sexual fitness?
- What are the unusual advantages of "coitus reservatus"—and how practised?
- How and why should the technique of the love episode be varied?
- What are the causes and preventatives of impotence?
- How do birth control methods compare in usefulness?

Few can fail to profit personally from the rare information that is in

The ART OF MARRIAGE

BY J. F. HAYDEN, B.Sc.

REVISED and ENLARGED EDITION • 279 PAGES • ILLUSTRATED

Here, indeed, is an invaluable addition to the few better books that deal with the rarest information in the affectional realms of sex. A book so complete, so practical, so studiously sensible that it has opened the eyes of thousands.

Persons eager for constructive information will find THE ART OF MARRIAGE a veritable masterpiece in its ability to suggest and cultivate the ingredients of the ideal, happy marriage.

"Ignorance," not "innocence," is held by the author to account for the unequalized sexuality, frigidity, satiety, prematurity, lack of art in the sex act itself, prudery, impotence, etc., leading to unsuccessful marriages. THE ART OF MARRIAGE contains the fullest treatise on the subject of Frigidity to be found today. The treatise on Reservatus methods is most extensive and complete.

In a very definite way, THE ART OF MARRIAGE holds out a key to the hidden joys of life. It aims to overcome the emptiness in the lives of even cultured people who endure in silence the emotional shortcomings and failures of marriage. For those newly married, or about to be, few gifts contain such lasting values.

Every subject pertaining to marriage success is fully, frankly, ably presented in this book, which is dedicated to the ideal that every honeymoon can last a lifetime—if the technique is known and applied. It is sold with the written understanding that you are free to return the book for refund if you are not completely absorbed by its contents.

Handsomely, legibly printed in large, clear type, with a complete index and illustrations.

$1.98

SEND THIS COUPON IN TODAY

FREE OFFER! SEND NO MONEY

The Union Library Association, Inc. Established 1884
373 Fourth Ave., New York, N. Y.

N-21

Gentlemen: In plain, personally addressed wrapper, send me a copy of "The Art of Marriage," FOR FIVE (5) DAYS' FREE INSPECTION. Upon receipt, I will deposit with postman $1.98 and a few cents postage. If not completely satisfied, I have the privilege of returning the book, without explanation, for a refund of the purchase price.

☐ CHECK HERE if you prefer to enclose $1.98 in full payment, thus saving delivery charges. SAME FREE FIVE-DAY EXAMINATION AND REFUND PRIVILEGE APPLIES.

Name

Address

City and State

I agree to safeguard the book from falling into the hands of improper persons; especially minors, without their parents' consent.

WHO GETS WHAT?

"Careful and detailed analysis of German Fascism—the most complete, to my knowledge, that exists in the English language."

—HAROLD J. LASKI

The definitive study of German Fascism, tracing it to its source in monopoly capitalism, telling how the Nazis climbed to power on the backs of the working class, how they retain that power. Professor Brady describes the state agencies which regulate the daily life of the German people. His graphic charts are clear, enlightening blueprints of Fascism.

The book concludes with a survey of Fascist tendencies throughout the world, including the United States, which every liberal should regard as a duty to read and to get others to read "... economic realism ... cuts through to the supreme question: Who gets what?"

—Chas. A. Beard. Index, charts, Viking Press, $3.00

THE SPIRIT AND STRUCTURE OF GERMAN FASCISM

by Robert A. Brady

Now Ready

A HISTORY OF POLITICAL THEORY

By GEORGE H. SABINE

Critical insight and mature judgment distinguish this significant new study. In a clear and vigorous prose, the author traces the development of ideas and institutions from City-State to Fascist Dictatorship—outlining the contributions of individual philosophers—and showing the close relationship between social change and the emergence of theories of government. $4.00

GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS ABROAD

By HENRY R. SPENCER

"Indispensable for anyone who would make a serious study of the international relations of the world today."
WALTER CONSUELO LANGSAM, in The Living Age.

$3.50

HENRY HOLT AND COMPANY
257 Fourth Ave., N. Y.

a Spaniard, a priest a priest and not a Spaniard, an Anarchist an Anarchist and not even a Catalanian? To answer that they are suffering from "particularism" is like saying that water is not as dry as we might like it to be because it is suffering from wetness. As a matter of fact, history and the social sciences have much to say on the phenomena that Ortega describes as "particularism." "Particularism" is not a new phenomenon, nor even a locally Spanish phenomenon. Its laws are on the whole fairly well understood. Do not go to Ortega, however, for that sort of discussion. From the thing he takes us to the name and then from the name back to the thing, and that is the end of it.

The thing, nevertheless, is interesting, and one should read in this connection Ortega's essay on the Spanish military class, which he describes as "a loaded rifle with no one to shoot it." It is to be hoped that Ortega will some day give us equally illuminating essays on the priests, the capitalists, the nobility, the urban workers, the farmers—each class, besides, with its vertical and horizontal divisions. For looking at Spain at long range I have always been interested to note that in Spain we used to have the lower clergy unionized against the hierarchy, and in the army, junior officers unionized against the generals, the monarchy, and the republic.

Ortega's landscape is exceedingly interesting, and along with it the sidelights that he throws on the temperaments of the inhabitants of the different regions—especially the Castiles, the Asturias, the Basque country, and Andalusia. The essay on Andalusia is inimitable: "Let us not exaggerate the indolence of Andalusians. . . . They must do all that is necessary, for Andalusia continues to exist. Their laziness does not completely exclude work. Rather it becomes the meaning of work and the air which work takes on." That is Ortega at his best, and it is such a high grade of best that one wishes he would not waste so much time on his cafe philosophy and sociology.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON

Sweet Beulah Land

KENNEBEC: CRADLE OF AMERICANS. By Robert P. Tristram Coffin. Farrar and Rinehart. $2.50.

IN A headlong, rapturous mood Mr. Coffin inaugurates the first of a series of books written under the general editorship of Constance Lindsay Skinner. He recasts the history of the Kennebec from the time Hakluyt and Purchas described the first Abenaki Indian down to the day when the last shad net was hung up in the deserted houses on the shore, and does it in a spirit of high romance that would do credit to any scop, gleeman, or jongleur, past or present. Plainly the rhythms of Maine's finest river have cradled him from childhood, and now the whole state's rocks and rills, fir and furniture, fish and people are presented like an all-star Griffith production with technical advice from Swinburne.

Mr. Coffin's enthusiasms are happily contagious and his style is eminently readable. If launched a month sooner this book might well have been responsible for a seasonal deflowering of other sections of New England. For the Kennebec strawberry that comes in the sweet of the year would most surely have been sought out by summer flannels, and the fresh-water clams and fish, under the hot ardors of his pen, become delicacies that would have made company for dinner in every Maine fisherman's home.

Even the actual history of the river is all pretty much

Sweet Beulah Land to Mr. Coffin. I thought at first it was something for the children, and the policemen who didn't like the WPA play about the beavers. And then I found myself liking it as well as any historical fairy story I had ever read. The Indian queen with whom Aaron Burr fell in love seemed much comelier than Pocahontas, and the craggy men of Maine somehow had a much more direct way of polishing off the French and Indians than had, say, General Harrison. (Incidentally the shoe industry and Powers Hapgood are not mentioned.)

Almost everything else and everyone who ever walked the Kennebec are mentioned. Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe is described as she left the First Parish Congregational Church at Brunswick to hurry home and write "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Longfellow, Hawthorne, Abbott, Millay, and Robinson are other names the Kennebec can claim. And the rapids of the Cobbosseecontee saw, besides English colonials, Moravian Germans, Irish, Huguenot French, French Canadians, Poles, Finns, Swedes.

I am delighted that I have had more than one summer on the Kennebec; otherwise I should feel with the hairy ape that I didn't quite "belong." But perhaps when Mr. Havighurst writes of the upper Mississippi and Mr. Burt of the Snake River, there will be a similar wish to have been cradled where cradling was best, as Mr. Coffin suggests with major accents.

Reading his story of the Kennebec is actually like looking at one of Maine's own patchwork quilts, where the brightest colors stand out the clearest. For although Mr. Coffin at the end of the book briefly deplores the fact that his river has been befouled by greed and that it must continue to take summer boarders until its three great nourishers of life—fisheries, forests, and merchant marine—are reopened to activity, he never examines the reason behind the reason or suggests, as a historical writer, any possible solution to the Kennebec's stagnation. He hopes for the day when alewives can fill Merrymeeting Bay again, but in the meantime he is romantically certain that his salt-of-the-earth Yankees will continue to fill the cradles with the best Americans.

STANLEY YOUNG

King into Office Boy

THE MAGIC OF MONARCHY. By Kingsley Martin.
Alfred A. Knopf. $1.25.

FOR many years historians and students of government will debate the issues surrounding the abdication of Edward VIII and the accession of George VI. In these discussions they will make frequent references to Kingsley Martin's contemporary account of events and of the course of British opinion. Sympathizing in many respects with Edward and frequently critical of the Cabinet, Mr. Martin nevertheless does not take the view stated on the floor of the House of Commons by James Maxton—who is not the least picturesque member of the Labor opposition: "Mr. Baldwin and the National government have demonstrated in a most effective fashion that the greatest and best-loved monarch this nation has ever known can be scrapped like an office boy and that within twenty-four hours another office boy can be started in his place."

In Mr. Martin's interesting little book—much of which has been published in the New Statesman, which he edits, and in the Political Quarterly, which he helps to edit—two principal points are explicitly dealt with. There are also oblique

Mary Has TWO New Dresses

TWO dresses for less than her mother used to pay for one. Mary's new ready-made dresses, compared with those her mother bought 20 years ago, are in better style, have fast colors, and are chosen from a far wider range of exciting new fabrics.

Why can Mary have two new dresses today?

It is because of the amazing progress the textile industry has made in the last two decades. It is because research scientists and engineers have worked to improve processes and to give the public more for its money. More goods for more people—at less cost.

It is because General Electric engineers and research scientists have contributed to this progress. More than forty years ago, they initiated the first use of electricity in the textile industry. Today, every modern loom has its individual electric drive, and electric control which governs the quality of the unrolling yards of fine, sleek fabric. General Electric scientists have perfected instruments to test and match the colors, and to keep the weft straight and true.

Electric equipment—much of it especially designed by G-E engineers for textile applications—increases production, protects expensive machines, prevents delay and spoilage, lowers costs. In short, General Electric engineers are in the "efficiency business," and the economies they help to effect enable millions of American Marys and Helens and Ruths to buy two new dresses where otherwise they could buy only one.

G-E research has saved the public from ten to one hundred dollars for every dollar it has earned for General Electric

GENERAL  ELECTRIC

When THE LITERARY DIGEST
says that

JOHN L. LEWIS

"considers Morris Ernst's The Ultimate Power is one of his reading 'musts'," it reflects the feeling of liberal readers and thinkers everywhere.

THE ULTIMATE POWER

by Morris L. Ernst

at all booksellers $3.00
DOUBLEDAY, DORAN

FIVE WEEKS in SOVIET RUSSIA

A comprehensive tour under leadership of
WILL GEER

of New Theatre League, including attendance at the MOSCOW THEATRE FESTIVAL.

Sailing July 28. Tour including round-trip Third Class on the QUEEN MARY $559

Other trips under authoritative leadership $399 up

THE OPEN ROAD

12th Floor

8 West 40th Street

New York

Cooperating with Intourist

Memorial Meeting and Concert for Aid to the Basque Refugee Children

MECCA TEMPLE 55th Street Bet. 6th & 7th Aves. July 1, 8:30 p.m.

PATRONS — PROGRAM

Mrs. Lincoln Steffens ■ Dr. Frank Bohn ■ Sam Jaffee
Bennett Cerf ■ Doland Ogden Stewart ■ Arthur Kober
Archibaid MacLeish ■ Robt. W. Dunn ■ Ernest L. Meyer
Pascal Covici ■ Samuel and Bella Spewack ■ Quincy Howe
James Waterman Wise ■ Herman Shumlin ■ Kyle Crichton
Joseph Freeman.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—MAX GOBERMAN, Conducting

Subscription 35c & 50c; Reserved Seats $1.10 & $1.65

MAKE YOUR RESERVATIONS NOW!

Address Julius Rosenthal Memorial Committee
8 West 40th Street

PE 6-9197

references to what might have happened but did not, and underlying the whole discussion is a fourth consideration which in the future may be of far greater importance than the other three.

Mr. Martin begins with an analysis of the mystical aura which for some years had been surrounding the monarchy. For the occupant of the throne the people had come to have something approaching reverence. Adoration was so extreme as to be irrational. Even before the accession of Edward VIII the press had ceased to devote any serious attention to the functions of the Crown. That showed a marked change from the attitude toward monarchy during the reign of Victoria. Punch made ribald jokes about her first pregnancy. The newspapers talked plainly about the Prince Consort and freely expressed what they conceived to be the truth concerning the abilities and the characters of other members of the royal family. Until some years after Victoria's death there was nothing resembling reverence.

The change came about partly because the monarchy had behaved itself for so many years and partly because, in Gladstone's phrase, there had been a gradual and beneficial substitution of influence for power. That transformation spelled the defeat of the republican movement. At the time that influence is exerted, however, no one outside the government or the court circle can know just how great royal pressures and resistances are. This is Mr. Martin's second point. Queen Victoria's correspondence, recently published, shows that she was by no means the figurehead Walter Bagehot declared her to be. On this an incisive and still authoritative analyst of the British constitution was in error. But on the psychological importance of monarchy Bagehot made shrewd observations when he argued the importance of the theatrical functions of government. He was more prophetic than he knew, since he could not anticipate the zenith reached in the recent Coronation. For that he would have had to be a Barnum, not simply an economist, or "a wit and a seer," as Woodrow Wilson called Bagehot.

The consideration which is hinted at rather than fully discussed by Mr. Martin belongs in the realm of what Sir Henry Maine called "hypothetics"—"the science of that which might have happened but did not." If the discussion of Edward VIII's romance had not been taboo in the British press, if talk of it had not been limited to Mayfair groups, what would the popular attitude have been? The magic of monarchy encouraged a conspiracy of silence until the Bishop of Bradford, whose family name appropriately is Blunt, made his statement—apparently without reference to Mrs. Simpson—that the King was failing to appreciate the value of God's grace. If the news had not been broken so bluntly, would the Baldwin government have had to attempt to bring the dominions into line for amorganatic marriage? After the event it is easy for Englishmen to answer such a question with a decided no. But what would have been the attitude of the British government if the crisis had come weeks later, when visitors from the dominions were already en route to the Coronation; when any change of plan would have been devastatingly "bad for trade"? The historian will at least say that the King did not think of a time table that might have permitted him to keep his throne and still have the woman he loved.

The underlying issue which may become acute in the future is one that was discussed by the Labor Party before George V died. Members of the Labor Party, like Sir Stafford Cripps, suggested that if Labor had a clear majority in the House of Commons and sought to drive legislation to the statute books, there would be determined opposition from the Crown. Such opposition might be decisive if the King refused to pack the House of Lords. Under such circumstances what would be Labor's strategy? The precedent of Ulster's resistance to Home Rule in 1913 was declared to be ominous. The King's share in the fall of the Labor government in 1931 and the formation of a National government, while incompletely known, held out no assurances to the Labor Party.

Edward VIII was more of a "constitutional king" than any of his predecessors had been. He agreed with the Baldwin government that in a matter which intimately affected his private life but was of great public concern he must bow to the will of his ministers supported by the House of Commons. Will the present or a future king similarly yield if he learns from Labor ministers that they, backed by a majority of the House of Commons, insist that in a matter of public importance which outrages his private opinions—say, the nationalization of industry—he must bow to their will? In the case of Edward VIII the Labor Party supported Mr. Baldwin. In the second case will the Conservative Party support a Labor government? Perhaps the Labor Party should have asked for such an assurance before it joined in sacking the office boy.

LINDSAY ROGERS

Modern Government

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT AND POLITICS.

By Carl Joachim Friedrich. Harper and Brothers. $3.50.

EVEN political scientists have become isolationists today, separating their interests into water-tight compartments from which no leak is allowed. Books are concerned with the American Constitution or with the governments of fascist or of communist countries, and there is little attempt to discover any common threads of pattern in the web of government as a whole. Much less is there any effort to trace the reasons why so many of the threads appear short, broken, and unrelated. To this neglected field of comparative government Professor Friedrich has brought a welcome and important contribution. He believes that modern political science is not concerned with either existing or ideal forms of government but rather with instruments of political action in terms of the objectives that government is supposed to serve. Therefore his emphasis is on the working of political institutions and procedures and what he calls "common-sense" notions concerning them.

The first part of his book is devoted to modern government in the making. The microscope is first focused on the major objectives of government today and the means by which they are achieved. Beginning with a consideration of the forms of government and the methods of political action, Professor Friedrich soon deserts the beaten path and comes to grips with his subject in his illuminating discussion of the bureaucracy—using the term in no invidious sense—as the core of modern government. In the second part of the book he is concerned with what is somewhat cumbrously called "constitutionalizing modern government." Starting with the common hypothesis that a constitution means primarily the process by which the action of government is or may be effectively restrained, he canvasses the various means for such restraint with clarity and insight. His far-reaching scholarship is apparent particularly in the chapters on federalism and the territorial division of powers. The discussion of the Constitution as a political force and of political parties is thinner at the edges and makes one wish that Professor Friedrich had kept his spotlight on them until the picture emerged more clearly.

"We've gone through a lot...

- - for kids our age"

"... maybe we should try to forget. Maybe someday we'll get our chance to live. But today we can't forget...

... the things we've seen ... the horrors that filled our lives these past months.

"WE CAN'T FORGET the cries of our little brothers and sisters ... wounded, maimed, killed in the merciless onslaught of the fascist forces.

"Some of us will never see our parents again. They have died in the fight to make Spain free. Hundreds of us are without homes ... lacking food ... needing medical care.

IMPORTANT!

The extreme situation in Bilbao has caused thousands more to become homeless and hungry. Your help at this time is doubly imperative!

WON'T YOU TRY TO HELP US...

... by tearing out the coupon and mailing whatever you can to help defray the expenses of maintaining....

THE NORMAN THOMAS HOME FOR SPANISH CHILDREN which will soon be ready to house homeless children IN SPAIN

TEAR ALONG DOTTED LINE—TODAY!

- What Your Contribution Will Do
- $1,000.00 will maintain 10 orphans for one month.
 - $550.00 will equip a home for twenty war orphans.
 - $180.00 will maintain a home for 20 war orphans for 1 month.
 - $30.00 will provide equipment for 1 war orphan.
 - $12.00 will provide an infirmary for 20 war orphans.
 - $4.00 will maintain 1 war orphan for 2 weeks.
 - $1.00 will maintain 1 war orphan for half a week.

The Norman Thomas Home for Spanish Children Committee, 21 East 17th Street, New York, N. Y.

Enclosed please find $..... which is to be used for The Norman Thomas Home for Spanish Children IN SPAIN.

Name
Address
City..... State.....

Make checks payable to The Norman Thomas Home for Spanish Children Committee, 21 East 17th St., New York City. Funds will be transmitted through the United Youth Committee of the NORTH AMERICAN COMMITTEE TO AID SPANISH DEMOCRACY.

NO wonder the Old Guard rages. Gropper's been there!

William Gropper is taking a trip to America. For the next three months he will travel West and South, hitting the high spots of ordinary life. He will send back to The Nation reports in words and pictures of what he sees. Automobile workers in Detroit and farmers in the dust bowl. Share-croppers' huts and the latest in trailers for the middle class.

Gropper's drawings from life and his own comments will appear in six issues of The Nation beginning next week.

Don't miss this series by one of America's foremost artists. If you are not yet a subscriber, or if your subscription expires soon, mail the order form below at once!

ORDER FORM

THE NATION, 20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK CITY

Enter my subscription for ☐ one year for $5. ☐ two years for $8.
☐ three years for $11. ☐ I inclose my check OR ☐ I will pay in 30 days.

Name _____

Address _____

Extra Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50c

8-26-37

The chief difficulty of the volume is the lack of clarity with which its audience is envisaged. It is written, the author says, for those who are puzzled about the future of constitutional government and democracy. But these embrace a great and various multitude, and he seems to aim first at one and then at another in the throng. For persons with considerable technical knowledge, many of his discussions do not go beyond those of a college classroom, as, for example, the paragraphs on administrative law and administrative action. Technicians will also miss a developed theory of the state today. On the other hand, the novice will find some of the material hard going—for instance, the excellent theoretical treatment of responsibility and its enforcement.

Professor Friedrich has great belief in scholarship expressed in the vernacular, but at times he finds it impossible to develop some of the philosophical ideas which are his concern without resort to the language of the study and the lamp. The resultant mixture is at times a curious hybrid. Nevertheless the attempt to develop the ideas of the scholar in language intelligible to the uninitiated is a laudable one. Professor Friedrich also despises the idea of a bibliography, which he thinks might well be "washed out," but his own important and exhaustive bibliography will not be despised by those who desire to venture farther along the path where he has so brilliantly led.

JANE PERRY CLARK

VISIT
STUDY
ENJOY

MEXICO

THE
WORKERS UNIVERSITY OF MEXICO

SUMMER SCHOOL SESSION

July 5 to August 14

COURSES IN ENGLISH AND SPANISH

STUDENTS MAY LIVE IN PRIVATE HOMES

TERMS:

6	} WEEKS	$25	} TUITION
4		$18
2		$10

Information cheerfully given by

WORKERS UNIVERSITY OF MEXICO

ROSALES 26

MEXICO CITY

or by Mexican Consuls and Mexican Railway Representatives
throughout the United States

Write for Free Illustrated Catalog

JOSE MIGUEL BEJARANO

United States Representative

156 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK CITY

TWIN PINES

A Camp for Adults

3-Day Weekend—July 4th, $13.50 up
 New main house featuring individual screened sun porches and semi-private adjoining baths; comfortable bungalows.
 Sand beach bathing, boating, fishing,
 tennis, handball, basketball, baseball, etc.
 TWIN PINES ON TROUT LAKE
 S. SAIDEL, LAKE GEORGE, N. Y.

Letters to the Editors

The American Writers' Congress

Dear Sirs: To Mr. Macdonald the American Writers' Congress seems to have been (1) a maneuver of the Communist Party; (2) like the pep talks which precede the Exeter-Andover football game; (3) innocuous and boring; (4) an unintelligent effort to build up a united front of writers against fascism.

There were 358 delegates to this congress, and the only persons who thought of the congress unfavorably were Mr. Macdonald and four others who sat assiduously with him at all the sessions, and one Trotskyite who did not sit with the Macdonald group. Mr. Macdonald suggests there would have been others had they not been excluded, and that these others would have revealed to the delegates the machinations whereby they were strung on a "Stalinist" line.

Excluded? Was Mr. Macdonald excluded? Or those who sat with him? Or the other Trotskyite? The call to the congress was widely published, and in it all writers of standing were invited to sign the call and secure their credentials. Why did not the writers whom Mr. Macdonald says were excluded apply? James T. Farrell, who, Mr. Macdonald says, "didn't think it worth attending," belatedly turned up in a tropical sun helmet just before the great public meeting began, but was unable to buy a ticket as hundreds, unfortunately, were being turned away.

There is something very pathetic, and something very serious, in the attitude formulated in Mr. Macdonald's letter. It is pathetic that a man as intelligent as Mr. Macdonald is, and as honest as I once knew him to be, can see nothing in that really remarkable meeting at Carnegie Hall—where Archibald MacLeish, Donald Ogden Stewart, Earl Browder, Walter Duranty, Muriel Draper, and Ernest Hemingway spoke to an audience that overflowed the topmost seat. It is pathetic that he can see nothing in the whole congress but a "Stalinist" plot. It is serious when those with whom Mr. Macdonald has become temporarily associated attack the congress in the reactionary Saturday Review of Literature and elsewhere, and are praised editorially therefor in Hearst's New York American. By varied and circuitous routes the enemies of mankind enter the Valley of San Simeon.

The proceedings of the congress will soon be published in book form. Readers of The Nation, and the public, will then be able to decide for themselves whether the papers were as innocuous and dull as Mr. MacDonald implies.

Mr. Macdonald seems to think that questions about "the freedom with which the critic who is sympathetic to the building of socialism should comment on Soviet art and letters," or "the relationship of the writer to political parties," or "the attitude of writers who accept the people's front in politics toward revolutionary literature—must they shift their allegiance to liberal-democratic literature?" or "why left-wing literature has not come to more impressive fruition" were not answered. They were answered—by Newton Arvin, B. A. Botkin, Malcolm Cowley, Martha Gelhorn, Albert Rhys Williams, Granville Hicks, Eugene Holmes, and myself, as well as by the speakers on Friday night at Carnegie Hall. The answers apparently were not what Mr. Macdonald wanted to hear, and he was psychically deaf to them. I sincerely hope he will not be psychically blind when the book about the congress comes out next fall.

The second American Writers' Congress has made possible a national organization of writers in which the regional writers' groups (three—the Pacific Coast, the Midwest, and the Southwest—have already had congresses of their own) will be integrated and important parts. The possibilities of a national League of American Writers for enabling writers to obtain insight into the relationships between day-to-day events and the main stream of world trends are tremendous and of prime importance in the defeat of fascism. In another year, or two at the most, the new League of American Writers should be well on the way to exerting a creative influence upon American letters, and its rising tide will probably inundate the palsied inconsequence of the American Academy of Arts and Letters. For the first time in this country there will be a cultural organization, with its roots in the masses, that will actually have meaning and power.

To Mr. Macdonald this may seem only "a Communist maneuver." To those of us who are working to bring it about, it is neither a maneuver nor Communist. It is a direct effort to encourage and enable the writer to take his rightful place at the van of life. The phrase "Communist maneuver" is meaningless. It is as politically wrong as Mr. Macdonald's statement that the Socialist Party is opposed to the people's front. Is it in Spain? Or in France? No, it is not. Mr. Macdonald shouting "Communist maneuver" at the Writers' Congress is like William Green shouting "Communist" at John L. Lewis.

HENRY HART

New York, June 14

"A Cardinal of the Medici"

Dear Sirs: I am not sure that the case against Mrs. Hicks Beach's "A Cardinal of the Medici" is as strong as Mr. Weaver makes out in his review in The Nation of May 29. It seems unjust to blame her because her publisher has advertised her as "the wife of the brother of a lord." And the fact that she has devoted years to mastering the intricacies of a historic background does not necessarily imply that that she is deficient as a writer of fiction.

I believe that some of the points Mr. Weaver scores against the book are points in its favor. A vulgar formula of historical fiction is to smuggle one or two fictional characters, usually lovers, into the company of the historically illustrious and to involve some exalted historical character in the solution of their problem. Mrs. Beach has chosen for her fiction element a woman plausibly and significantly related to history. As the mother of the illegitimate hero she would have been forced to play an obscure part in the events of the time. Her activities would necessarily be limited to the realms of thought and feeling. In short, she is the perfect observer according to Henry James.

In complaining that the story should have been told from the point of view of the hero, Mr. Weaver disregards a theory of fiction indorsed by some very eminent practitioners. Dramatically there are considerable advantages in viewing the hero from the outside and working out his motives by impassioned inference. Mrs. Beach's point of view seems to me admirably chosen.

In comparison with most other fiction and popular biography with the background of the Italian sixteenth century, Mrs. Beach's book is remarkable in its order and restraint. To have presented so crowded and turbulent a period in terms more subtle than those of melodrama is almost a unique achievement.

The temper of Mr. Weaver's review is revealed in his rather picayune objection to Mrs. Beach's transference of a phrase of Keats to the sixteenth century. Surely Keats transferred many sixteenth-century phrases to the nineteenth. And Shakespeare's Cleopatra wore stays.

ROBERTS TAPLEY

New York, June 9

A Policeman's Lot

Dear Sirs: While in the office of a high police official some time ago, I noticed a copy of The Nation on a table. "Why, lieutenant," I said to the officer, "what are you doing with such seditious literature around?" The lieutenant blushed and stammered, "Oh, we have to keep track of what these enemies of the people are doing!"

SAMUEL BEER

New York, June 10

The Third Degree

Dear Sirs: Whenever major crimes come into the day's front-page headlines, as in the Gedeon, MacKnight, and Tierman murders, it seems clear to the reader that the technique of the police in obtaining information is fundamentally unsound. In these recent cases, and in various others described in the 1937 press, the suspect has very convincingly declared that what he said to the police was false, drawn from him under circumstances amounting to torture.

If mental and physical barbarities were successful in obtaining the truth from criminals, the public might perhaps be willing to condone them. But according to news accounts, the modified forms of torture so widely practiced in this country under the mild title of the third degree are proved over and over again to be just as ineffectual at getting at the truth as were the quainter wheels and spikes of our ancestors.

The public is tempted to wonder whether the breach between the psychologists, lie-detector inventors, and social workers on the one hand, and the practicing arm of the law on the other is not in itself one of our time's major defects. We are not surprised when policemen who have learned about criminals through night-stick contact sincerely believe in the efficacy of mental and physical torture. But we are disappointed when scientists who have in their hands more efficient methods of obtaining results by humane means neglect to apply their knowledge here and now, even if this requires emerging from their ivory towers.

WILLIAM D. ALLEN

New York, May 27

Wall Street Won't Heil

Dear Sirs: I am a conservative myself, and I think I know a pretty representative cross-section of Wall Street capitalists. But reports of what business men are thinking that appear in The Nation have frequently no relation whatever to my experience.

In the article on Time, Fortune, Life, in the May 22 issue, Dwight Macdonald says: "The business classes are becoming aware that something beyond old-style capitalism is necessary. This means, if they have anything to say, some form of fascism." My worry is how Mr. Macdonald can discover something in the minds of the business classes that I cannot. I feel quite sure that business men are becoming aware that unless they return to old-style capitalism, they are lost. Hitler had a certain popularity in the dingiest corners of Wall Street a year or so ago, but his sympathizers now are negligible.

I feel particularly sensitive about Mr. Macdonald's observations, as I have just returned from Vassar where I assured a palpitating class in economics that fascism had lost almost all its appeal for Wall Street.

T. H. GAMMACK

New York, June 15

Latin American Dilemma

Dear Sirs: In regard to Señor G. Arbaiza's article, Latin America: Boycott Fascism, in The Nation of June 5, I should like to make a few brief comments. (1) The reason for Latin America's silence in the Spanish war is not so much suppression as impossibility of action. The few people who would do something in behalf of the Spanish government—writers, workers, teachers, students—are too poor or have too little influence to help. (2) Spanish American dictators have not borrowed Nazi methods. We claim the dubious honor of being the forerunners of fascism. Mussolini and Hitler are disciples of Dr. Francia, Solane López, Rosas, Porfirio Diaz, Benavides. (3) How can Latin Americans boycott en masse the trade and traders of Germany and Italy when all bankers, importers, brokers, and buyers are also fascists? (4) Great sums of money are needed to counter the influence of thousands of fascists and Nazi agents throughout Latin America.

I agree with most of Señor Arbaiza's opinions but it is impossible to begin an effective boycott without a complete house-cleaning.

A. TORRES RIOSECO

Berkeley, Cal., June 11.

CONTRIBUTORS

THOMAS L. STOKES is Washington correspondent and feature writer for the Scripps-Howard papers.

ALEXANDER WERTH is Paris correspondent of the Manchester Guardian. His recent book, "Which Way France?" has been acknowledged as the outstanding work on French politics of the last decade.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER is a Seattle journalist who has frequently contributed articles on affairs in the Northwest to the New York Times, The Nation, and other periodicals.

ELIOT JANEWAY writes the monthly "Trade Currents" on the Far East for Asia.

BERTRAND RUSSELL, who fits into no one category, is among other things a philosopher, mathematician, social theorist, and an English earl. The latest of his many varied works is "The Amberley Papers," a history of his family.

PHILIP RAHV is an editor of the Partisan Review, a radical literary journal.

EDA LOU WALTON, poet and critic, is associate professor of English at Washington Square College, New York University.

ARTHUR LIVINGSTON, translator of Pareto and the plays of Pirandello, is associate professor of romance languages at Columbia University.

LINDSAY ROGERS, authority on international law, editor of the Knopf series of Political Science Classics, coauthor with H. L. McBain of "The New Constitutions of Europe," is professor of public law at Columbia.

INFORMATION FOR SUBSCRIBERS

THE NATION, 20 Vesey St., New York. Price, 15 cents a copy. By subscription—Domestic: One year $6; Two years $8; Three years $11. Additional Postage per year: Foreign, $1; Canadian, 50 cents. The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Dramatic Index, Index to Labor Periodicals, Public Affairs Information Service. Three weeks' notice and the old address as well as the new are required for change of address.

RESORTS

The Sophistication of a Smart Country Club...The Convenience of a Modern Hotel. All land and water sports...18 hole golf course...11 piece orchestra.

THE BILTMORE FIFTH AVENUE ASSBURY PARK, N. J.

Telephone Asbury Park 1456—Max Finn
A HOME-LIKE RESORT IN AN IDEAL SETTING—ON BEAUTIFUL SUNSET LAKE—Just a stone's throw from Boardwalk and Beach. Nineteen years of successful operation attest to the excellence of the Biltmore's food and service—Moderate rates—Write or telephone for reservations.

SPERLINGS LILAC LODGE

in Rockland County

The Most Beautiful Place for your vacation. Dietary laws observed. Tennis, Handball Courts.

Moderate prices for July 4th
West Nyack, N. Y. Tel. Nanuet 409

VINEYARD LODGE

Ulster Park, N. Y.

"Garden spot of Ulster County"

Where peace and tranquility reign supreme. Modern hotel midst beautiful orchard, vineyards and woodland. All sports, solariums, swimming, social activities. Rates $16 up. J. Rosenthal, Kingston 1430

Hillcrest Lodge among the Watchung Mts. 25 minutes by train, 50 by car. C. C. of New Jersey, commutation reasonable. Golf, tennis, swimming, handball.

Plainfield, N. J. Millington 364

MANHATTAN BEACH HOTEL

37 MINUTES TIMES SQUARE

MAKE THIS YOUR SUMMER HOME

Recreational Facilities. Solarium Singles 11 up
SHEEPSHEAD 3-3000

RIVERSIDE INN on Lake Housatonic. Swimming, boating. 1 3/4 hrs. from New York. $3 per day. $18 per week. Station, Derby, P. O. Seymour, Conn. Tel. Derby 598-12.

ROBIN HOOD LODGE, in the Adirondacks. One mile from Warrensburg. Private beach on Echo Lake. Tennis, handball, badminton, swimming and canoeing. Cabins. Guests met at Lake George. $20.00 and $21.00. Tel. 27-F-12. R. J. Venton.

For a Quiet, Restful Vacation Try The SHUGALA CREEK FARM. Secluded, Unpretentious, only 3 hrs. from N. Y. Shower, Electricity, Radio, Piano. Good views. Farm products supplied at table. $15 week—Children half rate. Milton Bass, Eureka, N. Y., or V. A. Vanderbilt 3-1562.

SCHOOL CAMP

LAKEWOOD MODERN SCHOOL CAMP

CARMEL, NEW YORK

A camp for boys and girls from four to fourteen years of age, where the keynote of happiness is in creative activity with a social environment developing responsibility and comradeship.

For reservations and further information write: J. A. S. H. DICK

CHILDREN'S CAMP

FAIR HAVEN

In the Bear Mt. — tion of the Ramapos

A Progressive Co-ed Camp—ages 3-16
Separate Pre-school Community. Counselor training group for campers 15-16

Streamlined creative, non-competitive activities, with individual attention. Arts and crafts, shop, dramatics, dancing, music, study of nature and stars. Archery, fishing, swimming, horses; all athletics. Outdoor and covered playgrounds. Showers in each building. Enrollment limited to 85. Write at once for reservation.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Rosman, directors.

FAIR HAVEN, Garnersville, N. Y.

Phones: Haverstraw 9879 N. Y.: BUckminster 2-7061
Pennsylvania 6-7321

RECREATION CENTER

Childrens Recreation Center

MAHOPAC, N. Y.

A home in the country for children where beautiful and happy activities are stressed • Creative work in music, dance, drama • Excellent diet • Individual guidance • Parents accommodated.

Director: Mrs. B. SIEGEL

Open all year. Winter season school age children attend local school. Bus service.

R. F. D. No. 1, Mahopac, N. Y. Tel. Mahopac 812

FOR SALE

FOR PARENTS ONLY

We have built several beautifully complete modern homes on Lounsberry Road, Croton-on-Hudson, especially for families whose children will attend the Hessian Hills School. THREE of these homes are still available.

These homes are situated on the slope of a wooded hill overlooking the magnificent Hudson... near the School and the Croton shopping center, with 50-minute express train service to Grand Central Station.

They have 6 to 8 rooms, 2 to 3 baths and all modern conveniences. Each house has nearly an acre of ground fully landscaped. Owners will share the privileges of a large private lake.

You can buy one of these exceptional homes by paying as little as $81.00 per month, including all costs—principal, interest, insurance and taxes.

For each family we will pay the tuition of one child for one year at the Hessian Hills School.

For details of this most unusual offer, inquire at the property, or

WESTMANTON REALTY CORP.

55 Fifth Avenue, New York
ALgonquin 4-5730

Woodstock, N. Y. Beautiful hillside lot, nearly 4 acres, magnificent views, large evergreens; quiet, refined section, about 7 miles from Woodstock center; double garage convertible 4-room cottage; gravity spring water, electricity; 330 ft. frontage, good road; ideal for writer, artist, summer or year round; $1500; very easy terms. Owner P. O. Box 47, Station F, New York.

SUMMER RENTALS

6 room house, furnished, open fireplace, electricity, bathing, open porch. 50 miles from New York. $500 for season. Morley, R. F. D. No. 3, Peekskill.

Charming 5 room and bath Cape Cod Colonial house, nicely furnished, located in beautiful Connecticut country on 5 acres. 65 miles from N. Y. Swimming pool, ample water, electricity, modern plumbing, porch with fine views. $350, July 1 to Sept. 15. Call Jerome 6-6714 between 6-8 P. M. Saturday and Sunday, Newtown 237-14.

Westport, Conn. Comfortable small bungalow unexpectedly available — Stonybrook Colony—Tennis, swimming, children's camp, reasonable rent. Call PEEnn. 6-8858.

Cold Spring, N. Y. Bungalow, all modern conveniences. Beautiful country. 52 miles Grand Central. Ideal for children. Counselor available. CLOverdale 8-1902 or Cold Spring 156F6.

Bungalow, 3 rooms, sleeping porch, all improvements, swimming pool. Ideal for family with children. Near Peekskill. KINGSbridge 6-9489, evenings. EDgcomb 4-5520, daytime.

Attractive country home, furnished, grounds, brook, modern, six rooms, July to Sept. 15. Moderate rental. Near Westport & Bridgeport stations. References. Box No. 936, c/o The Nation.

ROOMS FOR RENT

Airy, spacious studio room with private family. Kitchen privileges if desired. Rubin, 134 Ross St., Brooklyn. First floor.

Beautiful new artistic large light studio. 2 windows. Suitable 1 or 2. Cultured atmosphere, reasonable. Polon, 213 W. 85th St.

OFFICE FOR RENT

A BARGAIN IN OFFICE SPACE

Two private offices with reception room, unfurnished, to sublet to desirable tenant. 620 square feet, airy, light and quiet. Suitable for lawyer or other professional firm — business. Convenient to all subways. Terms and rental price very reasonable. Apply Room 404, 20 Vesey St., Garrison Bldg., New York City. Tel. COrt. 7-3330.

TRAVEL

Vacation Tours

To Mexico, California; also Europe, Palestine & Russia. Space still available on July 3rd sailing of Dr. Cohen's Group and other sailings. Ask for free literature

AMALGAMATED BANK

11 UNION SQ., N. Y., ALGON. 4-1500

RECORDS

100,000

European Recordings

Announcing an extraordinary sale of 100,000 Partophone, Odeon, Decca discs. These marvelous records comprise cream of the world's finest music. A selection to gratify every taste. Sale prices: 50c & 75c per record. Values $1.50 & $2.00. Mail orders. Catalog. GRAMOPHONE SHOP, Inc., E. 48th St., New York

SCHOOL

THE COMMUNITY SCHOOL

2059 Bedford Ave. Brooklyn, N. Y.

BUckminster 2-9700

A Low Tuition, Progressive School. Coeducational, Ages 4-13. Enriched Curriculum, Child Psychologist. Reservations for 1937-38 Now Accepted.

LITERARY SERVICES

Special Articles, Reviews, Theses, Speeches, prepared to specifications. Convenient Service. Authors Research Bureau, 516 Fifth Ave., New York.

LANGUAGES

SUMMER SPECIAL. Language Records and 15 private lessons. French, Spanish, Russian, etc. $25.00. LANGUAGE SERVICE, 507 Fifth Ave., MURray Hill 2-4221.

SITUATION WANTED

Young man, 32, cultured, cooperative, companionable, experienced practical nurse. 7 years present position, desires change, free to go anywhere. Highest character references. Box No. 933, c/o The Nation.

SUBLET

Brooklyn Heights, for summer, charming airy through apartment. Piano, radio, books, refrigeration—$45 monthly. Evenings MAin 4-0712.

2 spacious rooms, complete kitchenette. Every transportation. 82nd, Central Park W. $50. TRafalgar 7-5287 or Box No. 934, c/o The Nation.

Large 2 room kitchenette apartment, unusually attractive. Vicinity Washington Square. Write Box No. 935, c/o The Nation or Call STu. 9-1209 evenings between 6-7.

Artist's beautifully furnished studio apartment. July-August. 2 large rooms, kitchenette, bath. Reasonable. 42 E. 9th St., STu. 9-6839.

Sublet room and kitchenette, charmingly furnished. 12th floor, reasonable. July-August. Tabak, 166-2nd Ave. 12C.

ROOM TO SHARE

Refined gentleman to share comfortable airy 4 room apartment. Washington Sq. section. July and August. WAt. 9-2338.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

62 cents a line

Minimum three lines

RESORTS

THE FIELDSTONE

ON ROUND LAKE

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and recreation in the heart of the Ramapo Mountains, one hour from New York.

Swimming, boating, tennis, riding, golf, and other sports

OPENING JULY FIRST

By Reservation Only Limited to 30 Guests

Special Opening Rate
of $15 for 3-day Fourth of July weekend

P. O. BOX 297 TELEPHONE:
MONROE, N. Y. MONROE 2501

A descriptive folder will be sent at your request

The Vacation Buy of the Year

COPAKE

The Island Paradise on Beautiful Lake Copake, Craryville, N. Y.

Nationally selected as the Ideal Camp. The only camp with all lake front. Modern Bungalows with every convenience and private showers. Magnificent 18-hole championship golf course. 12 fast tennis courts. Hand ball. Saddle horses. Aquatics. Unsurpassed food and entertainment.

N. Y. Off.: 116 Nassau St. BE. 3-5590

$100 WORTH OF VACATION $30
ENJOYMENT FOR

WUNNISHAUNTA

Camp for Young Men & Women

ON LAKE WINNEPESAUKEE

QUEEN WHITE MOUNTAIN LAKES

All Modern Camp Features
Sports . . . Dancing . . . Entertainment
Excellent Cuisine

New Low Rates: $25.00-$27.50-$30.00

Write for Booklet

Mrs. Sadie Brickman, Hostess
WOLFEROO NEW HAMPSHIRE

ALL SPORTS
SOCIAL STAFF
THEATRICALS

VACATIONLAND

JULY 4TH WEEK-END
3 DAYS, $12.00 UP

SWAN LAKE, N. Y. Liberty 1078M

BIRDLAND CENTRAL VALLEY

Under new management—with improvements—where informality prevails on 210 acres within 40 miles of New York City.

Private lake—clay tennis courts—saddle horses—moonlight and daylight riding—one minute to golf—18 holes—ping-pong—croquet—horse shoes—wholesome cuisine—the best—and more.

$4.50-$5.00 per day—$25-$28 per week
LIMITED TO 50 GUESTS

Telephone: Highland Mills 7895

RESORTS

4 DAYS COOKS FALLS LODGE of sports, fun, entertainment!

A wonderful week-end

4TH OF JULY

13.50

COOKS FALLS, NEW YORK

N. Y. Office—250 W. 57th St.

Phone COLUMBUS 5-3690

RESERVE NOW!

CAMP LIVINGSTON

on Lake Sunset, Livingston Manor, N. Y.

An adult camp with all modern conveniences. Four handball courts, six tennis courts, water sports, horses. Golf nearby. Superb meals. Music and social staff under personal direction of Sol Posnack.

July 4th Week-end—$16.50

Friday supper, July 2, to Tuesday breakfast, July 6

Rates for July and August—$27.50 a week.

Mgt. SOL POSNACK and BEN LIPSCHUTZ

N. Y. Phone: TRIangle 5-0845

Camp: Livingston Manor 38 F5

NOW! New Features of NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB

extra enjoyment to your vacation

■ New NAUTICAL OUTDOOR DINING ROOM
Overlooking the Lake

■ New MOONLIGHT PAVILION
Dancing Under the Stars

★ IMPROVED SOCIAL AND ATHLETIC FACILITIES.

★ SPORTY GOLF COURSE ON GROUNDS.

★ TENNIS, HANDBALL, SADDLE HORSES, BICYCLING, SWIMMING.

★ CONTINENTAL CUISINE
Under direction Chef Jules Machol

July 4th Week-end 3 days from $21.00.
July rates from $32.50.

Send for Illustrated Circular

NAPANOCH COUNTRY CLUB

NAPANOCH, N. Y. Ellenville 700

Office: 315 FIFTH AVE. MU 4-3806

CAMP MILFORD

The Camp with that Wonderful Spirit!

In Berkshire Hills,
On Beautiful Lake

Interesting social activities. Well planned athletic program. Wholesome food. Gay informality.

JUNE RATE $25

Daily $4

July 4th Week-End

3 Days $16.50

Daily Rate $6

11 West 42nd St.

PENN. 6-7812

JULY RATE

$29.50

Daily $11

KENT CONN.

RESORTS

UNCAS LODGE

UNCASVILLE, CONN.

A charming, unpretentious modern adult camp and 165-acre New England farm. An ideal retreat for lovers of rustic beauty.

- Private Twin Lakes
- 3 Clay Tennis Courts
- Saddle Horses and Golf
- 4 Ping-Pong Tables
- Unexcelled Cuisine
- Dancing to a Fine Orchestra

"Send for Booklet"

JULY RATE $24.50 PER WEEK
$4.00 per day

Phone: PResident 1111

A Vacation Paradise

Hotel Accommodations
Country Club Activities

JULY 4th WEEKEND

Special Low Rates

Enjoy Golf, Tennis, Riding, Handball, Famous Cuisine (Dietary Laws).

Write for Booklet N.
Sarah Solomon, Man. Dir.,
Pottersville, Warren Co., N. Y.
N.Y.: 45 W. 45th. ME. 3-5430

ON SCHROON LAKE

STAR LAKE CAMP

In the glorious Adirondacks between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground for adults. 1800 feet elevation and right on the Lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Swimming, Canoeing, Handball, Baseball; Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Delicious wholesome meals that pep up the appetite. Rates $22.50 weekly.

Send for Booklet

New York Office:

116 Nassau St., Room 802a
BEekman 3-6345

Royal Hotel and Country Club

GREENFIELD PARK NEW YORK

On the scenic hills of the
SHAWANGUNK MOUNTAINS

BEN SHAW and group from New Theatre League. All sports, dancing nightly

JULY 4TH WEEK-END

3 FULL DAYS $13.50

LOW JULY RATES

DAY CAMP FOR CHILDREN

For information call—New York Office
521 Fifth Avenue—Murray Hill 2-8778
Management: H. Davis and J. Doroshkin

Carefree Friendly Informal Lake Chodikee Lodge

HAMPSHIRE PLAYERS IN DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL REPERTOIRE. ADULT SOCIAL AND ATHLETIC ACTIVITIES. LECTURE FORUM. PRIVATE LAKE.

JULY FOURTH WEEK-END
Friday Supper to Tuesday Breakfast

$18.50

RATES
27.50
UP

N.Y.C. 1202 Kings Highway. B'klyn BS. 5-4130

ARTEMIS, in the Lower Berkshires, fronted by lake. Quiet charm; delicious food; adequate comfort. $5-$10 weekends; $25 weekly. Write for literature: Artemis, Brewster, New York. Phone: 555 F5. Management by Rogers.

PINE HILL FARM HOUSE
Pleasant Valley, N. Y., Dutchess Co.
An ideal place for rest. Beautiful surroundings. Wholesome food. Modern conveniences. Tennis, bathing, fishing, rowing.
Pleasant Valley 2741 RATE $17 in June

